However, in the face of repeated and evil aggression the overall response of our Government and of the west as a whole has consisted essentially of huffing and puffing that has added little or nothing to the policy of trying to combat aggression by the Serbs. At great expense, NATO planes fly over the former Yugoslavia monitoring, patrolling and working out where the Serbian guns are, in order to report to New York.

Similarly, the United Nations monitoring officers often operate in the most hazardous of areas. I pay tribute to them, too, as my colleagues and I met two of them doing their most important work in Pale at the end of 1993. They count the shells out in great detail, and estimate from whence they are coming and where in Sarajevo or anywhere else they are landing. Again, reports are filed with their seniors, notably the United Nations in New York. However, that usually leads to nothing.

That brings me to the reluctance to use air strikes. I believe that the British Government in particular, have placed the brake on the use of air strikes. At different times when the United States Government clearly wished to take a firmer approach to the conflict in Bosnia and to stand up to the aggression by the Serbian regime of Dr. Karadzic, British Ministers said no, and urged caution.

The history books will show that the west's overall response has been poor, but the role of the British Government will stand to be especially condemned. In recent years the Serbs have tested, prodded and then understood the feebleness of the west's response. Sadly, every time Ministers from the Ministry of Defence or the Foreign and Commonwealth Office have stood up in the House to comment on the situation, when the speeches have been analysed they have served as a green light for further Serbian aggression.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House have mentioned the recent tragedy in a suburb of Sarajevo, in which innocent citizens were killed. Despite the pleading of the general who should have been in charge, senior United Nations officials said, "No, not even on this occasion will we use the sanction of air strikes." Even now the House and the Government could show some resolution. Especially when military commanders ask for them, we must allow the use of air strikes, not least for the protection of safe havens. Others have argued with great authority why we should do that, and I add my voice to theirs.

We have heard little on the subject from Ministers recently, but we need a vigorous and rigorous pursuit of the war criminals. One should not have to say that 50 years after 1945, when Britain was soon to see the Nuremberg trials. There are war criminals. We are talking about mass rapes, genocide and ethnic cleansing. Who are the criminals? They are the soldiers on the ground, but who gave them their orders? Are those people being pursued? At long last there are signs of the United Nations pursuing war criminals. Does the pursuit of war crimes have the full support—including financial support—of the British Government?

Will the Secretary of State for Defence say something about war criminals and their pursuit when he replies to the debate? Will he touch on the difficulties faced by some senior British UN officials in their daily contact with Dr. Karadzic, when they know—and we know—that they are dealing with a war criminal who one day may have to appear before the world's court?

That brings us back to our celebration of victory in Europe 50 years ago. There have been celebrations and acts of sad remembrance, but learning the full lessons of 50 years ago involves more than celebration and humming along to well-known old songs. We must relearn the lessons of 1945 in a more complex post-war period.

Bosnia is a proud and democratic cosmopolitan society, particularly Sarajevo, which I visited for three days at the end of 1993. It is a proud and democratic city. The fact that it is still being shelled mocks our pretensions of celebrating VE day and challenges our post-war hopes.

In the face of genocide more than 50 years after the holocaust, our Foreign Office policy has never dared speak its name. British foreign policy has once again been one of appeasement. Once, 55 years ago, appeasement was thrown out by our nation and our House of Commons in favour of action, and hand wringing was eventually rejected to make room for resolution. All these years later, that may be the most valuable lesson to learn from our history—the lesson that appeasement never pays and that firm action must be supported.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): In 1987, I visited the museum of the young Bosnians in Sarajevo. On the pavement just outside are, allegedly, the footprints showing from where the shots were fired to assassinate Archduke Ferdinand, which started world war one.

I was taken round the museum with a tourist group by a young woman of 19 or 20 who was extolling the great attributes and virtues of the great Serbian patriots. I asked her, "Are you a communist?" and she said that she was. I said, "If you are a communist, I cannot understand why you are extolling an individual act of terrorism. I thought that Lenin was against terrorism of that kind." But she said, "No. They were great Serb nationalists and partisan heroes." I said, "But the assassination of Archduke Ferdinand led to a war in which tens of millions of people were killed, and that in turn led to another world war in which tens of millions of people died." She replied, "What is the death of millions of people compared with the freedom of a nation?" That was 1987, and it was the voice of a young, intelligent, English-speaking Serbian communist woman.

I suspect that, in similar conversations, such statements could have been made by Croats or members of other national groups in the former Yugoslavia. When I hear talk of appeasement and simple solutions, my mind goes back to that conversation. The conflict in the former Yugoslavia is far more complex, difficult and tragic and any simple solution from outside is unlikely to produce a result.

It was noticeable that the VE day celebrations in Britain were attended by the President of the Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina, the President of the Republic of Croatia, the President of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and the President of the Republic of Slovenia, yet there was no one representing one third of the population of the former Yugoslavia in Krajina, Croatia, Bosnia, Montenegro or Serbia. That is ironic since the anniversary of the liberation of the Jasenovac concentration camp took place only a few days ago.

My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) gave a detailed historical description of the mistakes that have been made, which I shall not repeat, but at the risk of being labelled an appeaser or pro-Serb, which seems to be a term of insult used to describe those of us who say that the situation is complex and that we should consider it in its historical context, I want to say a few more things about what has happened in Croatia and the former Yugoslavia generally.

First, we must recognise that Yugoslavia is a 20th-century state established at the end of world war 1 to bring together Roman Catholic Croats, Muslims in Bosnia and elsewhere in what is now called Kosovo and the Orthodox Serbs who are found in different parts of the former Yugoslavia.

When the Nazis invaded Yugoslavia in April 1941, they completely crushed the Serbs, but they set up an independent state of Croatia, including what is now Bosnia-Herzegovina, under the Ustashi leader, Ante Pavelic. The Ustashi had a clear policy on the 2 million Orthodox Serbs in their state—convert a third, expel a third and kill a third. That was done systematically.

Between April and July 1941, the Ustashi converted, expelled and, above all, murdered hundreds of thousands of people, not just Serbs, but Jews and gipsies as well, cruelly, viciously and systematically.

In the summer of 1941, the Ustashi set up a chain of 20 concentration camps which were later used to expedite Hitler's final solution. The largest of those camps, Jasenovac, had a regular occupancy of between 3,000 and 6,000 inmates from autumn 1941 until May 1945. Few people sent to that concentration camp lived longer than three months. According to camp rules, if they lived that long, they were executed anyway. In that period, it is estimated that some 70,000 people perished in the camp, which is in the area that has just been liberated from the Serb population of Krajina by the Tudjman regime.

Reference has already been made to the former second lieutenant, Dinko Sakic, the final commander of that camp. From April 1945 onwards, the Ustashi guards at Jasenovac toiled day and night to slaughter those still surviving—Serbs, Jews and gipsies. They did so under the control of Dinko Sakic. The killing stopped on 2 May 1945 only when Tito's partisans finally liberated the area.

Anybody who is thinking and talking about events of the past week in Croatia has to understand that context. When we hear talk of appeasement, we must understand that history and that it is a little simple to associate the partisan-led, communist-led, predominantly Serb partisan forces and their successors with the Ustashi fascists of that period in quite such a glib way.

I shall make two more points. The hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) made what I thought was a very intelligent speech describing the difficulties of the military situation in the former Yugoslavia. He made a number of pertinent suggestions. I draw attention to the report of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, "The Expanding Role of the United Nations and its Implications for United Kingdom Policy", published on 23 June 1993. Recommendations 13 and 14 state:

"We consider that calls for military deployment on the ground to enforce in Bosnia a disputed peace plan have been misconceived: troops equipped for peace-keeping or humanitarian protection work cannot be transformed into a UN fighting force simply by passing a new Security Council resolution."

"We are not persuaded that it is practicable to try to impose a peace plan in Bosnia from outside. We fear that attempting so to impose a plan for the constitutional structure of part of former Yugoslavia could make things worse rather than better for the civilian population, as well as having serious consequences for the safety of UN personnel there, which includes a large British contingent".

Those words were right then and they remain right.

It is important that we recognise the limitations under which the UN mandate and the UN forces have been operating in recent years. It is regrettable that when the Security Council has met to try to find political fudges to deal with irreconcilable national differences between simplistic positions pushed in Washington and more realistic assessments put forward in Europe, it has made unworkable and unenforceable proposals that have led to great difficulties for the people on the ground who have to try to deal with the situation.

We must learn from the experience of peacekeeping not only in former Yugoslavia but elsewhere. One cannot expect the United Nations forces on the ground, the blue helmets, to solve intractable, religious, ethnic and political conflicts in states or between states. Those problems are deep-seated, complex and require serious, long-term solutions. The quick-fix approach so favoured in Washington and, unfortunately, supported by some hon. Members, will make matters far worse.

The Foreign Secretary seemed to be talking about conditions under which withdrawal might be necessary. He said that if the arms embargo were lifted, we would need to withdraw. He then admitted, as have others, that, in fact, the arms embargo is not really working anyway. He said that if the fighting flared up—it has flared up and it is flaring up—or if there were no signs of an effective peace process, we would need to withdraw. Given the attitude of the Bosnian Government, who clearly are not interested in a peace settlement on available terms and have used the ceasefire to rearm, re-equip and redeploy their forces, the attitude of the Bosnian Serbs, who clearly are not interested in a peace settlement, and the attitude now of the Croatian Government and their supporters in Bosnia, it is realistic to say that there is no sign of an effective peace process.

If we are serious about withdrawal, we must consider how long it would take. If it becomes necessary—and I think it will—we must think about when it will be carried out. This is May, and if withdrawal takes six months, we need to think about the onset of winter. The forces have been there through two winters in difficult conditions. It is a terrible thing to say, but perhaps we have been lucky that casualties have been so low. We should think of what withdrawal would be like in a third winter, when the conflict might be much greater. Perhaps we cannot get the forces out, but what is the point of their staying if they cannot do the job that they are there to do?

I do not normally feel sorry for the Foreign Secretary but I have enormous sympathy for him because of the dilemma in which he finds himself, and I admire the way in which he put it. We are in an impossible situation, and we have to convince the British people of that because talk of appeasement, winning for one side and of the balance of force shifting is not the right approach. We must soon come to the view that we cannot go on any longer. We must recognise that there is a limit to how long we can simply sit ineffectively hoping for something to turn up.

9.16 pm

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): The debate has been well informed, and a great many hon. Members have taken part. It has been characterised by the deep sincerity of every hon. Member who spoke. They all expressed their views with deep conviction. The right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) admitted that he was pessimistic, and my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Gapes) also ended on a pessimistic note.

The views that were expressed in the debate have not followed the traditional Government-Opposition line. The views of some Conservative Members were identical to those of some of my hon. Friends, but the House is none the poorer for that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South gave us a telling, chilling reminder of what is happening in that piece of land that is called Croatia in the former Yugoslavia. My hon. Friend has had much experience over the years in international matters, and as he was also the last Back-Bench Member to speak in the debate, what he said makes a deeper impression because it is fresh in our minds.

By contrast, my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) spoke with optimism about some of his experiences in Sarajevo, and my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Wicks) also had a different view and a different interpretation. The House benefits from such views.

This is one of a series of debates. Over the past three years, I think that I have attended all the debates on Bosnia and the former Yugoslavia. I have heard people hone their arguments, and I have perhaps detected a greater tolerance between hon. Members with different views. I have seen the House wrestle to try to decide the most propitious role for Britain and the United Nations in trying to avert an all-out war in the Balkans. On some occasions hon. Members have described the policy as one of containment, and I do not think that that is bad.

I remember in the early days arguing from the Opposition side of the House that there should be early pre-positioning and deployment of troops in Macedonia. That is something that my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. O'Hara) and the hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) know a great deal about. That was a wise argument. We were so pleased that the Government, and later the international community, accepted that approach, and we have at least contained the problem in Macedonia.

Vigilance is always necessary. We must always be careful and we can never be complacent, but, so far, all-out war in the Balkans, which was so widely predicted three years ago, has not occurred. Having said that, we are all aware that an unhappy state and society exists in former Yugoslavia, Bosnia and Croatia.

As several hon. Members have mentioned, it is poignant that we are discussing military matters on the day after all of us, I think, have been involved in our own VE day celebrations. The hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) made a great point of that. Coming from the base and constituency that he represents, that is not a surprise.

I think all 13 hon. Members who have spoken have paid tribute to the professionalism of British troops. It is timely that today we read the official notices in the newspapers that 41 members of our armed forces have been honoured for their services and bravery in former Yugoslavia. Congratulations go to them all from every hon. Member.

Just to make a point, I should like to mention some of the people honoured. It would be singularly appropriate to mention Corporal Wayne Mills, who was awarded the first conspicuous gallantry cross. Members will know that that is the highest award after the Victoria cross. He is a brave individual.

I am prepared to pay great tribute to General Sir Michael Rose. He has served this country well. He served 12 months in his office, and not many of his predecessors were able to stick the post for that period. It is virtually an impossible job, but he stuck to it and I am sure that he was as robust with Salidic, Izetbegovic and Karadzic as he was with my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook). General Rose told me about his robust and, I think, two-sided exchange with my hon. Friend. It was right that a debate took place, and it is healthy that politicians and senior military people have such a frank exchange of views.

Time and again, Lieutenant-Colonel David Santa-Olalla of the Duke of Wellington's Regiment showed his bravery and the strength of British officers by leading by example. His citation refers to his work in Gorazde. Having been to that enclave, I pay tribute to him. Those two officers received the distinguished service order.

Military crosses were won by Corporal Andrew Rainey and Sergeant Gary Cryer. It is important to mention non-commissioned officers. The great strength of the British Army and all armed forces lies in their NCOs. They go out with small detachments and, especially in former Yugoslavia, they have immense responsibility. They must take the decisions to interpret the rules of engagement. They are provoked almost beyond their wisdom, yet they manage, because of their training and discipline, to resist the temptation.

Largely through their experiences in Northern Ireland, where similar types of command and control operations exist, the NCOs of our British forces are among the best in the world. Perhaps it is worth while to recall, as other hon. Members have reminded us, that that bravery is not without danger. We have lost 13 of our troops. If we think of it in a more general way, with our troops being part of a larger force, 162 young men have lost their lives, 162 families throughout the world have been bereaved, and 162 families obviously wonder whether the price was worth paying. Those are not easy judgments to reach.

Opposition Members have tried to support the Government's policy in Bosnia. At times we have been ahead of them, but we believe that, by and large, they have followed the correct line. As my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Wicks) suggested, we have been disappointed about the Government's commitment to war crime trials; we consider that very important, and I hope that the Secretary of State for Defence will assure us that the Government are entirely committed to the exercise.

We have concentrated on Bosnia in our debates, but the events of the past week have again highlighted the problems in Croatia as a potential flashpoint in the wider war that may emerge in the Balkans. That may indeed be a danger: we shall have to watch the position carefully. We are all wondering what action to take against the Serbs for the breach of the UN's safe area mandate; meanwhile, I hope that every diplomatic effort is being made to point out to President Tudjman that he flagrantly invaded a UN-protected area of sector west. I do not think that that serious issue has been raised during this debate, or generally.

It is appropriate that both the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Ministry of Defence are involved in the debate, and highly appropriate for it to have been opened by the Foreign Secretary. That has served to emphasise what I regard as the cardinal point: ultimately, the problems in the Balkans can be resolved only through negotiation and diplomacy. I firmly believe that the country that we are discussing cannot be conquered by military means; we must have a diplomatic solution. That was at the core of the argument advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), who made some thoughtful and positive suggestions.

Having said that, let me add that Opposition Members take the view that, if threats are to be made, there will come a time when they must be backed up. It cannot be right for threats against the United Nations to be treated with impunity. We believe that, while air power alone solves little, there are occasions—as we have seen in the past—when its use gets the message across.

I want to probe the Foreign Secretary on that, because I felt that he was not as forthcoming as he might have been. It was reported in today's newspapers that General Rupert Smith had requested air power, but had been overruled. May I ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether that is true? If so, was he overruled by Mr. Akashi or by his superior officer, General Bernard

[Dr. David Clark]

Janvier? It is important for the House to know whether the decision was made for diplomatic, political reasons, or for very good military reasons.

During the debate, it was argued that this was not a peacekeeping mission. The hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) referred to a document entitled "Wider Peacekeeping", which has just been published by the British Army—a very good document, which the hon. Gentleman has clearly had time to examine. That manual differentiates between peacekeeping, wider peacekeeping and peace enforcement. It has been widely acclaimed, and I know that it is highly regarded in the United Nations. The publication gives interesting definitions for those three terms:

"In peacekeeping the performer carries only a balancing pole and there is a hushed and respectful silence in the crowd as the performer walks the tightrope."

In wider peacekeeping, the performer carries the same balancing pole, and walks the identical tightrope:

"He also has the general consent of the parties to the conflict. However, on this occasion it is apparent that not everyone approves of his performance and the circus audience is restive and noisy. Some individuals are even throwing missiles at the tightrope walker as he makes his journey."

That graphically makes the point that in Bosnia, we are playing a wider peacekeeping role. It is important that we understand that point, and it is clear that British troops already do so. Corporal Mills, whose award of the Conspicuous Gallantry Cross was announced today, said:

"Working for the United Nations in Bosnia is an extremely difficult job. You are not there to fight a war. Your aim is to ensure that the food and other supplies get through to the Bosnian population—the victims of the war.

You never know when one of the warring factions is going to take a dislike to the UN and start taking pot shots. You have to be prepared for it and respond to the situations as they occur."

Corporal Mills puts in clear terms Britain's mandate in Bosnia. It is incumbent on us all to make it clear to our constituents that restricted mandate and the fact that we do not have a peace enforcement role. Our role is to get the humanitarian aid through, and we have been most successful in that. As long as British troops can continue to do that, we ought to support them.

The Secretary-General of the UN requested reinforcements. I was pleased in January to hear the Secretary of State for Defence announce that the Government intended to dispatch another three Chinook, six Lynx and six Gazelle helicopters. Why are we waiting? What have no Chinook or Gazelle helicopters been delivered and only four of the six Lynx helicopters been delivered? There may be good reasons, but the House has a right to know them.

Will the Secretary of State for Defence clarify the Government's position on the arms embargo? On 31 July 1994, the Secretary of State—after stoutly maintaining opposition to any lifting of the embargo because it would put our ground troops at unnecessary risk—announced that Britain no longer opposed the lifting of the embargo. On 21 November, the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) was much more robust:

"We judge that the lifting of the arms embargo would lead to an intensified conflict with severe risks that UNPROFOR would be caught up in the fighting and lose its impartiality in the eyes of the warring factions. In such circumstances, UNPROFOR could no longer carry out the UN mandate and would have to withdraw."

I understand that, and I also heard the Foreign Secretary speak only last week about the need to withdraw UNPROFOR if the arms embargo was to be lifted. We know the consequences of lifting the embargo, but what is Government policy on that specific point?

I make one further point about the withdrawal of UN troops. I understand that it is very important to provide confidence in our ability to get the troops out if necessary. If we can get that confidence across, there is every reason to believe that the nations that have troops there will have the confidence to keep them there. It is a vital point.

I know that an international exercise has just finished, and that the Ministry of Defence and NATO are evaluating its results. I do not want press the Minister too hard on Operation Arcade Guard, but I want to press him on a couple of other points.

In the worst case scenario, if we and the rest of UNPROFOR have to withdraw our troops, we know, as has been said in the House today, that it may require up to 50,000 troops. The Americans are, I think, going to provide about half of those.

We are concerned about the different lengths of time that it has been suggested might be needed to withdraw. It has been suggested that withdrawal might take up to six months. Another suggestion is that it could be completed in six weeks. The shorter the period, the better the prospects for getting the troops out, if necessary. Can the Secretary of State for Defence assure us that everything is being done to facilitate the shortest period for extracting the troops?

Other hon. Members have raised this critical point, but I take it that it is absolutely certain that NATO will have the command and control of the troop extraction. I think that the whole House would be happier if that was the case. Perhaps the Secretary of State for Defence could say a word about the attitude of French Government on that point, because we understand that they have slight difficulties—theological difficulties, almost—with that command and control system.

The situation is Bosnia is very complicated. If it had been easy, we all know that the problem would have been solved. But the problem is there, and is not going to go away. The role of the UN has not always been understood, so the role of UNPROFOR and our troops has not always been understood.

We believe that our troops and UNPROFOR have been doing sterling work. We believe that they have kept alive tens of thousands of people, and that they are giving us the breathing space during which we can pursue diplomatic solutions. We equally accept that there may come a time when the risks to our troops are so great that we cannot justify them being there. If we can keep our troops there, and if they can continue doing a worthwhile job, the Government will have our support, as do the troops.

9.37 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): It has been a feature of virtually all the speeches that have been made by hon. Members on both sides of the House to pay tribute to the courage and great skill with which our troops are carrying out their responsibilities in Bosnia and the former Yugoslavia. I do not lightly thank hon. Members for making such remarks because it is of very real importance to the morale of our forces in Bosnia and elsewhere to know that they have the unqualified admiration and support of hon. Members on both sides of the House. That is something for which we can genuinely give thanks.

There has been an understandable and inevitable comparison or juxtaposition of the victory in Europe ceremonies and commemorations over the past few days with the fact that Europe is experiencing one of the most savage and traumatic wars within a state of Europe since the Spanish civil war in the 1930s.

There is a tendency in some quarters to suggest that somehow the responsibility for the sheer savagery and atrocity that we have seen in the former Yugoslavia has to be shared by the west as a whole or by the United Nations or by NATO. I understand the emotions that give rise to such comments, but I believe that it is crucial to emphasise that the responsibility for what happens in former Yugoslavia is to be found overwhelmingly with those within former Yugoslavia who have initiated the conflict. I sometimes hear suggestions that the conflict would have been avoided if only the west had done this or that or NATO had initiated this policy rather than that policy. I do not believe that such views are grounded in a credible explanation or analysis of the problem.

We are all well aware that, for a good number of years, former Yugoslavia was slowly but almost inevitably disintegrating. The forces that might have prevented that could have come only from within former Yugoslavia, not from outside. We know that, once Slovenia had declared its independence and Croatia had broken away, whatever the diplomacy of Germany or the European Union or whatever the views of the UN or NATO, the idea that Bosnia-Herzegovina could have escaped the consequences of the disintegration of Yugoslavia is not a correct analysis. In reaching a judgment about the success or failure of the UN and other forces that have been active there, one must bear that fact in mind.

Let me examine for a moment the suggestion by my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Sir. P. Cormack), that, in a fundamental way, the UN has failed in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Of course I accept that, if one measures success or failure by our aspirations, clearly the UN can be said to have failed. However, compared with all historical precedents by international organisations, a far more powerful case can be made that the UN, while not realising its full aspirations, has achieved more in Bosnia than in almost any previous operation either by the UN or by the League of Nations before it. One has only to go back to the previous great war within Europe, the Spanish civil war, to see that the League of Nations was unable to make even the most minor impact of a humanitarian kind and how the great powers adopted their clients and provided arms and in no way sought to dampen the conflict in that savage period.

That must be compared with what has been achieved over the past three years by British and other forces of the UN. It can be compared with what has happened in Angola, Cambodia or Somalia—other wars which are not dissimilar and where people have slaughtered each other in hundreds of thousands or, in the case of Cambodia, in millions. In those cases the UN could begin to be involved only once a ceasefire had been agreed. Only after a ceasefire was agreed in Cambodia, after many years of senseless slaughter, did the UN send forces for the first time. After 15 years of bloody civil war in Angola, it is only in the past few weeks, again when a political ceasefire has been agreed by the competing armies, that the UN has felt able to intervene.

We can compare all those facts with what has been achieved so far by the UN in Bosnia. In the past three years, as hon. Members have pointed out, many tens of thousands of lives have been saved. Many people would have been slaughtered in the conflict or would have died from starvation or from a lack of medical supplies. In addition, we should remember the not unreasonable forecast of three years ago, that, if we did not take the necessary steps, it would be a conflict not just in Bosnia but would spread to Macedonia, Kosovo and throughout the Balkans. That could still happen, but the fact that it has not happened yet is in no small measure due to the achievements of the United Nations in providing a focus for stability in Bosnia, Croatia and Macedonia.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Nobody—my right hon. and learned Friend has acknowledged this—disputes for a moment the wonderful work of the British and other troops working for UNPROFOR. However, to suggest that this is analogous to civil wars in Africa is not correct. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) and the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) have all said, this is not a civil war in the accepted sense of that phrase. It began as a war of aggression, with Serbia determined to create a greater Serbia.

Mr. Rifkind: While I was going to deal with that point later, I shall deal with it now in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South. I hope that we will not get into too much of a terminological debate about whether the phrase "civil war" does or does not describe exactly what is happening within Bosnia. There is not much disagreement between the different points of view. We all acknowledge that President Milosevic and Serbia bear more responsibility than anyone else for the initiation of the conflict.

We also all accept that probably 95 per cent. of those doing the fighting in Bosnia are Bosnian Serbs, Bosnian Croats and Bosnian Muslims. There are no foreign armies in Bosnia, and Bosnia has not been invaded by another state. There is much external interference, but that is not a feature unique to this particular conflict. While my hon. Friend was right in saying that the various communities within Bosnia lived in peace and harmony with each other for many years, it is also true—as has been mentioned by a number of speakers—that Yugoslavia in general, and Bosnia in particular, has in the past experienced more bloody civil war, butchery and slaughter from all sides than almost any other part of Europe.

My hon. Friend must only look at the memoirs of that gallant soldier Sir Fitzroy Maclean, who, when he was sent to Yugoslavia during the war, recorded his instructions from Churchill as being to make contact with the various resistance groups and to identify and advise the British Government which of those groups was spending more time trying to kill Nazis than each other. As he concluded that Tito's partisans on balance—it was only on balance—were spending more time attacking the Nazis, the United Kingdom and our allies chose to give support to that group. There is a history which we cannot ignore, and there has been great internecine hatred in Bosnia.

[Mr. Rifkind]

The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) made a number of comments, some of which I agree with. He rightly emphasised the great importance of the UN and the international community not making threats which they are not prepared to carry out. I freely acknowledge—the British Government have emphasised this point on many occasions—that one of the great factors in this issue is the tendency of international organisations and politicians of all persuasions and from all parts of the world to declare that certain things are unacceptable and that certain matters will not be tolerated when it is clear that none of the Governments concerned, or the international community as a whole, intends doing the minimum necessary to give credence to those threats. I accept that there must be a link between the language we use and the action that we are prepared to take.

With regard to the use of air power within Bosnia, the UN and NATO have shown on several occasions their willingness to use such power in appropriate circumstances. Questions were raised regarding the response of the UN to the mortar attacks on Sarajevo in the past couple of days. I am not at liberty to speculate as to what detailed discussions might have taken place within the UN, but I agree with the hon. Member for Livingston that we must allow the UN's own chain of command to come to a judgment as to whether to ask NATO for military action in the specific case.

I strongly agree with the hon. Gentleman's remark that it is highly damaging to the authority and credibility of UN if evidence of internal disagreements within that chain of command become known. The matters should of course be discussed, but we believe that differences of opinion within the UN should be kept as matters to be resolved and presented to NATO and the international community in the manner suggested by the hon. Gentleman.

I refer to the remarks made about the implications for the NATO alliance of the strains and pressures which have developed between NATO and the UN in the past couple of years. My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) and the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) pointed to the problems which have arisen as a result of the dual key, and the need for both the UN and NATO to agree before military action is taken.

It is perhaps inappropriate to say that the dual-key arrangements are the cause of the tension. They are the consequence, not the cause, of the phenomenon that, while the UN troop contributors are on the ground, the United States has been solely concerned with the use of air power. The need has arisen, therefore, for as long as that remains the case, for both ground and air commanders to be in agreement before military action is taken, or there will be grave danger to the lives and safety of forces on the ground.

It is precisely because the United States has agreed, in the event of any need to withdraw from Bosnia, to contribute substantial ground forces in addition to those being provided by the present troop contributors, that the problem of dual key will not arise with regard to NATO action that might be needed in the event of a withdrawal—NATO would be invited to supervise such a withdrawal. Clearly, if the United States, as well as western European and other countries, is on the ground with significant forces, it is right and proper that command and control can be concentrated in single hands.

Mr. Macdonald: Will the Secretary of State say something about the suggestion that British forces will be withdrawing from Gorazde, bearing in mind what happened in Bihac when the French forces withdrew and were replaced by a wholly inadequate force? Can he assure us that British forces will not be withdrawn until he is confident that they will be replaced by a force that is at least as competent?

Mr. Rifkind: We are not contemplating the withdrawal of any forces from Bosnia—

Mr. Macdonald: From Gorazde.

Mr. Rifkind: I am answering the hon. Gentleman.

Within Bosnia, how the UN uses the forces supplied by the various countries is primarily a matter for the UN commander. It is right and proper that the principle of rotation should apply, and we have expressed that view publicly as well as privately. One should not expect one country—whether Britain, France or wherever—to carry out one role, in an exposed way, over a prolonged period. Those matters are under discussion and no final decisions have been reached. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs emphasised earlier, the United Nations does not believe in the principle of unilateral action to withdraw troops from Bosnia-Herzegovina, and that will continue to be our policy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) made some pertinent remarks about Macedonia, and I pay tribute to the responsible way in which the Government of that country have acted to try to ensure a continuation of stability in that locality. He raised one or two technical matters and there will, perhaps, be a letter on its way to him to deal with those matters for which I do not have direct responsibility.

On the basic question of whether the United Nations should stay in Bosnia-Herzegovina, or whether the case for withdrawal has changed significantly in recent times, my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) suggested that perhaps the time had come for those forces to be phased out. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), in a speech to which I listened with great care, emphasised that forces could well be stuck there for up to 10 years before the war came to a conclusion.

We have emphasised that the presence of British forces in Bosnia should be based, first, on whether they can carry out the mandate that they have been given and, secondly, on whether they can do so without undue risk to themselves. When considering the arguments for and against their presence or withdrawal, let us also consider for a moment the advantages of withdrawals.

Clearly, the first would be the ending of risk to the lives and safety of British and other UN forces. Secondly, there is an argument that that presence has become pointless and that they are not achieving anything, or not sufficient to justify their continuing presence in the country. Thirdly, there is an argument—it was not heard much today, but it is raised occasionally—that the presence of the United Nations may prevent the conclusion of the conflicts by creating a rigid situation that prevents either side from enforcing a military solution.

I understand those arguments. Like all such arguments, there is some truth in them all, but I must point out to the House the opposite point of view and the disadvantages that would flow from a premature withdrawal. We must contemplate what would happen if not just the United Kingdom but the United Nations withdrew from Bosnia, and see whether we are prepared to live with those consequences.

We must assume that the immediate impact would be the overrunning of the enclaves, not just of Gorazde, Tuzla or Srebrenica but of Sarajevo itself. Those would be difficult to defend because, even in the immediate aftermath of a withdrawal, the Bosnian Government would not have received any additional military hardware of a substantial kind in a time scale that would be likely to be decisive for that purpose. So enclaves controlled by the Bosnian Government would be immediately snuffed out.

Secondly, one must envisage the implications of the inevitable raising of the arms embargo in the event of a UN withdrawal. Do we wish to encourage that to be brought about, with the flooding of arms into Bosnia? Although arms have been getting to the Bosnian Government forces, they have certainly not included heavy artillery and weaponry which would be a consequence of the lifting of the embargo.

Another factor is whether we are simply contemplating withdrawal from Bosnia-Herzegovina and assuming that, somehow, the United Nations could continue in Macedonia and Croatia. That is a highly improbable scenario. We must accept that, if there were a withdrawal from Bosnia, it would have to be part of a wider withdrawal from the whole of former Yugoslavia, with all the consequences that could flow from that for Macedonia, Croatia and other parts of the region.

Finally, we must consider the implications for Kosovo, an area that has been extremely tense for a number of years, with a 90 per cent. Muslim population within an area controlled from Belgrade, which we know could at any time erupt into serious conflict.

Against that background, the other question that I would ask the House to consider, and which the British Government certainly consider as of great significance, is whether we can say at this stage that we must write off any prospect of a political settlement and that, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford predicted, the war will simply drag on month after month, year after year, for the indefinite future. It may be unwise to make that judgment at this stage.

As a number of hon. Members said, the ceasefire progressed during the winter months when one would not expect much military conflict and, as spring approached, so the fighting resumed. It is worth remembering, however, that fighting has not resumed throughout Bosnia and is still extremely limited.

Like many hon. Members who have visited Bosnia, each time that I have been in that country over the past three years, I have experienced a further extension of the area that is slowing returning to normality. A year and a half ago, one saw not just conflict between Serbs and Bosnian Government forces but an equally savage civil war between Croats and Muslims in central Bosnia. Now, the area of the country where British troops are most concentrated is overwhelmingly peaceful.

It will not necessarily remain so, but, for the past year, when one has travelled from Croat to Muslim area, one has not even seen military patrols on the borderline between Croat and Muslim communities, as was the feature of the countryside even 12 months ago.

Although British forces in Gorazde are in an area of great tension, the vast majority are carrying out crucial tasks in a large part of Bosnia that has seen no conflict for a year or 18 months but which would have to anticipate a dramatic and devastating return to conflict if the UN pulled out and thereby created or precipitated a very serious vacuum of power.

Obviously, withdrawal may become necessary. As my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary told the House clearly, we cannot afford to contemplate a situation in which our troops cannot carry out the tasks imposed on them, and in which they are used as a target by any of the competing factions. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South objects to the word "faction", but, whatever word one uses, all the separate groups within Bosnia have seen the United Nations as a legitimate target on certain occasions. That would be intolerable if it developed as some people predict.

The House has acknowledged the great gallantry of British troops in Bosnia. I thank the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) for the justified remarks that he made about several of the individual soldiers serving in Bosnia, especially the gallant colonel who has been the first recipient of the conspicuous gallantry cross, a new recognition of a very—[HON. MEMBERS: "Corporal."] I am sorry; I thank the House for that correction. It would no doubt be deserved, but the citation for that gallant soldier fully recognises the dangers confronted by British and other UN troops in the most difficult of circumstances.

The conclusion of the Government—and I suspect of the whole House—at this moment is that the United Nations presence in Bosnia continues to be justified. Although the work being done is difficult and often receives precious little thanks—including from those who benefit from it—we can nevertheless take great pride in it. I pay tribute to those who have made it possible.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Monday 15th May, the Speaker shall put the Questions on the Motions in the name of Mr. John M. Taylor relating to the draft Conditional Fee Agreements Order and Regulations 1995 not later than one and a half hours after the first such Motion has been made; and the said Motions may be entered upon and proceeded with, though opposed, after Ten o'clock.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

Punjab (Treatment of Sikhs)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

10 pm

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): I wish to bring to the attention of the House the continuing persecution of the Sikhs living in their homeland, the Punjab—an issue that I have brought before the House on three previous occasions in the 12 years that I have been a Member of Parliament.

I noticed that nearly 30 hon. and right hon. Members were in the Chamber to listen to a debate about Bosnia, in which British people are not really interested because it is not of direct concern. We now have a debate—at least, a statement—about the position in a Commonwealth country, and the 30 people who were in the Chamber at 10 o'clock have almost all left. I find that surprising and disappointing.

Sikhs in my constituency and throughout the world are worried for relatives and friends who continue to live in that part of India. The rape of young women, the beating of old men and the murder of young boys, together with the imprisonment without trial of thousands of innocent people, have been taking place for more than a decade and continue to this day.

Living in fear is part of everyday existence in Punjab. The freedom that we take for granted in Britain does not exist in that part of India.

Recent evidence obtained from police files shows that bodies of police suspects murdered in police custody have been cremated as "unclaimed" and that that practice has continued since 1984. The documents that I have with me were given by or bought from police authorities in the Punjab. They list names of people relating to the bodies that have been cremated; yet the Indian authorities denied the existence of such records.

The Indian Express carried a front-page story in its edition of 3 February 1995, in which it said that, during the three years 1991-93, the Punjab police dumped about 426 bodies for cremation as "unclaimed" on the Patti Municipal Committee. In many cases, the relatives had not been informed even though the bodies had been identified.

In the same region last year, another 17 "unclaimed" bodies were sent by the police for cremation. Why cremation? Because burnt bodies cannot be examined later for evidence of torture or other abuse.

Police sources have disclosed that, although some of those so-called "missing persons" may have died as a result of torture while in police custody, others may have been eliminated because they had some evidence of police brutality—in other words, they had witnessed what was going on, and they had to be put away together with those who were murdered as suspects.

A local human rights group brought that position to the attention of the Indian high court, but its action was dismissed on the grounds that only relatives of murdered individuals could be party to any litigation. That approach is a bit like telling the relatives of Kuwaitis who disappeared during the occupation of Kuwait to apply to the Iraqi high court in Baghdad for an inquiry to be held into their disappearance.

Investigations into allegations of police torture are rare and, even when such allegations have been established, prosecutions have not taken place. According to recent reports by Amnesty International, there is no evidence of a police officer having been convicted of human rights violations in Punjab. That says it all about the so-called free and democratic nature of that place and the police reaction to law and order.

The British Parliament has refused to condemn the behaviour of the Indian Government, no matter how well documented the facts are. The Government refuse, supposedly because India is a powerful Commonwealth country. Indeed, India refers to itself as the "largest democracy in the world". Perhaps the phrase the "largest hypocrisy" is more appropriate; it is one that I use frequently to describe that Government and that country. The Labour party, with its close links with the Congress party and the Gandhi family, prefers to say nothing at all—I suppose that that is par for the course for that party.

Abuses elsewhere, such as in Bosnia and in parts of the Soviet Union, have led to condemnation by our Government. Why have the Indian Government escaped Britain's wrath? If the Indian Government have nothing to hide, what are they attempting to cover up? Why will they not grant me a visa to enter the country? I reiterate my offer to the Indian Government; if my Sikh friends are telling me lies, I will condemn them outright upon my return from Punjab; on the other hand, if the Indian Government have been misleading the rest of the world, I will shout the facts from the rooftops upon my return to Britain.

With such a reasonable offer available, perhaps the Government and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs will seek to persuade the Indian Government to grant me a visa. I sincerely hope that they will. As the elected representative of some 8,000 Sikhs, I believe that it is important that I see the position for myself. I hope that, with the help of the Foreign Office, I shall gain access to that country.

Recognition of the rights of Sikhs who are living in Punjab is all that Sikhs elsewhere want. That means the right to press for self-determination and to strengthen the call for an independent Kalistan. Sikhs cannot understand how Britain, which is their mother country in some ways, can take such determined action against the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and yet stand by and do nothing about human rights abuses in India. They wonder why they are treated differently, but they are also aware that Punjab is not an oil-rich region. Our Government give the impression that they are being selective in their opposition to human rights abuses. If that impression is to change, our Government must condemn outright the behaviour of the Indian Government.

There should be no aid programme to India, particularly because aid is now tied to good human rights practices. If that is the case, how can we give a penny to the Indian Government which use and abuse the Punjabi people in their own country? If that has no effect, I believe that our Government should break off all diplomatic ties with India. Perhaps the "curry club" lunches between hon. Members in the House and the people who represent the Indian Government should also come to an end. There can be no appeasement of a Government who treat one of their ethnic minority groups in that way.

We are now celebrating the end of the second world war—a war that was fought to preserve freedom of expression, freedom from tyranny and freedom of self-determination. In Punjab there is no freedom of expression, only its restriction. In Punjab there is no freedom from tyranny, only the fear of tyranny. In Punjab there is no freedom of self-determination, only the ability to whisper the word "Kalistan", because to do otherwise would put lives at risk.

For Sikhs in Punjab, we should read Muslims in Kashmir. Who is causing their suffering? It is none other than the Indian Government. The Sikhs in Punjab and the Muslims in Kashmir turn to us for help. They believe in the democratic principles upon which our Parliament is based. How much longer must they suffer and how many more excuses will be found to justify ignoring their pleas?

As I said earlier, this is the fourth time that I have raised the issue on the Floor of the House of Commons. I suspect that, for the fourth time, my hon. Friend will read a Foreign Office brief and that no further action will be taken. I suspect that there will be no effort to help me to secure a visa to visit India. I suspect that the Government will not raise the issue of human rights with the Indian Government and that they will not consider doing away with the aid programme because of the abuse of human rights in India. I shall probably hear—with great respect to my hon. Friend—platitudes and no firm decisions.

There are about 300,000 Sikhs in this country. The 8,000 Sikhs in my constituency will want to know how Parliament can spend hours talking about Bosnia—which is of no concern to this country in any shape or form; the Balkans were never part of the Commonwealth—yet can debate this very important issue for half an hour four times in 12 years. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) has many Sikhs in his constituency, so I now give way to him to say whatever he wants to say.

10.8 pm

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) for raising this very important subject. As he said, many thousands of Sikhs live in Gravesend and Northfleet in my constituency. They are very concerned about their families and friends who remain in Punjab and many hundreds of my Sikh constituents travel to Punjab every year to visit them. They find the situation there to be extremely insecure.

In this country we take it for granted that human rights will always be preserved, and that if difficulties arise for ourselves and our families, in extremis we can turn to the police for help. Those are freedoms and rights not easily available to residents in Punjab. Not only are their families vulnerable to the depredations of the police but, if things go wrong and they are the victims of extortion or violence of any sort, they cannot have recourse to the police authorities, as should be their right.

What remains in Punjab is an extreme uneasiness for the individual, especially as there has been no proper investigation of the considerable number of cases of people who have disappeared over the years. Families throughout Punjab—and therefore, by extension, families in this country—have seen their members disappear. Justice does not ensue.

I know of a case of a constituent who—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. As I understand it, this is an intervention.

Mr. Arnold: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I thought my hon. Friend had finished: now I am not sure whether he has.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No, I distinctly heard the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) say that he would give way.

Mr. Dicks: I am quite willing to allow my hon. Friend to finish what he has to say before I resume, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Let us have a little order here. First, I hope that the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) has the Minister's permission too. This is not something that can just be done off the cuff, on the spur of the moment. Does the hon. Member have the Minister's permission?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tony Baldry): I am perfectly content for my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham to intervene, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington finished his speech?

Mr. Dicks: If it helps, Mr. Deputy Speaker, yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In that case, the hon. Member for Gravesham may speak.

Mr. Arnold: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for clarifying the situation, because I thought that I was making a speech supporting my hon. Friend's admirable speech in his Adjournment debate.

I was saying that many of my constituents are concerned about the lack of follow-up to the disappearances that have occurred in Punjab, especially when young men from their extended families have disappeared. For instance, there was a ghastly case of a young man disappearing and all the stories were that he was being held in prison in a police station. The family was eventually advised that the young man had died in custody, yet only a few weeks later he was clearly seen at the window of the prison. When the case was pursued with the prison authorities and the place was eventually checked out, the young man had disappeared yet again.

With my Latin American experience, I know about the concerns about those who have disappeared in Argentina. In the last decade of the 20th century such dreadful things are still happening.

It is especially relevant to raise the matter in the House of Commons, because until 1947 the House was responsible for the conduct of affairs in India. In some ways the agreement made by Mountbatten with the successor authorities, especially Nehru and the Congress party, for the creation of India led to the current position. The great Sikh leaders of the day took at his word and at face value the promises that Mr. Nehru made them concerning the autonomy and the governance of greater Punjab, as it then was—promises that he subsequently broke.

[Mr. Arnold]

As a result of the haste with which we left India and of the lack of care taken at the time to ensure that the legitimate rights of the Sikhs were sustained, we have a responsibility.

The debate is especially relevant this week, because over the past weekend we have celebrated Victory in Europe day. While I was doing so in my borough of Gravesham, I met an elderly Sikh visiting from India, who told me how he had served as a sergeant-major with the British forces in Italy as part of the imperial Indian army under the Raj.

We owe a debt of gratitude to those people. We owe it to them to speak up for human rights in Punjab, so that they can live in peace in the land of their forefathers.

10.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tony Baldry): My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) is and has been a robust champion of those of his Sikh constituents and others who have continuing concerns about the welfare of Sikhs in Punjab. I sincerely hope that the Indian authorities grant him a visa to travel to India. I cannot see that they have anything to lose by ensuring that everyone has access to see for themselves the situation in Punjab and elsewhere.

It is clearly an issue that raises broad concern in the House, as has been evidenced by the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) and the presence with me on the Front Bench of my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Kirkhope), both of whom take a close interest in the welfare of the Sikh community here in the United Kingdom and overseas.

One reason why a Foreign and Commonwealth Office Minister is standing at the Dispatch Box answering on matters which are clearly the internal interest of another sovereign state is that large numbers of our fellow countrymen and women are Sikhs, who understandably take a close personal interest in the welfare and well-being of Sikhs throughout the world. The second reason for Ministers to become involved in the matter is human rights. Concern for human rights knows no national borders.

We take human rights issues extremely seriously. Serious abuses of human rights, wherever they may occur, such as summary execution, arbitrary imprisonment and torture, all deserve and will attract the condemnation of the House and the British Government. Hon. Members can rest assured that we shall continue to press for the strongest support for human rights throughout the world. Whenever we meet Ministers from countries where there are concerns about human rights violations, we draw attention to those concerns.

We should, however, be wary of absolutes, and of seeing things entirely in black and white. My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington is a long-standing critic of the Government of India over many years. As he made clear, he has introduced a number of Adjournment debates on the matter, and his criticism of the Government of India has been sustained. That is matter for him. Clearly, my hon. Friend has not sought to temper his criticism in light of the guidance of "Erskine May" that "opprobrious reflections must not be cast in debate on sovereigns and rulers over, or governments of, independent Commonwealth territories or countries in amity with Her Majesty.".

I am sure that it is understood by all who have taken a close interest in the matter over many years that, given his strong views on the matter, my hon. Friend has only "opprobrious reflections" for the Government of India. I appreciate that nothing is likely to deter him from his personal views on the matter.

Just as I promised to reflect carefully on everything that my hon. Friend said, so I ask my hon. Friend and the House to reflect whether the issues are quite as stark as he set out.

Until two years ago, the situation in the Punjab was unsatisfactory and unstable. There was widespread violence, with several thousand people being killed every year. We were concerned about the nature and level of human rights abuses there. Ministers, including my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary, discussed those concerns with the Indian Government on numerous occasions.

We emphasised to the Indian Government the need to respect human rights and the rule of law in confronting terrorism, and the importance of bringing those responsible for any wrongdoing to justice. We continue to make those points, not just in relation to Punjab. Concerns for human rights are a regular element in our discussions with the Indian Government at all levels.

At the same time, we have consistently condemned terrorism, which can offer no solution to the problems of Punjab or anywhere else. Atrocities committed by terrorists are as unacceptable as human rights abuses committed by security forces. It must be remembered that the Indian Government faced a serious challenge from terrorist violence in Punjab. In 1991 alone, it resulted in more than 5,000 deaths, including terrorist attacks on trains and buses, which were held up and innocent passengers gunned down and murdered.

We have always acknowledged and supported the right of the Indian Government to defend India against terrorist activities, and their responsibility to protect their citizens from terrorism.

Mr. Dicks: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the figures he quoted came from Indian Government sources?

Mr. Baldry: We have a high commission in India, which closely monitors reports of deaths in papers and from contacts and sources throughout India. I do not think that there is any doubt about the range and scale of the number of deaths that took place in 1991.

It is important to see developments in Punjab in perspective. There has been considerable progress since earlier Adjournment debates initiated by my hon. Friend. The situation now bears little resemblance to that of two years ago. The security situation has been transformed. There have been virtually no terrorist incidents this year, and terrorist activity has been severely curtailed, even if the potential for it has not been completely removed.

A key element in that new climate has been the creation of the Indian National Human Rights Commission. The Indian Government deserve credit for that. Although still a comparatively fledgling organisation, it has made an encouraging start in terms of casework and policy. The commission visited Punjab in April last year. Its report stated that there was "near unanimity that terrorism has been contained" and a

"widespread feeling that life in urban and rural areas has largely returned to normal".

The report concluded that changes in the situation on the ground should pave the way to normalising the role and function of the police, and re-establishing district magistrates' authority over them. That has since proved to be the case.

The newly established National Human Rights Commission has also challenged the constitutional validity of the controversial Terrorist and Disruptive Activities (Prevention) Act—TADA. That was first introduced in 1985 to deal with the exceptional situation in Punjab, but it is in force throughout India. The central Government have recognised the need to prevent the abuse of that legislation. The Indian Home Minister told Parliament last year that he had asked all Chief Ministers to review TADA cases and to ensure that there was no suggestion of innocent people being harassed by the local authorities.

The Home Ministry has also reminded state governments that TADA was enacted to deal with terrorism, and was not to be used for political purposes. TADA cases are now kept under review by a high-level committee chaired by the Home Minister. He has said that he intends to visit the capital of every state in the union where people are detained under TADA, to ensure that those powers are not being abused.

Of course, it must be in the interests of India and all those concerned for India that all possible objective mechanisms are available to investigate and deal with any complaints of human rights abuses. That is why we have to continue to urge the Government of India to allow greater access by the International Committee of the Red Cross and Amnesty International to areas such as Punjab.

We have consistently encouraged the Indian authorities to allow international human rights groups and other international observers to visit areas where human rights abuses have taken place. Amnesty International visited Bombay last year. I understand that it is discussing further visits with the Indian Government. I hope that those will include a visit to Punjab.

Just as important as the improvements in promoting human rights is the fact that the democratic process is now fully operational, right down to grass roots level. Participation in elections has risen steadily during the past three years. State elections were held on 19 February 1992. The Congress (I) party won 12 of the 13 seats, but the turnout was only 28 per cent., reflecting a boycott by the Akali Dal parties. The first municipal elections in 13 years were held on 6 September 1992, just seven months later, and there voter turn-out increased dramatically, to 71 per cent. The largest number of seats went to independent candidates.

The move towards the restoration of political normality was further confirmed by the rural elections in 1993. Just under a year after the state elections, voter turnout was an emphatic 82 per cent. Since January 1993, there has been a further parliamentary by-election in May 1993; and again in September 1994, block and district level elections were held for the first time in 19 years. That is impressive evidence both of the Indian Government's determination to restore the democratic process to Punjab at all levels, and the desire of the people of Punjab fully to participate in their own governance, as evidenced by the involvement of the Akali Dal parties.

Those figures provide a clear indication that the majority in Punjab have rejected violence. Other figures confirm it. The number of monthly deaths has shown a clear and steady decline. Violence has reduced significantly and consistently since 1993. From several thousand deaths in 1992, there were only 394 in 1993, and less than 100 last year. That improving trend is continuing into 1995. So far this year, I am glad to say that there have been no deaths as a result of militant activity.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington mentioned Khalistan. We are aware of calls by some Sikh groups for a separate state of Khalistan, but it has to be remembered that not all Sikhs want to see the break-up of India. India is a democracy. To be credible, calls for a separate state should be debated within the constitutional and democratic means available for that purpose. The Indian Government have the right to seek to uphold the territorial integrity of India.

There is other evidence of Punjab's return to stability. The process of law is reasserting itself after years of acquiescence in the face of intimidation, and the courts have intervened on behalf of a number of detainees via habeas corpus proceedings. Economic life has also largely returned to normal. Punjab is traditionally India's most prosperous state. Once again, industrial and agricultural endeavour is flourishing, factories are resuming production, and people are going about their business without hindrance.

Mr. Dicks: If all those things are happening, as my hon. Friend says, because terrorism has reduced, why is police brutality still in the ascendancy? As I understand it, there are no signs whatever of such brutality easing. If terrorism is easing—I am delighted that it is, because I share my hon. Friend's view that it has no part to play—why is police brutality not following the same pattern?

Mr. Baldry: I am not quite sure on what basis my hon. Friend makes his allegations. Clearly, if there are allegations of police brutality, such matters would need to be progressed through the courts in India. It is quite clear that the courts are not slow to take action where they think that it is appropriate. Action may also be taken through the mechanism of the new National Human Rights Commission.

As I shall make clear in a moment, the state of Punjab is also contemplating introducing its own local human rights commission. So there is no lack of willingness on the part of India in general, or Punjab in particular, to ensure that any violations of human rights are examined fully and in detail.

The media also have a part to play. The attention of the press and the wider media is no longer monopolised by terrorism, and they are returning to their usual functions, and subjecting the Government's conduct to close scrutiny. Coverage of issues such as corruption, unemployment, price rises, power shortages, and, indeed, human rights issues, has resumed.

Of course much still needs to be done in Punjab, but the clear trend is towards the re-establishment of the rule of law and respect for human rights. The Chief Minister of Punjab has agreed to give favourable consideration to establishing a state human rights commission under the terms of the Indian Human Rights Act 1993.

The national context is also important. The treatment of detainees by law enforcement authorities remains a problem in India, but there has been a definitive change in the Indian Government's attitude towards human rights.

[Mr. Baldry]

They are taking seriously the international concerns expressed—by ourselves among others—over India's human rights record. They have done more than take note: they have taken action.

As I said earlier, much remains to be done in Punjab, but the trend is encouraging. India is a democratic state. Its people are subject to the rule of law—a principle to which this country contributed significantly. Remedies against abuse of human rights or personal liberties are available within the Indian legal system. The new National Human Rights Commission shows signs of acting as a watchdog against unchecked abuse.

The Indian authorities will need to remain vigilant, as will the friends of India, for the sake of the people of Punjab and India's reputation abroad. The first helpful steps have been taken, however, and we must jointly ensure that we continue along the right road.

I referred to the Sikh community in this country. I should like to end with an important consideration. Of 800,000 people of Indian origin who have made their home in Great Britain, the Sikhs are the largest group, totaling more than 300,000 people. They have made a valued contribution to many areas of our national life. They are inventive, industrious and energetic. It is entirely fitting that my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington should express their concerns—as have other hon. Members—and seek to promote their legitimate interests.

There is a wider perspective. The Sikhs are part of the larger community of Indian origin in Britain. That community as a whole, as we can say from experience in so many of our constituencies, makes a significant and increasingly important contribution, not only to the life of this country, but to our broader relationship with India. They are one of the foundations on which that relationship so solidly rests.

We must press the case of any individual part of this edifice in a way which does not damage the whole. It is vital, therefore, to maintain this twin perspective. The need to argue—

Mental Illness

Motion made and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

10.4 am

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): The tradition in debates in this House is that one begins by declaring an interest. I declare an interest in that I am a member of the advisory council of the Jewish Association for the Mentally Ill, although I suspect that I receive much more advice than I give.

This debate is in the interest of the thousands of mentally ill individuals who are inadequately treated under the present system; of parents who see their sons and daughters suffer and, all too often, cannot influence the psychiatrists who treat them; of preventing the avoidable suicides and murders which take place because of failures in treatment.

I last raised the subject of the mentally ill in an Adjournment debate in December 1993. Although I have been silent in the House on the matter since then, I have frequently written to Ministers questioning the principles of the Government's policy, and have pointed out to the relevant authorities a number of individual cases where treatment has been inadequate.

The backdrop to the debate in 1993 was a local tragedy. In the summer of 1993, I attended the funeral of a constituent. There is nothing unusual about Members of Parliament doing that, but in that case I was attending the funeral of a 24-year-old constituent who had been receiving psychiatric treatment for some time. His mother had frequently written to me saying that the treatment was inadequate. I had written many letters to the psychiatrist and others trying to help him, saying that the care in the community that he was receiving was inadequate, that his mother knew her son much better than any psychiatrist did, and that the psychiatrists should listen to the mother.

They did not listen to the mother, and eventually, that 24-year-old boy dropped from the sixth floor of a building in my constituency and committed suicide. The death of a young man, which could have been avoided, is a galling experience which I shall always remember—the day life was tragically cut short because experts would not listen to a parent who knew much more about her child than they did.

During the eight years in which I have been a Member of this House, I have attended only three debates on the mentally ill, two of which, including this morning's, I have instigated. Since the debate in December 1993, a raft of reports has suggested that the care in the community policy is failing many of those whom it seeks to help.

In February 1994, we had a report into the murder of Jonathan Zito by Christopher Clunis. One must remember that Christopher Clunis had passed through the hands of 150 doctors, nurses, social workers and policemen, and had been into 14 hospitals, prisons and hostels, yet he was in the community and able to kill an innocent individual in London.

Another report in April 1994 said:

"Thousands of the mentally ill are relying on variable, patchy and under-funded services."

In August 1994, it was pointed out that more than half of the 22 people who had killed an innocent individual after discharge into the community had refused to take the drugs that they had been prescribed, or to attend treatment.

In September 1994, the Department of Health's mental health task force referred to "a serious problem of emergency access to appropriate care for severe mentally ill people."

In September 1994, the Mental Health Foundation said:

"some services, particularly acute hospitals in inner cities are under such pressure that proper discharge planning of any sort is an unattainable dream."

The Royal College of Psychiatrists produced a report in 1994, in which it said:

"It is common for there to be no admission beds at all, available in the South of England. In these circumstances patients . . . may have to be nursed for 24 or even 36 hours in a room in an accident and emergency department while doctors or nurses make numerous phone calls to locate a bed, often at a hospital many miles outside London. There have been instances where suicidal or dangerous patients have absconded while waiting and others where patients, who would have accepted voluntary admission to their local unit, have had to be compulsorily admitted because they did not wish to go to the distant hospital."

The report concluded:

"It would be difficult to argue that to admit a London resident to a hospital on the south coast is any advance from the days when such patients would have been admitted to the large psychiatric hospitals that ringed London".

More recently, in April 1995, the Royal College of Psychiatrists reported:

"'True' bed occupancy was very similar to that in" its previous survey—123 per cent. It said that that figure was

"accounted for by the fact that 189 people who should have been in London admission beds were inappropriately placed elsewhere.

102 of the 189 people . . . had to be admitted to distant hospitals because of bed shortages."

That emphasises the fact that in London there is a shortage of beds in mental hospitals. Surely that should guide Government policy in future.

The Royal College of Psychiatrists also said:

"Violent incidents (mainly assaults on staff and other patients) are very common on psychiatric admission wards. 131 incidents were reported during the week of the census, 47"

"had resulted in some injury."

The policy of closing large mental institutions by the year 2000 was instituted by Mr. Enoch Powell in 1961. It is ironic that that gentleman, who made his economic fame by attacking long-term or even short-term economic planning, should, as Minister of Health, have indulged in a policy of mega-long-term planning in deciding in 1961 what should be done by the year 2000. In the early 1960s, there were 140,000 beds in mental institutions; today there are 20,000.

[Mr. John Marshall]

The Powell thesis was fundamentally misguided. It was a reaction to the excessive incarceration, in the 1940s and 1950s, of people in mental hospitals who should never have been there. However, the fact that some people were wrongly admitted in the 1940s and 1950s was no reason to decide in 1961 that no one would need to be admitted into large mental hospitals in the year 2000, or indeed in the year 1996.

There is no doubt, to my mind, that the pendulum, which swung too far in the 1940s, has swung back too far in the opposite direction. Self-evidently, many of those who were in mental hospitals in 1961 should not have been there, because they have subsequently managed to cope by living in the community. However, it is equally true, and it is visible to anyone looking round London today, that some people cannot cope in the community and should be in an asylum.

That would be better for them. Their quality of life would be better. It would be far better for their families, who worry about what is happening to their sons and daughters, wives and husbands, and it would be better for society at large.

I recently sent several letters to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis), questioning the adequacy of the number of beds in London. There is a great deal of apocryphal evidence to suggest that I am right, and that some of the statisticians in the Department of Health are wrong. There are too many examples of patients being released prematurely, and of others having difficulties securing admission.

It is equally true that, just as there is a shortage of beds in the hospitals, there is a shortage of beds in the community. The shortage of beds in hospitals encourages the premature discharge of mental patients, and I am afraid that it is sometimes compounded by professional misjudgments.

I shall always remember one of my earliest surgeries. A large deputation came to visit me from one of the council estates in my constituency, and I wondered what the council had done. The people said, "It is Mr. Campbell," so I wanted to know whether he was the caretaker. They said, "Oh no, nothing like that. Mr. Campbell has just been admitted into the N block, and he has just come out of hospital."

I asked what the problem was. They said, "He has been discharged from a mental hospital and he does only one thing—he plays music. The trouble is that he starts at 8 o'clock at night and finishes at 8 o'clock in the morning. We are all trying to sleep when he is playing his music, and when he is not playing his music we are trying to work."

I wrote to the hospital. On that occasion they admitted that Mr. Campbell needed to go back into hospital, and he was taken back, but probably he should never have been released into the community.

The care in the community policy rests on the paradox that people are told that they are sufficiently fit to live in the community, but they are sufficiently unwell to need medication—and thoroughly nasty medication to boot. None of us like to take nasty medicine. I always remember that, as a child, when I had a severe illness during the war and I was given very nasty medicine, I once asked my mother, "Why don't you try the medicine?" She took it. I then said to her, "You have taken it today. I don't need to take it." She gave me a short shrift answer that that was not a logical response, and I agree with her in retrospect.

None of us likes to take nasty medicine, and most of those people who have been buoyed up by discharge into the community believe that they no longer need to take the nasty medicine. That is when they regress. That is when they become violent. That is when they sometimes lose their general practitioner. That is when they become aggressive to other people. That is when they end up in prison.

It is surely wrong that someone should be discharged into the community because it is thought that they are unsuitable for institutional care, and then end up in another institution—a prison.

Mr. Oliver Heald (Hertfordshire, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that there are people living in the community perfectly satisfactorily and taking drug therapy regularly, and that they now have a freedom that they would never have had if they had remained in one of the large institutions? Surely the key is that those people should be adequately supervised.

Mr. Marshall: My hon. Friend has anticipated the next part of my speech, when I was going to discuss the Government proposals for supervised discharge.

One of the other ironies of care in the community is that many of the people who have been released into the community end up sleeping rough. I shall always remember one of my first constituency engagements, in, I think, September 1987, when I visited the National Schizophrenia Fellowship. I asked one of the members, "What is your problem?" and she explained that her daughter was schizophrenic. I asked where her daughter was, and she replied, "She is sleeping on a park bench somewhere in London tonight." If one talks to them, one discovers that a significant number of the people who will sleep rough in London tonight are people who have been released from mental hospitals throughout the capital.

Some people criticise the Government's power of supervised discharge in the Mental Health (Patients in the Community) Bill—which will shortly receive a Third Reading in another place, and will shortly thereafter come to this place—on civil liberty grounds, but those who do so are, I believe, making a completely flawed argument. That argument assumes that someone who is sufficiently troubled to need psychiatric help is sufficiently sane to decide rationally about his treatment. The protection of one person's civil liberties may well mean that they are denied to someone else.

Those who criticise supervised discharge ignore the fact that many of those who are released into the community commit suicide. There is no doubt that the official figures understate the number of suicides committed by released schizophrenics. The courts will take account of the religious susceptibilities of those who may or may not have committed suicide, or recognise that the validity of a life insurance policy will be determined by the verdict reached by the coroner. The NSF estimates that between 300 and 500 released schizophrenic patients commit suicide each year.

When we talk about civil liberties, we must also remember the civil liberties of those adversely affected by current arrangements. Jayne Zito had the civil liberty to expect that her husband would not be killed. Georgina Robinson, an occupational therapist, had the right to expect the civil liberty of being able to work in a mental care health centre without being killed by a patient. Ruth and John Gore's civil liberties should have meant that they were not hacked to death by their schizophrenic son. Jason Dalson's civil liberties should have meant that he was not killed by his mother at the age of 6.

Those are the civil liberties that we must remember. In each of those murder cases, the law recognised the concept of diminished responsibility when the individuals charged went to court and pleaded guilty to manslaughter rather than to murder. Is it not right to recognise the concept of diminished responsibility before a crime is committed rather than after?

One of the ironies behind the problem is that the strongest advocates of supervised discharge are the relatives of those affected. They do not believe that such discharges would affect their son's, daughter's, husband's or wife's civil liberties. They believe that it is essential that the discharge of their relatives should be better supervised than it is now, so that those relatives can enjoy a better quality of life.

One of my concerns about the treatment of the mentally ill is the attitude of GPs. I am sure that virtually every colleague in the House has received more than one letter from one of my constituents. That lady is convinced that her telephone is being tapped; that her mail is being intercepted; that foreigners are coming into her home whenever she is out of it; and that Mossad and the Japanese—a strange combination—are after her. It is rather odd that both of them should be after the same innocent lady living in Hendon.

I visited that constituent at her home. She saw me outside first and said that everything I said would be recorded by bugs. I went into the house to look for those bugs, but could not see any. She pointed to where the intruders had come in, and showed me where they had left their mark. In fact, she had metal windows, and the mark was rust. I asked that poor lady who her doctor was. Her initial reaction was to say that she did not need a psychiatrist, but I then discovered the identity of her GP. I have pestered the man to try to do something about that poor lady but he has done nothing.

I could spend the next hour recounting other similar examples, but I know that other colleagues, such as my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), want to take part in the debate. My hon. Friend the Minister should try to ensure that GPs are better educated about the problems of mental health, and show a greater willingness to do something about it.

As I have already said, I am a member of the advisory council of JAMI. It has encountered problems with two local authorities in London. The London borough of Barking and Dagenham has written to say:

"The value of JAMI is recognised".

"is seen to benefit from his contact with you. However, I regret that my efforts to secure funding have not been successful".

JAMI has been asked to carry on that beneficial treatment, but will be given no money for it by that London borough. The London borough of Ealing, with which I used to be associated, has refused to give any funds to the course of treatment and support that JAMI has been giving to one of its residents, because it feels that, although the treatment was helpful, the gentleman concerned would not need residential care if he did not get it. It has therefore decided to give nothing towards that treatment.

We need a change of emphasis in our treatment of the mentally ill. Mental health needs to cease to be the Cinderella of the health service. I should like the Minister to announce a moratorium on further hospital closures until adequate alternative services are in place. The bulldozer must stop: the destruction of existing hospitals must cease. We should construct new, smaller mental hospitals and provide better facilities in the community. Hospitals must not disgorge patients into the community when they are unable to provide them with adequate treatment.

The Royal College of Nursing has made it clear that "there are grave concerns that the closures of psychiatric institutions have not been offset by sufficient alternative support and treatment in the community. There is an increasing body of evidence which exposes the inability of the current aftercare arrangements to meet the needs of people with serious mental health problems."

I should like the Minister to make it clear that the Government recognise the need for more community psychiatric nurses. At present, about 4,000 psychiatric nurses treat 180,000 schizophrenics. Many of those schizophrenics may not be attached to a particular psychiatric nurse, but each nurse has a case load of about 55 clients. That means that she—or he: one must not be sexist—can see each client for about half an hour a week. I do not believe that that time necessarily provides the right amount of treatment. The Royal College of Nursing has certainly said that it believes that the number of psychiatric nurses should be more than doubled.

The professions concerned should recognise that they should pay more attention to the views of the parents and relatives of those suffering from mental illness. On 18 January 1995, The Independent stated:

"The time has come to jettison an Act which neither protects the public effectively nor provides the care which seriously mentally disordered people require to achieve a more fulfilled and happier life."

That single sentence underlines the nub of what I have said, at greater length. Were that recommendation met, it would fulfil the needs of the country.

10.27 am

Mr. Richard Spring (Bury St. Edmunds): I am grateful for the opportunity to take part in this debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on securing the debate, and on putting his argument so coherently.

When "The Health of the Nation" was published in July 1992, handbooks on different key areas were also published. What struck me about the handbook on mental illness was the revelation that 18,000 people die from mental illness, directly or indirectly, but most notably from suicide.

It is true to say that this generation has stopped trying to sweep the issue of mental disability under the carpet. That happened before, greatly to our shame, but we now recognise that mental illness affects people across the nation. It is fair to say that there is not a family in the land that has not been struck, directly or indirectly, by some form of mental illness, temporary or permanent.

People have phobias, anxieties, compulsive eating disorders and more serious conditions, such as schizophrenia. All those conditions cause immense distress to the families and friends of sufferers. Almost 90 per cent. of those who commit suicide suffer from mental disorders. No fewer than 66 per cent. of suicides consulted general practitioners within the month leading up to their suicide, and 40 per cent. consulted their GPs in the previous week.

Just over a year ago, I initiated a debate in the House as a result of an experience in my constituency. My attention was drawn to a truly tragic case of a young lady with behavioural problems who fell between all of the stools of the mental health process. She was not defined as psychiatrically unwell, so she could not be treated. It was believed that she suffered from a behavioural problem, and a psychiatrist told me that the criminal justice system was the only route for her to follow.

That young lady suffered from an illness, whether behavioural or psychiatric, which prompted her to cause damage to herself, and which created fear within her family and in the community. As a result of that case, I have become particularly interested in the area of mental health, and I have been moved by the plight of those who are affected by such problems, and that of their families.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South said, many mental health beds have been removed from the national health service. However, some 80,000 beds remain, both on a daily or permanent care basis, for those who suffer from mental afflictions. In the past decade, the number of clearly mentally distressed people who are living rough has increased throughout the industrialised world. It is significant that the Homeless Network's audit of rough sleepers found that 91 per cent. of those in that unhappy situation had one or more special needs, and that one in three suffered from mental health problems.

The homeless mentally ill initiative was introduced almost five years ago in order to provide specialist psychiatric accommodation for those with mental health needs in London. It has addressed, at least in part, that particularly worrying problem which affects not only the individual sufferers but all those who live in London. I certainly share my hon. Friend's view that communities feel threatened as a result of well-publicised cases of mentally ill people who have been released into the community prematurely.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Three large institutions are located in my constituency, two of which have virtually closed, and the other will close in five years. Does my hon. Friend agree that the concept of care in the community is absolutely correct? The scheme costs twice as much money as the old Victorian system, but we must ensure that those who need help can receive it.

There have been a number of highly publicised cases of people who were released into the community, who are sleeping rough and who are suffering as a result of deficiencies in the current system. As a consequence, the whole care in the community system is suffering also. Does my hon. Friend believe that we should target more resources at the small number of people who are now falling between two stools in the health service, in order to ensure that the care in the community system receives the credit it deserves?

Mr. Spring: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for putting his point of view so eloquently. I will examine the effect of the proposed new legislation, and I shall also inform my hon. Friend how we are trying to address the problems in Suffolk. I believe that we must reassure the public about this matter. The situation is akin to the public's reaction to crime: statistics may be falling, but the fear of crime is extremely damaging to people's sense of well-being.

I hope that the Mental Health (Patients in the Community) Bill will address some of the legitimate concerns that have been raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) and other colleagues. My hon. Friends the Member for Ribble Valley and for Hendon, South have asked what level of supervision is adequate to deal with the problems of individuals and to provide proper comfort to the communities and to the families which are blighted by mental illness.

A supervised discharge will be required for those who leave hospital after having been detained under the Mental Health Act 1983. The new legislation will also tighten up provisions for returning to hospital those patients who go absent without leave. The period wherein patients can be recalled will be extended from six to 12 months. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State elaborated on the legislation in a press notice of 12 August 1993, in which she said:

"Under supervised discharge, patients would be subject to conditions, including a treatment plan negotiated with them and their carers, and a requirement to attend for treatment. A named key worker would be immediately responsible for that patient's care. He or she must ensure that the procedures agreed in advance are followed and that decisive action is taken if the patient does not co-operate".

We know of well-publicised tragic cases that have horrified and touched the heart of the nation. Therefore, the safety of the public must be uppermost in our minds. The supervised discharge arrangements, which I accept are a valuable advance in this area, include a treatment plan and an obligation to receive treatment. Any failure to do so will lead to a recall to hospital.

I hope that the my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health will assure the House that hospital discharge procedures will be improved. It is also critical that the supervision register is monitored properly and adequately upon its introduction. Every year £2 billion is spent on mental health. The number of community health nurses has increased substantially, despite the pressures that my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South referred to. More psychiatrists and psychologists are involved in the national health service than ever before.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley said that it was incumbent upon the health authorities to draw up proper care programmes for mentally ill people who are discharged from hospital. I contacted the Suffolk health authority to seek assurances that my county is undertaking such programmes. The authority is appointing a programme manager for mental health services to oversee the formulation of a programme, and I am pleased that that appointment is in the pipeline. The health authority is also introducing a number of other initiatives, including the improvement of acute in-patient services, and the provision of a consultant psychiatrist in Suffolk to examine proper rehabilitation procedures.

Community psychiatric nurses are providing an important new assessment service to individuals with mental health problems who are in police or court custody. The link between the justice process and mental illness is inextricable, and the distinction is often unclear. The service began last month, and decisions will be made as to those who need treatment and those who should be punished. That distinction was blurred previously, and it was certainly not taken into account when I introduced my Adjournment debate.

The legislation in another place will advance the issue in a wholly constructive manner. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South eloquently highlighted the remaining potential imbalance involving premature discharge and inadequate bed space for those who still require care. When the new procedures are introduced in the next year or two, we must monitor the situation carefully and compassionately. We have not struck the right balance over many decades. We are now moving in the right direction, but I believe that it is incumbent upon all hon. Members to watch the developments very carefully.

Of course we do not want monstrously large hospitals for the mentally ill. Specialists in the area have said that the best success can be obtained by developing smaller units, which are properly coordinated and humanely supervised. I hope very much that that will become increasingly the pattern in the next few years. We need a balance, and I hope that we are moving towards one. I am sure that we will need to monitor the situation carefully in the next few years.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on calling for this debate, and on the manner in which he and the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring) presented the problems.

Neither side of House has a monopoly of concern for mental illness. This sort of debate allows the concerns of hon. Members, based on our direct experience of the problems in our constituencies, to be properly drawn to the attention of the Minister, so that he can carry them into responsible action by his Department.

We can understand the pattern of care needed for the mentally ill if we distinguish between the different stages of a mental illness, and, indeed, the differences between individual cases, because such differences are enormous.

The stage at which a mental illness presents itself most dramatically can be at a patient's first appearance at an accident and emergency department, or, preferably, a specialised mental health clinic. It is the experience of many patients that an accident and emergency department is not a good environment for a mental patient first to contact the health service. There is enough trauma in an accident and emergency department in dealing with acute physical cases.

To introduce a distressed mental patient into such an environment causes chaos in the department, and is unfair on the medical staff and on other patients, who desperately need attention but cannot get it because the whole place is disrupted by the behaviour of a mental patient.

However, if a 24-hour specialised emergency clinic open 365 days a year is available—as there has been for some years at the Maudsley hospital in London—the staffing and the expert care that can be given to mental patients provide an entirely different environment. It is still hugely distressing for the patient—that is unavoidable—but nevertheless it is a quite different environment from that of the ordinary general district hospital accident and emergency department.

I understand that the clinic at the Maudsley is now available only to people living locally in the area covered by the hospital, rather than to the whole of London. If that is the case, it is a great pity, and I hope that the scope of its service can be changed. We need such clinics in every major urban centre and city throughout the country, so that they are available to people in those desperate circumstances.

The greater proportion of patients presenting themselves for first care do not require emergency admission. However, some do, and they face a desperate situation in terms of the availability of beds. Dr. Paul Lelliott, who is the head of the research unit of the Royal College of Psychiatrists, recently carried out a survey of the availability of beds in London. He will present his report at 6 o'clock this afternoon at a meeting of the all-party mental health group, of which I am privileged to be the chairman.

The report found that not only was there not a single bed available in the whole of London on some occasions in January, but that there was a 23 per cent. shortage of beds for those patients who needed admission. It was not just a flash in the pan of one patient not being offered a bed. A 23 per cent. increase in the number of beds was needed to deal with the number of patients who required emergency admission under newly identified diagnoses in January.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): The hon. Member is making an extremely important point. Does he accept that the situation is compounded because of a number of cases in which people with mental illnesses have been brought before the courts? The courts would like to commit those people to mental hospitals for care and treatment, but cannot do so, because there are no beds. As a result, as my hon. Friend the Minister knows, those people are committed to prison, which is the last place where such people should be committed. We need extra beds—not in the future: we need them now.

Beyond the shortage of beds, there is the question of what sort of beds. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds pointed out the problem of beds becoming blocked up because hospitals do not have channels through which patients can be reasonably discharged, and because there is an inadequate support system in the community.

It has been proposed that hospitals should be allowed to run hostels, which can be a transitional stage for people returning to the community. Such hostels are run by several hospitals around the country for the physically ill, not the mentally ill. They work very well, and costs per bed in them are far lower than they are in the hospitals themselves. It would be possible considerably to ease the channels of discharge from mental hospitals if, under the control of the hospitals, there were hostel places where people could be accommodated as they got used to returning to the community.

People often do not have any circumstances in the community to which they can return. They do not have a house, or, if they have been allocated a council house, there is no furniture. If it is minimally furnished, there is no community support. To construct all that apparatus of support takes time and organisation. It needs all the different support services to get together to create such apparatus for cases where the person has no family. A hostel can greatly ease that problem of transition.

There is also the need for continuing care. The supervised discharge proposals are concerned with cases where people who are mentally ill have attacked members of community. However, the number of suicides and cases of self-inflicted harm is far greater—10 times or more—than the number of people who are attacked by the mentally ill. Consequently, the greatest physical suffering is that of people who are mentally ill.

The Minister could confirm that forensic psychiatrists are not making a case for the expansion of their particular services. They tell me that their service is the best staffed part of psychiatric care services. The extreme cases that are looked after by the forensic psychiatrists are already the best provided for. I am not saying that the system has no problems to consider or that need working through, but its problem does not seem primarily to be that of resources. We therefore need to get public pressure and public concern about such cases properly directed and channelled into the organisation of the services and the balance of support in the community as a whole.

After moving on from the more intensive period of community care, there are the various forms of therapy and counselling which are needed to tackle some of the behavioural problems faced by patients. There is no unique therapy or counselling, but there are many cases in which it has been helpful to try out various channels in order to find the most appropriate type of counselling or the most suitable person. Because that has proved successful in many cases, it needs resources. The resources that could be absorbed by counselling and therapy are unlimited, but there should be channels through which people can feel their way through the services.

As well as the responsibilities of the Department of Health, other Departments—specifically Social Security and Employment—are also involved in a patient's return to the community and to work. I accept that there is good will on the part of the Departments concerned, but there is sometimes a lack of an appreciation of the nature of mental illness. The Department of Health must ensure that the various schemes produced by the other Departments are realistic for the mentally ill.

For example, a clear vital statistic in the performance of the disability working allowance, apart from the sums involved and the conditions under which it is paid, is the consideration of how likely it is that a mentally ill person returning to work will be able to sustain 40 or even 20 hours a week of consistent attendance for the indefinite future, or even for six months. There needs to be tolerance when a patient knows that it is best to stay at home and not risk going into work and provoking a crisis.

That is well understood by everybody concerned with mental health, but it does not fit easily into the structure of social security or a job placement scheme, which is concerned with people who, quite properly, need other encouragements and disciplines. We shall be debating how all that is put together when we consider the legislation about supervised discharge. The health service and the Department of Health must make a major contribution to the basic planning stage and the perception of the problem.

Hon. Members undoubtedly see many different types of case. It is a healthy sign that there is legislation going through the House now and that there is increasing concern by individual Members arising from work in their constituencies. It reflects a greater public sensitivity to the needs and problems of the mentally ill. The younger generation have a much deeper understanding of the problems of mental illness than some of their forebears. It is that concern, together with the relationships they form and the support they give in the community, that offers the best hope of care for the mentally ill in the future.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon South (Mr. Marshall) on initiating this debate this morning.

I am extremely concerned about the good name of care in the community. We must do all we can to ensure that any deficiencies within the system are corrected as soon as possible. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring) talked about the high-profile cases in which people have fallen between two stools and are not receiving the proper care or supervision in the community. Some are not taking their tablets, are found wandering the streets at all times of the day and night, and are sleeping rough.

Those are the cases that the public see. They are not aware of the 99 per cent. of cases in which patients are receiving proper care. They see only the small number of cases, including the suicides, that make the newspapers. Therefore, the whole concept of care in the community is tainted. I am extremely concerned that we should do everything possible to ensure that the targeting of resources and help is aimed at those who are in need so that they receive proper care in the community.

As I said in an intervention, I had three large mental institutions in my constituency, which must be quite unusual. Brockhall has now closed, and is being taken over. No doubt the site will soon be turned into a housing estate. Whittingham will also close shortly. That institution is what everybody thinks of when they think of an old Victorian asylum. It has superb gardens, where the mentally ill can wander within the confines of the institution. The people outside the community never see those people, because they do not go into the hospital grounds unless they need to do so. Again, planning permission is being sought to turn that site into a housing development.

In a number of years, Calderstones, another large mental institution, will be closing. There will be a small unit on the site looking after those with extreme and difficult problems. Having said that, there are currently 600 people living there, who will all be discharged into the community. If one considers how many people were living in those three large mental institutions and who have now, over a short time, been discharged into the community, one can grasp the task that was before the Government in implementing this policy.

Many people have reservations about the speed at which all this has been done. They think that it should have been carried out more slowly. Some people, myself included, think that it has been more cruel than kind to take people who have been institutionalised all their lives out of the large institutions and put them somewhere else. Do not get me wrong: I am not a defender of the large institutions; they were a mistake, and we have moved on. However, we must ensure that the resources are there, so that those who are discharged into the community receive the proper care.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I was horrified by what my hon. Friend said about the closure of a number of institutions in his constituency. He said that some of the sites will be developed for housing. He said that Whittingham had superb grounds. Will my hon. Friend accept from me, having taken a deep interest in mental health over almost 20 years, that one of the treatments for those suffering from schizophrenia in particular is found in the environment in which they live and are being treated?

Is it not sad that those wonderful hospital grounds, many of them quite close to cities and town centres, and therefore very much part of the community, are being disposed of merely for the capital gain of housing development? If a smaller and more modern unit could be constructed on those sites to care for the mentally ill, the environment, which is so important for the treatment of some people with mental illness, could be retained.

Mr. Evans: I accept everything that my hon. Friend says. The grounds at Whittingham are large, and it is appropriate in certain circumstances to have that sort of atmosphere and quietude. That institution is on the outskirts of Preston. Some of the high-profile cases involve people who have been in that environment but who are now wandering the streets of Preston. That must be wrong.

I know that, with the redevelopment of Whittingham, a new unit will be put on that site. I hope that sufficient grounds are kept aside within the development, so that people are able to enjoy the quietude and the asylum, away from the noise and the grind of everyday living.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Get a commitment from the Minister.

Mr. Evans: I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) has been to Calderstones in my company. I was there only a few weeks ago, taking a look at the good work that was being done, particularly with people with learning disabilities. My hon. Friend will know of the good work and commitment of the staff who work at such institutions. One of my concerns is that the spread of people going into the community will mean that there are insufficient numbers of adequately trained experts to deal with the problems.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way—he has touched on some valuable points.

Does he agree that we should be carefully considering another category of patients? We need to consider not just those who have been sectioned and come out of hospital, but those who are vulnerable and who do not quite qualify for being sectioned, but who desperately need supervision so that they do not harm themselves and others.

Mr. Evans: I agree with my hon. Friend. That is exactly what we need. Those people do not necessarily need large institutions; they need smaller institutions, with sufficient grounds, so that they are not any danger to themselves or other people.

Whittingham has a tradition of looking after people with mental illness, to which a stigma is attached. Mental illness is something that one does not talk about. The people in Whittingham have grown up with the institution, and enjoy the fact that it exists in their area. The people with mental illness mix with the people in the village, and the position is a total reversal of the not-in-my-backyard syndrome—NIMBY. If one tried to set up such an institution in some districts, the residents would fight tooth and nail against it, but the people of Whittingham fought hard to retain the institution in their community, because they know and understand the problems that those people have.

The problem of people with mental illness being referred to prisons because there are insufficient beds available has already been mentioned, and it worries me. One of my constituents, whose son unfortunately has a mental illness, came to seem me a couple of weeks ago. He became involved in a crime; his parents say that he should not be on the streets, but receiving care, because of his problem. He is now in prison. He is not receiving the care that he needs.

At the end of his sentence, he will be released back into the community in no better shape—perhaps worse shape—than when he went in. We must ensure that sufficient beds are available for people who might become involved in crimes because of their illness, and we must ensure that those people receive the proper treatment they need.

Lady Olga Maitland: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is another problem: the shortage of longer-term beds? There is a danger that patients who return into the community enter the carousel system. They come out of hospital, after a period they are desectioned, they commit another offence and have to return to hospital. They never receive treatment in hospital for long enough—the required period could be six months, one year or even longer. The problem is that such people are released too soon.

Mr. Evans: I agree with my hon. Friend. Nothing can be more distressing to professionals than to see those with whom they have worked released into the community prematurely and being sent to prison because they have committed a crime, or falling into rough ways because they are not taking the tablets and are not being properly supervised. The process then has to start all over again.

I shall bring my remarks to a close, as I know that other hon. Members want to participate in what has been a useful debate. We need to target the resources at those who are not receiving the proper care in the community. Those who receive care in the community benefit from the small cluster homes, where they receive virtually one-to-one attention from the dedicated staff. We must ensure that they can benefit in future, and we must not throw the baby out with the bath water.

11.3 am

Mr. Oliver Heald (Hertfordshire, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on instituting the debate.

[Mr. Oliver Heald]

I very much agreed with the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) about the change in attitudes in our society in recent years. It is right to start by praising the policy of care in the community and the great strides that have been made in taking individuals who did not enjoy freedom out of asylums, so that they are now able to make their homes in the community. Such people have been de-institutionalised and are free to become part of the community and take up jobs—many of them responsible jobs—due to the new drugs and treatments that have become available. It is a tribute to the House and the Government that the change has been made, and has been largely successful.

When one makes such a change, one also has to manage it and deal with its effects. We must all accept that, in a tiny minority of cases, the failure to take drugs or to follow the care programme have led to disasters such as that involving Jonathan Zito, which has already been mentioned.

We must consider three issues. First, we must ensure that only those who are likely to co-operate with their care programme and with those trying to help them, and who take the drugs they need are discharged from hospital. The people who take the decision to discharge such patients should not be under pressure—be it financial pressure or the pressure to adhere to the convention or dogma that everyone can be treated in the community.

Secondly, we must ensure that everyone who is released from hospital is properly supervised, with proper accommodation and finance for that purpose. When the decision is being made as to whether to discharge a patient, proper account must be taken of the resources available. That may mean that somebody who could be released or discharged into the community purely on the basis of medical science if there were a huge input of resources and supervision, may not be discharged immediately because it is not possible to provide such support and supervision. The available resources must be taken into account when the decision is made as to whether to discharge a patient. There must be adequate supervision to protect the individual and the public.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South mentioned the Mental Health Task Force report. It stated:

> "Patients with severe and chronic mental disabilities are being discharged without adequate supervision, or the provision necessary to meet their housing, social and health needs. This could incur risks not only to public safety but also to the safety of the individuals concerned".

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: My hon. Friend is making an important point. Does he accept that, if someone is discharged from a mental illness hospital into the community, the person who is nominated to be in charge of that case—in charge of that person—should be medically qualified, because mental illness is a disease, not something that a social worker can properly supervise? Does my hon. Friend agree that the person nominated should always be medically qualified?

Mr. Heald: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. A high level of expertise is needed. I am not an expert in social work and mental health—my hon. Friend knows far more about it than I do. There may be social workers who are so highly trained that they have more expert knowledge about care in the community than some of the doctors who deal with the specialty in hospital.

The important point is that hon. Members have responsibility for the public at large. We also have responsibility for those individuals. However, if there is a question of the safety of the public, the House should always err on the side of protecting the public, because the freedom of the public at large is always a high consideration for the House, and more important than an individual's freedom in such circumstances.

The hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) said that the number of suicides was greater than the number of individuals who are attacked by former patients. That is not the right balance. It is vital that the public are protected.

Lady Olga Maitland: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Heald: No. I do not have time to give way.

The freedom of many individuals will be less if the public reach the point at which they are completely dissatisfied with the protection available to them.

If individuals are discharged into the community and they fail to co-operate, it is important that they are detained speedily and placed back in hospital. The Mental Health (Patients in the Community) Bill, with its provision for after-care supervision, taking to the House the power to effect a speedy readmission to hospital, is vital if the public are to be satisfied.

I hope that the Minister will tell us the current guidelines on the discharge of patients, and when the guide to co-operative working will be available.

11.10 am

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on initiating the debate. Other hon. Members have contributed sincere thoughts and concerns about the current situation relating to the care of the mentally ill. In particular, my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) has a deep personal commitment to the issue, as chairman of the all-party mental health group.

As I listened to the debate, I had the feeling that one or two hon. Members were harking back to a golden age of the asylum that, frankly, never existed. Many years ago, as an authorised mental health officer, I had the misfortune, to some extent, to witness the system working. Some people who hark back to that system are thoroughly misguided, and do not appreciate exactly what it was all about. The process of moving from the 19th-century asylum system has rightly had all-party support over the past 30 years.

Public confidence in community care policy has been shaken in recent times. That has been due not only to some of the tragic cases that have been mentioned this morning, but to a much wider belief that the Government are more concerned with running down the existing system to save money than with developing an alternative system of community care.

In responding to public anxiety, the Government have been unable to answer two particularly important questions: first, in halving the number of psychiatric in-patients by 70,000 between 1982-83 and 1992-93, what has happened to the people leaving hospital? I have tabled questions but received no answers. Secondly, what has happened to the public resources that have been released by the huge closure programme? They have clearly not been invested in alternative provision within the community.

Immediately before moves towards community care in the late 1950s, 15 per cent. of national health service expenditure was on mental health. Now it is about 11 per cent. Although there have rightly been important developments in community re-provision since that time, it comes nowhere near matching the 4 per cent. drop in expenditure that has occurred. Key elements in community care are missing in many sectors.

The central emphasis of many hon. Members' contributions this morning is to urge the provision of acute beds—urging asylum. I urge them to look at examples of asylum within the community. People do not have to be in parks miles from the public, locked in institutional care. Asylum exists within the community. There are safe houses, supported accommodation and sheltered environments in which people can be enabled to live without being in the old bin system that many of us, unfortunately, knew intimately.

It concerns the Labour party that, within community care, mental health appears to be the poor relation. The Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy found that only 3 per cent. of the overall community care budget is spent on mental health. The Mental Health Foundation found that, of every pound spent on mental health services, 91p goes on NHS treatment, while the remaining 9p covers all community provision by local authorities and the private and voluntary sectors put together.

The public can see that the Government's mental health policy consists almost entirely of piecemeal initiatives, not a coherent thought-through strategy. That point was made not specifically but in general terms by hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Hendon, South. Each tragic incident, some of which have been referred to—I take them all very seriously—results in an ad hoc attempt to patch the holes in the care system, when it is clear that the system itself needs a thorough overhaul. I hope that the Government will respond to the points that were made by Conservative Members this morning.

The central issue that the Minister must address is the organisational framework of community care. When the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 was being debated in the House, I thought that it introduced a fundamental contradiction, especially in planning mental health services. Within the NHS, it introduced a competitive market in health, but alongside that was the requirement at local level to plan community care. The two elements were completely contradictory.

We have seen the result at local level, which has a bearing on some of the tragic cases that have been mentioned. The result has been the fragmentation of local provision, duplication in some instances, and gaps in provision, as has been mentioned by hon. Members. We must add to that the joker in the pack, which was not mentioned this morning—GP fundholding—which is undermining coherent planning in community care. If a fundholder purchases a community psychiatric nurse from outside the immediate area, in such circumstances local collaboration simply does not exist. The Government seem to be turning a blind eye to some of the inherent problems in the operation of the market as it applies to community care.

The divided structure between the national health service and local authorities adds to such organisational problems. Administrative difficulties undermine attempts at inter-professional and inter-agency working. No doubt the Minister will mention last year's Audit Commission report, which mentioned poor co-ordination, ineffective use of resources, and lack of communication and effective multi-disciplinary team working. Only 25 per cent. of health and social services authorities had actually established the criteria for operating the care programme, let alone actually got it working.

I have listened carefully to comments on the Mental Health (Patients in the Community) Bill that will shortly come before the House, but I am concerned that it addresses just one element, despite considerable pressure from a variety of sources for a much wider review of existing mental health provision and legislation. Indeed, the Mental Health Act Commission itself has called for the existing legislation to be updated and to reflect the shift towards care in the community.

There is concern that mental illness is regarded by that legislation primarily as a medical condition. That is where I disagree with the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton),, for whom I have great respect. Mental illness is a much wider issue than a clinical problem to be dealt with by doctors. I shall deal with that point in a moment.

One matter that the Government must address—in a sense, it was ignored by the hon. Member for Macclesfield—is the clear connection between mental illness and social factors. There are social reasons why people become mentally ill, and they must be looked at in the context of reviewing the policy on the care of people who have mental health problems.

Although "The Health of the Nation" identifies mental illness as a key issue for prevention, there is no acknowledgement of the need to shift towards social remedies to mental health problems. There is no acknowledgement that the deliberate widening of social inequalities has impacted significantly on mental health.

Mr. Spring: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hinchliffe: I do not have time to give way. I apologise to the hon. Gentleman; I have two minutes left.

For example, a range of studies—I shall happily refer hon. Members to them—have now confirmed the connections between increased unemployment, mental illness and suicidal behaviour. Each year, more than 5,500 people commit suicide—more than those who die in road traffic accidents. We need to consider the social factors that result in such tragic figures.

It is crucial that the Government understand the clear connection between their own core policies and mental ill health. Housing policies result in record levels of homelessness, as people are dumped on the street because councils no longer have the ability to offer them proper accommodation. In areas such as mine, industrial policies that have wiped out entire industries, such as coal, and left people rotting on the dole, influence their mental health. The Government must address those problems.

Economic and social policies that lead to the redistribution of wealth away from poorer people towards those who have money have a bearing on the mental health of poorer people in our communities. Until the Government address those points, our debates will be on the periphery of the real issues we have to address.

The most important steps that any Government can take are preventive. Until the Government learn the central lesson that preventive measures are the key element, they will not come anywhere near dealing with the fundamental issues that need to be addressed in respect of the care of the mentally ill.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Bowis): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on initiating the debate and raising this subject in the House for the second time. I know that he has provided long and effective support for a number of national and voluntary organisations, and I welcome his involvement and his thoughts.

I also welcome the thoughtful contributions from both sides of the House and all sides of the arguments. I should mention those from my hon. Friends the Members for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring), for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) and for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald), and from the hon. Members for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) and for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe), and the interventions from my hon. Friends the Members for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) and for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland), not forgetting the supervising presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Kirkhope), who is a founder member of the Mental Health Act Commission.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): The Minister should not forget the Whips. He has mentioned everyone else.

Mr. Bowis: I mentioned supervising presences, and hon. Members can read into that what they will.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South on his choice of title for the debate. The element of care, perhaps caritas, is crucial to all health care, but perhaps it is even more fundamental when we are helping people to cope with an illness which, after all, frightens them and other people. It can be invisible and unpredictable, it is widely misunderstood and it produces prejudices in others which exacerbate the problem for the sufferer.

If we start with the concept of care in both its strands—of mattering to us and looking after those who are ill—we begin to build the understanding that will help us do better for people with mental health problems.

We need to care enough to care for the mentally ill. We need to care enough to overcome ignorance, remove stigma and provide the range of services that we all need. It is not just the 10 per cent. of us who currently need those services; it is the one in four of us who will do so during our lives. Mental illness can affect any of us, and will affect many of us.

The hon. Member for Wakefield spoke about prevention. Of course prevention is crucial. That is why our policies put so much emphasis on initiatives such as the "Defeat Depression" campaign and our work with employers, helping people to cope with stress and to lead mentally and physically active and fit lives. Everyone can play a part. At work, a flexible employer with a counsellor on board can help people who may be under stress at home or at work and need that additional support.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South said, it was Enoch Powell, some 30 years ago, who first advocated moving people from the old institutions back to the community, where many of them could live more fulfilling lives if given proper support. The development of new drugs for treating mental illness means that is possible for many more people. That does not mean that we can simply close down all the old hospitals and walk away. We need a range of facilities for care to work in the community.

It is our policy that hospitals should not close until and unless alternative provision is available. We need residential care—some of it sheltered—in or near communities. We need modern hospital facilities—long-term, medium-term and short-term. I have preached the case for medium-term hospital hostels to providers and purchasers in our health service, and I shall continue to do so. We need 24-hour crisis beds for those who cannot cope in the short term, and we need asylum in the best sense of the word—a place of safety in which to rest and improve one's mental health.

Some patients will need much longer spells in hospitals, and a few, sadly, will need to spend all their lives there. Some will need different levels of security, including medium-secure units, and a small number will need the high-security services in our special hospitals.

We have been concentrating on developing a range of facilities. Let me dwell for a moment on medium-secure provision, which is so important to so many issues that have been raised today. It fills a gap that was perceived and identified in 1974 by the Glancy committee. When the Government came to office in 1979, there was not a single medium-secure psychiatric bed in the country. We have invested £47 million in the programme, and by the end of next year we shall have provided 1,200 of those places. That makes so much more possible. In addition, further places are being developed by regions from mainstream NHS capital allocations, as well as in the private sector.

Reference has been made to enabling people to leave prison. In the past four years, we have enabled 2,500 patients to move from prison to hospital. I understand the impatience of my hon. Friends and the courts, but it is worth bearing in mind the fact that, a few years ago, that option was not available, as medium-secure beds were not being provided. The option has become available only recently, and it will increasingly be the route for the appropriate placement of people.

Reference has been made to the Mental Health (Patients in the Community) Bill, and I welcome what has been said about that. In answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds, we have issued new guidance on hospital discharge. I commend to him the discharge handbook, which is helping people to make the right decision and to ensure that the decision to discharge somebody is made only if the care programme is available and ready in the community, with the key worker in charge, and there are provisions for that individual's needs.

We have introduced through the House the new code of practice to the Mental Health Act, stressing that a person's health, as well as the risk to himself or to others, is sufficient to take him for assessment and into hospital. We have introduced supervision registers, identifying those patients at significant risk of causing harm, committing suicide or harming other people if they are not given extra protection and care. Those are now in place in every health authority in the country.

We recognise the point, well made by hon. Members, about the need to have the right person in charge of someone in the community. It is not always a medical person. Sometimes the key need is social functioning. Sometimes—indeed more often—it is right that it should be a medical person, probably a community psychiatric nurse. We are making sure that those people are properly trained and know their role as key workers.

I am conscious of London's particular problems, which were referred to in the Royal College of Psychiatrists report, which drew attention to the fact that too many people were in the wrong beds. It was not just that there were insufficient beds, but that they were inappropriate beds. The medium-secure programme goes some way towards meeting that, as does the extra £10 million we put in and the mental health task force project, which identified good practice and listed where we needed to do better. It was followed up with a further report showing what had been achieved.

The £20 million homeless mentally ill initiative for London has funded 10 hostels, providing 150 bed spaces. Outreach teams are now taken on by the respective health authorities. In respect of accommodation, where the Housing Corperation agreed initially to 150 supported places, I am pleased to say that approval has now been given to some 162.

The mental illness specific grant is enabling local authorities to develop their community services. It has provided an extra £10 million this year, and £66 million in total. That has already supported 1,000 schemes throughout the country and helped 100,000 people.

The NHS has a role in ensuring that the care programme approach, registers and the priority that we give mental health are effective throughout the country. The beds are there, but we must ensure that they are the right ones. There are 20,000 acute beds and 80,000 long-term beds, as there have been over the past decade, but they are in different places. That is good news—provided that those beds are everywhere, to meet the range of need.

Nobody can be complacent about mental health. We must work together, because there is an inter-agency task ahead for us all. I re-emphasise, in this short response, our commitment to providing effective, appropriate and safe care for people with mental health problems.

Personal Financial Services

11.30 am

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen): I am grateful for this debate and, following the recent Personal Investment Authority statement on the mis-selling of personal pensions and the Office of Fair Trading report on the selling of endowment mortgages, I hope that the debate will provide a timely opportunity to examine the serious problems that still exist in the sale of many personal financial services. I declare an interest, as I receive a modest contribution to my office research costs from the National Union of Insurance Workers. That is not a party political union or one affiliated to the Labour party. In fact, I believe that at the last general election it sponsored a Conservative candidate.

That union's sponsorship brings me no personal pecuniary benefit, but taking an interest in personal financial services since becoming a Member of Parliament has brought me personal financial benefit. As I began to take a closer interest in the operation of the financial services industry, I realised that I had been mis-sold a personal pension some time ago. Four years before I entered the House, I chose to become self-employed and acquired a personal pension. The mis-selling that occurred in my case was not one of the spectacular instances that hit the headlines in the past year, but a mundane, everyday example of mis-selling of the kind that collectively waste the savings of too many people. I was sold a regular premium policy even when I had made it clear to the financial adviser that I was most unlikely to continue in a personal pension scheme for more than a few years. I remember making it clear that I hoped to join within a reasonable period the generous occupational pension scheme offered to Members of Parliament.

In those circumstances, I should have been advised to make single premium payments into my personal pension policy, because, with a regular payment scheme, charges in the early years are much higher. Unless the policy is kept until maturity, it is an expensive way of saving. When I raised that matter with the company concerned, the error was admitted without fuss. The recalculation of my personal pension savings over the four-year period showed that, had I made single premium payments, my pension savings would have increased by no less than 50 per cent.—a significant difference.

When I told that story to a colleague in the Tea Room the other day he said, "If I'd been as daft as that, I certainly wouldn't go around telling people about it." That is part of the problem. Many people who are not unintelligent are unsophisticated when it comes to financial matters but are reluctant to admit to the fact. That makes them over-dependent on advice from people who may have a vested interest, and reluctant to ask hard questions or to complain when they fear that things are going wrong. I suggest that that is true of the majority of the people who bought a variety of personal financial services in recent years.

I shall outline some of the steps that need to be taken to minimise mis-selling, avoid wasting hard-won savings and restore public confidence in an industry of immense importance to the country and the British economy. It is important to set the scene.

The problems of mis-selling that came to light over the past couple of years occurred at precisely the time that the Government were urging ever-greater individual dependence on personal financial services, savings and insurance. The Government have openly and clearly pursued a twin-track strategy. They have provided financial incentives to leave state provision and to take out personal savings and pension policies, and they have progressively reduced the value and benefits of state provisions. The effect of that for many individuals has been to give them a choice between a rock and a hard place.

Over the past 10 years, the Government have encouraged opting out of the state earnings-related pension scheme, and the Pensions Bill now in Committee will take that further. The Government Actuary suggests that Government measures will reduce the national SERPS bill by nearly 50 per cent. over the next 45 years.

The Government have encouraged pensioners to take out health insurance while reducing access by the sick elderly to national health service beds. The Government are now requiring new mortgage takers to provide their own insurance cover because the Government are removing income support on interest payments on mortgages taken out from October.

The really damning indictment of Government policy is not just the shift from public provision to private insurance but the way that the Government made that shift without ensuring that consumers were guaranteed value for money and financial security from the private provision that they are encouraged to make. The scale and range of problems now facing consumers taking out private insurance and making private savings are daunting.

Half a million people will have their opt-outs and transfers from occupational pension schemes individually reviewed. The cost of restoring lost benefits to them is estimated at between £1 billion and £2 billion. The cost of administering the review is expected to run into hundreds of millions of pounds. The ultimate cost of compensating people who were mis-sold and of conducting the review and paying the fees and other charges will have to be met from the pockets of consumers.

According to the Office of Fair Trading, endowment mortgages—which accounted for 84 per cent. of the home loans market in the late 1980s and which are still the choice of an astonishing 60 per cent. of home owners—pose a higher risk and frequently are a more expensive option than repayment mortgages. The OFT strongly suggested that the existence of high commissions on endowment policies biased sales advice and distorted the market towards inappropriate policies for many people.

When the Department of Social Security and the Securities and Investments Board report later this year, they will confirm that people on low incomes—as many as 2 million—were wrongly advised to leave SERPS for personal pensions because their incomes were low, rebates were low and personal contributions over and above the rebate were low or non-existent. Fees and charges are eroding the savings of people who opted out for personal pensions. Some will be left with pensions of a lower value than they would have had under the state earnings-related pension scheme. At the very least, people on low incomes, who can ill afford risky saving strategies, have been exposed to an unacceptable degree of risk in the marketplace.

The cost of the opt-out has been enormous. By 1992, the cost of giving incentives to low-income savers—people on less than £10,000 a year—to opt out of the state scheme was £3.6 billion of public money given away, much of it now being absorbed in the fees and charges of insurance companies. By now, that figure is probably around £5 billion. That is an enormous amount of public money to transfer to the private sector to leave people with inadequate pensions which, in most cases, will be no better than they would have received under SERPS, and may be worse.

The extent to which that strategy has failed means that there will not even be a public saving in the long run. Projections made by such organisations as the National Association of Pension Funds in evidence to its income inquiry show that for many people those pensions will be below foreseeable state benefit levels, so people will have to have their pensions topped up through state contributions.

Bacon and Woodrow have recently suggested that many people are being sold private additional voluntary contribution schemes despite the fact that AVC schemes available to them through their occupational pension scheme provide better value at a lower cost.

Huge losses are incurred every year through the early cancellation of schemes. Evidence shows that 30 per cent. of endowment policies, which in most cases bring reasonable value only if they are kept to maturity, are cancelled within five years, and only 20 per cent. are kept to maturity. A couple of years ago, the Office of Fair Trading estimated that the cost of early cancellations to savers was running at £250 million a year. That is more or less a Maxwell scandal every year or so in the life assurance industry.

The cost is much greater than that because those savings were due to be kept over a long period. They were due to mature in 20 or 25 years' time. Therefore, the loss to savers at the time that they might have expected to get some return on their savings will be about £750 million to £1 billion a year.

Other problems are becoming apparent in other financial services that are not regulated under the Financial Services Act 1986 because they do not involve investment. Permanent health insurance policies often turn out to be anything but permanent. People find that their ability to claim on their policy is subject to the arbitrary decisions of company doctors who are subject to less accountability and fewer grounds for appeal than the doctors of the Department of Social Security who, in the general view of my constituents, are not always regarded as the most sympathetic members of the medical profession.

Loss of income policies, which are expensive to operate, in many cases turn out to have severe penalties. People who return briefly to work find that they can no longer renew their policy and end up with little to show for their money. Contracts are revoked arbitrarily when companies become aware that particular groups of employees are likely to be subject to redundancy.

Insurance on unsecured bank loans is enormously expensive and, in practice, subject to little competition at the point of sale. The Government have refused to regulate the market that they are creating in mortgage insurance. I predict with some confidence that, unless the Government change their mind on that, within months, and certainly within some years, it will become clear that mortgage lenders are selling policies that over-insure when compared with the benefits that the Government are taking away.

The sum total of those problems is pretty disastrous. First and foremost, the waste of the public's money is a scandal. These days, people can ill afford to see their hard-won money frittered away; nor can the country, which faces a growing bill for future pension provision, afford to see money which could be accumulating as savings, as future pensions, absorbed in excessive fees, charges and the waste of early cancellation.

It is a sobering thought that, even when nothing goes wrong in the sales process, the results are far from satisfactory. With many companies selling personal pensions and endowment mortgages, nearly £1 in every £3 invested by the consumer is lost in fees and charges. One third of the potential pension, one third of the potential endowment return, goes to the company for its administrative costs and, in the case of shareholder companies, payment to shareholders. The Government cannot seriously expect to see private savings replace state provision when so much of the potential benefit, so much of the potential investment, is lost in that way.

The second problem is no less important. The current crisis threatens the integrity of a major important British industry which employs hundreds of thousands of people, makes a major contribution to Britain's national wealth and generates savings for investment on a scale unparalleled in most other European countries.

In the past year or so, there has been a sharp fall in the sale of some personal investment products. For example, there was a 10 per cent. fall in the sale of regular premium products between 1993 and 1994, and I am told that the first quarter of 1995 has been the most difficult for the industry for decades.

If that were a sign that individual savers were shifting away from some of the policies towards more prudent forms of investment, that would probably be good, but I suspect that that is not happening. I suspect that the fall in sales, the difficulty of making sales, reflects the drop in public confidence in the industry and is the effect of the highly publicised difficulties of recent years. If that is the case, individuals are simply failing to make any form of investment saving at all and, in the long run, that will bring a significant cost to themselves and the country.

The effect on the industry is also important because there are major opportunities for the United Kingdom insurance industry in Europe. Problems in the funding of state pension schemes in Britain, which most people recognise although they may have different solutions, are writ large in other European countries that have less developed non-state pension provision.

Therefore, there is an enormous potential market in Europe for expertise and direct services for the British insurance industry. However, I suspect that someone coming from most other European countries to look at the British industry and seeing the type of problems that I have outlined would be less than impressed with the record of recent years and less certain that under this Government ways of developing effective personal financial services had been developed as well as they could have been.

I did not seek this debate in order to rubbish the insurance industry. It is an important industry and, whatever the differences between the two sides of the House on where exactly the line is to be drawn between public and private provision, there is clearly a need for an active personal financial services industry. As working patterns change, as life-time employment in one company becomes a rarity, as the role of parents change, there will be a growing need for savings that only personal financial services can meet.

For example, most people need and will need a non-state pension in addition to any state pension. It is sometimes said that we cannot afford a state pay-as-you-go pension scheme. Logically, that is not true. The cost of any given pensions bill to the resources of the nation in 30 years' time is the same however it is funded. It is nearer the truth to say that, although we may happily pay the taxes to fund our parents' pension bill, we do not trust our children an inch. We are not certain that, in 30 years' time, they will be willing to vote for a Government willing to levy sufficient levels of taxes to pay our pensions. Demography shows that the demands on those children will be greater than they are on us.

Faced with that political risk—that is what we are talking about—prudence suggests that we should have our eggs in more than one basket and that people should have non-state pensions. If we are to sort out the mess and have a secure form of non-state pension, we will have to address the root causes of the problem. I do not have time to survey all the current regulatory issues, but I want to focus on some that have been given insufficient attention.

The failures of state regulation have been widely discussed in the technical and financial press. The attempt to turn poachers into gamekeepers failed, and all we got was poachers. But the tabloid press has had a different target. The tabloid press has greedy salesmen—sales reps who have eyes only for the commission that they can earn. In the popular mind and the popular media, they have been universally blamed for the mis-selling of recent years.

Some people, obviously, have been driven by greed or straightforward, outright dishonesty; but it offends against common sense to suggest that half a million people could have been induced to opt out of occupational schemes, and 2 million or more low earners could have been enticed from the security of SERPS, simply by the greed of individual financial advisers and sales representatives. Over the past year, I have talked to people who sell pensions and other insurance policies, and the picture that I have seen is rather different from the popular tabloid image.

Those people say—rightly—that much responsibility for the current problems lies with the Government. When the personal pension boom began, the Government spent £1 million on advertising the benefits of personal pensions, giving little or no warning of the problems. One memorable advertisement showed someone tied upside down in chains representing that person's existing pension provision. The advertisement told people about the new personal pensions:

"employees will be able to choose their own Personal Pension scheme instead of staying in SERPS or an employer's pension scheme."

It is now the received wisdom of the regulators that very few people who have the opportunity to join an occupational scheme should be encouraged not to do so, that very few people who are members of such a scheme should be encouraged to leave it, and that very few people who have deferred pensions from an occupational scheme should do other than leave them in that scheme. In their advertisement back in 1988, however, the Government clearly endorsed the idea that people should opt out of their employers' schemes.

I am not attempting to whitewash the industry, but it makes a fair response when it says that the Government encouraged the idea among the public that opting out was a good idea. None the less, the management of most insurance companies—the very people who were then put in charge of self-regulation—actively encouraged their sales forces and financial advisers to target those who have now been mis-sold policies.

There is still a great deal of foot-dragging in the industry in regard to sorting out problems. It has been dragged kicking and screaming into dealing with the problems of opt-outs and transfers from occupational schemes. It is now two years since the regulators told insurance companies that they needed to re-check the policies of all who had been sold personal pensions to ensure that they had been given good advice. The reasonable expectation—shared by the regulators—is for a substantial number of people on low incomes to have been advised by insurance companies to opt back into SERPS and out of their personal pensions, but as far as I know there is no sign that the industry is taking such action or that such a shift is taking place.

The main conclusion that I have reached, having spoken to people working in the industry, is that most of those who sell at the sharp end of insurance companies suffer employment conditions and practices in which mis-selling is likely to be an inherent danger. Commission on products plays an important role in that, less because of commission-driven greed than because for the majority of financial advisers—tied agents—commission is the source of their income. If they do not sell, they do not eat, pay their own mortgages or clothe their children. Some companies have recently introduced higher basic salaries, but for most employees any reasonable income is entirely dependent on sales performance.

That is not the only pressure on financial advisers, however; others are equally insidious. Many sales managers depend on override for their income. The managers obtain their own income from the commission generated by financial advisers working under them, which creates permanent pressure to sell throughout the management hierarchy. Companies use sales targets, often set at unrealistically high levels, to keep the financial advisers in a state of permanent job insecurity: anyone who does not meet the sales targets that cannot be achieved is constantly liable to dismissal for poor performance.

Financial advisers are vulnerable to the peculiar contracts in force in the industry. Sales representatives are held personally responsible for lost commission on policies that are cancelled early—which means that they can run up debts of thousands of pounds on policies that they sold in accordance with their companies' instructions and the regulators' own good practice guides. Indeed, in some cases people who move from one company to another see their own clients "churned"—sold new policies—and the resulting bills for the early cancellation follow them.

People with personal debts are not allowed to work in the insurance industry, so the consequence of such action is the denial of employment. More worryingly, people are tied into an insecure position in which pressure is on them to sell. Other companies push the legal interpretation of self-employment to the nth degree: companies in which people are clearly working permanently and receiving free training, software and support systems and are nevertheless encouraged—or forced—to work as self-employed.

It has been common practice for new entrants to the industry to be lent commission in advance of sales. It looks like a salary and feels like a salary—until the sales do not materialise, when it becomes a personal debt that those employees are liable to repay. Despite recent improvements in the regulatory requirements, it is clear that training standards and professional support for financial advisers vary widely. I was given more than one example of sales advisers' being assisted, quite improperly, to pass basic competence tests that are now required.

At the same time, the real burden of higher compliance standards is often felt by the front-line financial advisers. They are liable to lose their jobs if they make mistakes, at a time when they are under greater pressure to sell. Frequently, those responsible for disciplining financial advisers for making compliance mistakes are the same people—or part of the same management structure—as those who are setting unrealistic and demanding sales targets.

That puts the problem of commission in a different light from that generally shown by the tabloid press. Commission is a problem for three reasons. First, it is part of a complex set of pressures leading to job and financial insecurity for financial advisers. Highlighting commission alone will solve nothing unless the other pressures are tackled. Secondly, the effect of commission on the consumer is not so much salesman's greed as the distortion that it creates between products that offer different levels of commission. The Office of Fair Trading has highlighted the distortion between endowment mortgages, which carry high commissions, and products such as repayment mortgages, which carry little or no commission.

The most fundamental problem affecting employment in the financial services industry, however, is the fact that employment pressures run directly counter to the requirements of good regulation and the legal requirements of the Financial Services Act 1986 for the giving of best advice. It is a widely understood principle of any effective regulation of markets that financial incentives should reinforce the aim of the regulation. For the financial adviser—the tied agent, the sales representative—that means that giving best advice, which may be not to buy anything or to buy a product that carries little commission, should involve the same financial reward as selling a product attracting a high commission. That is not the position today. Until the problem is tackled and financial advisers are rewarded for their advice as much as for what they sell, mis-selling is bound to continue.

Over the past year or so, the number of people selling insurance has halved, but we have not yet created the network of financial advisers and tied agents that would provide the highly qualified, totally objective and well-rewarded individuals whom the industry and the consumer need. It is a sad fact that the regulators, whether SIB or LAUTRO—the Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation—in the past or the Personal Investment Authority, have had almost nothing to say about employment practices in the industry; when they have, it has all been at arm's length. It is hoped that increasing training standards and costs will improve staff retention, and that commission disclosure will change the reward structure. But it is all too little, too indirect and too ineffective.

In other areas of financial services product not covered by the Financial Services Act, the Government have relied overmuch on industry codes of practices rather than on direct regulation. As Which? revealed this month, poor financial advice is still widely available in the high street from insurance companies, building societies, bank assurance companies and independent financial advisers. Until employment practices in the industry are tackled, mis-selling will continue.

I accept that it is difficult for regulators to prescribe exact employment terms, but a number of things could be done. The regulators could study and issue good practice guidance on contracts, remuneration, discipline procedures and the setting and management of sales targets. That should emphasise the need for a substantial element of basic salary and for performance-related pay that reflects the quality of advice given, and not just the volume or value of sales achieved. Such guidance would provide a focal point for unions in the industry and for consumers to judge the company from which they were buying.

The regulators could and should introduce direct registration of all those selling insurance in the industry, making the contractual obligation of individual financial advisers to meet compliance standards one between the adviser and the regulator, not between the adviser and his own manager. Creating a directly regulated sales force would be a major step towards the genuine professionalisation of the industry and raising the status of financial advisers, and it would give some protection against the arbitrary use of discipline by managers and companies in the industry.

The Government could, of course, bring financial advisers' representatives into regulators' governing bodies or, more to the point, perhaps draw on the experience of financial advisers' representatives in establishing a system of statutory regulation. It is a real indictment of self-regulation that self-regulatory structures have never seriously tried to draw on the experience of people who actually sell personal financial services to try to improve regulation. I hope that that matter will be dealt with.

Another aspect of regulation has had too little attention. The whole emphasis of the regulatory effort has been on the sales process, not on the quality of product. It is hoped that improved disclosure will improve the quality of products. Indeed, the Minister of State, Treasury said:

"the new regime for disclosure will—we hope and intend—substantially improve the avoidance of problems of mis-selling."—[Official Report, 28 April 1995; Vol. 258, c. 1124.]

That is over-optimistic.

Certainly, league tables showing the dramatic effects of fees and charges are becoming available. They show, for example, that on a £50,000 endowment mortgage, an individual's choice of company can influence the final value of his investment by as much as £9,000. I doubt, however, whether disclosure will have much effect. Few signs exist that most tied agents are being trained to deal with increasing competition in the marketplace. In general, people still remain dependent on the building society, the bank assurer whom they first contact, or the tied adviser who first contacts them. Under the present regime, it will be many years, if ever, before disclosure really creates genuine competitive pressures that work in consumers' interests.

We need to consider ways of improving not only the quality of products in the market but the sales process. The Office of Fair Trading and consumer organisations have done far more to highlight the failure of different types of products than the regulators. That must change. A number of key areas for action exist.

First, when sales are made, customers should be told how their potential insurer compares with the industry as a whole in relation to key measures, such as the impact of fees and charges on the effective rate of return. Choice of company can influence the return on a personal pension of £50 a month by as much as £70,000, on total savings of, say, £250,000. That is the effect of the different charges levied by a company on the same assumed rate of investment return. It is in the consumer's interests to know how his potential insurer compares with others.

The shilly-shallying over disclosure of persistency rates should end. I have already the highlighted the waste through poor persistency rates. It is unacceptable that people do not receive information about how effective their company is at retaining its clients in any consistent form. If agreement cannot be reached with the industry—that seems to be the big problem—the Securities and Investments Board or the Personal Investment Authority should impose a standard definition of persistency rates to be used by all. Once again, that information should be available on a comparative basis to potential customers as well as on an individual company basis.

If companies choose to bump up their assumed investment returns or to reduce their premiums by assuming abnormally high rates of return, something needs to be done about that. The industry average assumed rate of return on investment is less than 8 per cent. Some companies, however, have produced projections assuming rates of return of 9.25 per cent. It enables them to produce large presumed bonuses or to reduce their premium rates substantially. A case exists for underlining that for consumers. They should be informed about what the current average industry assumption is so that they will be aware that they are being sold a policy that has an abnormally high assumed rate of return.

None of the measures that I have outlined would be expensive to enforce. Information could be regularly collected by regulators and supplied centrally on, say, a quarterly basis to companies to pass to customers. It would bring some genuine consumer choice and competition. Even if that were done, more would need to be done. Regulators should take on the responsibility of applying direct pressure on costs. The spread of fees and charges levied is far too wide. As I said, it is unacceptable that such a large proportion of people's savings—£1 in £3 in many cases—is absorbed in fees and charges. Nationally, that is an expense that we cannot afford. Consideration should be given to introducing over time a minimum acceptable level of charges, and companies exceeding that limit should be highlighted.

Action should be taken to prevent mis-selling to low-income individuals who would be better off in a state earnings-related pension scheme. One possibility would be to set a floor below which no transfer could take place. It might be more in tune with the market to introduce a requirement that any personal pension sold to someone below a given income level—perhaps £12,000 per annum—should be guaranteed by the company to perform no worse than the SERPS equivalent. That would soon sort out companies that had genuine confidence in their investment performance from those that did not.

We should be aware, as the regulator should be, of companies that, according to the Office of Fair Trading, use the money they make on early cancellations to bump up published maturity values of policies that are kept to term. The regulator should be prepared to tackle that abuse if necessary.

The Government should be boosting the industry by introducing more helpful and responsible measures than they have introduced to date. An underlying problem exists in that many people are under-insured and under-provided for in their retirement. The Government have simply said, "Take this private sector step," without underlining to people the fact of their under-insurance and under-provision.

The Government should undertake a regular survey of the real pension position of a large sample of the population at different ages and earning levels, and they should project forward the type of pension entitlement that is being developed. In many cases, that would highlight the degree of under-insurance and the need to make provision. Such a move would help to make the transition from a society where insurance products have to be sold to one in which informed consumers would choose to buy.

I have gone on longer than I intended, but I should like to make one final point. The Government also have a responsibility to set the framework in which people can take long-term decisions about personal financial services and personal savings. One of the things that has tipped the balance from endowment mortgages to repayment mortgages is the reduction of tax relief on mortgage interest payment. When the Government embarked a few years ago on their strategy of reducing and probably phasing out MIRAS, they gave no consideration to the impact on people's decisions to take out endowment mortgages. If the Government want to claim that they are encouraging greater dependence on personal financial services, they have a responsibility not to make decisions that change the ground rules after people have become locked into an investment decision.

For most people who have taken out an endowment mortgage, there is now no way out. It may have been a bad decision at the time, but trying to get out of it now would leave them even worse off, taking into account the costs of early cancellation. Of course, there is also the saga of the tax that never was, or the tax that may be—we are not sure which. That recent episode has highlighted the dangers of encouraging people to make personal provision and then threatening them with the possibility that they will be taxed on the money that they have put aside. What needs to go hand in hand with the Government's strategy of privatising social provision is long-term stability in Government policy, which the Government have been reluctant to provide.

We need an effective personal financial services industry and people need to be able to buy its products with confidence and security. So far, the Government's record has been marked by a mixture of irresponsibility and complacency. The regulatory system is by no means at the level required to ensure that the industry can offer consumers what they need. It also does not offer those who work in the industry the employment conditions that would enable them to act as truly objective and professional advisers. The quality of products on sale is much lower than it should be or needs to be. It is important that the Government deal with those problems in the very near future.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) on securing this debate. During his time in the House, he has acquired a formidable reputation in the financial services area. It is to his credit that he has not only secured the debate but has made a number of constructive suggestions with the aim of improving the current unsatisfactory position.

The financial services industry is of immense importance to this country. Although, to a certain extent, my hon. Friend and I have a number of criticisms—in the proper sense of that word—to offer, no one should be in any doubt that we fully support the industry. Edinburgh—part of which I represent—is the fourth biggest financial centre in Europe, so I well understand that the industry is of immense importance. No one can level a charge against me that I do not have its best interests at heart when I make some suggestions to improve the present position. My hon. Friend shares my view.

The industry employs 2.5 million people, and many towns and cities depend on it for employment. Indeed, the industry as a whole, broadly defined, produces about 18 per cent. of this country's gross domestic product. As my hon. Friend said, it is of crucial and growing importance as a service provider, so it is important to have a regulatory system that commands confidence. It is also important that if there are problems—and undoubtedly there are—they should be dealt with in the spirit of trying to persuade more people to make provision for themselves, both for their benefit and for the benefit of the industry as a whole.

As my hon. Friend said, more and more people will want to make provision for themselves through savings, both long term and short term. The Government should encourage that as a matter of principle. Saving has worth for the individual as well as value for society as a whole because saving makes money available for investment—and long-term investment is something that this country needs.

Pensions are of growing importance, so it is crucial that we get the right regulatory regime. If an individual makes a mistake when he takes out a pension, it could be 20 or 30 years before he realises that the mistake has been made, by which time he can do nothing about it. We must remember the changing working patterns in this country, which make it unlikely that people will work for 30 to 40 years for the same employer before retiring with a gold watch. Instead, people will have many jobs and will go in and out of employment. It is important that they make the appropriate choice of pension. My hon. Friend was fortunate to discover his mistake at an early stage, so he had an opportunity to put matters right.

The problem we face—I use the word "we" advisedly—is that a mistake made at an early stage may not be discovered for many years, so nothing can be done about it. It is a catastrophe not only for the individual but for us collectively because in the end the state has to put the matter right, inasmuch as it can do so.

People will want to buy other protections from the industry, and my hon. Friend mentioned endowment mortgages. I want to say a word about the concept of caveat emptor, which is important to the law of contract. I do not believe that the regulatory system or the Government can ever substitute their judgment for that of individuals and they cannot protect people against foolishness, stupidity or, in some cases, dishonesty. No one should try to get away from the fact that caveat emptor—buyer beware—is an important concept.

However, when dealing with public policy and matters as important as, for example, the sale of a pension, the doctrine of caveat emptor should be qualified by the recognition that there must be a regulatory system that at least tries to minimise the risk that people will be sold inappropriate products. In other words, there is a public interest in proper regulation. That is something that the Opposition have long recognised, but I am not sure that it is universally recognised by the Government.

We need a regulatory system that commands the confidence of the industry and the public: both are important. Currently, the problem is that the regulatory system commands neither the confidence of the industry—where more and more people are saying publicly as well as privately that the system simply is not working—nor the confidence of the general public. There is a need for that confidence, for the benefit both of individuals and of us collectively as members of society. It is not in our interests that people should be scared off or discouraged from making provision for themselves.

My hon. Friend referred to the pension transfer problem, which has been raised in the House on many occasions. The problem continues. I am disappointed to note that the industry—or at least certain parts of it—are determined to challenge, through the courts or by other means, the determination of the Personal Investment Authority to resolve the problem and examine cases where mistakes may have been made. The industry must understand that if the public sees it trying to avoid putting right mistakes made in the past, they will understandably say, "I will not trust the industry in the future." The selling of financial services, in particular pensions, demands trust more than anything else. If a mistake has been made—and it is common ground that mistakes may have been made—it is far better for the industry to put up its hands and say, "It's a fair cop," and try to put things right.

I understand the legal constraints on the trustees of funds and their duty towards those funds, but the industry must understand that if it prevaricates, delays and gives the impression that it is not willing to put things right for the people to whom it has sold its policies, the industry itself will suffer. That would be in nobody's interest.

My hon. Friend referred to the SERPS problem, where there may have been substantial mis-selling. That problem is only just beginning to come to light. It will haunt the Government for the rest of their time in office, and it will also haunt future Governments. That is why it is important to deal with problems when they come to light, rather than shovelling them into a dark corner, hoping that they do not return.

Significantly, figures show that since the pension transfer problem came to light sales are down by about 10 per cent., and even more in some cases. That is largely because the public have lost trust, which now needs to be restored. A number of steps should be taken to achieve that.

First, the regulatory system needs to be reformed. As I have said, I believe that self-regulation, in particular, has been discredited. Few people are now prepared to stand up and defend self-regulation. Unfortunately, those few are in the Chamber. The Government simply will not accept that a mistake was made in the mid-1980s when self-regulation was thought to be an appropriate way of dealing with these sales. If the Government accepted that, they would propose fresh legislation to correct the fundamental flaw in the Financial Services Act 1986.

Self-regulation is a fiction anyway, because the present system is rooted in statute. A tennis club is self-regulated, as are voluntary organisations. When the Personal Investment Authority was set up, we had the fiction of it bidding for recognition by the Securities and Investments Board, when the PIA knew that it would not be recognised unless it complied with every last dot and comma required by the SIB. The legal fact is the PIA's obligation to its members.

That fiction is cumbersome, expensive and results in duplication, as we have seen in the sale of personal pensions. Both the SIB and the PIA are prescribing rules and regulations and are making pronouncements. Significantly, when the problem with pension transfers first came to light, some within the Financial Intermediaries, Managers and Brokers Regulatory Organisation, which has been subsumed within the PIA, stated that the problem was being greatly exaggerated. That may have been so, but it does not help public confidence when the regulator appears to be acting as if it were a trade association.

I do not believe that it is possible to serve two masters—the trade interest and the public interest—at the same time. Our proposed reforms should leave no one in any doubt that the ultimate master of the regulators must be the public interest, not the trade interest. I do not suggest that it is not in the industry's interests to have a regulatory system that commands confidence, but I do not think that self-regulation can command confidence in the 1990s. It may have had its day in the 1980s, but the Government must accept that that day has gone.

Different regulation is required for different ends of the market. The problems at Barings—I shall not go into those, as we are not discussing them today—were of prudential supervision. At the other end of the market—the market we are discussing today—we are dealing with the need for proper customer protection and rules of conduct.

Any reform of the system must recognise that there are two distinct needs and that they must be dealt with appropriately. In that connection, I wish to consider briefly the nature of regulation required. It is necessary to tread a fine line between sufficient regulation to maintain public interest and over-regulation, whereby we may lose sight of what we are trying to achieve.

I suggested that it was not possible to exclude stupidity, greed and foolishness, but one can try to reduce the likelihood of their occurring. That is why I believe that the time has come to look at the nature of regulation. Many people say that the industry is being strangled by regulation. Independent financial advisers are important if we are to provide a facility for proper impartial advice, and many of them believe that they are being squeezed out by the new rules.

We must get away from the box-ticking approach to regulation, whereby advisers are told to tick boxes to show what they have done. That does not prove anything. If Robert Maxwell had been alive today, he would have ticked every box that was ever shoved in front of him. I never ticked a box when I was in practice as an advocate, and people who consulted me relied on the trust that they had in their professional adviser. My hon. Friend said that the regulatory system should be geared towards promoting a long-term commitment to the industry and professional integrity.

I have some sympathy for those who believe that all the rules and regulations have been put in place to protect the regulator, so that if anything goes wrong it can say that it has a rule to deal with the problem. It is necessary to look at the regulations, to streamline them and to put them in broad terms. We should have four rules and regulations which work, rather than 400 or 4,000 which do not. The PIA should undertake the fundamental review that is necessary now, rather than going further down its present road of having so many rules and regulations that we lose sight of what we are trying to achieve.

We must also look at the way in which products are sold, and my hon. Friend spoke on this matter with a great deal of force. He mentioned the role of the Government, but I do not want to say very much about that as I have made these comments before. It is worthy of note, however, that the Government created the culture in which mis-selling can take place.

My hon. Friend drew attention to the advertisement that has been shown again and again as a public information advert, although it seems to me to be stretching public information almost to the point where credulity is broken. The advertisement refers to the mis-selling of pensions. In the late 1980s, the Government led people to believe that the very act of going private was enriching in itself. It did not matter how much money one had, or what one's prospects were: if one got a private pension, one must be better off.

That allowed a climate in which unscrupulous salesmen, as well as people who thought that they should do what the Government wanted, could sell policies that were manifestly unsuitable for the people to whom they were sold. It is no wonder that the Government promoted self-regulation at that time, because self-regulation, which became increasingly equated with self-interest, went hand in hand with the culture that so dominated our lives in the late 1980s—a culture which, I am happy to say, is being increasingly discredited, and not just in the area of financial services.

My hon. Friend stated that many commentators tended to blame what are called unscrupulous salesmen, but they have not concentrated on the role of the employer, who usually sends salesmen out into the market. Those in the industry who complain about its image and who say that the industry is not held in high esteem should grasp the fact that the problem is substantially of their own making. If there is no trust between someone who is buying a product and the person selling it, it is inevitable that mistakes will be made and that people will not trust each other. That is why I fully support the independent sector, which is very important if it is genuinely independent.

People in the industry have been content to send salesmen out to areas devastated by pit closures, for example. Firms recruited people who had perhaps been in the NUM and were well known in the community to go through the area selling policies that should never have been sold. People were persuaded to opt out of the coal board pension. The management of those firms knew full well what was going on.

The industry must recognise that it is not in its long-term interests to sell inappropriate policies or policies that may be surrendered. My hon. Friend made a very good point about that, and the sooner some light is shone in some dark corners of the industry, the better for everyone.

I have never understood why, when something goes wrong in a mutual company, the regulators should impose a fine on the company and not on its directors and management. The fine imposed on a mutual company is paid by policyholders, who lose twice. They buy a policy, and then discover that the fund has been diminished by the extent of the fine. That is entirely inappropriate.

My hon. Friend drew attention to the role of commission and its influence on sales. I visited a prominent national life company—I shall not name it, as I do not think that it is unique in this respect—where I was shown its great training course. I was told that it had complied with every rule and regulation in the book. I had an opportunity to speak to some of the people on the course, and one of them told me that the salesmen had to make 10 contacts—a contact is reported back to management—and three sales every week, or they would lose their jobs. What happens on a Friday afternoon when the salesman has made only six contacts and one sale? I suspect that the conditions are then right for mis-selling to take place.

As my hon. Friend has said the problem that many sales people face is that they need to sell to make ends meet and to keep their jobs. In that climate, it is not surprising that mistakes are made. My hon. Friend and others have drawn attention to what has happened with pensions transfers and endowment mortgages. It cannot be right that people are put under pressure to buy something, simply because an individual needs that sale or commission to keep his job. If that is allowed to continue, it will be bad for industry and for society as a whole. That is why it must be stopped.

I do not believe that one can abolish rewards or incentives and I would not seek to do so, but the industry needs to look at how commission influences sales. Individuals can be rewarded for effort in other ways, and people should be rewarded for increased effort. The industry should remember that opposing disclosure, as it did for many years, does it no good whatever. It now opposes moves to do something about commission. It is high time that it grasped that difficult nettle and did something about it.

The Government's policy towards the pensions market is misplaced. We believe that state and private provision are complementary. It is appropriate for many people to have private pensions—I have had some in my time—but it is important for others to have occupational pensions. It is wrong to suggest that private personal pensions are always best, and it was wrong of the Government to act as a recruiting sergeant for the sale of personal private pensions, as they did as a matter of policy in the 1980s.

It was a triumph of Conservative party ideology over common sense and public interest. It is the Government's job to promote the idea of having pensions and savings and then set appropriate standards and an appropriate framework so that individuals can make a choice that suits their personal circumstances. It is not for the Government to tell people that they must do one thing or the other.

It is important for the long-term interests of the industry and the country as a whole that people make proper pensions provision for themselves. Many thousands of people do not have adequate cover and some have no cover at all. The regulatory system should therefore be geared towards promoting the holding of pensions and savings.

The situation with regard to pensions in this country is bleak. By 2015, there will be 15.5 million pensioners. Although the present pension is worth about 15 per cent. of average male earnings, by 2030, on present policy, it will be worth 7 or 8 per cent. People will therefore want to provide for themselves and increase what they can expect from the state, and should be encouraged to do so.

It is the Government's role to educate people in the broadest sense and to create a regulatory system that gives them the confidence to deal with the industry on a basis of trust and assurance, knowing that they will be sold policies that are appropriate for them.

The regulatory system should be used far more to promote competition. We hear much rhetoric about competition—I dare say that we shall hear some this morning—but that rhetoric differs from actual competition. It is perfectly true to say that there are hundreds of different providers, but there is less apparent difference among the products available.

We need more openness. Fees, commission and administrative costs must be exposed, as knowledge of those will make for a better and more informed choice. I am glad that the Government accepted last year the need for disclosure. It is too early to say how successful disclosure will be. Ultimately, the best compliance will come from the public if they are in a position to make an informed choice and judgment.

The regulatory system should be used far more, acting in the public interest to look at problems with a view to opening up the market so that people can make an informed choice. The regulator should be not a passive but an active organisation, looking into matters such as persistency rates and other problems that come to light, so that consumers can make an informed choice. The regulatory system cannot substitute its judgment for that of individuals but it can create the right environment, and we want to promote that fact.

I mentioned disclosure and the need for openness because, as my hon. Friend said, there is something wrong when people buy a product—he mentioned endowment mortgages—simply because it is better for the building society or whoever sells it. It is curious that building societies, which are mutual bodies that exist for the benefit of their members, should conspire to sell inappropriate products to their members. Building societies might wish to reflect on that. The sums that building societies receive by way of insurances generally need to be looked into more.

My hon. Friend the Member for Itchen mentioned comparisons and league tables, and he was right to say that those are not the complete answer.

Mr. Mike O'Brien (Warwickshire, North): My hon. Friend is right to say that the industry needs regulation to restore confidence in it. All the evidence that the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee has taken from the industry and elsewhere suggests that confidence needs to be restored and that effective regulation can ensure that confidence exists. Whatever the costs, the cost of not having regulation will be far greater for the industry in the long term than the cost of ensuring that regulation is proper and effective.

Mr. Darling: I agree with my hon. Friend. First, we should all be alarmed at the compliance cost of regulation because, ultimately, money spent on compliance will not be available to pay out when policies mature. That is one reason why we should look at how the regulatory system works. All those rules and regulations cost a great deal of money and it is ironic that, because of the nature of self regulation, the Government, who say that they want to get rid of red tape, are conspiring to create more red tape. Self-regulators, more than regulators set up on a proper footing, tend to take the belt-and-braces approach to protect themselves against criticism, and that needs to end.

Secondly, I have said time and again that good regulation will pay for itself, which is why we want to put it on a proper footing. There should be unanimity for putting it on a proper footing, not just between the industry and the public but on both sides of the House, but that unanimity does not yet exist.

I wish to make an important point about comparisons. Put simply, the regulatory system should put individuals in exactly the same position as chief executives or chairmen of life assurance companies. A couple of years ago, I attended a seminar at which the chief executive of a respectable life assurance company showed the audience a graph of the performance of three different policies with a term of 30 years. The first steadily increased in value so that, if it were cashed in at any time, its value would have steadily increased. The second policy gained nothing for the first 10 years but, if it were cashed in thereafter, the gains would not have been too bad. The third policy would have yielded absolutely nothing unless it was kept for at least 29 years, after which its value rocketed and its performance was good.

The public would like to have such information. That chief executive had it because he worked inside the industry. At the end of the seminar, I was staggered to see all the other chief executives approach him and ask which companies he had quoted from, which makes me wonder whether we could do something better with the regulatory system. That example makes the case for publishing comparisons so that members of the public are in the same position as that chief executive. It is important that we ensure that people make the provision that best suits them and do not simply accept an option that is most profitable for the salesman.

We should all reflect on the fact that many people have inadequate pension provision. Many more people honestly believe that they have provided for themselves but are in for a rude shock when they reach 60 or 65 and discover that the pot contains not nearly as much as they had been led to believe. It is extremely important that this Government and future Governments educate the public so that people understand that, to maintain the standard of life that they have come to expect or would like to have, the decisions that they make, particularly on pensions, are absolutely crucial. It is the job of the regulatory system, acting in the public interest, to ensure that that happens. Our view that self-regulation does not work is finding growing support throughout the country and inside and outside the industry.

The Minister may pray in aid the familiar refrain for all those sensible reforms: a lack of parliamentary time. In the past few weeks, we have all been struck by the fact that the Government seem to be stuck for matters to put before Parliament. We have plenty of parliamentary time to deal with this problem. We shall deal with it, but it would be nice to think that, in the remaining time allotted to them, the Government might start to accept the problem.

The financial services industry is immensely important, not just to those who work in it or to the country for the wealth that it creates but because of its crucial role in enabling people to make provision for themselves. We need to support that, and it is important that people make the right choices.

Unfortunately, the present system is not working. Consequently, many people continue to receive inappropriate advice and make the wrong choices, with the result that, in 20 or 30 years, those who follow us will have to pick up the pieces. That thought, more than any other, should motivate the Government to act, and to act now.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Anthony Nelson): I hope that everything that I say today will reassure the House that the Government take investment matters very seriously, and that we have supported several measures to try to crack down on mis-selling.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) on being chosen for the debate and on selecting a subject which is of great importance to millions of people outside the House and which, as he acknowledged, also has economic implications.

The Government have sought in several ways to improve investor protection, not only in the Financial Services Act 1986. Increasingly, in recent years, following some unhappy incidents of mis-selling and the collapse of certain firms, we have revisited the regulations under the legislation and also the personalities and the mechanisms for giving effect to the regulations.

We have increasingly created a system of law and a structure of regulation which can provide greater investor confidence. However, it is not a sector in which absolutes, certainties or guarantees can be provided. Self-regulation lies best with the investors themselves. There is a responsibility on individuals to seek good advice, to spread their investments, to ensure that they rely to some extent on their education and common sense, and not to confuse authorisation with a guarantee. Those are essential components in sharing the responsibility for safe and secure investment in the United Kingdom.

The hon. Member for Itchen was honest enough to admit that part of his interest in the subject was aroused by the fact that he had been mis-sold a personal pension. I think that anyone should be careful about approaching the hon. Gentleman in future in that regard as he has demonstrated a considerable grasp of the subject and it would now be difficult to mis-sell him anything. However, I welcome his honest admission that it is an extremely complicated subject even for intelligent people, let alone those who are more vulnerable to mis-selling. It therefore behoves all of us, in trying to build systems of investor protection, to remember the simplicity alongside the accustomed complexity that is sometimes necessary to deliver that protection.

Mr. Denham: It is not correct that I became interested in the subject because I was mis-sold a pension. It was only when I became interested in the subject that I realised that I had been mis-sold a pension. I should hate to think of all the consumers out there having to spend as long as I did trying to understand the industry before realising that they have been sold a pup.

Mr. Nelson: A little knowledge has proved to be a valuable thing for the hon. Gentleman, and I am delighted about that.

The hon. Gentleman demanded many changes. I wish to reflect carefully on several of his arguments. I shall also make it my business to ensure that the positive suggestions that he made are considered carefully by the regulators outside the House—the Securities and Investments Board and the Personal Investment Authority. Indeed, I believe that they are already considering several of his suggestions.

If I may say so without causing embarrassment, the contents of the hon. Gentleman's speech were far more specific, relevant and constructive than those of the speech of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) who, when speaking to the Labour finance and industry group on 1 May 1995, heralded a great package of new Labour plans for investor protection. In fact, it was nothing of the kind, and the thin coverage subsequently given by the media to the paucity of his proposals shows what a vacuum it was. Today, however, we heard a speech of substance. I give credit where it is due, and it is due to the hon. Member for Itchen.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that there should be direct regulation of salesmen. I know that the PIA is considering that, but I would say to the hon. Gentleman and to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling), who came close to recognising it towards the end of his speech, that there must always be a balance between the imposition of regulation and the cost of compliance. The costs are already the source of great complaint from the industry and, as was recognised in the debate, they are passed on to the customer—no one else pays them—so there must be a limit to the extent to which we can bind the Leviathan of that industry with the tape of regulations and requirements which impose impossible costs on the viability of those who offer those services, as well as the people who invest through that medium.

Mr. Darling: Does the Minister not grasp my argument that many of the costs are being incurred in a futile manner because they achieve nothing? If we are to spend any money on regulation, we should try to do so effectively, so that it bears fruit. At present, we have plenty of regulation, but it is not clear that it achieves the ends that we want.

Mr. Nelson: That is simply not true.

Let us consider the important issue of personal pension mis-selling, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Itchen. That problem came to light initially partly because the Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation identified certain problems. It was then the subject of scrutiny by the SIB, which in December 1993 identified the problem and said that it would undertake a survey to identify the extent of it.

In March 1994, the SIB introduced revised rules for selling to prevent such mis-selling occurring in future. In October 1994, the SIB made proposals for the reviewing of the cases of all those people who had been mis-sold personal pensions. I am amazed that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central has not got the message. That is not a deficiency but a success of the regulatory system. It may be uncomfortable. It may be costly for people to identify and seek redress—at the cost of the industry—for the cases in which mis-selling has occurred, but a responsible and effective regulatory system should aim to do exactly that.

Let us consider the report about endowment mortgages which was recently published by the Office of Fair Trading. It may be uncomfortable for the industry and for people who feel that they should perhaps have chosen a repayment rather than an endowment mortgage, but it would have been even more uncomfortable if that situation had persisted without being identified and some redress suggested. That is another success of the system.

Success is not always welcomed as a beneficial move from which everyone gains. We sometimes have to recognise that a part of success lies in identifying where problems have occurred, however difficult it may be to face up to those—and, my goodness, the costs and problems of facing up to personal pensions mis-selling are considerable; nevertheless, the Government and the regulatory system set up by the Government's legislation have identified those problems and made proposals to redress them.

It is not a perfect system. It is not a perfect world. We shall not always uncover every instance of mis-selling. However, considering the changes that have taken place—especially, with the establishment of the PIA, the re-vetting of more than 5,000 firms which are being admitted into the PIA—the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central, should be more generous in recognising that the Government are, through our system, seeking seriously and substantially to identify the ways in which things have gone wrong and to make redress where appropriate.

Mr. Denham: Does the Minister accept that the pace of change is far too slow? It is nine years since the passage of the Financial Services Act 1986, and we still do not have a satisfactory regulatory system. Does the Minister accept that there is a complete lack of evidence that the regulatory system can respond quickly enough and develop quickly enough as new problems become apparent?

Mr. Nelson: No, not really. It is true that I have my frustrations with the existing system, but such frustrations would be felt about any system. Putting a statutory label on either an existing or partially revised system is not a panacea. The answer does not always lie in structures or the people within them, but it certainly lies in the decisions made by people within whatever structure exists.

The Labour party is hung up, as it always has been, by legislation. A week ago, the first words of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East were, "We will regulate. We will legislate." That was his clarion call and that is the starting point for the Labour party. I do not want to introduce a partisan note, because the hon. Member for Itchen did not make a partisan speech, but passing simple legislation designed just to shake up the system does not mean that people will not be mis-sold inappropriate products. The answer is much more complicated. We must consider some of the genuine suggestions made by the hon. Member for Itchen to see whether we can improve the system.

The hon. Gentleman referred to personal pensions and the state earnings-related pension scheme. It is right that the SIB should give priority to redressing the mis-selling of personal pensions because, although we shall not know the extent of that mis-selling until we have the results of the review that is being conducted at an individual level, the problem associated with SERPS appears to be a smaller one than that of personal pensions.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that the Government were responsible for all the problems of mis-selling because we promoted personal pensions. It is true that, when my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was a junior Minister at the Department of Social Security, he was instrumental in bringing the programme forward. I say that with acclaim, not recrimination, because personal pensions were, have been and remain appropriate for many people. They are a flexible means of providing for retirement and many people should continue to hold one or to take one out in the future.

The Department of Social Security has, however, made it clear in the leaflets that it has published and in other publicity that people should think carefully before entering into personal pension arrangements. It is a fact, however, discovered and redressed within our existing system, that mis-selling has happened. That is being put right in order to re-create and redress the confidence that the industry should rightly deserve.

As I said when the Office of Fair Trading report on endowment mortgages was published, and which I have now read, I shall wish to consider its contents carefully. We hope and intend that the system of disclosure which came into effect at the beginning of this year will go a long way towards redressing some of the mis-selling problems and those caused by inappropriately taking out endowment mortgages. I place rather more reliance on that transparency than do the hon. Members for Itchen and for Edinburgh, Central, who seemed to suggest that disclosure would not do the trick and was not sufficient in itself. I agree that it is not sufficient in itself, but I place rather more reliance on it than I perceive that they do.

I welcome the fact that the Council of Mortgage Lenders is working on a code of practice for the selling of mortgages. The building societies ombudsman now has a pre-contractual remit—admittedly, not retrospectively dated—which essentially means that he will be able to investigate individual cases when people complain that they have been mis-sold a mortgage. He may be able to make recommendations in such cases. Endowment mortgages come, of course, under the Financial Services Act 1986 to the extent that the endowment or investment aspect is covered by it.

[Mr. Nelson]

The hon. Member for Itchen made an important point about the relationship between the problem of mis-selling, changes in the industry and opportunities within the European Union. He rightly said that we are ahead of other countries, if that is the right description, in having funded pension schemes and long-term savings schemes. I agree with him that there is a tremendous opportunity for our investment services industry to be the haven and trustee for long-term savings within the European Union. I also agree that part of the prospect of obtaining that business will be delivered only if confidence in the industry and its reputation are recreated and adequate arrangements, both fiscal and regulatory, are introduced in the European Union to deliver that. Hon. Members will know that some of the changes that we have introduced in this year's Finance Bill are determined to exactly that end.

About a week ago, I announced proposals for open-ended investment companies. I predict that they will be one of the most exciting vehicles for long-term savings in this country. Over a number of years they will transform the landscape of savings in this country. As unit trusts convert into open-ended companies, we will also be on a par with many of the savings products and savings vehicles sold out of Luxembourg and Dublin docks. We should all have a party when some of the firms come home from those locations and attract the funds, employment, liquidity and benefits to the United Kingdom economy. That will happen as a result of some of the Government's proposals in conjunction with the industry. That is a positive development.

The hon. Member for Itchen referred to commission. He was concerned that the commission-led system, as he saw it, led to some bias in the selling of investment products. He would prefer a system that rewarded best advice. I share and understand those sentiments, but I have some difficulty in endorsing proposals either to put an end to commission, which he is not suggesting, or to introduce some rapid change to create alternative systems, as yet unspecified, which reward only best advice. As the hon. Gentleman said, sometimes the best advice may be to do nothing or not to buy any product.

People can pay an independent financial adviser to give them advice, which may be to do nothing. That is the benefit of such a person and that is what those advisers proclaim to be their unique role. Commission is an interesting but complex issue. In its absence, will people pay others to receive objective advice? I am afraid that all experience tells us that people simply will not do that. People are not prepared to go to another person and write out a cheque to him in order to get independent financial advice. They will get that advice if it appears to be free, and then subsequently a commission payment is involved.

My fear is that by arbitrarily getting rid of the commission system, if one were to be so radical, one would end up with much lower standards of investment advice and much more inappropriate selling of investment products. I do not think that the answer lies in such a radical move, but I understand the sentiment which led the hon. Gentleman to suggest that we should reward best advice rather than allow it to be market-driven by those who could offer and provide the greatest commission.

The hon. Gentleman made an important point about training and competence in the industry. I hope that he, like me, welcomes the fact that the PIA recently issued proposals and rules for training and competence, which will require all investment advisers to obtain a financial planning certificate. There will be no grandfathering into the scheme, because all those advisers will have to take the new exams to varying levels. Various organisations, such as the Securities Institute, have a keen desire to improve professional competence through more adequate training. I believe that in the future we shall see a sea change in the quality of people on the doorstep and on the telephone selling of investment products.

The hon. Gentleman expressed doubt that disclosure would do the trick and called instead for some product control. Some of his proposals would not so much control the product as attach a few bells and whistles to the proposed system. He called in particular for comparative company charges, persistency rates disclosure and current average industry consumption, but the PIA is already proposing to publish lapse rates. Proposals relating to key fact documents will also be implemented. The Securities and Investments Board will review the system of disclosure once it settles down.

In these and other ways the Government, the SIB and the PIA are taking the issue of investor protection very seriously. We hope that the future will be better than the past and that many of the problems that the hon. Member for Itchen and others have identified will be solved. I thank the hon. Gentleman for the positive suggestions that he has made, and I hope that my answer has reassured the House.

Prisoners of War (Japan)

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): There were obviously many emotions sweeping the country during the VE day celebrations. Many people were thinking about their family members and friends who died during the second world war, and many more were thinking about their fallen comrades and reflecting upon the fact that they themselves survived. Despite that sombre note, it seemed to me that the overwhelming feeling was of joy not simply that a great battle had been won, but that there had been a degree of reconciliation between those who had fought on opposing sides.

The press carried a number of moving stories of how those who had fought on opposing sides had come together for the celebrations. We also heard about the sons of former Army commanders who had met and found, perhaps not surprisingly, that they had at least as many things in common as they had differences. Whatever the complex mix of sentiments expressed during the VE day commemorations, overwhelmingly the mood was one of joy and celebration.

However, there is one group of survivors from the last war for whom I suspect that the celebratory aspect was very muted indeed. They had undergone suffering which defies imagination. Even those of us who are of a generation who do not remember the war, who have perhaps been hardened by an unremitting diet of man's continuing inhumanity to man, and who have been brought up in a society where we see death and mutilation in our own homes whenever we turn on the television news, are chilled when we remember what those people went through. I speak of those people who survived the prisoner-of-war camps of the Japanese.

I do not intend to use the debate to castigate the nation of Japan or to suggest that the Japanese of my generation bear a responsibility for what happened during the second world war. I do not suggest that for one moment. However, I think that it is essential that I remind the House and the former prisoners-of-war that we have not forgotten their trauma and their nightmarish experiences.

Many years after the war, Field Marshal Lord Slim, who led the 14th Army, recorded how he and the liberating armies had uncovered prisoner-of-war camps that were

"little more than barbed wire enclosures in which wild beasts might have been herded together".

He went on to describe the Japanese gaolers

"almost without exception as being callously indifferent to suffering, or at the worst, bestially sadistic. The food was of a quality and a quantity barely enough to keep men alive, let alone fit them for the hard labour that most were driven to perform. It was horrifying to see them moving slowly about those sordid camps, all emaciated, many walking skeletons, numbers covered with suppurating sores and most naked apart from the ragged shorts that they had worn for years or loincloths of sacking. The most heart-moving of all were those who lay on wretched pallets, their strength ebbing faster than relief could be brought to them".

The testimony did not end there. In his book "The Night of the New Moon", Laurents van der Post described his experiences in a POW camp on Java. He described how POWs were forced to watch Japanese soldiers having bayonet practice on live prisoners tied between bamboo posts, and how POWs were made to witness different types of executions—I shall omit the details he gives. Ernest Hiller wrote of his experiences in a similar camp in his book "The Way of a Boy". He described how the military police—the Kempetai—tore out finger nails, burned the stomachs of pregnant women, locked POWs in bamboo cages for days without food or water, and much more besides.

Of the thousands of prisoners-of-war who were forced to build the Burma-Siam railway, it is estimated that one person died for every sleeper laid. Some 50,000 British troops were taken into captivity, of which a stunning 25 per cent. died. That is a truly remarkable figure, which says something about the unique nature of their experiences.

It is hardly surprising that the suffering of the people who survived those experiences continues to this day. It is even more heart-rending to learn that it not only continues but increases. I shall quote from "A Study of the Post-Captivity Health of ex-Prisoners of War of the Japanese" by J. Watson, which I believe is the leading work in this area. It was published in July 1986.

Mr. Watson details the conditions from which ex-POWs suffer. He concludes:

"It has for some time been recognised and accepted that ex-FEPOWs do suffer from a variety of psychiatric manifestations. These can include nightmares about their experiences, general irritability, anti-social behaviour, chronic anxiety and intermittent depression. It is also recognised and accepted that such features may not have manifested themselves until many years after the period of captivity had ceased and, indeed, the occurrence has sometimes been described as the 'late-onset ex-FEPOW syndrome'. It is therefore not surprising that 44.5 % of the sample had exhibited psychiatric manifestations at some time".

He goes on to describe psychiatric manifestations as covering anything from nervous symptoms to full-blown psychosis. It is clear that those who survived the prisoner-of-war camps continue to undergo suffering that is every bit as real today as it was during the war.

It must be said in passing that I do not decry in any way the experiences of those who suffered imprisonment at the hands of the Germans during the second world war. However, what was the exception under German captivity—to which the late Eric Williams drew attention—was the rule in the treatment of British and allied prisoners under the Japanese. It was an entirely different situation for prisoners of the Japanese. What was considered to be in breach of German military law was accepted as the norm and the appropriate way to treat Allied prisoners of war. That is what the POWs suffered in Japanese hands.

A treaty of peace with Japan was signed in 1951. Article 14(a) of the treaty provided:

"Japan should pay reparations to the Allied Powers for the damage and suffering caused by it during the war".

It went on to talk specifically about the "undue hardship"—an amazing euphemism—that prisoners had suffered at the hands of the Japanese. There has been much debate about the implications of the treaty.

Article 14(a) stated that the "resources of Japan are not presently sufficient, if it is to maintain a viable economy, to make complete reparation for all such damage and suffering".

As a result, compensation of £76 10s per prisoner was decided upon. Those who had served on the Burma railway received an extra £3 each. Times change, but even at today's value that is only £1,000 per prisoner.

Many people would look at the terms of that treaty and assume that it was a payment on account. The treaty talked about the "present inability" of the Japanese nation to be able to make sufficient reparation. That explanation may appeal to those people whose views are driven by common-sense and humanity, but it has been accepted that, although it may have appeared to be a payment on account, the treaty represented the final legal obligation on the part of the state of Japan.

That point has been made on a number of occasions, and I do not question it now. It was made finally by my hon. Friend the Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Sir M. Lennox-Boyd), when he was a junior Foreign Office Minister, in reply to a debate in 1991. He responded to a speech by my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Braine of Wheatley, who has done so much to keep the matter in the public eye.

There is no doubt that the Japanese have met their legal obligations. However, there is a great deal more to life and death than legality; morality plays a part also. To his great credit, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister raised the matter directly with the Japanese Prime Minister in September 1993. That represented a departure from the way in which previous Governments of both main political parties had dealt with the issue.

In the relatively short time remaining, I do not think that it will be particularly useful to rehearse what has occurred since then. Suffice it to say that it was hoped that Japanese business men might take part in an initiative to provide compensation to POWs. However, that has finally fallen through. A number of former prisoners-of-war have filed suit in Japan for the sum of £14,000 each.

Ironically, that sum is based on the compensation paid to Japanese American internees for having been interned after Pearl harbour. However, the sufferings of being interned in America are light years away from what allied prisoners underwent. I cannot say, any more than can my hon. Friend the Minister of State, whether those legal moves will be successful.

I believe that the matter goes much further. The crux of the issue is that nobody who has been brought up in a Christian tradition could say for one moment that the present-day inhabitants of Japan must bear the guilt for what was done by their forefathers. However, if they do not bear the guilt, they do, at the very least, have a responsibility to face up to the consequences of what was done by their forebears. The charge that must be laid before the Japanese Government, representing, as do any Government, the people of their nation, is that they have not yet faced up to that responsibility.

To even talk about sums of money, be it £1,000, £14,000 or £14 million, seems a ludicrously inappropriate response to what has gone before, because one can never reverse what has happened. In my conversations and meetings with the Far East Ex-Prisoners of War Association in Torbay I have been told that what matters to them—God knows, they are the only ones who could know—is that there should be some tangible recognition by those who bear the responsibility for facing up to the consequences. If there was some recognition by the Japanese nation of what they had gone through, it would make their continued suffering in their twilight years much more bearable.

As I said, we have just celebrated—that is the right word—VE day. There is another day approaching on which I believe that the celebrations will be of a much more sombre tone, and that is VJ day—victory in Japan. The first VJ day was on 15 August 1945. Given what we know about the psyche of the Japanese nation, I cannot imagine that in any shape or form the Japanese people will find the celebrations easy. After all, it represented Japan's destruction as a military power, its humiliation and loss of face, and the de-deification of their emperor. It was a shattering experience for them, and it cannot be a day to which they are looking forward.

There may be one way in which the Japanese nation could look forward to that anniversary. Japan has marvellous potential, and is a force for good in the world. It generates great wealth and contributes to culture, as well as having generated many jobs throughout the United Kingdom. All that means that, in a real sense, it has a right to say that it should belong to the community of nations in the fullest sense, subject to one caveat; it must finally atone in the way that I have described for what was done in the past.

Surely it could be a cause for celebration in Japan as well if, before or on that date, the Japanese Government admit, apologise and atone for what was done in their name. Atonement would then be complete.

The contribution of Her Majesty's Government is simple—it is not to argue the legal point before the Japanese courts, because that would be entirely inappropriate, and it is certainly not to question whether the treaty has been implemented legally because it clearly has. To his great credit, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has taken a moral stand, and made representations to the Japanese Government.

I hope that what my hon. Friend the Minister of State will say today in his winding-up speech is that the Government have not forgotten the suffering of those who survive, and that they will continue to make and reinforce those moral points and representations until justice is done.

1.13 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) on his choice of subject for debate, and on his speech. As he said, we have spent the weekend commemorating the tumultuous events of 50 years ago in Europe. It has been a time to give thanks for the peace that we have enjoyed, and to remember the sacrifices of so many brave men and women who made that possible.

This anniversary has reminded us all that the conditions of peace and democracy that we now tend to take for granted in Britain were won only after a mighty struggle against tyranny and injustice. It has been a profoundly moving occasion, with important lessons for post-war generations.

My hon. Friend has reminded us that the victory and peace in Europe which we have been commemorating is only part of the story. The second world war did not end on 8 May 1945. It is true that Nazism and fascism had been decisively defeated in Europe, but the war against Japanese militarism was to continue for over three more cruel and hard-fought months. On 8 May, the Fourteenth Army had just recaptured Rangoon, after one of the most desperate and heroic campaigns of the war. There could by then be little doubt that the tide of the war in Asia and the Pacific was running towards victory over Japan, but no one knew how much longer it would continue, or with what cost.

The end of the war in the far east was devoutly desired by many, but by none can it have been so deeply yearned for as by those allied prisoners who were enduring captivity at the hands of the Japanese, and by their loved ones at home, whose personal agonies had, if anything, been made even worse by the end of the war in Europe. For the prisoners, it would mean the end to years of misery and maltreatment. The extracts from the work of the late Lord Slim and Laurents van der Post which were quoted by my hon. Friend gave us a small reminder of that suffering.

For many, the final liberation and release came too late. About a quarter of the allied prisoners in the far east died during the war, compared with 5 per cent. of those captured by the Germans. My hon. Friend has reminded us eloquently of the acts of wanton cruelty which were perpetrated on allied prisoners in the far east, for which hundreds of their gaolers were tried and executed after the war. This was not "victors' justice" as is sometimes claimed, but a natural remedy for acts of gross inhumanity.

I join my hon. Friend—and, I believe, all hon. Members—in expressing the most profound respect and sympathy for the former prisoners and their families. We shall have occasion to do so again more formally when we commemorate the 50th anniversary of VJ day—the true end of the war—on 19 and 20 August. I am glad that there will be a special service of remembrance in St. Paul's Cathedral for all the veterans of the far east war. It is right to remember today that, for the prisoners, for the men fighting in Burma and for many others in Asia and the Pacific, the war continued beyond 8 May, and so did their sufferings and sacrifices.

Most of us can picture the terrible conditions of captivity endured by the prisoners of war—the young soldiers, sailors and airmen—captured during the fall of Singapore or at other moments during the war. We can picture the forced labour on projects such as the Burma railway, as well as the random brutality that they endured. We have read the many heartrending written accounts of their appalling treatment or heard of it from their own lips.

We should not forget that whole families of civilians, including women and children, were interned when the Japanese overran east Asia. They were also held prisoner for the rest of the war. They suffered grievously, and I pay tribute to their courage and endurance.

My hon. Friend set out the case for the survivors to receive compensation as the 50th anniversary of the end of the war draws near. As my hon. Friend said, that is a cause long championed by my noble Friend Lord Braine, who is now president of the Japanese Labour Camp Survivors Association—the JLCSA. That association, together with the Association of British Civilian Internees—Far Eastern Region, has commenced legal action in the Tokyo courts against the Japanese Government.

As my hon. Friend said, they are seeking $22,000 in compensation for each former prisoner. Their first delegation visited Tokyo at the end of January, and our embassy was able to arrange a meeting for them with a representative of the Japanese Foreign Ministry, as well as providing an opportunity for them to take part in an act of remembrance for their former comrades at the Commonwealth war graves cemetery near Yokohama.

Those legal proceedings are now under way, and I am not in a position to intervene in them. For the British Government, the legal position is clear, and has been reaffirmed by successive Governments of both political complexions. The issue of compensation was legally settled by the peace treaty of San Francisco in 1951, and it is not open to us to raise the matter formally with the Japanese Government.

My hon. Friend stated that, under those arrangements, the amounts paid to former prisoners were small. He has alluded to the reasons for that at the time. Japan had been devastated by the war and the allies were determined not to repeat the mistakes—as they were then perceived—of the treaty of Versailles. An agreement was reached, and a treaty signed with Japan—today that remains the formal legal position. In that respect, the United Kingdom's position is no different from those of the other allied Governments, including the United States, Australia, Canada and New Zealand, who also had prisoners in Japanese hands.

The legal position has not prevented British Governments from representing to the Japanese authorities the strong emotions that the issue has continued to arouse in this country. We have made representations at all levels, including the highest. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has raised the matters informally with successive Japanese Prime Ministers.

It is fair to claim that, under my right hon. Friend's leadership, we have had more intensive discussions of the situation of the former prisoners with the Japanese Government than have our counterparts in the Governments of the other western allies. Throughout those discussions, we have encouraged the Japanese Government to work with us to identify solutions in the spirit of the modern co-operative relationship between our two countries.

The visit of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to Japan in September 1993 marked an important stage in that process. When he arrived, he found a new Japanese Government, with a greater will to address the issues than some of their predecessors. He was able to discuss the matter fully and constructively with his counterpart, Mr. Hosokawa. During those discussions, as was reported to the media, Mr. Hosokawa expressed "his deep remorse as well as apologies for the fact that Japanese past actions had inflicted deep wounds on many people including former prisoners of war".

Both Prime Ministers confirmed the legal position which I have outlined. My right hon. Friend told Mr. Hosokawa that if, in future, the Japanese Government contemplated taking steps to redress the matter, it would be necessary for the position of those involved in Britain to be fully taken into account. He informed Mr. Hosokawa that we were also examining whether non-governmental measures would assist in solving the problem. Mr. Hosokawa agreed that that approach was worth examining.

The two Prime Ministers recognised that immediate solutions were not possible, but agreed to keep closely in touch about the matter. Those discussions at prime ministerial level have provided the basis for the work on the issue that has been subsequently undertaken by the two Governments.

The British Government followed up the reference to "non-governmental measures" by bringing together a small group of people under the chairmanship of Sir Kit

[Mr. Alastair Goodlad]

McMahon, a former deputy governor of the Bank of England, to explore the scope for a non-governmental charitable foundation. Our idea was that such a foundation might provide practical help to both former prisoners of war and civilian internees. We hoped that it might be possible to persuade Japanese companies and foundations to donate funds for that cause.

The basic medical and welfare needs of the former prisoners of war are already met by the national health service and the social security system, and, in particular, the war pensions scheme, but there is always room to do more. As my hon. Friend said, many of the survivors still suffer from medical problems deriving from the conditions of their captivity. It will surprise nobody when I say that the most prevalent are psychological problems relating to the horrors that they experienced.

I am aware that some former prisoners criticised the concept of a foundation, and said that they did not want what they called "Japanese charity". I believe that that was a misunderstanding. The Government were attempting to define an approach that might bring practical benefits to the former prisoners in a way that would recognise the special nature of their case.

Sir Kit McMahon, who undertook the work at the Government's request and received no personal benefit from it, handled the matter with great skill. In my judgment, nobody could have pursued it with a greater combination of determination and tact. I take this opportunity to thank him and the other members of his small committee for the time and effort they have devoted to the subject.

It was therefore a matter of regret that, when Sir Kit visited Japan last November, he found the reaction of the Japanese private sector uniformly negative. I should make it clear that the Japanese Government, while never formally committed to supporting our approach, were constructive and open throughout. But the message from Japanese companies and foundations could not have been clearer. Sir Kit concluded, and we accepted, that our approach was unlikely to succeed in those circumstances.

Meanwhile, with a new Prime Minister, Mr. Murayama, the Japanese Government had been giving more thought to the general issue of the nation's wartime responsibility. On 31 August last year, Mr. Murayama formally expressed remorse for Japan's wartime actions and announced a peace, friendship and exchange initiative. That will provide £650 million of Japanese Government money over 10 years. It will mainly be devoted to exchange visits and historical research.

The main focus of the programme will be on Japan's Asian neighbours, but the United Kingdom and other allied countries are specifically included, and we expect a substantial proportion of the funds to be spent in this country. The first year of the programme is to be the present financial year.

The programme does not meet the wishes of former British prisoners of war to receive compensation, but I do not believe that we should dismiss it out of hand. It provides evidence that the Japanese Government are sensitive to the need, as Mr. Murayama put it, to and to respond to the concerns felt in this country.

"face up to the facts of history",

Similar evidence is provided by the recent improvements in the way in which the events of the second world war are described in the textbooks used in Japanese schools. Only if the facts of history are honestly taught to later generations can we hope that lessons will be learned.

I have been privileged to meet many of those who suffered as prisoners of the Japanese. Many of us count former prisoners among our constituents and, indeed, our friends. It is impossible to hear them recount their experiences without being deeply moved. Some, even now, prefer not to speak about what happened to them 50 years ago. Others have said to me that they cannot expect anyone who was not there to understand what it was like and what they feel about it now.

Even if we can never grasp the depth of emotion felt by those men and women, the simple recital of the facts of what they endured and witnessed cannot fail to make the most profound impression on us all. Instinctively, we feel humbled by it. Instinctively, we respect the feelings of those who have experienced such things. Instinctively, we are drawn to help. In that respect, the members of her Majesty's Government feel no differently from any other hon. Members or members of the British nation. That is why the Government have taken the steps I have described to try to find a solution. Those efforts continue.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister sent two messages to his Japanese counterpart, Mr. Murayama, last autumn. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has discussed the matter with the Japanese Foreign Minister, who is also the deputy Prime Minister, both when they met last September in Japan and on 19 April this year when they met in New York. In addition, there has been a series of discussions between senior officials about what might be done to help.

There is no doubt in the mind of the Japanese Government about the seriousness of the issue, or the widespread public sympathy in this country for the former prisoners. Today's debate will have underlined both those points. At the same time, the disappointing reaction to the proposal for a foundation shows the sensitivity and difficulty of trying to identify possible remedies in present circumstances. That is no excuse not to keep on trying. We are continuing our discussions of all those matters with the Japanese Government.

I cannot yet report to the House that we have arrived at an outcome that will satisfy all parties, but I can assure my hon. Friend and the House that we will continue those discussions and explore every possible avenue available to us for identifying further action in the non-governmental sector to enlarge upon the initiatives that have already been announced by the Japanese Government.

Hospitals (Grampian Region)

1.29 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I am glad to have the opportunity of raising this extremely important matter so soon after the Government announced—as far as I can gather, for the first time anywhere in the United Kingdom—that an entire hospital, including the provision of core clinical services, is to be put out to private bid to all comers. Before I deal with that point, I should like to address some of the background of how it came about.

In recent years, there has been a fundamental rationalisation of hospital services in Grampian. For those of us who represent rural constituencies, too often that has meant a closure of rural services and centralisation in Aberdeen. For example, the maternity unit in Inverurie in my constituency was closed and demolished. At that time there was a promise that a new GP or geriatric unit would be built on the site, but priorities changed and it has never materialised. In fact, the site is now a car park. Other maternity units were also closed at that time, although strenuous local campaigning ensured that we saved Keith, Huntly and Torphins.

Over the past year, hospitals for the mentally ill at House of Daviot and Kingseat in my constituency have closed. Most of the patients have been transferred to Aberdeen, some into the community, and 12 to a unit in the Jubilee hospital in Huntly. We are still awaiting a decision on the future of Woodlands hospital for the mentally ill, after a controversial and badly mishandled public consultation. In fact, along with the hon. Members for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) and for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson), I met the Minister of State. We called on him to reconsider plans to close Woodlands and transfer to a new site to be built on the Cornhill site, and to come forward instead with plans to redevelop the site to meet the needs of the long-term mentally ill requiring permanent care or rehabilitation.

There is concern that we have heard nothing further about the proposal. If there is anything that the Minister can do to update us, or at least if he can say when an announcement will be made, I should be grateful.

More recently, there has been a welcome if limited recognition by health care providers in the north-east that there is strong demand for local community hospitals. Inverurie is lucky to have one. A review of the range of services that could be added to the hospital is still under consideration. Huntly has had a welcome investment in upgrading the Jubilee hospital. There is a growing campaign, backed by local doctors, for a community hospital to be provided in Ellon, where the former hospital was closed years ago and made into the golf clubhouse. Since that time, the community of Ellon has trebled if not quadrupled.

The health board has said that it recognises the demand. It has written to me, following consultations with GPs, stating the sort of provision that is being considered for Ellon. It suggests that it would include in-patient care, post-acute rehabilitation, respite care, rehabilitation, palliative and terminal care, day care, obstetric care limited to the post-natal phase, specialist out-patient clinics and home care support. The board went on to say that a Grampian-wide services review identified the potential for such a facility in Ellon.

However, it had other commitments first, including the replacing of the Woodlands hospital and potentially on a reprovision in Stonehaven. It is of concern to me that the announcement a couple of weeks ago about Stonehaven could further delay provision there and, consequently, have a knock-on effect on making progress towards commitment to a community hospital in Ellon. I am concerned about what was done, the way it was done and the knock-on effects elsewhere.

This time last year, Stonehaven saw the announcement by Grampian Healthcare trust in its business plan—that is no way to make announcements about the future of hospitals—that Arduthie and Woodcot in Stonehaven were to be closed. That announcement was sweetened with a pledge to build a new community hospital. I understand that, in accordance with that, towards the end of last year, Grampian Healthcare submitted plans—I have copies—for a new 47-bed hospital to be built on the site of Arduthie hospital at a cost of £2.4 million, which was based on the Scottish health executive's own standard costings.

That hospital would have replaced 77 beds that are currently provided by the two hospitals, which have a total full-time equivalent of 130 staff. The proposed new hospital is to include casualty services, 16 long-stay geriatric beds, 12 psycho-geriatric beds, 17 GP beds and two post-natal beds, and it would be similar to the community hospital in Peterhead, in the constituency of the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond).

Grampian Healthcare must have been wondering at the delay in responding to its proposal, and indeed asking why it had not heard. It was as stunned as anyone when a press release was issued by the Scottish Office last month, stating that the new community hospital, including its core clinical services, was to be put out to tender to all comers. That is a first for anywhere in the United Kingdom. I am advised by Grampian Healthcare that to date it has received no direct formal notification of that, just a copy of the press release sent through the post.

That is in spite of the fact that, in a letter to me last year about Ellon hospital, the chief executive of Grampian health board said that it was already working with Grampian Healthcare on replacing Woodlands hospital and potentially on a reprovision in Stonehaven. Well, not any more; it is not. Not only has Grampian Healthcare had only a copy of the press release but, when it attempted to obtain more information from the health board, it was told that it was not entitled to it; it is no different from any other potential bidder for the hospital.

There will now be a further delay while the specification for the new hospital is drawn up. I understand that that will take four to five months. Presumably, that specification will then be made available to all potential bidders—private and public sector. That takes the private finance initiative way beyond anything that has been tried so far in the health service, and indeed beyond what the Government's own guidelines specifically suggested would happen. New guidelines published in March stated in a key paragraph:

> "An option that many projects will need to explore is one in which the private sector would undertake the design, building, financing and operation of the non-clinical services."

That was a new departure in March, and in April we had the entire hospital clinical services—nursing services, doctors and all the paramedics—being put out to tender: design, build and operate.

[Mr. Malcolm Bruce]

As far as I can ascertain, the closest that anywhere has come to that situation is Morriston hospital in Swansea, where a cardiac centre attracted bids from three private health care companies, but the bid was finally awarded to the local trust. I am advised also that that was under active consideration in Portsmouth, until the chief executive of the trust committed suicide. In both cases—it is an important distinction—the initiative to involve the private sector came from the trust. All right, it was under encouragement from officials and Ministers, but it was not imposed, as is the case with the proposed community hospital for Stonehaven.

Most people who live and work in the north-east of Scotland and those who represent communities in the north-east of Scotland take pride in our communities as being forward looking, progressive and flexible, but we see no reason why we should be the guinea pigs for experiments that Ministers would not dare to try anywhere else, and certainly not south of the border.

Ministers and others contend that the hospital will still be in the NHS because the services will be provided free to patients. That is a spurious argument as ownership, control and operation will be in private hands. It is comparable to a local council putting homeless people into bed-and-breakfast hotels and saying that those hotels are in the public sector. It is absolute nonsense; they are privately owned businesses selling their services on commercial terms to the public sector. That is not just my opinion. I quote Mr. Jeremy Taylor, chief executive of Grampian Healthcare trust:

"If the services go to a private company it will not be NHS services, it will be a private service."

In those circumstances, it is difficult to see how quality can be assured, complaints effectively pursued or costs saved other than by cutting corners, staffing levels, pay or probably all three. Private sector finance may be appropriate for the property. That is a matter of debate and it has been recognised that it may be a practical compromise involving the private sector, but it is not appropriate for core clinical services. The Government deny that there was any intention to put core clinical services in private hands and their own guidelines specifically limited the private funding initiative to non-clinical services.

Not surprisingly, the announcement has outraged the local community. I am advised that last night Stonehaven community council passed the following resolution:

"The decision of the community council is that we strongly oppose the measure that the Government is to take over the NHS in Stonehaven and we shall do everything in our power to oppose it."

A number of relevant local interest groups were at that meeting. Local Liberal Democrats collected more than 2,000 signatures in the town on Saturday alone, to a petition calling for the retention of Stonehaven hospital services within the NHS.

If an entirely new hospital is to be owned and run by a private company, it will not be an NHS hospital in any terms that the public understand. Likely bidders could include construction companies, organisations such as BUPA, breweries, property companies and almost anybody from public companies to private individuals—possibly, last week's lottery winner.

It is preposterous for the Government to suggest that they are not transferring fundamental national health service assets to the private sector. That is borne out by the fact that potential bidders will have to get their own legal advice as to their likely liabilities under the transfer of undertakings directive. As the House knows, that has already caused the Government considerable embarrassment and it may deter some people from making a bid. If potential bidders depend on lower staffing levels, they may subsequently have to pay for all the contractual obligations for workers whose contracts they amend or terminate.

All that preparation spells nice work for lawyers. The more bidders there are, the more counsel's opinions will have to be sought and the more consultants will be involved in the preparation of bids. That is characteristic of the Government. Far from cutting down bureaucracy, they have increased it. They have also increased the complexity of supervising the service and securing public accountability. They have created an enormous expansion in publicly funded consultancies and they have expanded the bureaucracy necessary to supervise a much more complicated way of delivering services.

There is no difference of opinion about the practicalities of what we want. We want new and improved community hospitals in Grampian. I certainly want improvements in Inverurie and a new hospital in Ellon. The population is growing faster than anywhere else in the country. I can provide figures that show that the population of Grampian is estimated to grow from 506,100 in 1990 to 517,409 in 2001. The population over 75 is estimated to increase from 32,063 to 36,063. There are comparable figures for Kincardine and Deeside and for Gordon. It is a general characteristic. We need the services; our populations demand them and they are not being delivered fast enough.

The Government's change in ideology and their desire to drive an experiment through in north-east Scotland mean that a hospital that could have been started this year will be delayed for another year—just to test the Government's ideology.

The decision was announced without public consultation, without consulting Grampian health board or Grampian Healthcare and certainly without consulting local doctors, who would be the main users of the hospital. It is a matter of treating public opinion with total, absolute and utter contempt and showing no interest in getting an input from the people who will ultimately manage, deliver, control and secure the service for patients, and indeed, value for money for the taxpayer.

I know, having spoken to them recently, that local doctors in Ellon are anxious to know how long they will have to wait for outline plans to become a firm promise. They are not keen on Stonehaven becoming the next guinea pig.

As I have said, there is room for private finance in aspects of the health service if there are genuine benefits, but the proposals are a step too far. They take the NHS out of Government hands and further from effective public accountability. I assure the Minister that it will be a long, bitterly fought battle.

1.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): First, I would like to answer the question that the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) asked about Woodlands. My noble and learned Friend the Minister of State recently met relatives of the people cared for at Woodlands and local Members of Parliament to hear their views at first hand. Before reaching a decision on the proposals, the Secretary of State will wish to be satisfied that the alternative model of care proposed is geared to meeting patients' individual needs, whether care is provided in the community or in a hospital setting. That matter remains under consideration.

We have heard a certain amount today about perceived threats to the NHS, about privatisation—by either the back door or the front door—and about the concept of free health care being undermined by the possible involvement of the independent sector in the provision of services.

The proposals for Stonehaven are certainly not about privatisation. They are about seeking to achieve a high-quality, responsive service, tailored to the needs of the local community. Let me be quite clear that the health board, as purchaser of health care services in Grampian, is leading the exercise and will continue to do so. The board will set and monitor standards and pay for the service, as it does at present.

Let me say what I believe the NHS is about. It is primarily about patient care and putting the interests of patients before all other considerations.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Will the Minister give way?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No. I must answer the points raised by the hon. Member for Gordon first.

The NHS is about providing that care free at the point of delivery to those who need it, and ensuring that the best possible quality of care and treatment is delivered in the best possible facilities in the most efficient and cost-effective way.

Despite the alarmist and somewhat misleading press reports about Grampian health board's announcement that it intends to put hospital services in Stonehaven out to open tender, nothing in the board's proposals is inconsistent with the principles that I mentioned.

It may be helpful if I put the record straight by outlining the background to what is now proposed in Stonehaven, which is in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch). He has taken an assiduous interest in the matter ever since he was elected. He has repeatedly been to see my noble and learned Friend the Minister of State and regularly written to him urging a resolution.

There are at present two hospitals in Stonehaven—Arduthie and Woodcot—providing GP-managed acute beds, long-stay services for the elderly, casualty and other therapeutic support services. Both hospitals are old and no longer provide an ideal base for modern hospital care. Neither is suitable for development to meet future service needs.

Grampian Healthcare NHS trust, which currently provides the services from those hospitals, recognised the need for change and highlighted its intention to modernise services in its business plan published early in 1994.

The trust also carried out an option appraisal in 1994 with the close co-operation of Grampian health board, which is responsible for assessing need, planning services and purchasing them on behalf of the board's resident population. Representatives of the local community were also involved in the process.

The appraisal examined a number of options, ranging from the status quo through modification of one or both the existing hospitals to provision of a new hospital. The conclusion was that a new hospital, to be built on the existing Arduthie site and designed to replace both existing hospitals, was the best way forward.

Having reached that conclusion, the trust submitted its appraisal and recommendations to the Scottish Office. There are two main reasons for the Scottish Office being involved. First, new hospitals have to be paid for and any proposals that might involve investment of NHS resources must be considered in the context of competing bids for capital development funded elsewhere in Scotland. Secondly, any proposals to close existing hospitals must be consulted on publicly by the health board and ultimately approved by the Secretary of State.

On the first point, my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made it clear in his November 1994 statement that no public sector capital projects would be approved unless the scope for involving the private sector had been fully explored. In discussing the recommendations made in the trust's option appraisal, the Scottish Office and Grampian health board agreed that that should be done in seeking to secure a new hospital for Stonehaven.

The object of the exercise would be, without being prescriptive in any way, to invite potential providers to say how they would provide the new hospital and to establish whether there were previously unconsidered and perhaps innovative ways of doing so. It would also help to establish clearly the solution that best met the health care needs of the people of Stonehaven, while offering the best value for money.

With the agreement of my noble and learned Friend the Minister of State, the health board has been asked to draw up a detailed specification of the services that it wants to purchase in Stonehaven, and thereafter to invite tenders from a range of organisations for providing the new hospital. It will be open to the Grampian Healthcare trust, other NHS trusts and the independent sector to bid for the contract separately, or in conjunction with each other or general practitioners. It will also be open to those organisations to bid for all or part of the service.

On 26 April, Grampian health board announced that it had been asked to proceed in that way, indicating that it would start work immediately on preparing the specifications—which, on its present timetable, it expects to complete by the autumn. Thereafter, the tendering process would begin. The board's aim is to be in a position to make a decision on the bids by the end of April 1996.

The board publicly stated that it would work closely with local GPs and with the local community and its representatives to establish the nature of services required at the new hospital before preparing the service specification. Mechanisms will be put in place to enable members of the public to comment individually if they wish. There can be no doubt that the views of health care professionals and of users of the service will be fully taken into account.

[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton]

That is where things stand. No decisions on who will provide the new hospital in Stonehaven in the future have yet been taken, and it seems wrong to me to speculate on the likely implications for health care services in Stonehaven before that point has been reached.

It might be helpful if I outline what those proposals mean and do not mean. They mean that a new hospital will be provided in Stonehaven—my noble and learned Friend has already made that clear. They offer the opportunity of providing a new hospital earlier than might be possible under a conventional NHS solution, if the private sector shows interest in building it. They will ensure that all possible options for providing a modern service geared to the people of Stonehaven's needs are fully explored. They will provide the opportunity for the local community to be involved in determining their own needs, through the board's intention to consult on the preparation of its specification and the consultation that will be required before either of the existing hospitals can close.

The proposals do not mean that people will be asked to pay for services. We remain committed to providing health care free at the point of delivery. The proposals do not represent a fundamental change of policy compared with existing arrangements. General practitioners currently provide the services at the existing hospitals and will continue to do so at the new hospital. Private sector involvement in the provision of long-stay services for the elderly and other care groups is already well established.

The proposals do not mean a reduction in the quality of service. The objective is to identify the best way of providing those services. The health board will remain responsible for specifying the service requirements. We expect the board to be rigorous in monitoring quality and standards through its contract with whatever provider is successful in the tendering process.

The proposals do not mean a wholesale move away from provision of health care services by the NHS. We are committed to ensuring that people have access to high-quality, cost-effective services funded through the NHS wherever they happen to live. Each proposed new service development will continue to be considered in the context of best meeting the needs of the people to be served.

The proposals do not automatically mean that services in Stonehaven will be provided by the private sector. Once all the options have been appraised, a conventional NHS solution may yet turn out to be best. Grampian Healthcare has welcomed the proposed approach and is clearly in a strong position to submit a competitive bid. The proposals do not cast any doubts on the quality of the service currently provided by Grampian Healthcare staff. Their skills and dedication are not in question, and they will also be a powerful weapon in the trust's armoury in preparing any bid.

Inviting bids from a wide range of potential providers and minimising the restrictions on what they are asked to say they can provide, or the manner in which they can provide it, will ensure that providers have the scope to develop innovative solutions to delivering the best possible services in terms of quality and value for money.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: We have heard a great deal of civil service speak. Will not the Minister acknowledge that the proposals for Stonehaven are a step further than anything proposed anywhere else in the United Kingdom? Despite the Minister's remarks, it is not a question of inviting providers to ensure that they secure the maximum public participation. It is a question of putting the entire hospital out to bids from all comers. In those circumstances, when the hospital could be owned entirely by a brewery or anybody else, it is difficult to see how the palliatives that the Minister mentioned can be secured. If that is the way that the NHS is going, can he really believe and maintain that the service is safe in his hands?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Yes. What matters is that the best possible services are provided to consumers in the best possible manner. That will certainly happen. Of course the health board has the right to monitor closely and to enforce the terms of the specification. If they were broken by anybody, the board would be in a position to take the necessary remedial steps immediately. I would expect it to do so. It is the board's duty to make certain that the highest possible standards are maintained, which is in the best interests of consumers.

The hon. Gentleman called for this debate under the general heading of new hospital provision in Grampian. The city of Aberdeen already enjoys the benefits afforded by a hospital in a central location at Foresterhill, which provides for the majority of acute service needs.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Will the Minister give way?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No. I must explain the general position.

The existence of Foresterhill has not prevented our approving capital expenditure of £9 million in recent years further to service provision at Aberdeen royal infirmary and a further £21 million to facilitate rationalisation of acute and other services in the city and beyond. Only two weeks ago, my noble and learned Friend opened the new infection unit at the infirmary—the first of its kind in Scotland and the first to be incorporated within an acute teaching hospital. In the mental health sector, investment of £29 million has made the Royal Cornhill one of the most modern hospitals of its kind in the United Kingdom.

Outwith Aberdeen, a major redevelopment and expansion of Dr. Gray's hospital in Elgin, costing some £22 million, will ensure that the people of Moray have ready access to a wide range of hospital services, many of which they would previously have had to travel to Aberdeen or Inverness to obtain. Peterhead cottage hospital has also been completely rebuilt at a cost of £4.4 million and is now a fine example of a modern community hospital providing a range of services in a local setting.

Mr. Salmond: Will the Minister give way now?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: If the hon. Gentleman has a question about Peterhead, I shall answer.

Mr. Salmond: I actually want to ask a question on the subject of the debate. The Minister mentioned the role of the Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch). Was that hon. Gentleman consulted in any way before the initiative was launched—or was he kept in the dark, like the rest of us? That is a simple question, so may we have a straight answer?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: If the hon. Gentleman is seeking to get me to reveal private and confidential discussions between my hon. Friend and other members of the Government, the answer is that they remain confidential. My hon. Friend the Member for Kincardine and Deeside has been foremost in putting the interests of his constituents first on every conceivable occasion.

Capital expenditure of more than £100 million has been approved for hospital building or improvement in Grampian since 1979. I do not see that as an indictment of the Government's record. On the contrary, I see it as a clear indication of our commitment to ensuring that the people of Grampian enjoy modern, efficient hospital care.

I am confident that the NHS is alive and well in Grampian. We are committed to it remaining so. Our first priority, which the current proposals for Stonehaven are intended to support, is to ensure that NHS users in Grampian and elsewhere in Scotland enjoy the kind of responsive, high-quality services that they are entitled to expect.

Grampian has made rapid and effective progress in developing care in the community and in ensuring that people are only—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. Time is up.

Executive Power

2 pm

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): This week we have been celebrating the victory 50 years ago of democracy over fascism. Sadly, however, there has been little contemplation in the Chamber, no debate on the fundamentals of democracy, the clash of philosophies or even a step back to take stock and discuss the future of our political system. In a different context, the director general of the BBC recently called on the media to devote as much time to reflection as to antagonism—words which could equally apply to our own Parliament, the forum of the nation.

It is Parliament's failure to carry out a serious and regular MOT on our democracy which so vividly illustrates that our legislature, and even its agenda, is the creature of the Executive. In no other western nation is the Executive, the Government, so dominant. It is as if the democratic revolutions of the United States, France and elsewhere have passed us by, and the keystones of democracy, a separation of powers and checks and balances, are irrelevant to our own country. Hence, we have a unitary state rather than pluralist one, stagnant one-track politics instead of an active diversity which continually guarantees and renews our political evolution. The textbooks may say that Parliament is meant to be sovereign, but the reality is that Parliament is controlled by the Executive and, for our country, that spells Executive sovereignty.

In the United Kingdom, the leader of the Executive, in the shape of the Prime Minister, controls the appointment of the Cabinet, commands a majority of the legislature, appoints the members of the judiciary and the second Chamber and controls the spending and even the structure of local authorities, all uninhibited by a Bill of Rights or a written constitution. Those untrammelled powers would make a starling salivate and, in the wrong hands, have wrought massive, uncheckable destruction on our social fabric. The Thatcher years proved beyond doubt that our democratic culture, good as it is, must be bolstered by democratic institutions resilient to those who would seek to abuse our democracy.

The democratic socialist answer must be to replace one-track politics with pluralism and to hear all the voices, some of which may be our salvation. I am particularly pleased that the Labour party recently, for the first time in its history, decided to put such a commitment into its constitution—a commitment to "an open democracy, in which Government is held to account by the people; decisions are taken as far as practicable by the communities they affect; and where fundamental human rights are guaranteed".

That is now the commitment of my party. I hope that the Conservative party, should it ever have a constitution, will adopt a similar view.

My party is now pledged, through successive leaders and successive decisions of our party conference, to create a new democratic settlement, including a Bill of Rights for British citizens, an elected second Chamber, free local authorities, assemblies for the regions and nations of our union, a diversity of electoral systems, an effective House of Commons, an accountable Europe and a revitalised judiciary. The next Labour Government will be remembered for nothing unless it is remembered for changing for good the way in which we govern ourselves. The whole of that agenda is, in essence, designed to tackle the problems of unrestrained Executive power in the United Kingdom. We can do that in two ways—first, by putting in place the checks and balances that are central to a separation of powers, and, secondly, by directly curbing the size and scope of the Executive itself.

I should make it clear that in referring to Executive power, I refer specifically to that authority nominally found in the Crown, but in reality exercised by the Government of the day. I do not refer here to the residual power of the Queen and the royal family, or to their status as royalty. Some of the most ardent centralisers and woolliest thinkers in that area would have us attack the soft target of the Queen rather than confront the key sources of political power. It is the inherited use by Government of that Crown or prerogative power which lies at the heart of the strength and overdominance of the Executive. As my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) recently said:

"The prerogative is all about the power of Government over the people and virtually nothing to do with the power of the people over Government."

The reality is that today a massive hinterland of power is exercised by Executive decree without accountability to Parliament, and sometimes without even the knowledge of Parliament. That is extra-parliamentary activity writ large indeed. In practice, after using Executive power in a high-profile policy area, Governments will often seek to come to the House to give some parliamentary window dressing to a decision already taken in the corridors of Whitehall and No. 10 Downing street. That window dressing, however, limited though it is, is entirely voluntary and at the whim of the Government rather than a right of Parliament—a right of the legislature.

A recent example was the renewal of the royal charter of the BBC. The Government will kindly allow the House some sort of debate. They will find a contrivance so that Members of this Chamber and the other place can discuss the issue. However, we shall not be allowed to amend or reject the charter because that comes under the royal prerogative.

In certain areas of foreign policy, such powers are absolute. For example, agreeing to treaties is currently a matter for prerogative power, not for Parliament. It can be argued that the Maastricht treaty need not even have come before the House until consequential legislation was due. Treaty after treaty is concluded without the formal consent of Parliament. Foreign policy as a whole is almost a democracy-free zone, free of democratic control and accountability.

Powers devolving from the Crown, free from parliamentary scrutiny, are vested in Ministers and go virtually unchallenged. The Scott inquiry has revealed that Ministers can even write their own sick notes to mask errors and omissions concerning matters such as by the use of public interest immunity certificates. It is here that parliamentarians need to refocus the debate.

The threat is not to a mythical parliamentary sovereignty from Europe or Maastricht. The focus must be on restoring the strength of Parliament in the face of its domination by Executive sovereignty. Again, as parliamentarians, our task is to expose what little power Parliament has in the face of Government by Executive decree.

The Executive is generally free to bind the country under international law regardless of the express wishes of Parliament. These powers have effectively privatised us out of our democracy and all of them need to be placed under the public ownership of our representative institutions. Such powers should no longer be the personal and private domain of Ministers; there should be accountability to us in the House.

Treaties can be negotiated only by the Executive—we all realise that—but the power to ratify them should lie with our democratically elected representatives, as it does in virtually all other democratic cultures in the western world. Going to war is another deeply significant issue, but that, too, is a matter for prerogative power—not for the House, but for Whitehall and No. 10—when it should be in the parliamentary domain. Although it is usually debated after the event, no Government of any political colour have a duty to obtain the consent of Parliament before going to war, as has been illustrated by the Gulf war, the Falklands war and the war in Bosnia.

I accept that, in a national emergency, the Government may be forced to act without the immediate consent of the House, but there should be safeguards to ensure that, if British service men and women are sent into battle, there will be adequate debate about the reasons for the decision. Formal ratification by Parliament of Executive action is the minimum that should be accepted in a modern democracy. The technical device of squaring one or two members of the Privy Councillors freemasonry is no longer an appropriate substitute for public scrutiny by democratically elected institutions.

The Privy Council is one of the many devices that have been used successfully over the years to assimilate politicians of all parties into the Executive culture. The seduction of "One day, all this will be yours" must be replaced with a clear moral and political stand for democracy; without that, the core of our democracy will remain on shaky ground.

The bible of our unwritten constitution, "Erskine May", says:

"The prerogatives of the crown, in connection with Parliament, are of paramount importance. The legal existence of Parliament results from the exercise of the Royal Prerogative. To a Queen's writ the House of Commons owe their election as representatives of the people."

Similarly, Parliament is dissolved by the Queen, acting on the advice of the Prime Minister but using prerogative powers that cannot even be questioned in the House.

Honours are doled out without a nod to our elected representatives. Institutions as important as the BBC—which I have already mentioned—and the civil service are the creation of Executive power, with no statutory basis agreed by Parliament. Given such a system, and the arrogance of Ministers grown fat on 16 years of unchecked authority, we are beginning to see developments such as that involving the current Home Secretary, who was caught red-handed trying to abolish the criminal injuries compensation scheme without parliamentary consent. But for the vigilance of the Fire Brigades Union and others—and the Law Lords—he would have got away with it.

The accountability of Ministers to Parliament, under statute, is already tenuous enough; accountability without statute is virtually impossible. In a modern democracy, it is no longer sufficient for matters of such potential importance to be dealt with on the basis of hearsay and secrecy. We need to define—openly, publicly and in writing—the institutions of the state, their role and their inter-relationships. That can best be done by means of a systematic definition and creation under statute of all the most important prerogative powers. We must bring the rule of law—statute law—to the conduct of Government.

That has occurred quite recently in the case of the security services, and civilisation as we know it has not collapsed because the security services now operate under statute law rather than prerogative power. If that example is extended to the other activities that I have mentioned—treaty making, war, the civil service and the dissolution of Parliament—it will necessarily end the vagueness surrounding such powers, and restrict their exercise by increasing their transparency and the accountability of those involved.

Although these immense extra democratic powers will fall to the Labour party after the next general election, the acid test of our commitment to a devolved and pluralist democracy will be whether we resist the temptation to abuse them as the current Government have and instead ensure that they are legitimised in statute law and irrevocably placed within the democratic arena. It is conceivable that the incoming Government could introduce all the other elements of our democratic agenda, but then fail to tackle Executive power. If we do not do that, we shall merely count the days before the centre of a unitary state—perhaps still under the control of a Labour Government—erodes the effects of a wider reform package, and regathers effective control.

The unitary state, controlled by an unchecked Executive, is a political system that has demonstrably failed in the 1980s and 1990s; it must be replaced by a pluralist, democratic system. That is the best way in which Parliament and parliamentarians could honour those who, 50 years ago, gave their lives for our democracy.

2.16 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service and Science (Mr. John Horam): The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) has done a service to the House, but he is not right in saying that the subject has never been debated. It was debated two years ago, in 1993, and some of his arguments—as well as some of those that I shall advance in rebuttal—were aired then. The matter has also been touched on in subsequent debates, so it is not an entirely debate-free area.

The hon. Gentleman deserves considerable credit for producing, in January, a pamphlet entitled "Reinventing Democracy". It is a major work, including everything about democracy except the kitchen sink. I was slightly disappointed to see that Madam Speaker was not in the Chair—I am making no personal reference to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—as I intended to say, "We authors, Ma'am", since I have also produced a pamphlet, though on a different subject: it is called "The Competitiveness of Britain", and it was published about a year before the hon. Gentleman's.

I am aware of the hard work and lack of appreciation involved in the production of such pamphlets, and I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his production of a volume which—having read it—I consider robust and coherent. I must add, however, that although I agreed with a great deal that the hon. Gentleman wrote about the procedures of the House in the section concerning parliamentary democracy, I had to dissent from many of his conclusions. That will not surprise him.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, having conducted research for his pamphlet and the debate, the powers of the royal prerogative—as he pointed out, we are talking of the prerogative as exercised by the Government, not any residual powers of the royal family—have a long history. They are, in effect, a residual item: as parliamentary power spread over almost the whole area of authority, that was left by custom and practice because it was not felt necessary to take it over. Some rather piquant phrases are used: "the undefined residue", for instance, and "the attenuated remnant". We are talking about a small element of our total power structure—in fact, all that is left following the gigantic spread of parliamentary power which has rightly taken place over the centuries.

Secondly, despite the hon. Gentleman's remarks, things have not changed a lot since 1979. One would think that, somehow or other, there had been a great diminution of parliamentary power over the Executive since 1979. In fact, the contrary is the case: things were much the same before 1979 as they are now. The hon. Gentleman mentioned that only last year the intelligence services were brought within statutory control. That example shows that the element of prerogative has been reduced in this Government's lifetime. Far from standing still and being no better than the last Labour Government, we are considerably better in some respects. We have recognised where in some degree it is necessary to take over the prerogative, and we have done so.

Thirdly, despite the existence of this small residual item of Executive power, Parliament is still sovereign. Parliament's power is unlimited. We can take whatever power we want. That is the prerogative of the House. It is what parliamentary sovereignty is all about. We can enforce such measures, as far as our writ runs. It is true that small items of the prerogative still exist, but they are subject to the overriding power of Parliament, which we can exercise at any time.

Fourthly, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it." That is part of the reason why many items still remain as part of the prerogative and are exercised by the Executive. It simply makes sense for them to remain so. The issuing of passports, for example, is done by prerogative, and not on a statutory basis. Whichever party is in power, the Government of the day sometimes need the discretion not to issue a passport for certain reasons. That is well understood. It is handled in a sensible and sensitive way. I—and, I am sure, the hon. Gentleman—have never had any particular problems as a result of the practical application of that prerogative.

It is not necessary to bung up the House of Commons with legislation designed simply to change the formality of such things when in practice they work well as they are. As the hon. Gentleman said in his pamphlet, quite enough legislation goes through the House already. We do not want even more going through, which would be designed nominally to change the status of something that in practice is working extremely well. The hon. Gentleman will face that problem if he tries to implement his pamphlet.

[Mr. John Horam]

At the end of the pamphlet, the hon. Gentleman helpfully gives a programme for the first, second, third and fourth years of a potential Labour Government—an ambitious thing to do, as we may never get a Labour Government. The pamphlet has already got the first four years mapped out. He wants four items to be put through in the first year. Frankly, if he were able get all that through, it would produce parliamentary gridlock. Little else could be passed.

The hon. Gentleman was not a Member of the House when the Labour Government tried to put through Scottish devolution. If he consults his colleagues who were in the House at that time, he will find that an immense amount of effort goes into even one small constitutional change of that sort. He wants major constitutional change on many different fronts. He would find that that would have a time-consuming effect that is out of all proportion to what he may imagine.

The hon. Gentleman is perhaps over-egging the pudding rather a lot when he talks about the unaccountable nature of Executive power. In fact, it is accountable. Changing it would mean changing only some of the formal positions involved, not the reality of how power is exercised. The hon. Gentleman said that in some sense Ministers were not properly accountable for actions under the prerogative. He is clearly mistaken about that. I should like to make that point in case any misunderstanding exists.

Wade and Bradley, the Bible, if I may put it like that, of administrative law is unambiguous on that point. It states:

"Except in those special circumstances where prerogative powers involve the personal discretion of the sovereign"— the hon. Gentleman will agree that we are not talking about that—

"prerogative powers are exercised by or on behalf of the Government of the day. For their exercise, just as for the use of statutory powers, Ministers are responsible to Parliament."

In practical terms, that means that, even where Ministers exercise prerogative powers or powers under the prerogative, they are still answerable to the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration. One can make a complaint against a Minister for maladministration, whether he exercises powers under statutory obligations or under a prerogative. Similarly, the exercise of the royal prerogative is judicially reviewable—provided, of course, that the matter in question is justiciable. On those grounds, Ministers are accountable for the use of the prerogative, just as much as they are under statutory law.

The hon. Gentleman made a number of points about the use of the prerogative by the Government. One particular point involved the British Broadcasting Corporation and royal charters. The BBC would be reluctant to have the position changed, because one of the things that protect the independence of such institutions is the fact that they exist under royal charter. In many ways, that is a better protection than being brought under statute law and therefore being susceptible to changes following political decisions in the Houses of Commons or the House of Lords.

The hon. Gentleman made the point that, in emergencies in relation to war and making treaties, Governments must act, but more so in relation to war. He said that there should be a process of ratification subsequent to decisions being taken. That is a poor substitute for what, in practice, has happened.

The hon. Gentleman began by recalling that this weekend we celebrated the 50th anniversary of VE day. With great affection and gratitude, he remembered the events of 50 years ago, but he will also recall the events of 55 years ago, when the last war started. Matters were determined in the House. The Prime Minister was changed as a consequence of pressure from the House of Commons, and the whole conduct of the war possibly changed because of the debates that took place here.

Post hoc ratification is no substitute for the sort of debates that should and do take place in the House, as they did in the second world war and, subsequently, during the wars in the Falkland Islands, Bosnia and the Gulf. In practice, the hon. Gentleman's demands are met by the sort of procedures that we traditionally follow in the House.

None of my hon. Friends would seriously agree with the hon. Gentleman that somehow or other treaties are agreed to in the House without any particular remonstrance or debate. We spent a great deal of time in Parliament discussing the Maastricht treaty, which I believe is branded on the souls of some of my hon. Friends who had to speak in those debates. They went on so long and it was a close run thing, as the hon. Gentleman is aware. No doubt the Opposition can defend their actions in that debate, although at times it seemed as though they were voting against what they believed in.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): The Minister is one to talk.

Mr. Horam: I can certainly defend my position on Maastricht. No one could seriously complain that there was a lack of debate on that. Similarly, other treaties that have come before the House have been thoroughly debated.

The current position is sensible. It has been improved, where possible, by the Government. The hon. Gentleman may be aware that even Al Gore's specialist advisers said the other day that this country is in the forefront of the world movement towards reinventing government. We can take credit for the fact that, with the possible exception of New Zealand, no other country and no other Government have done as much to reinvent government as our Government have done. We are well ahead of other countries in that regard.

I should be amazed if implementing some of proposals in the hon. Gentleman's pamphlet led to an improvement in democracy. At the heart of his proposals are no fewer than six different tiers of democracy—including not only parish, district and county councils, but regional assemblies and a European Parliament to which he would give additional initiative and powers. That would not be more democracy: it would be gridlock.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Media Ownership

1. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his policy in respect of concentrations of ownership of the media. [21942]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs (Mr. Jonathan Evans): The Government are currently reviewing their policy on media ownership and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage will make the Government's views known once that process has been completed.

Mr. Hinchliffe: The Under-Secretary will be aware that, in a debate exactly a fortnight ago, hon. Members on both sides of the House expressed their concern about the serious implications of the Murdoch News Corporation's involvement in the proposed rugby super league. What steps have the Government taken to evaluate the implications of that development, especially for media coverage of British sport as a whole?

Mr. Evans: If a monopoly of televised rugby league emanates from any registrable agreement, that matter would be considered under the provisions of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1977, not under the monopolies legislation. In those circumstances, it would be for the Director General of Fair Trading to look into the new agreements. As I know that the hon. Gentleman has taken an exceptional interest in this matter, I am sure that he will draw his concerns to the attention of the director general.

Mr. Fabricant: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a great deal of obsession in this place with News International, yet Longman Pearson, The Guardian group and Associated Newspapers all have a considerable degree of cross-media ownership covering newspapers, television and other media? Does he further agree that mechanisms exist—such as the Monopolies and Mergers Commission and the Office of Fair Trading—to ensure that there are no monopolies in the media?

Mr. Evans: I have already referred to the structure of our current competition law. However, within the context of the question asked by the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe), the whole matter of cross-media ownership is complex. The issues outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant) make that clear. For that reason, the whole matter is currently the subject of a review and it would be wrong of me to pre-empt its outcome.

Mr. Wilson: Does the Under-Secretary agree that my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield has raised a subject of considerable importance relating to monopoly and, in particular, the coverage of British sport? I understand that, in the case of rugby league, there is a monopoly issue because the contracts will exclude non-Murdoch players from international competition. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the implications of that go far beyond rugby league? Is it not time to send out a strong signal that the Government are not prepared to allow whole sports to be bought, with access to them then being conditioned by people whose interests are in the media rather than in the sport?

Mr. Evans: The question raises two distinct issues. The first relates to the review of cross-media ownership, and I have made it clear that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage is deeply involved in that. The Government will announce their policy at the appropriate time.

Within the context of the issue raised by the hon. Member for Wakefield, I have outlined the current structure of competition law. If the hon. Gentleman feels that he has real concerns which he believes should be raised in relation to other sports, I have suggested to him that he draw those concerns to the attention of the Director General of Fair Trading.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: May I return my hon. Friend to the question of predatory pricing? If News International has 37 per cent. of the daily national newspaper market, and if the Director General of Fair Trading satisfies himself that a sustained price cut will increase the losses of The Times, why is it fair and reasonable to allow that media concentration to continue and to hit the other newspaper groups that are trying to compete in the broadsheet market?

Mr. Evans: I am aware of the concerns which my hon. Friend has outlined on previous occasions in relation to this issue. He will be aware that the Director General of Fair Trading is the appropriate person for considering allegations of predatory pricing. The director general looked at the issue when the pricing war between major national newspapers began, and it is a matter that will continue to excite his interest.

British Gas

2. Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions he has held with British Gas about levels of consumer satisfaction. [21943]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Energy (Mr. Richard Page): Overall levels of consumer satisfaction are a matter for British Gas. Thirty-nine specific standards of service are regulated by the Office of Gas Supply.

Mr. Jones: Does the Under-Secretary think that British Gas's blind, elderly and disabled customers are happy with the service that they are getting, when the home advisory service which British Gas has provided up to now is being cut by 50 per cent.? Does he think that those customers will be satisfied with the fact that the British Gas chairman is giving himself a 75 per cent. pay rise?

Mr. Page: British Gas is not going to cut its services to the elderly and the blind, and it is in fact spending £170 million a year on those services. It also provides a gas care register. Ofgas has agreed some standards of service with British Gas, and British Gas has failed in three areas of service. For example, Ofgas wanted a level of 100 per cent. for the reading of meters for customers moving home, but British Gas has reached only 98.9 per cent.

A level of 100 per cent. was demanded for energy efficiency, but British Gas is getting only 99.8 per cent. British Gas is addressing those shortcomings.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: In view of the soaring number of complaints, will the Under-Secretary join the Pensions Investments Research Consultants—an organisation that advises pension funds that hold £70,000 million in their funds—in condemning the soaring boardroom pay-outs at British Gas, which are in breach of the Institute of Directors' guidelines on best practice? Will the hon. Gentleman advise shareholders at the British Gas annual general meeting on 31 May to support resolution 13 on controlling the pay-outs and perks in the boardroom, as I shall be doing at that meeting? If not, why not?

Mr. Page: The Government have made our position clear on the pay of the directors of British Gas. We will await the report of the Greenbury committee. I hope that the pensioners connected with the PIRC are happy with the 21 per cent. reduction in gas prices since privatisation.

Mr. Lidington: Does my hon. Friend agree that gas consumers have every right to be pleased not only with the reduction in gas prices since privatisation but with the healthy profits being made by British Gas, taxation on which goes to help finance the improvements in public services to which the Government are committed?

Mr. Page: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point. Last year, British Gas contributed £504 million to the Treasury. That was a valuable contribution, and British Gas should be congratulated on that.

Volvo Site, Workington

3. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what efforts are being undertaken by his Department with a view to help find an occupant for the Volvo site in Workington. [21944]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Primary responsibility for finding a new occupant for the factory falls to the company and its agents. However, the local development organisations, together with Inward, the regional development organisation, and the Government office for the north-west are fully aware of the opportunities that the site has to offer. They continue to promote the site at every suitable opportunity.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the Minister refer my comments to his departmental officials with gratitude for the work that they are doing in trying to market that very important site? Will he join me in reiterating that we have in Workington a 500,000 sq ft modern factory in an assisted area where European moneys are available? Anyone watching Parliament today who knows of a potential client should come forward as soon as possible.

Mr. Evans: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the generosity of his remarks about the work undertaken by Government officials. It may reassure him to know that I had a meeting with Inward last week at which that subject was at the top of the agenda. Inward is very much aware of the statements which have been made not just in this House but throughout the north-west by the hon. Gentleman, who has taken a leading role in seeking to promote the occupation of the site.

Gas Supply

4. Mr. Canavan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will arrange to meet the chairman of British Gas to discuss gas supply. [21945]

The Minister for Industry and Energy (Mr. Tim Eggar): My right hon. Friend and I meet the chairman regularly to discuss a range of issues.

Mr. Canavan: Will the Minister demand an explanation from the chairman on why more than 16,000 disconnections were made last year because of fuel poverty and why the number of consumer complaints increased by 150 per cent. during the first quarter of this year compared with the first quarter of last year? Will the Minister instruct the chairman, the chief executive and all the other fat cats on the board of British Gas that it is high time that they put their house in order and started providing a better standard of service instead of lining their pockets with exorbitant salary increases and share options?

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Gentleman mentioned the current figure for disconnections but failed to mention that, some six years ago, just after privatisation, there were 61,000 disconnections a year, which shows that British Gas has improved its standard of service to those clients by a very high degree. Moreover, the standards with regard to the introduction of pre-payment meters have improved sharply. The 39 standards of service set out by the Office of Gas Supply have been met in full, with the exception of three specific services, two of which my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State referred to. British Gas has said publicly that it is committed to improving its standards further. If that is not enough for the hon. Gentleman, he should know that we shall introduce competition into the domestic gas market, which will almost inevitably lead to a reduction in prices for domestic consumers and an improvement in standards of service.

Mr. John Marshall: When my right hon. Friend meets the chairman of British Gas, will he congratulate him on the massive increase in investment since the industry was privatised, the massive increase in productivity and the substantial real terms reduction in prices? Does he agree that the snivelling comments of the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) show that the new Labour party is just the old Labour party writ large, with the same prejudices it has always had?

Mr. Eggar: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Salmond: Is it possible that the Minister is unaware that British Gas is now held in public odium and that, at the annual general meeting later this month, the British Gas board faces a revolt by small shareholders, not just on salaries but on a range of other issues? When will the Department of Trade and Industry stop waffling on about British Gas being a world-class company and recognise that it has created a privatised Frankenstein's monster that is now totally out of touch with its customers, shareholders and staff?

Mr. Eggar: British Gas is a world-class company and is winning business for Britain throughout the world. The hon. Gentleman should welcome that.

Mr. Marlow: Instead of making down-market and emotive allegations about Frankenstein's monsters, privatisation and the rest of it, will my right hon. Friend tell my constituents, who have a real interest in this subject, what has happened to gas prices in real terms since privatisation and how those compare with prices before privatisation? Behind everything else, that is the issue that really matters to them.

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Gas prices have fallen by more than 20 per cent. in real terms since privatisation and by 15 per cent. when account is taken of the imposition of value added tax. Furthermore, standards of service have improved and the number of disconnections has fallen, which is concrete evidence of the success of our privatisation policy.

Mr. O'Neill: When the Minister sees the chairman, will he take account of the fact that the assurances which he gave in Committee on schedule 5 to the Gas Bill, that the changes were no different from those that would take place in any other privatisation legislation, will result in the prospect of a world-class company like British Gas abrogating its contracts on gas supply with a number of companies, both British and international? Does he realise that he is putting Government support behind the possibility of a major British company betraying undertakings that it has entered into faithfully with other companies, both British and worldwide, to take their supplies of gas at prices that were agreed some time ago?

Mr. Eggar: The point that was made in Committee with regard to schedule 5 was that there was a clear precedent for the allocation of existing contracts in such a position. The most recent precedent was the Gas Act 1986 and the previous one was in 1981, in the sale to Enterprise Oil.

As the hon. Gentleman said in Committee, and as I reiterated in that debate, it is appropriate that there should be commercial discussions between the producers and consumers of gas—in that case, between British Gas and several suppliers. That is what I believe that the hon. Gentleman said in Committee he wanted, and that is what I continue to want. I hope that there will be successful commercial discussions in the coming weeks.

Rural White Paper

5. Mr. Colvin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what submissions his Department has made for inclusion in the proposed White Paper on the rural economy. [21946]

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Heseltine): Officials in my Department are in close contact with the White Paper team and have been working with them to ensure that the interests of businesses in rural areas are fully represented.

Mr. Colvin: Does my right hon. Friend acknowledge that, although 23 per cent. of our population live in the countryside, only a small proportion work there, and that the more that can be done to encourage jobs alternative to agriculture, the better that is for our transport system and our rural economy as a whole? Will he support the proposal for the rural business unit, which would enable farmers and landowners to lump together for tax purposes not only their farming enterprises but alternative enterprises, which would do a great deal to encourage the alternative industrial use of redundant farm buildings?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend raises a very important point. I am aware of the proposal that has been made by the Country Landowners Association. I can assure him that, in the context of that proposal and of a wide range of other representations to enhance the wealth-creating potential of the countryside, my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food are giving the most urgent consideration to those matters.

Mr. Rendel: Will the President of the Board of Trade ensure that the White Paper demonstrates support for tele-cottages in rural areas, especially ones like that recently set up by the Lambourn Valley trade and tourism association in my constituency, with support from the Liberal Democrat-run county and district councils, and will he tell us how many other authorities are supporting tele-cottages at present?

Mr. Heseltine: I think the hon. Gentleman will recognise that the changing technological capabilities of people to work in outlying areas or at home are well understood by the Government and will play a significant part in the findings of the White Paper.

Mr. MacShane: The President may not be aware that in Rotherham 65 per cent. of the land area is rural and there is a very important small rural economy there, but how can any rural economy function without an efficient network of public transport? Bus deregulation and privatisation have ripped out the heart of bus transport and, if we continue with rail privatisation, there will be no rail transport to keep the rural economies alive.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman will know that there has been an improved arrangement and facility for rural buses, and that has been one of the advantages of changes that we have introduced.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Rural Development Commission and the Department of Trade and Industry are doing extremely good work in developing new businesses in the countryside? However, I wonder whether he could do more to ensure that other colleagues in other Departments make sure that we obtain the right planning permission and that we restore the right enterprise culture to the countryside, because that will ensure that we have a growing rural economy rather than a dying one.

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is right to press those arguments. As I said, the two colleagues in the Government who are responsible for that matter are taking the White Paper very seriously.

Coal Industry

6. Mr. Skinner: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent meeting he has had with owners of the newly privatised coal industry with regard to overall production and costs. [21947]

Mr. Heseltine: DTI Ministers have met representatives of successor coal companies on a number of occasions and a range of issues have been discussed. I invite the hon. Gentleman to agree with me that there was nothing crooked in the arrangements that brought those companies into existence.

Mr. Skinner: There is one easy way to find out, is there not? The President of the Board of Trade has one story. "Panorama" and some other people, including myself and other Opposition Members, believe another story. He must do the decent thing and clean the matter up. Why does he not set up a fully independent public inquiry to find out the truth about the sequence of events that led to one of his friends, Richard Budge, getting the coal pits and then having £100 million knocked off the bid? Only an independent inquiry will be able to find out the truth.

Mr. Heseltine: I am glad that the hon. Member has not repeated the disgraceful allegations he made yesterday. What he does not understand is that all the papers relevant to this matter will be at the disposal of the National Audit Office and that it will be for it to determine whether any matters should be drawn to the attention of the Public Accounts Committee.

What I find utterly intolerable in the hon. Member's allegations is that he thinks that a Minister in my position has the power so to order civil servants in my Department that they would carry out the sort of activities of which he is accusing them and the Government. To suggest that the permanent secretary in my Department and all the civil servants involved would behave in the way suggested by the hon. Member is an intolerable abuse of the privileges of the House.

Mr. David Evans: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, since privatisation, jobs have been created in the mining industry every single day and coal is being produced more competitively? Does he not think it a bit rich that, when the lot opposite were in power from 1964 to 1970 and from 1974 to 1979, 313 pits were closed, with the loss of 230,000 miners' jobs? Is that what is meant by the new, caring, sharing Labour party of the lot opposite?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend, as so often, has hit the nail firmly on the head. The real determination of the Labour party is to try to obscure by smear the remarkable success of the privatised coal industry. That coal industry is seeing increases in productivity; sales of British coal overseas and increased profitability. It has kept open far more pits in the private sector than the nationalised industry considered possible in the public sector. Once again, privatisation has proved immensely successful, despite everything that the Labour party has said.

Anti-competitive Practices

7. Mr. Hain: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action he intends to take tackling anti-competitive practices. [21948]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The Government are committed to pursuing a vigorous competition policy under existing competition law, and to introducing legislation to reform the law on restrictive trade practices and abuse of market as soon as parliamentary time permits.

Mr. Hain: Is not the Government's competition policy in as much of a shambles as their party, so much so that the Director General of Fair Trading, Sir Bryan Carsberg, who is widely respected, is stepping down after only two years in office? The Government have not even been able to find a successor. Why does the Minister not adopt the Labour party's policy of merging the Office of Fair Trading and the Monopolies and Mergers Commission to create a dynamic new regulatory body that could stamp out anti-competitive practice?

Mr. Evans: One of the sights of new Labour with which it is somewhat difficult to come to terms is the image of the hon. Gentleman as a spokesman for competition in the marketplace. That unreconstructed Tribunite socialist is now portraying himself as a friend of competition.

I think that the hon. Gentleman referred to the speech made by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), who suggested that he supported the remarks of the Director General of Fair Trading when he recently gave evidence to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry on the issue of a unitary competition policy. It is clear that the hon. Gentleman did not understand that evidence, because Sir Bryan Carsberg actually suggested that there should be a lesser role for Ministers and for the House. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, however, made it clear in his speech that he wants to substitute his personal judgment for the independent analysis of the MMC.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: Last year, industrial output in this country was at its best ever level and manufacturing exports rose by 14 per cent., also to their best ever level. Does my hon. Friend not think that it is a bit rich that the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) should talk about anti-competitive measures when the measures that the business men of this country fear most are the imposition of a social chapter and the minimum wage—precisely the policies adumbrated by the Labour party?

Mr. Evans: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. He will have noticed also that the hon. Member for Neath had difficulty understanding what he was talking about.

It is Government policy to keep the competition policy mechanism under review. For that reason, changes were introduced last year in the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 in order to refine the system. The Government have also announced that they will legislate further when parliamentary time permits. As my hon. Friend made clear, the greatest threat to competition within our economy comes from the policies advocated by the Labour party.

Dr. John Cunningham: Does the Under-Secretary of State agree that the Government's commitment to effective reform of competition policy can be gauged by the fact that the proposals to which he referred—which apparently have not been acted upon because of lack of parliamentary time—were first announced in 1988, seven years ago? Is it not clear that the Government's commitment is not to the competitive markets but to the privatisation of as many large-scale monopolies as possible in order to raise revenue to bail out their mismanagement of the economy? Is that not obvious from the Government's ill-considered, hastily arranged statement yesterday about the privatisation of the nuclear industry? That is another cynical measure—a pre-election tax bribe—which will end up costing the taxpayers much more in the long term.

Mr. Evans: That effort was no better than that of the hon. Member for Neath. The right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) is correct in that we wished to legislate earlier in relation to the restrictive trade practices matter. However, I should correct his assertion that the announcement was made in 1988; it was 1989. It is only one part of a range of measures that the Government have announced. The abuse of market power consultation was undertaken in 1993 and a large number of the responses that we received supported the eventual outcome as proposed by the Government. The right hon. Gentleman has not referred to the fact that the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 confers new powers on the Director General of Fair Trading to accept undertakings. I know that the right hon. Gentleman welcomed those provisions previously.

Machine Tools

8. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the top six countries exporting machine tools by value to the United Kingdom in the most recent complete year and in 1979. [21949]

Mr. Page: The top six countries exporting machine tools by value to the United Kingdom in 1997 were, in descending order, the Federal Republic of Germany, the United States of America, Switzerland, Italy, Japan and France. In 1994, the top six on the same basis were the USA, Japan, Germany, Switzerland, Italy and Belgium/Luxembourg.

Mr. Banks: I realise that the Minister is known for his foresight, but surely he does not know what the figures for 1997 will be. Nonetheless, it is a very interesting answer.

Is it not a fact that for many years we had a machine tools and transport machinery trade surplus, yet from 1983 we have had a deficit in all years except 1991? In 1994 there was a trade deficit of about £5 billion on machinery and transport. We do not export to many of the countries from which we import. Why do we have a balance of trade deficit with Japan? Why can we not export machine tools to Japan, which is our largest source of imports?

Mr. Page: I thank the hon. Gentleman for correcting my transposition of 1997 for 1979. I also congratulate him on giving me the opportunity to set the record straight. In 1979 there was a machine tools trade deficit of £50 million and, by contrast, in 1994 the industry ran a balance of trade surplus of £28 million. In 1993 and 1994 we saw the first balance of trade surpluses for two years. I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to draw that success to the attention of the House.

Sir Donald Thompson: Is my hon. Friend aware that, in the real world of the west riding of Yorkshire, the machine tool industry is doing even better than it did last year, and will he join me in congratulating Denford Machine Tools in my constituency, which this very day is celebrating publicly the expansion of its business?

Mr. Page: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The machine tool industry is showing significant improvement. In fact, on Sunday, subject to the business of the House, I hope to be allowed to fly to Milan to attend the EMO machine tool exhibition, which is one of the largest in the world and at which some 33 United Kingdom-based machine tool companies are exhibiting. I hope to do my bit to secure them some orders and bring more work and jobs to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hardy: Would not that industry do even better if Britain had the same opportunity to export machine and hand tools to some of the countries on that list, and to two or three other significant exporters to Britain, that they have to export to us?

Mr. Page: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point, but our machine tool industry has undergone a considerable revolution. We are starting to make computer-controlled machine tools that are suitable for export. Back in 1979, machine tools were manually operated and few were run by computer. That is the world in which we are operating.

MK Electric and PMS

9. Mr. Amess: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to visit MK Electric and PMS to discuss the provision of new jobs. [21950]

Mr. Eggar: Neither my right hon. Friend nor I have any immediate plans to visit MK Electric or PMS, even though they are in Basildon.

Mr. Amess: Would my right hon. Friend join me—[Hon. Members: "Labour gain."] Is that old Labour or new Labour? Would my right hon. Friend join me in welcoming the news that the Princess Royal will visit Basildon on Tuesday to open the new headquarters of MK Electric, the company that produces the finest plugs in Europe, and PMS, the company that produces the finest gifts and novelties in the world? Does he agree that such expansion and investment are further evidence of this country's economic recovery?

Mr. Eggar: I am disturbed to note that my hon. Friend did not mention Basildon in his question. [Hon. Members: "He did."] I correct myself: he mentioned it only once.

I am delighted that Her Royal Highness will visit Basildon on Tuesday, not least because MK Electric, as my hon. Friend knows, has recently received an "Investors in People" award as well as transferring its headquarters to Basildon, and PMS is creating 170 new jobs. As my hon. Friend is aware, the number of people unemployed in Basildon has fallen by no fewer than 700 over the past 12 months, and that is recognition of the economic success in Basildon.

Micro-businesses

10. Ms Coffey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the survival rate of micro-businesses in their first year of operation. [21951]

Mr. Page: To avoid placing undue burdens on small firms we use administrative sources to monitor survival rates of new businesses.

Recent estimates of the survival rates of new, mostly micro, businesses have been produced by Barclays bank. For the period 1989-1993, it estimates that on average 77 per cent. of start-ups were still trading after their first year of operation.

Ms Coffey: As the Minister is aware, the enterprise allowance scheme, which last year in Stockport enabled 350 people to set up their own businesses, has disappeared in a cloud of smoke into the single regeneration budget. There is no DTI funding for business links to give help and financial support to start up businesses. What advice, apart from do-it-yourself, can he give my constituents who will lose the benefit of the enterprise allowance scheme, and what proposals has he to help small businesses and people who prefer self-employment to benefit?

Mr. Page: As the hon. Lady said, the single regeneration budget provides some start-up support to help unemployed people into self-employment. She made the valid point that the first moments after any birth are the most fragile. There is a fond belief that running a small business is easier than running a large business, but that is not so. The important point is that survival rates for smaller businesses would be much better if those wishing to start them went along to business links and took strong advice on the viability of their financial package before going ahead. What is even more important for small businesses is a stable economic environment in which they can plan with certainty.

Mr. Sykes: One of the greatest challenges facing small businesses in 1995 is the over-burdensome and over-zealous enforcement of regulations by petty bureaucrats across the country. A year ago the House passed the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, at which time the Government promised to introduce a system of appeals to help small business people. What has happened to that procedure?

Mr. Page: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to refer to the fact that we introduced that Act. We shall consult on how better to advance that to help small businesses.

Manufactured Goods

11. Mr. Grocott: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate he has made of when the United Kingdom will achieve a surplus in the balance of trade for manufactured goods. [21952]

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Richard Needham): My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will publish new forecasts for the balance of payments in June. Manufacturing exports were at record levels in 1994 and the prospects for this year are excellent.

Mr. Grocott: I do not blame the Minister for not answering the question, but will he confirm what the Under-Secretary failed to in his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks)—that Central Statistical Office figures show that in 1979 in the key manufacturing sector of transport, equipment and machinery there was a surplus of £2 billion and that in 1984 there was a deficit of £5 billion? In the face of those incontrovertible facts, I suggest to him in a friendly and helpful way that the Government should abandon their policy of getting the message across, because in that key area their message has been one of 16 years of failure.

Mr. Needham: Every month the hon. Gentleman comes back for more; he often asks these questions. Let me give him the figures for cars. In 1979, exports of cars from the United Kingdom were worth £838 million and imports of cars into the United Kingdom were worth £2.6 billion—exports were a third of imports. In 1994, we exported £5 billion-worth and imported £9 billion-worth. We have more than halved the gap in one of the most important areas of manufacturing about which the hon. Gentleman asked. Between 1974 and 1978, the United Kingdom had 4.9 per cent. of world trade and between 1989 and 1993 we had 5.2 per cent. Will the hon. Gentleman please congratulate the Government on their magnificent achievements?

Mr. Waller: Imports of capital equipment have increased during the past year, which has reflected a welcome revival in the confidence of British manufacturing industry. Is it not especially pleasing that exports of the British capital equipment industry have done very well and that we are now in surplus with the rest of the world? Does not that demonstrate a favourable currency position and the fact that our exports are capable of competing effectively in terms of quality anywhere in the world?

Mr. Needham: My hon. Friend draws our attention to the capital goods sector, our share of which to non-OECD countries has increased from 5 per cent. two years ago to 7 per cent. last year. Wherever one looks, the success story of British manufacturing is there to be seen. Of course, we had to get over the 1960s and 1970s when we had to live with the results of Labour Governments, and it took some time to do so. Our good results are now coming through.

Mr. Bell: The Minister mentioned the 1960s and 1970s, but he might have also mentioned the 1980s. In that regard he might have read an interview with Sir Denys Henderson, the chairman of ICI in The Times on 17 April. He made it clear that in the 1980s his relationship with the Government had lapsed because, in his words, it was the Government's view that manufacturing industry did not matter. Is it not true that because of the policy pursued in the 1980s we had a deficit on our manufactured trade last year of £10.7 billion. The Minister does all that he can for exports, which we welcome, but he never tells the House that our imports have risen higher than our exports. As he mentioned the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his opening remarks, I remind him that the Government's only policy seems to be whether to raise interest rates, and even that depends on local election results.

Mr. Needham: The hon. Gentleman is a fair and reasonable opponent, although he always likes to reflect on the negative rather than the positive. He must accept that the legacy that was inherited in the 1980s meant that it took some time to set things right. Between 1974 and 1979, UK productivity rose by less than 1 per cent., in Germany it rose 4.5 per cent., in France it rose 5 per cent., in Italy it rose 5.5 per cent. and in Japan it rose 5.9 per cent. Between 1979 and 1993 our productivity has risen, on average, 4.1 per cent.—more than three times the amount that it rose under the last Labour Government. After Japan, we have had the highest increase in manufacturing productivity of any country in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. That is a magnificent achievement. The facts can be seen in the figures that I quoted on car exports. The hon. Gentleman should give some credit to the Government and to the people of this country for that.

Ministerial Visits

12. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on how many occasions since his appointment a car parking space has been provided for him when visiting static exhibitions in London in his official capacity. [21953]

Mr. Heseltine: It is not possible, without incurring disproportionate costs, to research my many visits to exhibitions in the past three years to see where a car parking space has been provided.

Sir Michael Neubert: Would my right hon. Friend accept that I do not begrudge him an official car parking space, which is one of the last great luxuries in life? Would he also accept that traffic is congested and parking is in short supply in Olympia and Earls Court in west London, where the main exhibition centres are currently situated, and that not the least argument in favour of the proposed new major international exhibition centre in the royal docks is that, in addition to ease of access, ample parking space would be available? As such a centre would not only assist in the regeneration of east London but enhance the potential of our capital city as a national asset, will my right hon. Friend do all in his power to support that proposal?

Mr. Heseltine: I thank my hon. Friend for his generosity in allowing me the privilege of a parking space. I can reassure him that I have just visited the potential site of the exhibition centre in the London Docklands development corporation area. It is for the scheme's promoters to propose appropriate financial arrangements and to secure the necessary planning undertakings. If they are successful, no one will be more pleased than me.

Libya

13. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the value of the trade with Libya for any convenient years in the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s, at adjusted or current prices; and what is the value in the last financial year. [21954]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Technology (Mr. Ian Taylor): In 1966, UK imports from Libya were worth £61 million while exports were worth £29 million. In 1974, imports were worth £386 million and exports £64 million. In 1984, imports were worth £165 million and exports £246 million. In the financial year ended March 1995, imports were worth £153 million and exports £185 million.

Mr. Dalyell: Is it not true that, partly because the present generation of decision makers in Libya were mostly educated at British universities and British technical colleges, not in the United States, British industry has been hit far harder than industry in America, let alone in Germany, Italy and Greece, which pay not a blind bit of notice to the sanctions? Will the Department ask two or three senior officials to look carefully at the film on Channel 4 which is to be screened for more than two hours tomorrow evening and which casts the gravest doubts on whether the Libyans were responsible for the Lockerbie crime? Are we not hurting British industry by looking at sanctions without a certain critical faculty?

Mr. Taylor: I know that the hon. Gentleman takes a deep and understandable interest in the Lockerbie tragedy, which has led to his asking many questions about Libya. Libya is, at best, a marginal market for us, so it is not possible to evaluate exactly the effect on British business of our observing the United Nations sanctions. However, our relations with Libya have been troubled over a period.

I cannot comment on the film "The Maltese Double Cross", which is due to be shown tomorrow evening on Channel 4. Its editorial content must be the responsibility of the producer, but I have heard comments by others and, indeed, I saw comment in The Sunday Times, which cast doubt on the authenticity of the argument advanced. We will have to watch and judge, but at the moment the Government are upholding the UN sanctions that were imposed in 1992.

Insider Dealing

14. Mr. Mudie: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of meetings with the Securities and Investments Board on insider dealing. [21955]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: My Department has regular contacts with the Securities and Investments Board plc on a wide range of subjects, including, but not limited to, insider dealing.

Mr. Mudie: In the nine years since the insider trading legislation was enacted, fewer than 10 people have been convicted. As that crime is widespread, why have so few people been convicted? When can the small, ordinary investor expect Government action and protection? Are the Government, having indulged in a spot of insider dealing themselves over the sale of National Power, too ashamed to legislate?

Mr. Evans: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman, if he has an ounce of generosity in him, will recognise that the Government introduced that legislation. A Conservative Government attempted to legislate in 1973, but the Bill was overtaken by the election in 1974. Between 1974 and 1979, no such legislation was enacted by the Labour Government. The legislation was introduced by the Conservative Government in 1985. It was recognised at that time that tackling insider dealing is difficult and complex for evidential reasons as much as for anything else.

Mr. Mudie indicated assent.

Mr. Evans: I note that the hon. Gentleman accepts that.

It was for that reason that the law was subsequently refined. The hon. Gentleman will know that, in 1993, further provisions were taken through the House by the Government, which became operable on 1 March 1994. The Government consider it appropriate that we should look at the way in which that legislation is working.

Mr. Jenkin: Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be a rather perverse way of judging the effectiveness of the criminal law if we based it on the number of criminal prosecutions? It would not be a very good advertisement for the criminal law if we said that the more murders there are, the more effective are our courts and criminal law. Does my hon. Friend agree also that a balance has to be struck between the flow of information between companies and the market and the restrictions that we place on that flow of information with insider dealing rules? Would it not be wrong for unrealistic share prices to be shown on screens in our dealing markets because the flow of information was too stifled?

Mr. Evans: My hon. Friend accurately describes some of the evidential difficulties in attempting to characterise certain behaviour as insider dealing. He shows that we must proceed in such cases on the basis of evidence of wrongdoing rather than party political prejudice.

Dr. John Cunningham: In view of the ease with which almost everyone under suspicion, including, most recently, Lord Archer, avoids even being charged with insider dealing, will the Minister confirm that, at recent meetings, the Securities and Investments Board has pressed his Department to change the law? Is it not obvious that such changes could mean civil rather than criminal sanctions, thus making it easier to surcharge wrongdoers, and that his Department is the Department that is objecting to and blocking such changes? Apart from the obvious protection of the old pals act, will the Minister tell the House why that is?

Mr. Evans: I can deal with the right hon. Gentleman's question very shortly: he should not believe everything that he reads in the newspapers.

Manufacturing Industry

15. Sir David Knox: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he next expects to meet the President of the Confederation of British Industry to discuss manufacturing industry. [21956]

Mr. Heseltine: I and other DTI Ministers regularly meet the Confederation of British Industry to discuss a range of issues. The latest CBI survey confirms the strength of manufacturing industry. Export orders are growing faster than ever and export optimism is at its highest for a generation.

Sir David Knox: Does my right hon. Friend agree that reasonably stable exchange rates are particularly important if manufacturing exports are to continue to rise, as they have recently? Will he confirm that, whether or not we are in the exchange rate mechanism, it is a major objective for the Government to prevent fluctuations in the exchange rate, as upward and downward movements are particularly detrimental to the manufacturing sector?

Mr. Heseltine: I know that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have all those matters carefully in his mind. My hon. Friend will understand that the Government's determination to maintain strict control over the economy is at the forefront of our objectives.

Mr. Sheerman: Does not the President of the Board of Trade realise that when he meets the CBI he has no credibility at all if he pretends that in the past 16 years we have not lost market after market and home market after home market? Is not his credibility zero if he does not talk to the CBI about how we haul back on that long path to securing those markets for British manufacturers?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point by suggesting that the problem existed 16 years ago. I agree. Precisely because the last Labour Government did so much to undermine the competitiveness of British industry, it has been a hard and painful process to turn it round. However, the latest CBI survey shows exactly how substantial our success has been. Inflation has been below 3 per cent. for the past 18 months—the first time that has happened since 1961. Exports are some 11 per cent. higher. Growth in the economy has been 3.9 per cent. over a year. Understandably, the CBI reflects those exciting figures in its forecasts of the state of optimism of British industry.

Sir Michael Grylls: Despite the huge improvements in British manufacturing industry in the past decade or so, will my right hon. Friend discuss with the financial institutions the gap that appears to exist in long-term finance for firms with a turnover of between £3 million and £50 million? In Britain, those medium-sized firms still find it difficult to get long-term secured loans—true secured loans, not overdrafts dressed up as loans—for expansion and developing new products. It would pay dividends if my right hon. Friend used his influence in that direction.

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend takes a great interest in those matters. I am totally sympathetic to the point that he makes. I have frequent conversations with representatives of the financial institutions and the Bank of England on those important issues.

Research and Development

16. Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will outline the measures he is undertaking to encourage business expenditure on research and development. [21957]

Mr. Ian Taylor: There are a substantial number of measures, ranging from grant schemes such as SMART and SPUR, to those which improve the market intelligence available to business, such as the UK R and D scoreboard and the technology foresight programme, in which the DTI has been heavily involved.

Mrs. Campbell: Does the Minister support the view of the Science and Technology Select Committee that the evidence in favour of tax incentives to encourage business expenditure on research and development is sufficiently strong to warrant a Government review? Can he confirm that one is being carried out?

Mr. Taylor: I can reassure the hon. Lady that we constantly keep under review the need to encourage research and development and innovation in the United Kingdom. The competitiveness White Paper, which is due to be launched in a few weeks' time, will demonstrate just how extensive our thinking on those matters has been. There are provisions for companies to write off revenue or current account against related profits. That is not often drawn to our attention, but it already exists in law.

Sir Dudley Smith: Does my right hon. Friend agree that research and development is extremely expensive? There is absolutely no guarantee of success, but it is absolutely vital to the future of Britain or of any country. In the circumstances, may I reiterate what the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) said? We need always to pay attention to the tax position as well as other measures. My hon. Friend's Department can do more than any other to encourage research and development.

Mr. Taylor: I understand exactly what my hon. Friend says about the importance of R and D and innovation for British business. It is one of the keys to our competitiveness. That is why the DTI is now actively engaged in benchmarking to help companies. It is why we have expert counsellors in the business links, which are growing up around the country, promotions and conferences to encourage business to understand the importance of research and development and discussions with the City to change its attitude to the relationship between dividend policy and long-term investment in research and development.

Mr. Clapham: As the Minister accepts that innovation is vital to the competitiveness of British industry, can he explain why his Department cut support for it by £5.5 million while allocating £30 million to the renovation of No. 1 Victoria street?

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman, sadly, lowers the tone of a constructive discussion. Civil research and development in this country has been rising. The overall figures are affected by the decline in defence in R and D expenditure, but I assure him that the DTI is concentrating on assisting British industry to understand the importance of long-term R and D—particularly smaller companies. There will be further announcements in due course, when the competitiveness White Paper is published.

Japanese Trade Barriers

17. Mr. Dunn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations have been made to the Government of Japan about the trade barriers against British goods; and if he will make a statement. [21958]

Mr. Ian Taylor: We take every opportunity to make representations both directly and through the European Commission where the interests of British firms are damaged by trade barriers. We have regular and frank discussions with the Japanese Government on such issues. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade and my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade both visited Japan this year and raised current trade problems.

Mr. Dunn: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a general perception that exporters from the empire of Japan have easier access to our markets than do British exporters to the empire of Japan? Will my hon. Friend be ever determined to ensure ease of access to Japanese markets by our industrialists and that free trade actually is free trade?

Mr. Taylor: I can give my hon. Friend some good news. In the first quarter of this year, our exports to Japan were up 40 per cent. The changes that the Japanese Government are now making voluntarily and in response to the yen crisis are likely to lead to further opportunities for British business, which we enthusiastically support. Our relationship with Japan, which has further to go in some key sectors, is best resolved through the multilateral arrangements of the World Trade Organisation. We hope that, in an effort to build the WTO's credibility, all nations—including the United States—will take that into account. That is why we referred our problems with whisky supplies into Japan to the WTO, backed by the European Union in the last few days.

Mr. Pike: The Minister said that our net exports to Japan are up 40 per cent. What is the balance of manufactured trade between this country and Japan?

Mr. Taylor: We have a deficit in manufactured trade but the figure for overall visible trade is a good deal more positive and in credit. Our overall position is extremely important. In 1994, our exports to Japan totalled £2.9 billion and imports totalled £8.9 billion. Those are the full year figures, so I prefer to use those.

Trade Marks

18. Mr. French: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many applications have been (a) received and (b) processed by the Trade Marks Registry since October 1994. [21959]

Mr. Ian Taylor: In the period from 31 October 1994 to 31 March 1995, the Trade Marks Registry received 24,241 applications, of which 23,717 were processed by the formalities section. In the same period 19,344 cases were examined, 13,090 cases published and 10,973 cases registered.

Mr. French: Is my hon. Friend aware that the volume of applications is such that it typically takes about five months to produce an acceptance or rejection, notwithstanding the registry's hard-working and diligent staff? Does he agree that such delays produce an unnecessary commercial handicap? Will he introduce a maximum target time of no more than three months?

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend refers to a problem that has arisen because of the success of trade mark applications following enactment of the Trade Marks Act 1994. I hear what my hon. Friend says and we will look further into the matter. Improvements are being made and staff have adjusted to the high volume of applications, which shows how well the British economy is performing. Otherwise, there would not be the demand that we are experiencing.

Trade Statistics

19. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his latest estimate of Britain's share of world trade (a) in visibles, (b) in invisibles and (c) in (a) and (b) combined. [21960]

Mr. Needham: In 1993, the latest year for which information is available, the United Kingdom had a 5 per cent. share of world visible exports, an 8 per cent. share of world invisible exports and a 6 per cent. share of visibles and invisibles combined.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, under the Government's policies, Britain is more than maintaining its share of world trade compared with the years of decline when we suffered under socialist anti-enterprise policies dictated by trade union barons?

Mr. Needham: The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) said that we were losing market share after market share. In fact, that is not true. Our share of world trade has gone up from 4.9 per cent. under the last Labour Government to 5.2 per cent. now. For a nation of 1 per cent. of the world population to have 6 per cent. of the world's trade is no mean achievement.

Mr. Purchase: Although we have improved our exports and general share of world trade, we have not kept pace with the general increase in world trade, which, during the past 12 months, has averaged more than 8.5 per cent., a total which we have fallen somewhat below. Is it not true that we are suffering now from a lack of capacity in our exporting industries which, had it not been wasted during the 1980s, would have stood us in good stead now?

Mr. Needham: The hon. Gentleman knows that our share of world trade increased last year. Our share of exports in volume terms was 11 per cent. up against an increase of 8.5 per cent. Instead of being somewhat down, it was a hell of a lot up.

Drugs (White Paper)

3.30 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the Government's drugs strategy for England, set out in a White Paper presented jointly by myself, as chairman of the Ministerial Committee on Drugs, my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Health and for Education, and my hon. Friend the Paymaster General. Copies are available in the Vote Office.

The White Paper follows the Green Paper published last October, to which more than 400 organisations and individuals, including the Opposition parties and the all-party committee on drugs, have responded. A list of all those who submitted written responses has been placed in the Library.

The consultation showed wide general support for the main lines of what was proposed. The White Paper therefore follows it closely, while making a number of modifications reflecting particular points raised in the consultation.

There are two main themes. The first, alongside a continuing commitment to legal deterrents and firm enforcement of the law by the police and Customs and Excise—and a reaffirmation that we do not intend to legalise any currently controlled drug—is a new emphasis on education and prevention. We need to educate our young people about the dangers of drugs, and develop their skills to resist. We need to convey clear messages against drugs to parents and to everyone in the community. We also need to ensure that people who do misuse drugs can get help through information, advice and treatment. The other theme is to establish key priorities, with clear programmes of action and indicators of performance in progress towards achieving them.

The priorities we propose are three. They are interdependent and of equal importance. The first is to increase the safety of communities from drug-related crime. To that end, my right hon. and learned friend the Home Secretary has already included a specific reference to drug-related criminality in the five key policing objectives for 1995-96.

All police forces, where they have not already done so, will now establish their own comprehensive drugs strategies, to be developed by April 1996. Those will cover not only the targeting of drug dealing and related crimes, but also, importantly, the wider role of the police—for example, in working with schools and in the community.

My right hon. and learned Friend will shortly also issue guidance to probation services about their work with drug-using offenders, including the necessary links between drug misusers and treatment services. He has already set out, in the prison service drug strategy published on 26 April, his plans for tackling the problem of drugs in prisons, for which more than £4.5 million will be made available this year.

HM Customs and Excise will of course fully maintain its effort in stopping drugs entering the country, dismantling trafficking networks and organisations, and working closely with the police to enforce the law.

A second priority is to reduce the availability and acceptability of drugs to young people. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education is today issuing guidance on that front, based on the draft issued for consultation last November. Nearly £6 million is being made available this year to support teacher training and new drug prevention projects. The effectiveness of drug prevention work will be included in school inspections.

But the problem is not for schools alone. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has renewed and extended the Home Office drug prevention initiative, under which local teams work with communities to develop effective ways of preventing drug misuse. We will also be co-ordinating new publicity campaigns, using a variety of expertise—in the private and voluntary sectors as well as in Government—to make the messages credible and effective.

For those young people who do experiment with drugs, whatever the messages they receive, we need to ensure that appropriate treatment services are available as soon as they need help. Pending the findings of the current review of the effectiveness of drugs services, which includes early intervention services for young people, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health is providing an extra £1 million this year for the development of such services.

The third priority is to reduce health risks and other damage related to drug misuse, and in particular to ensure that individual drug misusers have access to cost-effective treatment. The findings of the task force conducting the effectiveness review to which I have just referred are expected early next year. In the light of them, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health will issue new guidance.

Her Department will also ask health authorities to review the arrangements for sharing the care of drug misusers between specialist providers—including voluntary organisations—and the normal providers of primary care such as GPs. Those efforts will be backed up by improved access to information about drug misuse and the local treatment services that are available. A free and confidential national telephone help line, operating 24 hours a day, has been operational since 1 April.

Important though it is to have a clear strategy and objectives at national level, with the various Departments working together, such a strategy will work only if it is carried through at local level in similar partnership between the many statutory and voluntary agencies involved. The White Paper therefore proposes the establishment of new drug action teams throughout England.

To the membership of those teams suggested in the Green Paper—senior representatives of the police, probation and prison services, health authorities and local authorities, including the education services—we are, in the light of consultation, adding social services, and encouraging the teams to co-opt representation from the voluntary sector, which often plays a very valuable role in delivering advice and treatment services.

Chief executives of health authorities are being asked to organise the teams, but on the basis that each team should decide for itself who should take the chair, according to what seems best locally. There will be similar flexibility over boundaries, as the boundaries of the various agencies concerned do not always coincide.

But all parts of the country must be covered, and health authorities will therefore be required to report to central Government on the boundaries that are proposed.

To reflect the fundamental importance of wider community involvement, each drug action team will have an advisory drug reference group with a wide-ranging membership of relevant interests. The Government will provide some £8.8 million over the next three years to establish and support the new local arrangements.

The implementation of these proposals will be overseen by the Ministerial Committee on Drugs, supported by the central drugs co-ordination unit that was established some 18 months ago.

I believe that the White Paper sets out a clear, practical and comprehensive strategy, based on partnerships both national and local, which can make a real difference. I commend it to the House.

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): Opposition Members welcome the right hon. Gentleman's statement. There is no doubt that the problems associated with drug misuse have reached new heights: nearly every community in Britain is affected, and every parent is worried about the impact of drug misuse on individuals and families. The effects of drug-related crime and a drug culture are undermining the potential of our young people, pervading every community and devastating some.

Will the Leader of the House confirm that, when research shows that nearly 50 per cent. of our 15 and 16-year-olds have been offered drugs, and two thirds of all thefts are drug-related, we are indeed facing a problem of record proportions that needs urgent action?

The Lord President is aware and has acknowledged that the Labour party has taken a positive approach to the Green Paper that preceded the report, and we are pleased that many of our points have been taken on board, especially about the need for a national strategy and co-ordinated action. I hope that he will confirm that today.

The Labour party is opposed to the legalisation of cannabis. Will the Lord President acknowledge that that is common ground between us: that, given the need to send a strong and clear anti-drugs message to young people, action to legalise cannabis would be wrong, and that the debate about that can serve only as a distraction from the real issue?

I regret, however, that the report does not deal with another problem that affects many young people: the consumption of cigarettes and tobacco products. It is time that the Government turned their mind to tobacco product advertising, which is not covered by the report.

Having generally welcomed the Lord President's approach, may I ask him several specific questions? First, how much of the £5.9 million, which will be available through the Department for Education's 1995-96 grants for education support and training budget to train teachers and support drug education projects, will be completely new money? Will he give an assurance that that funding, which works out at just £240 per school, will be sustained, so that we do not see a repeat of what happened a few years ago, when a new budget for drug education co-ordinators was announced, but was rapidly followed by cuts that reduced their number from 135 to 75?

Secondly, as the Office for Standards in Education is rightly to be given the task of inspecting the quality and effectiveness of schools' policy on drug education, what will be done to ensure that the 9,000 school inspectors are trained in that specific area? What is to happen to schools that have already been inspected and will not be reassessed for four years or more?

Thirdly, why are the localised drug action teams—something that again we welcome in principle—to be set up by the chief executives of district health authorities? Would it not have been more appropriate for local authorities to be the co-ordinators? While on this point, does the Lord President envisage just local authority officials having a role in those teams, or does he envisage a role for elected councillors? On the funding of the teams, is the £8.8 million over three years for the development fund new money, and who will determine the allocation of that specific budget?

Has the Lord President read the report published today by Judge Tumim about the initiatives needed to deal with drug dealing in prison, not least because, in some prisons, up to 80 per cent. of prisoners are drug users? In view of the concern expressed today, which has been repeated on other occasions, surely his specific recommendations should have urgent consideration.

May I ask the Lord President about the impact of cuts in the number of Customs and Excise officers, who do so much, including at times risking their lives, to stop drug trafficking? Surely such Government cuts conflict with the task of fighting drug abuse, as expressed in the document.

Co-ordination across Departments has long been called for by Labour Members. We are glad that, for once, the Government have listened, and that is why we welcome today's announcement.

Mr. Newton: First, I express my gratitude to the hon. Lady for the general tone of her earlier remarks, the welcome she gave for my statement and her acknowledgement of the importance of the problem. I am also grateful for the positive and constructive response, which I am happy to endorse, of the Labour party, and, indeed—I say this to the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith)—of the Liberal Democrat party, to the Green Paper.

Just as I believe that a great deal will depend on the partnership between the Departments represented and between the different agencies on the ground, I also believe that the whole process will work better if it is also a political partnership similar to that displayed in these exchanges. I especially welcome the firm declaration by the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) of her opposition to the legalisation of cannabis. I agree with the reasons that she gave for that.

I will not spend too much time on what the hon. Lady said about cigarettes and tobacco—she might also have included alcohol—as those are the subject of actions, programmes and targets that the Government have set under a different heading, the "Health of the Nation" strategy. It is not that those matters are not being tackled: they are being tackled in ways somewhat different from those set out in the White Paper.

The hon. Lady asked me about the GEST programme. The funding of programmes to train teachers in drug education and innovative projects is new money for those purposes. However, it was, of course, taken into account in planning for the whole of education expenditure during the negotiations last autumn, when we had already published the Green Paper and outlined the direction in which we wished to move.

[Mr. Newton]

The question of training for Ofsted inspectors is a matter for that body, which is independent. However, I have no doubt that it will take appropriate steps to ensure that any necessary training is given.

The reason we asked district health authorities, rather than anyone else, to take the lead in establishing the teams—although, as I said, not necessarily to chair them, as that will depend on local circumstances—is that, of all the bodies involved, they have a direct line of accountability to central Government. That in particular was a point to which we attached importance.

The hon. Lady asked about the involvement of local authorities on the drug action teams. It is certainly envisaged in the White Paper that that involvement would be at the level of director or assistant director in the various services involved, because the intention is that those bodies should take executive action. However, I hope that councillors in the authorities will be involved in informing the work of their officials on those bodies.

On the point about Judge Tumim's report, at this stage I can say only that it appears amply to justify and underline the need for the prisons drugs strategy that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and the Prison Service set out only a few weeks ago.

On the point about Customs and Excise, I simply say that intelligence activity in this area is being supplemented by some 50 posts redeployed from other locations. I see no reason to believe that a more effective use of Customs and Excise resources, which was what the fundamental expenditure review was about, will in any way detract from or diminish the increasingly successful efforts of Customs and Excise in this area.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): Will my right hon. Friend accept my welcome for his statement and, indeed, the welcome from both sides of the House—especially members of the all-party drug misuse group, which argued for a Government strategy on this subject for many years, in an awareness of the difficulty the Government have in accepting the need for a strategy on anything, most of all when it is interdepartmental?

Will my right hon. Friend also accept my thanks for his personal catalytic efforts, and for the way in which he and his colleagues have listened to the submissions made on the Green Paper, which was published last autumn? Will he extend to the central drugs co-ordination unit the thanks of the whole House for the job that it has done, while also accepting that we are worried, because the unit has been promised an extension only until the end of 1996, whereas the White Paper stretches into 1998? I hope that the unit will be given an extension until at least the end of the period covered by the White Paper.

The Lord President has touched on one or two—

Madam Speaker: Order. I must draw the attention of the hon. Gentleman to the fact that this is the time for hon. Members to ask questions following a statement, and the House has an important debate coming up. I hope that there will be brief questions and speedy answers. Otherwise, I shall not be able to call all the Members who wish to ask a question.

Mr. Rathbone: I was trying to suggest a way out of that dilemma, Madam Speaker, by expressing the hope that the Lord President will find time for a debate on the White Paper as soon as possible.

Madam Speaker: In that case, I may not have to call any other hon. Member.

Mr. Newton: First, I thank my hon. Friend for his generous remarks about the successful way in which the exercise has worked. Secondly, I warmly endorse what he said about the central drugs co-ordinating unit, led by Sue Street. It is only a small group, but it has done a fantastic amount of work with considerable success. It has support among those with whom it has spoken, and I well understand why my hon. Friend wishes to see the unit continue, and I shall bear that very much in mind.

So far as the question of a debate is concerned, my hon. Friend makes me put on my other hat and reply cautiously. I would be pleased if I, as Leader of the House, were able to find time for such a debate.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): We welcome the approach and direction of the White Paper, and the priority it gives to education and access to health services. Will the Leader of the House confirm that it does not provide resources for hard-pressed individual schools to make teaching time available for the vital work of drugs education?

Will he explain the philosophy which lay behind the Department of Education's guidance to schools that they need not report to the police cases of possession of cannabis among school pupils, or suspend pupils in those cases? To those of us who believe that it would not be appropriate to legalise cannabis, is that a recognition that there are some complicated problems associated with the matter?

Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that, while he has been deliberating, the Chief Inspector of Prisons has castigated the Prison Service for failing to deal with the scale of the drugs problem in prisons? Will he recognise that the drug action teams will have to listen to young people, people who deal with addiction and people in the health services, who often take a rather different view of the matter from politicians and civil servants?

Mr. Newton: There appeared to be some ambivalence in the right hon. Gentleman's remarks about cannabis, just as there has been—to put it mildly—some ambivalence in his party's resolutions on cannabis. I will leave that subject to be explored on another occasion, rather than engage in acrimony today, against my natural nature.

As for the right hon. Gentleman's comments on the reporting of the discovery of illegal substances in schools, I understand from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education—the right hon. Gentleman will observe that she is not far from me—that what he has said is just plain wrong. If schools find illegal substances, it is expected that they will report that to the police.

On the right hon. Gentleman's other point, one hopes that not just the drugs action teams but everybody involved in the field will make sure that they maintain their contacts with young people, because it is only by fully understanding the nature of the problems and how people feel that we can have effective action to deal with those problems.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): May I give a warm welcome to what my right hon. Friend has told the House, and particularly the initiative for local drug action teams? Will the teams be sufficiently flexible to build on the work that is being done in many rural communities to set up pavement projects which are related not just to drugs but to alcohol and solvent abuse, so that we avoid duplication and harness local support and funding, as well as the Government funding which my right hon. Friend has suggested this afternoon?

Mr. Newton: The answer is yes in every respect. The White Paper does not set out a rigid prescription of how the teams shall be set up, what areas they will cover and who should take the chair, because we are anxious that they maintain the flexibility to relate to local circumstances, and we do not want to suppress the very good activities which are taking place in many parts of the country.

Equally, my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary's recent extension of the drug prevention initiative teams has led them to be covering much wider areas than before in many cases—including, I am glad to say, a new one covering the whole county of Essex. That means that they take in rural areas, as well as the urban ones which have often been the focus of activity in the past.

Mrs. Audrey Wise (Preston): A constituent of mine persuaded her heroin-addicted daughter to seek treatment from our local drugs team. Despite the fact that the daughter has a baby that was then being breast-fed, the response was that there was a waiting time of four months before she could receive help or treatment.

To tell a drug addict that she must wait for four months is effectively to say, "Go away—we're not bothered." My inquiries elicited the fact that it was because of a shortage of resources. Will the measures announced by the Lord President today ensure that sufficient resources will be available in my area to prevent such dreadful things from happening?

Mr. Newton: Although I understand why the hon. Lady raised that point, she will realise that I cannot comment here and now about a particular case. If she sends me details, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health or I will look into it. If we thought that there was no room for improvement in services, whether treatment or other, I would not be standing here now, nor would the Department of Health be conducting an effectiveness review. We shall seek to do everything we can to overcome any problems we discover.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): I welcome the White Paper, but may I concentrate my right hon. Friend's attention on public concern about drug-related crime committed to feed a drug habit? One of the key objectives in the White Paper is to ensure that "the law is effectively enforced, especially against those involved in . . . supply and trafficking".

What measures will the ministerial committee take to tackle the criminality of the drug user who creates the market?

Mr. Newton: I have already said that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has included drug-related crime in his key police objectives for the forthcoming year, which would embrace efforts to deal with the problem that my hon. Friend mentioned. More than 1,000 police officers throughout the country are principally concerned with drugs work, including more than 300 concerned specifically with that work with regional crime squads. If we find that more effort is required as the strategy develops, I am sure that it will be put in.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): May I say with great respect to the Lord President that Ministers are still not sufficiently seized of the extent of the problem of drug abuse around the country? Some 60 to 70 per cent. of everyone in prison is there, at some point, because of a drug-related offence, and it is easier to get drugs inside prison than outside.

Young people usually get their first experience with drugs through introduction by another member of their family. In the east end of London, abuse of drugs, particularly crack cocaine, is rampant. Is the Minister prepared to come to the Newham drug awareness project to find out for himself just how extensive the problem is?

I know that this is unacceptable to those on both Front Benches but, unless this country is prepared seriously to consider the legalisation of certain categories of drugs—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."]—we shall never deal with the problem any better than the United States has.

Mr. Newton: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's last point has already been given by hon. Members on both Front Benches, and I shall not add to that. The answer to his question of whether I am prepared to visit the project in Newham is: yes, although I cannot give an exact time. Nor can I guarantee to give the same response if I have a stream of similar requests, although I shall do my best.

On the first point, I refer again to what my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has already set out in the prison drugs strategy, which recognises the problem to which the hon. Gentleman refers. A range of measures to tackle it involve additional resources, including the introduction of mandatory drugs testing.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I warmly welcome my right hon. Friend's statement, but will he give maximum priority to preventing 14 and 15-year-olds from becoming addicted to heroin and so leading a life of crime, as is happening in Bolton?

Mr. Newton: I certainly acknowledge that, if that is happening, as it may be in other places as well, it is a serious problem, which I want to see tackled in any possible way. I hope that the measures that I have set out this afternoon will help.

Mr. Gordon McMaster (Paisley, South): Does the Leader of the House recall that the Scottish Office published a consultation document at about the same time as he published his? Is it not therefore a disgrace that the White Paper does not apply to Scotland? Does he agree that it may prove futile to introduce more Customs and Excise controls in England but not in Scotland and Wales?

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Scottish Office, in another place will shortly set out further plans for the development of the strategy that he has already described, following the findings of a working party that he chaired in Scotland.

I do not think that it is ridiculous that there are distinct, although closely related, approaches in the four component parts of the United Kingdom. They do have their differences, including, in Scotland, the fact that the organisation of social services and probation services, and the relationship between them, is different. It is sensible to take account of those differences, but it is also sensible to do what we are doing, which is to have a strategy in every part of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): My right hon. Friend's statement will be well welcomed by parents throughout the country, and I think that they will also welcome the apparent cross-party support in the House. However, does he agree that, in my constituency, which has a Liberal Democrat-controlled council, there will be problems in local implementation in view of the fact that, at its most recent conference, the grass roots of the Liberal party voted to legalise cannabis?

Mr. Newton: I have already made some reference to that matter, and I do not want to become involved, even at the behest of my hon. Friend, in the internecine warfare in the Liberal party, but I am sure that all Members of the House—and I think that that would include those on the Liberal Democrat Bench—would, whatever their opinions on that matter, want all local authorities to co-operate to the full in implementing that strategy.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): Does the Leader of the House accept that communities such as Hackney are desperate for a real war against drugs, because of the crime, the gangs and the gun use increasingly associated with the drugs trade in the inner city?

Although his White Paper is fine as far as it goes, should not the Government pay more attention to choking off supply, considering the resources available to the customs and, on a wider front, looking to our relationship with those third-world countries that act as drug producers and drugs transshipment points?

A great deal can be done to give resources to some of those countries to increase the strength of their own customs and coastguard, and we need to ensure that, on the wider trade front, we are not pursuing trade policies that force agriculturists in South America and the Caribbean into drug production.

Mr. Newton: I agree with most of what the hon. Lady says. This country does have a good record as a major contributor, for example, to United Nations programmes in that regard and to collaborative international action to try to tackle that problem. On customs, and enforcement generally, I draw attention to the fact that about half of the £500 million that is spent each year in this country in that respect is spent on police and customs enforcement, including more than £100 million this year on customs enforcement, and that seizure values doubled from about £250 million in 1990 to well in excess of £500 million in 1994. A great deal of effort is being made.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that he and his ministerial colleagues are to be congratulated on the serious and comprehensive way in which they have approached that difficult problem?

However, in the interests of taking quick, effective action to tackle what is probably the most serious social problem confronting advanced countries, especially among young people, will my right hon. Friend give a high priority to the existing efforts that are taking place, quite successfully, in my constituency and elsewhere, of voluntary organisations such as the youth awareness programme, which has already been tangentially mentioned, and the community drug help line in my constituency, which are doing sterling work very cost-effectively?

Mr. Newton: I can give my hon. Friend an unequivocal yes to that. As I said in my statement, one of the changes we have made since the publication of the Green Paper is to urge the co-option of representatives of the voluntary sector on to the drug action teams, and the drug reference groups, the advisory bodies, will certainly include representatives of groups such as those that my hon. Friend mentioned.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): It is extremely welcome that the Government are now encouraging police forces to target serious drug trafficking. May I ask the Leader of the House, however, how much new money will go into that, and how many new resources will be available to police forces to enable them to carry out that very important work?

Mr. Newton: The resources available to police forces were only recently set out by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary on a considerable scale, together with a range of measures designed to ensure that those resources are used to full effect. We would expect that, as the police develop the force-wide strategies to which I have referred, those efforts will become yet more effective.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): The report refers to the dangers of Temazepam, but it appears that no steps have been taken to subject its issue to more control. Would my right hon. Friend be prepared to comment on that?

Mr. Newton: My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Health are taking immediate steps to reduce the misuse of Temazepam. That will be done by imposing safe custody controls on manufacturers and wholesalers under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, and by immediately starting consultations, which is legally required in this case, on banning the prescription of gel-filled capsules by general practitioners under the General Medical Services Regulations 1992. In addition, we are carefully considering the recommendations of the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs to reschedule Temazepam under the 1971 Act. I hope that what I have said will encourage my hon. Friend.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): The Leader of the House has chaired a committee that has presented a White Paper with some good things in it, but I warn him that one action upon which the Home Secretary and the Government are embarking could destroy all that good. People used to describe the prison system as the university of crime, but it is not just Stephen Tumim who recognises that today's prisons are centres for gangs, the drug culture and the dissemination of gang culture and of drugs. Should the Home Secretary introduce boot camps, they will be the worst way of spreading gangs and the drug culture. They will do more damage to this country's drugs policy than any other single act.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will have noted that my right hon. and learned Friend is sitting next to me, and his whispered comments about the hon. Gentleman's remarks were not entirely complimentary. I will simply fall back on the very point that I have made two or three times—within the past three weeks, my right hon. and learned Friend has demonstrated his clear determination to adopt new measures on drug abuse in prisons, both to prevent it and to ensure proper treatment and rehabilitation for those who are already drug misusers.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his statement is particularly welcome, and that the cross-party support he has received is significant? Can he say any more about the wider role of the police, particularly their work with schools, which is such an important part of the operation to get the drug problem under control?

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. As I have said, part of developing police force strategies is related to their wider role, as described by my hon. Friend. I know from my conversations with Chief Constable Hellawell, of West Yorkshire, who is the chairman of the Association of Chief Police Officers committee on the subject, that the police are receptive to the need to do more on that part of their work. I am glad to say that work with schools is a marked feature of police work in Essex.

Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East): I welcome the Lord President's decision on the legalisation of cannabis; to have acted otherwise would have sent the wrong signal at this stage in the war against drugs. As a strong supporter of the strategy, I ask the right hon. Gentleman to reconsider the membership of the drug action teams.

The decision not to appoint a local authority member to them instead of a senior local government officer is a tactical mistake. It is more representative of Government thinking in the 1980s rather than the new partnership that is supposed to exist in the 1990s. If the Lord President wants dynamic, co-ordinated local authority action, it is tactically wrong to appoint senior local government officers and to have no elected representation.

Mr. Newton: I cannot add to what I have already said, but, just as we looked carefully at the results of consultation on the Green Paper, so obviously, with an initiative of this kind, we will look at experience as it develops. If it reveals the need to modify the existing approach or to adopt a different approach, I, at any rate, and I am sure my right hon. Friends, will always be willing to consider that.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): May I give a warm welcome to the White Paper? What focus has my right hon. Friend given to solvent abuse, given that half a million children in this country experiment with solvents, of whom a proportion, sadly, go on to use soft drugs?

Mr. Newton: I have made it clear that, in some cases, the drug action teams may wish to embrace other aspects of substance misuse, including misuse of solvents. We do not wish to prevent or discourage that exercise. I hope that my hon. Friend was encouraged by the publication on 20 April of the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs report about solvent abuse. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade is now taking action with regard to one very important recommendation, and is establishing an industry-led forum to consider ways in which producers can ensure that their products are less liable to be misused.

Ms Ann Coffey (Stockport): I am a little concerned about the resourcing of the drugs strategy. The Leader of the House has already said that no new money will be available for the police, although he is asking the police to do a considerable amount of work with the community, which will have an associated cost in police time. The Leader of the House mentioned that £8.8 million will be available in the next three years to support local action on drugs. That amounts to about £2.9 million per year, which does not seem very much.

We already have a drug action team in Stockport, but we do not have the resources to back it up. How will the money be allocated? Will there be bids for it as part of a "drug challenge"—an analogy of city challenge—or will the money be allocated according to need? If it is to be allocated by the latter method, I think that the Leader of the House will discover that the money is not sufficient to meet need in the community.

Mr. Newton: As far as resources in Scotland are concerned, the hon. Lady must obviously direct her questions to the Secretary of State. [HON. MEMBERS: "It is not Scotland."] I misheard the hon. Lady; she may disregard that comment.

As to resources for England, I have already said that the Government are spending more than £500 million in the drugs area each year. In today's statement, I announced a total additional resource of slightly more than £13 million—that is £5.9 million for education, £1 million for health and £4.6 million for prisons, which makes a total of £11.5 million.

To that sum is added just under £2 million from the £8.8 million that I announced over three years for the drug action teams. The £8.8 million is directed at establishing and supporting—particularly administratively—the drug action teams. They in turn will be concerned with many projects that relate to other flows of funding out of the £500 million to which I referred.

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, as 60 per cent. of all crime is said to be drug-related, the measures that he has proposed today will reduce crime substantially, particularly among the young? Does he also agree that the need to restrain the importation of drugs makes it all the more necessary to maintain our border controls, whatever anyone else in Europe may demand of us?

Mr. Newton: I agree with my hon. and learned Friend. He will know that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said clearly on many occasions that we stand firm on the question of border controls.

I hope that the measures that we have announced today will contribute to a reduction in drug-related crime. That is what they are intended to do, and I remind my hon. and learned Friend that the first of the equal priorities to which I referred was ensuring that communities are safe from drug-related crime.

Mr. Mike O'Brien (Warwickshire, North): Will the Leader of the House confirm that the amount of money that the Government are offering under the drugs strategy equates with the profit from perhaps one good drugs haul?

[Mr. Mike O'Brien]

How will the Warwickshire police implement that strategy when the size of its force has been cut by 50 police officers this year?

I agree that we need a clear policy in this area, and that we must monitor it closely. However, the Government have failed to implement Judge Tumim's recommendations concerning drug dealers and gangs in prison—in fact, he has criticised the Government on that issue in the last day or so. How can we be confident that the Government will implement this policy?

Mr. Newton: We are going over slightly old ground. I have already referred to the increase in general police resources that my right hon. and learned Friend announced at the time of the public expenditure round late last year. I will not try to add to those comments.

So far as Judge Tumim's report is concerned, I think that the hon. Member is straining a little. My right hon. and learned Friend has clearly acted in advance of Judge Tumim's report to tackle the problems to which it refers.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Will the Leader of the House recognise that if we are concerned about the link between drug use and crime, the very high price of highly addictive drugs such as heroin and crack cocaine are more important than the arguments about cannabis, unpalatable though that may be to hon. Members of both sides of the House?

In particular, the right hon. Gentleman should seriously consider those examples where the link between money and purchasing of drugs has been broken by prescribing drugs such as heroin, perfectly acceptably, under the national health service. Will he take that as an example of how to deal with heroin addicts in a way in which they are prepared to be dealt rather than through exhortations, which will not work?

Mr. Newton: I have referred several times to the review of the effectiveness of treatment services, which include a number of pilot projects that deal with, for example, methadone substitution. I do not think that any of us can be certain that we know all the answers in this field. The White Paper takes us forward. I hope that the effectiveness review will take us forward on that front as well.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

4.15 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker, of which I gave you notice. I wonder whether I could ask you to reflect on the powers of Parliament in respect of the issuing by the Executive of public interest immunity certificates, the so-called gagging orders. As you know, Ministers issue such orders from time to time, and it is for judges to decide whether they are upheld in the courts.

Could you reflect and subsequently clarify in a ruling whether departmental Select Committees now have powers to ask any Minister who issues such a certificate to justify that action, and, in cases that involve national security, whether those rights extend to the Intelligence and Security Committee?

Finally, Madam Speaker, as the Scott inquiry, which would not have been established had not a judge refused to uphold a series of such gagging orders, will report shortly and is likely to comment on the use of such certificates, such a ruling from you would be much appreciated by all those who wish to defend the rights of Parliament in relation to the Executive.

Madam Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me notice of his point of order. I have had an opportunity to reflect on the matter about which he wrote to me. His concern relates to the powers of Select Committees of the House. I must advise him that such matters are not in the hands of the Speaker.

War Widows and Pensioners (Equal Treatment)

4.17 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to end discrimination and to review the effect of differential treatment of war disablement and war widows' pensions; to bring forward the means for equal treatment; and for connected purposes.

Last Friday, Madam Speaker, you led this House in our commemoration in Westminster Hall of those who served the country in the last war. Over the weekend, many hon. Members will have attended the services, commemorations and events and the two-minutes silence to pay tribute to those who died or were bereaved.

Today, I seek leave, with very welcome support from both sides of the House, to introduce a Bill that seeks to deal with some of the remaining discrimination and unfairness that is suffered by those who were alive in the last war or who are the widows of those who served, and who now feel that they are being unfairly treated by the state.

In early-day motion 186, the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) draws attention to the concerns of that group of our community. That early-day motion has attracted over 240 signatures. I understand that nearly 50 other hon. Members, who do not normally sign early-day motions, have written to the Officers Pensions Society expressing their unequivocal support, and that there are getting on for 100 Government Members who support the proposals.

My Bill contains four matters that I hope that the Government will consider if the House allows the Bill to continue.

First, if somebody receives a war pension, where he lives will determine whether it is regarded or disregarded for the purpose of council tax and housing benefit. There is a statutory disregard of £10, and local authorities have the discretion to decide whether to disregard further. That does not apply in Scotland and Northern Ireland, where there is a full disregard for all war pensioners.

The only fair system that would ensure that people were not penalised by a decision made by their local authority that was dependent on entirely other factors would be a centrally regulated system. There should be total disregard for all war pensioners in relation to their council tax and housing benefit.

The bill for such a system would be small. My information is that not 60 per cent. but almost 90 per cent. of local authorities have already introduced some such system. The best calculation of additional public expenditure shows that it would require less than £2 million more to ensure that all our war veterans and war widows are treated equally.

Secondly, if someone has served in the war, receives a war pension and is injured, his war pension may disentitle him from legal aid when pursuing any action arising from his war injury. That matter has been pursued by the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), who has taken it up with the Lord Chancellor. It causes great unhappiness and discontent among people who gave their service, have been injured and are rightfully entitled to pursue their legal remedies. It seems the grossest injustice for them to be told that, because they have served and have been given by the state a reward for their service, they are unable to receive legal aid.

The third and fourth issues would require the Government to look at two subjects on which they have made no concessions, which arose during debates on the Pensions Bill in the other place and on Second Reading, and which the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) specifically mentioned. Other hon. Members and I welcome the concession by the Secretary of State for Social Security in relation to the new clause on second bereavement or divorce introduced in the other place. That leaves two categories of people who are still treated unfairly.

There are about 2,000 widows who, if they remarry, will lose their entitlements. Whether they become divorced again or bereaved or their marriage breaks down, they cannot claim what was intended to be a war service entitlement. The evidence of those who deal with the issue all the time—the War Widows Association and services associations—shows that probably only one in 100 widows have remarried. The widows would rather not remarry. Some of them cohabit—sometimes they are forced to do so—rather than lose financially as a result of remarriage.

The cost of introducing a system to deal with the problem would probably be very small, and could even benefit the Treasury. Such a system would be much fairer on those involved. In 1989, the then Secretary of State for Defence, the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King), accepted that the pension entitlement had been paid for by such people, who had earned their rights. It is anomalous that, whereas all other pension schemes, including ones in this place, give people a right which they retain for as long as they are widows, the war widows pension scheme, unusually, excludes those with a war service background.

The last category of people who are unfairly treated are those who married subsequent to the war service of their husbands. If someone served in the war and married later, his widow cannot take the pension that he earned and nobody else has inherited.

Every one of the 14 comparable armed forces schemes makes a pension provision for widows of post-retirement marriages.

The widows of Members of Parliament who married those Members of Parliament after their retirement receive the pension that their former husbands earned as a result of their service, yet the widows of service men who die before the beginning of the next century will be eligible for only a fraction of the service widows' pension, and the widows of service men who died before 1978 currently receive no pension at all.

We gave, rightly and properly, fine words of tribute over the weekend. There are a small and diminishing group of people who now want us to live up to what we say about the importance of what they did by what we do. It is shameful that, 50 years later, we as a state are unwilling to pay that small price.

I hope that Ministers will concede those matters as a result of the Bill, in the context of other Bills, or, at the latest, in the Queen's Speech, the Budget and the social security statement in the autumn. There is overwhelming support for the proposal. This is a great injustice, and the price we would require the state to pay to remedy it is minute compared with the service for which those people are entitled to their proper reward.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Simon Hughes, Mr. James Molyneaux, Mr. Alfred Morris, Mrs. Margaret Ewing, Mr. Dafydd Wigley, Mr. Winston Churchill, Mr. David Alton, Mrs. Edwina Currie, Mr. Nicholas Winterton, Mr. Andrew Mackinlay and Mrs. Diana Maddock.

WAR WIDOWS AND PENSIONERS (EQUAL TREATMENT)

Mr. Simon Hughes accordingly presented a Bill to end discrimination and to review the effect of differential treatment of war disablement and war widows' pensions; to bring forward the means for equal treatment; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 14 July, and to be printed. [Bill 120.]

Opposition Day

[11TH ALLOTTED DAY]

National Health Service (London)

Madam Speaker: I must tell the House that I have selected the amendment standing in the name of the Prime Minister. I have had to limit Back-Bench Members' speeches to 10 minutes throughout the debate. I hope that Front-Bench Members will exercise some voluntary restraint in their remarks, as, my researches show that 30 Back-Bench Members seek to speak.

4.26 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): I beg to move,

That this House notes the public's concern over the closure of accident and emergency facilities in London, the reduction in numbers of intensive care, general medical and surgical beds, and the now widely-challenged assumptions that underpin the Tomlinson Report; and calls on the Secretary of State for Health to halt the withdrawal of hospital services and to moderate the pace of change in the NHS across London with particular reference to St. Bartholomew's, Edgware, Guy's and Brook hospitals and to refrain from allowing any further bed losses or service withdrawals, until she has re-examined the case for change and reported her conclusions to this House.

The Secretary of State has called into question the need for a debate today on the future of London's health service, but two simple examples explain why we do not share her view. When she announced the closure of the accident and emergency department at Edgware general hospital, she said that many of its patients would be treated instead at other hospitals, of which one was Northwick Park. Within the week, a terminally ill cancer patient, Maggie Curtin, was left in pain for nine hours on a trolley in that hospital, in which, the day after, her husband found her dead in bed. The Secretary of State deems Northwick Park able to cope with the extra work load that will come its way when Edgware is closed, yet clearly it is already a hospital in which staff and resources are under intense pressure.

When Bart's accident and emergency department closed, we were told that patients would go elsewhere, particularly to the Homerton. Before that closure, it was pointed out that the Homerton itself had had to stop taking admissions on no fewer than 10 occasions in the period during which Bart's A and E department was at risk because it could not cope with the existing pressure. Nevertheless, the closure went ahead.

Yesterday, in both radio and newspaper interviews, the Secretary of State demanded to know why my colleagues were not praising the Homerton and the investment there. She continued to stress that theme all day long—long after she must have become aware that the accident and emergency unit at that hospital had been closed for 39 hours because it could not take any other admissions, and that a motor cyclist who had had an accident 200 yards from the hospital had to be sent elsewhere.

Nor are those isolated examples. At 10.15 this morning, London's emergency bed service told us that no fewer than 13 London hospitals are at present restricting admissions because of the pressure on their facilities, yet the Secretary of State says that there is no need for a debate in which we can allow hon. Members to explore the nature and the consequences of the Government's decisions about London health care in greater depth than could ever be possible in the aftermath of a statement, when each Member is allowed only one question.

In the most recent debate on London's health, the Opposition called on the Secretary of State to reconsider the proposals initially put out for consultation in the light not only of the responses to that consultation, but of further evidence that was not available when the initial decisions were made. We drew attention to potentially dramatic changes that were still in the pipeline. For example, special health authority hospitals had been subject to the full operation of the internal market for only a month, so no one knew what the effect would be on those hospitals and the number of beds that they could sustain.

There is nothing to suggest that the Secretary of State has heeded either that further evidence or the outcome of the consultation. That is why our motion calls on her "to halt the withdrawal of hospital services and to moderate the pace of change . . . and to refrain from allowing any further bed losses or service withdrawals, until she has re-examined the case for change and reported her conclusions to this House."

Those are the views of millions of Londoners who are not convinced by the Government's case and who are calling for those decisions to be genuinely reviewed and reassessed.

We all know that many hon. Members on both sides of the House are deeply uneasy about whether the Government are pursuing the right course. Not all of them have even suggested that they will abstain or vote against the Government tonight, but many of them would be secretly relieved if there were some way to halt the juggernaut that may be carrying them to destruction along with London's health service.

In the debate that we initiated in February before the Secretary of State's announcement, it was noteworthy how many Conservative Members, having ritually abused the Labour party, expressed considerable concern about what was happening in their constituencies. I hope that they are under no illusions about which part of their speeches the Secretary of State took into account. The right hon. Lady has given too much evidence that her ears and her mind are closed to the voices of those whose opinions she does not share.

In that debate, the Secretary of State said that she welcomed the chance to set out her policy for London and the rationale behind it. Frankly, I doubt that. If there is one outstanding characteristic of her tenure at the Department of Health, it is that she has never come to the House of her own volition to advance, explain or defend in debate the policies that she claims are without need of amendment.

As recently as the weekend, the right hon. Lady said that there would be no concessions on the proposals that she announced finally and reluctantly to the House a month ago; although faced with debate and potential defeat, she is now said to be willing to offer some amelioration to the proposals that she believed so recently to be beyond the possibility of improvement.

Therefore, Conservative Members can be in no doubt that any announcement of change today should be carefully scrutinised for its real impact—being designed to get the Secretary of State off the hook for a few hours while leaving their constituents firmly on the hook in the years ahead.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: If the hon. Gentleman's intervention is very brief and does more than reaffirm his loyalty to the Government's health policy, of which I hope his constituents are in no doubt.

Mr. Hayes: As an hon. Member whose constituency has been through the trauma of the closure of two accident and emergency units in West Essex health authority, I know that the closures were deeply unpopular at the time. There were burning effigies in the streets. Harlow has been through that and we now have a £10 million accident and emergency unit that will serve the area well. With her hand on her heart, never mind the party politicking, does not the right hon. Lady accept that, despite all the medical evidence, a review of a review of a review will not help one single patient?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I hope that other interventions will not be as long.

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman has not done himself or his colleagues any service. Under the pressure of time, I shall be reluctant to give way again to an hon. Member who makes the same point that he made in the previous debate.

I do not know what the hon. Gentleman's point is. We are discussing today proposals for other constituencies and other hospitals without any suggestion that the impact of those changes will be addressed in the way in which he claims it was in his locality.

There have been long-standing assumptions about London—that it received a disproportionate amount of money for health care and had a disproportionate number of hospitals and beds, which created problems that had to be addressed. Far-reaching change has already occurred. The number of medical schools was formerly nine but is now five. No fewer than 83 London hospitals have closed since this Government came to power in 1979. The total number of NHS beds in London has halved—the number of acute beds has almost halved and the number of non-acute beds has more than halved. There is no dispute among the experts that more beds have been lost since the Tomlinson report.

There has been a slightly unseemly dispute between Professor Jarman and the Department over whether all the beds that Tomlinson recommended should go have gone. I say unseemly because, in the Department's determination to produce different figures, it has taken a different scope of closures and a different time scale. However, there seems little doubt from the most recent Library figures that almost 2,500 beds have gone from the figures on which Tomlinson made his recommendations.

Some people assume that those bed losses in London are a good thing because they are bound to advantage other parts of the United Kingdom. Those happy optimists overlook the fact that what is happening in London is happening elsewhere. The process of change is the same and often just as damaging, whether in cities or rural areas. Decisions are taken in private, with nominal consultation, if any. The end result in every part of Britain is that the pattern of care delivery is changing without local people being fully involved and feeling that they have a say.

[Mrs. Beckett]

Under the present Government, consultation is a word. At most, it is a formal process that the Government endure, usually without much grace. It is not a process during which the Government listen.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): When I was elected in 1983, my local hospital had been neglected by successive Governments for many years, and had been starved of funds as a result of the disproportionate amount of money going to London. Today, my constituency has £24 million-worth of new hospital, which will treat my constituents on site instead of them having to travel to London. I commend the actions of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Mrs. Beckett: I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman is saying. Is he saying that because there have been improvements in health care provision in his constituency, which we all welcome, health care in London should be destroyed? Is that what he is saying? That is the reality of what is beginning to happen under Government policies.

In our earlier debate, we sought to persuade the Secretary of State to heed not only the further evidence accumulated but response to the consultation process. Hon. Members on both sides of the House sought from the right hon. Lady measured consideration and a measured response. What happened? The conclusions of South Thames regional health authority reached the Department of Health on 16 March. Those of North Thames regional health authority were submitted as recently as 23 March.

The Secretary of State announced her decision on 4 April. That was in stark contrast to the right hon. Lady's response to the report of the clinical standards advisory group on urgent admissions to United Kingdom hospitals, which apparently did not recommend proposals to the Secretary of State's taste. She considered that report for 13 months before she even published it, whereas the closures were agreed after only seven to 10 days.

The right hon. Lady's own recommendations following those proposals seemed to be no more than a ringing endorsement of what was, in all its essentials, the answer of which she first thought. It is a wonder that she did not introduce her recommendations with the immortal words, "Here's one I prepared earlier."

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): The right hon. Lady's call for a measured response is really a call for procrastination. She is one of the few Labour Members who have served in government. Has she forgotten that that involves making hard choices? Will she acknowledge that throughout this century, a series of reports have made the case for the reorganisation of London's hospital provision? Does she accept that there is widespread admiration for my right hon. Friend's courage in grasping this nettle?

Mrs. Beckett: Yes, I do remember what it is like to make hard choices, and I also well recall that the making of hard choices involves a great deal more than simply accepting proposals that are put before one. The making of hard choices involves exercising a political judgment and saying sometimes, to those who come forward with proposals, "Yes, there is an admirable case in logic for some of what you say, but it is not the right way to proceed." That is what politicians are paid for.

What the Secretary of State has announced are decisions that could irreversibly affect, among other things, the future of Bart's—an institution which, for almost 900 years, has served the people of London. That is not a reason for saving Bart's. If the people it served had all moved away, if people had ceased to travel in their tens of thousands into that area to work, if it had lacked investment to keep it up to date or had lost the teams of clinicians to make it great, no matter for how many hundreds of years it had existed, its future would be bound to come into question. But that is not the position.

I am not entirely sure that I know quite how to express what I am about to try to say to the Secretary of State. We all know—

The Minister for Health (Mr. Gerald Malone): Do not say it, then.

Mrs. Beckett: This is not a matter for flippancy, and I have not finished with the hon. Gentleman yet, either.

We all know that people's health is bound up with external factors. Poverty, housing conditions and, above all, stress and insecurity, play a large part in affecting their need for health care. Bart's serves some of the most deprived areas of London. The people who live in those communities already face high levels of stress and insecurity. The removal of an institution on which, for generation after generation, they have depended for health care is bound to add to that insecurity. The Secretary of State is not even listening.

The removal of that institution is bound to add to that insecurity. It is bound to have a deep effect on people's emotions in ways that probably neither I nor the Secretary of State—we have not shared that experience—can fully understand. I see no sign at all that the Secretary of State has weighed any of those matters in the balance.

According to the King's Fund, whose initial report promoted the most recent round of changes, what is now needed in London is a comprehensive and full reassessment of London's health needs and provision. I remind the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes), who seems to think that none of this needs to be reconsidered, that they are the people who started the most recent process and they now say that it needs a reassessment.

The Secretary of State still talks as if none of that is needed. Her case is that it is unnecessary because the Government are putting money into primary and community health services in London. But that is as if the investment, which we support, had already addressed and dealt with the continuing problems to which the King's Fund is drawing attention.

But in trying to assess the progress of that investment, the King's Fund said:

"there has been no systematic attempt so far to gather and evaluate the evidence of the impact of the government's initiatives in London. In fact, a detailed comprehensive description of the kind of projects which have been supported is not available."

In other words, neither what has been done nor the effect that those projects have had is yet known. Yet it is on the basis of those unknown projects, that unknown impact, that the decisions that we are discussing today are being made.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: I had better press on a little. If I have time later, I shall give way.

The information that is available is not reassuring. Although building up primary care means more than simply increasing the number of general practitioners, it would appear that the hard fact is that the number of GPs in London is falling and that there remain major difficulties in recruitment. For that reason, the Department has been working with the British Medical Association on a package of proposals to encourage recruitment in London. I understand that the Secretary of State has had those proposals for a year without doing anything about them.

Of the GPs who are working in London, a BMA survey showed that 65 per cent. disapproved of the Government's proposals as detrimental. They are calling—the people who are supposed to be delivering the primary health care development that the Secretary of State says will remove the need for these beds—for an increase in the number of hospital beds.

Waiting lists in London are higher than they were a year ago. Even the figures for the last quarter alone, announced by the Secretary of State today, do not show a reduction in the area that covers London. They show a total waiting list of more than 1 million in the south-east as a whole.

London is caught in a vicious spiral, facing the breakdown of an integrated service. Accident and emergency departments are being forced to absorb the pressure as best they can. Increased pressure on A and E departments means more emergency admissions; more emergency admissions mean the cancellation of an increased number of scheduled admissions; those whose admissions are cancelled end up in the A and E department in need of emergency admission—and so it goes on.

According to Casualty Watch, from the Greater London Association of Community Health Councils, in Enfield the A and E department has sometimes been so busy and so full that even people injured in road traffic accidents have had to be seen in the minor injuries department, which is neither staffed nor equipped to deal with such cases. In Newham, children wait for hours for operating theatres to become available. In Redbridge and Waltham Forest, waiting lists are probably the longest in the country. There were more than 10,000 people on the Redbridge waiting list in 1993; by January this year, the figure had risen to nearly 15,000—an increase of 46 per cent.

The London ambulance service faces severe difficulties in coping with a 10 per cent. increase in accident and emergency work. Consequently, every London citizen faced with a crisis that requires the ambulance service must deal with the fact that it can achieve only a 74 per cent. response rate within the prescribed standard.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: If I am going to give way, I shall give way to the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes).

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: The right hon. Lady quoted some of the reports that have been produced. Many reports have been produced about the health service in London throughout the century. Given that all the scientific evidence and all the studies of accident and emergency services have concluded that the reorganisation announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would produce a better service and save lives, why does the right hon. Lady lack the political courage to back what my right hon. Friend is doing?

Mrs. Beckett: I have no idea on what evidence the hon. Gentleman bases his assertion, but the evidence available to me suggests that he is simply wrong.

At the beginning of the debate, I referred to the closure this week of Homerton hospital. According to the London ambulance service, that is the second occasion on which the hospital has been closed to "blue calls" since the beginning of April. On five occasions during the past five months, different hospitals have advised the service that they are closed to "blue calls", including St. Helier hospital, which was closed for 38 hours in January.

Ministers know that those are not isolated problems, that they are occurring without a winter epidemic and that they are grave. Only today my office received information about two separate and disparate cases that highlight public concern. Yesterday Mrs. Edith Berry was taken to West Middlesex hospital. Her kidneys were not functioning properly, and Parkinson's disease was diagnosed. A bed was finally found for her at 1.30 this afternoon, 20 hours after she was taken to casualty.

To underline our contention that the problems are widespread and exist not only in London, Mrs. Helen Kime has sent me a copy of a letter that she sent to the Minister of State, whose constituency contains Winchester hospital. She writes:

"On Monday evening"— that is, Monday of this week—

"at 7.00 pm . . . we took a friend with a badly broken arm to the casualty department at Winchester general hospital. He was admitted to the Taunton ward and put on the list for the operating theatre the next day.

As I write this letter at 11.00 on Wednesday May 10th, 40 hours after his admission, his arm has still not been set.

He was left without food or water. He was not washed.

If he was a dog, the hospital would be reported to the RSPCA."

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): What has that to do with London?

Mrs. Beckett: In a not so sotto voce intervention, the hon. Lady asks what that has to do with London. I have pointed out to the hon. Lady and people like her that those problems do not only exist in London, although we are focusing on London's problems today, and that London cannot be sacrificed because every other area in the country will benefit; every area is experiencing the same difficulties.

Against that background, what are the Secretary of State's proposals, particularly for London? She proposes to close world-famous hospitals, and to take even more beds out of use. Let us look at Guy's, because, apart from anything else, it illustrates the need to scrutinise all that the Secretary of State says today very carefully.

A few weeks ago, the Secretary of State said that Guy's accident and emergency department would not be closed for some years, that Philip Harris house would be used "for most purposes for which it was intended" and that Guy's would continue to "provide a wide range of specialist and local hospital services."

I am sure that many of those who heard that announcement thought that it meant that Guy's would be saved as they now know it. Answers to parliamentary questions that I have tabled show, however, that in-patient beds at Guy's will be cut from 702 to 112.

[Mrs. Beckett]

The transfer of services to St. Thomas's will not apparently be possible without even more rebuild, expense and disruption to clinical services than was originally suggested. It will still leave empty eight floors of Guy's tower and all 11 floors of New Guy's house, both recently built and in clinical use. I understand that, even if all the developments required to replace at St. Thomas's facilities provided at Guy's were carried through, available space for clinical services would be less than existing space.

Estimates of the cost of that transfer are in excess of £200 million. Suggestions seem to be made that much of that money will come from private sources. Those who make that investment will no doubt expect a return, yet that investment is being made in large part to replace facilities that already exist. Despite what the Secretary of State said last month, it still appears that 18 state-of-the-art intensive care beds are among the facilities provided in Philip Harris house which will be lost. That is on top of the loss of up to 31 existing intensive care beds at Guy's, when everyone knows that there is intense pressure on such beds in London as a whole.

In many ways, that aspect of the proposals symbolises the Secretary of State's failure. When Philip Harris house is handed over, it will include 12 surgical and six medical intensive beds, which, according to contract, will have been equipped with all the most modern purpose-built facilities and equipment. Such beds are needed. Intensive care beds are under pressure everywhere in London, yet the Secretary of State intends to authorise the spending of millions of pounds of public money to rip out and destroy those facilities so that they can be replaced by something else. No matter what the blueprint is to which she is working, and no matter who the experts are who drew up the blueprint, however long ago it was, that makes absolutely no sense.

There is concern about the practical and financial impact of the proposals for Edgware hospital. The money allocated to build up Barnet hospital is, I understand, sufficient for the first third of redevelopment, but London Health Emergency estimates that the Barnet project needs to be at least two thirds completed before it will be practical even to consider going ahead with the proposals for Edgware. That is apart from the question of redeveloping and making changes in transport patterns in the region, to which Conservative Members have drawn attention.

My chief criticism of the Secretary of State is that a pattern runs through all the proposals and all the problems that the Government create. They anticipate the effect of the change that they have decided is desirable. They presume that what they expect will happen, and that the unexpected will either not arise or be insignificant. When the unexpected does happen, such as the increase in emergency admissions, they carry on regardless.

Sir John Gorst (Hendon, North): Surely the logic of the right hon. Lady's argument is not, as she has already stated, that there should be a pause or a review, but that the closures to which she has referred should be reversed completely and, in my view, for all time.

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman will no doubt make his case and that of some of his hon. Friends, but unless the Secretary of State is made to realise the depth of concern about the whole range of her proposals, some irreversible changes will take place. It may or may not be in the area that affects the hon. Gentleman's constituency, or in the constituency of the right hon. Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke), who represents Bart's, but irreversible change will take place. We believe that no such change should take place without review.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: I cannot. I am sorry. I would have given way to the hon. Gentleman, but time is not on my side.

The Government assumed that the new computer system for the London ambulance service would work as planned and they pushed ahead with its implementation. Across the country, day case surgery increases and, as a result of technical change, there is increased throughput of patients, but either no allowance or insufficient allowance is made for the knock-on effects, for the fact that facilities to resolve the problems of people receiving day case surgery are all too often inadequate or non-existent, and for the fact that speedier discharge of in-patients means far greater pressure on wards as everyone still in hospital is at the peak of their need for care and attention.

Beds in psychiatric hospitals have been taken out of use in huge numbers. Over-ambitious anticipation of reduced levels of need has meant that even though the number of beds in the private sector has increased, there is still well above 100 per cent. occupancy in all too many cases. Psychiatrists despair that the facilities required to help them cope with those with a mental disorder no longer exist on a level to meet the need. What is true in all those areas of policy is especially true in spades of the funding of primary care in London.

The Secretary of State's chief argument for the reduction in hospital beds is that the Government assume what almost nobody else now takes for granted—that investment in primary care will reduce the demand for hospital beds. In fact, there is a growing suspicion that by revealing unmet need, it will actually increase the demand.

What no one doubts is that the public have lost confidence in this Government's handling of the NHS—something for which the Secretary of State blames everybody but herself. The public have lost confidence in the Government's competence, their good faith and their ability to listen.

One of the Secretary of State's colleagues recently spoke of her family's history in terms that, for me, evoked the 1914 war rather than the more recent conflict. Her colleague spoke of her in family tradition marching towards the gunfire. I thought that analogy to be more than a little misconceived. If there is a parallel with the experience of that conflict, it is that the Secretary of State, far from being a brave subaltern or even one of the poor bloody infantry marching towards the guns, is the general, safely back at headquarters ploughing on with a doomed strategy and refusing to take any notice of the fact that there is any alternative.

The right hon. Lady claims to have a mailbag full of correspondence supporting her proposed changes to London's health service. However, when we tabled a parliamentary question asking what percentage that was of the total correspondence that she received on the changes, I am afraid she told us that the figures were not available. It probably would not matter if they were, because I am beginning to think that the right hon. Lady's outstanding political characteristic is that she hears only what she wants to hear. Her ears are as closed to other voices as her mind is to other opinions.

I know that many hon. Members in the House today do not support the policies that the Secretary of State is advocating and that if there were a free vote, she would be defeated. Those who do not support her proposals must weigh seriously whether they should support her in the Lobby tonight. She will take no heed—and I suspect that the Government will take no heed—of measured words of caution or of anxieties, no matter how deep, how sincere or how seriously expressed.

If the House wishes to send a message that even the Secretary of State cannot misinterpret or misunderstand, that message must be clear. It must be bold. It must be defeat.

4.57 pm

The Secretary of State for Health (Mrs. Virginia Bottomley): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'noting that the problems of London's health service have been the subject of at least 20 reports in the last 80 years, all of which have come to broadly similar conclusions, believes that a better service for patients lies in implementing decisions and not a further review; commends the Government for its record in investing in modern hospitals, first class specialist centres and primary care and for its determination to take necessary decisions in the long term interest of the Capital's health service and the people of London; and calls on the Government to ensure that the decisions are now carefully carried forward taking due account of concerns that they should be properly paced so that patients continue to benefit from new and better services before old ones close.'.

This is a serious debate and a matter of great importance and consequence. It is a subject of, frequently, great conviction and of great emotion, not only for my hon. Friends but, I accept, for Opposition Members and for those whom we serve in constituencies throughout the land. I believe that our task is to achieve a health service worthy of our capital city for the next century.

"To argue merely for the status quo is a grave disservice to the future well being of the health service in London."

The right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) will recognise—or at least she should recognise—those words not as my words, but as those of her immediate predecessor.

Sadly, as the right hon. Lady's speech today has shown, the Labour party has gone downhill since then. What is remarkable about the so-called new party is how it has scuttled away from the sound consensus on the need for change in London's national health service. The right hon. Lady's moratorium is a cop-out. Dithering in Opposition shows why her party would be a disaster in Government. This debate is a cynical and opportunistic piece of parliamentary gamesmanship, and once again shows beyond doubt that Labour will always put party politics before the nation's interests.

Sir John Gorst rose—

Hon. Members: Give way. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I wish to hear the Secretary of State. Does she wish to give way?

Mrs. Bottomley: In a minute.

Governments must rise above such tactics. Our task is to take the necessary decisions that the national interest demands. There are no instant answers or scratch-card solutions. It is not a question of a bit more money here or a review there. Those are smoke-screens thrown up by the Labour party to disguise the real questions at the heart of the debate.

Do we want London to continue to enjoy an outstanding national and international reputation for service, teaching and research, or are we to submit to a second-class service? Do we want Londoners to have the most modern and advanced hospitals, or is it more important to preserve every building and site even when they are outdated and ill suited to today's needs? Do we want to bring general practitioners and community health services up to the standards of the best, or is the current patchwork a price worth paying to maintain the hospitals status quo?

These issues have been debated endlessly:

"For 30 years, reports have been written and schemes put forward for improving medical care and teaching . . . Everyone who has studied the problems accepts that specialist services are duplicated, too few patients live near the sites in inner London and those in outer London are deprived. Everyone agrees that the first priority is to improve primary care and help GPs."

Those were not my words but those of Lord Annan, a distinguished former vice-chancellor of London university. Lord Annan speaks for many.

I pay tribute to the many doctors, nurses, scientists, academics, commentators, the independent specialty review members, the research team members and the patient groups who have prepared and argued the case for change. They believe that the time has come for the Government to stand firm in London's interests. They speak with a powerful and authoritative voice which we all must hear. They believe that we must build for the future, rather than remain fossilised in the past.

It is not just the distinguished academics and eminent doctors who have been calling for change. Those closest to patients know that the services in London are not good enough. We must address change to make sure that we have a capital health service for the people of tomorrow.

Sir John Gorst: I wish to refer to a point that my right hon. Friend made earlier in her speech, when she described the tabling of this debate as opportunism by the Opposition. May I inform her that I sought from the Leader of the House an opportunity for such a debate and remind her that I wish to register my vote against these proposals?

Mrs. Bottomley: I accept my hon. Friend's constituency interest, and I shall say more about the situation in Edgware and Barnet later in my speech.

The Labour party knows full well that, if it ever pretends to be a party of government, addressing change in London is necessary. Many Labour Members are seeing phenomenal and unprecedented investments in their constituencies as we build hospitals near to where people live. For them, today's debate is a piece of outright cynicism and opportunism. I repeat those words strongly.

Mrs. Beckett: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mrs. Bottomley: No, wait. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The House knows full well that is up to a Minister or any Member who has the Floor to decide whether to give way or not.

Mrs. Bottomley rose—

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Whatever gibberish the Secretary of State wishes to propound today, should she not be called to order? Is there not a long-established tradition in the House—I have been in the House longer than the Secretary of State—that when the leading speaker from the Opposition gets up, the Secretary of State sits down?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman may have been here for a long time, but he has still not grasped the point.

Mrs. Bottomley: I shall give way to the right hon. Member for Derby, South in a moment, but I want to get on a little further in my speech first.

There are difficulties and problems, and it is well understood that hon. Members feel close to their constituents and the institutions which have served them over many years. It is inevitable that when we are faced with such complex and fundamental change, great sensitivity is necessary in handling the delivery of that change. But the difficulties and the problems make the case for change even stronger.

The stories and accounts that we have heard of the difficulties in hospitals are precisely because there are many separate units instead of larger units, which are better managed and which co-operate better in handling the ebbs and flows of health care more effectively. Report after report makes the point that we must deliver a health service which is right for the future, and not a service that was right for the past.

Mrs. Beckett: The Secretary of State has repeated today what she has said repeatedly in the past few days on radio and television. She has said that there is something cynical and opportunistic about the Opposition tabling the debate. As her hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North (Sir. J. Gorst) reminded her, we called on the Secretary of State to provide a debate during which the House could thoroughly assess and thrash out the consequences of the proposals. We have called on her to do that many times in the past, and it is a demand that she has consistently refused.

If the Secretary of State thinks that it is not the purpose of Members of this House or members of Her Majesty's Opposition to provide an opportunity for proposals of this magnitude to be assessed, debated and discussed by people of different points of view, she does not belong in the House at all. That is what we are here for.

Mrs. Bottomley: I totally accept that the Labour party is the natural party of opposition. It constantly criticises and interprets developments in a cynical fashion, but never has any constructive proposals. Those of us who are now seeing the third health spokesman for the Labour party are still waiting for a policy from any of them. "A moratorium", "out to consultation" and "another review" is what we hear. The Labour party does not want to offend anybody, and it never says yes or no. That is always the way forward for the Labour party.

The right hon. Member for Derby, South responded to an intervention from my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North in that way—she said neither yes or no. The Labour party will say anything to try to achieve power ruthlessly and cynically.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mrs. Bottomley: I intend to proceed.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Bottomley: In a moment.

The change must be handled sensitively and it must be properly paced, but there is no serious challenge to the direction of travel. "Go carefully," we are told, "but do not go back".

I give my hon. Friends, Members of the House and London patients a strong assurance that there can be no going back. The issue now is not the policy, but the implementation of the policy.

It is the duty of the health service to carry out the decisions with skill, tact and perseverance if the benefits to London and the rest of the country are to come through. I have just written to the chairmen of the two Thames regions to stress precisely that message. Those chairmen, and the health authority and trust chairmen involved, will be held to account for carrying the policies through. They must explain, listen, lead and reassure staff and public alike that the changes will bring tangible and important benefits to patients. That is a message that they welcome. They are committed to working for the future, and not clinging to the past.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: My right hon. Friend will have noticed that the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) said that if there were a free vote tonight we would not vote in support of the proposals. Should not the right hon. Lady give a free vote to Opposition Members to see how her northern Labour Members vote? They do not want more money for London, but more money for the provinces.

Mrs. Bottomley: As ever, my hon. Friend is acute on matters of health policy.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): While I fully understand the views of local Members of Parliament, will the Secretary of State confirm that the over-concentration of hospitals and spending in central London inevitably mean that other areas in the region are seriously and consistently under-funded? Would it comfort the Secretary of State to know that many of us have a great deal of admiration for her courage in facing up to an issue that has been neglected for years, but only contempt for the Opposition, who pretend that the problem does not exist?

Mrs. Bottomley: I thank my hon. Friend. He represents a constituency where, in the past, constituents routinely travelled to London for care that they now receive at home. It is time to have a better balance of service and funding. London has long had many specialty hospitals, which are duplicated and fragmented and do not deliver the care that we expect for the future. We seek to achieve a balance within London and the home counties.

The result of the changes will be more modern local hospitals that are better geared to meeting the needs of Londoners today and tomorrow. For example, in Greenwich a new hospital—the Queen Elizabeth—will be available to NHS patients from August, bringing services from two other hospitals on to a better site. Neuro-sciences will transfer from the Brook to King's. Close links with the internationally respected Institute of Psychiatry will establish a truly world-class centre of excellence.

Hon. Members will know how strongly I believe that our job is to maintain not only national but international excellence in this country's research and teaching. The Brook hospital will close as it is old, cramped and ill-suited to modern health care. Incidentally, it has no "e" on the end, as the Opposition wrote in their original motion.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): My right hon. Friend will know of my concerns for the national health service in London, which I have frequently discussed with her. The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and I have often raised the issue of the London ambulance service. Is she aware that this morning I called an ambulance for a lady who collapsed before my eyes? It arrived within seven minutes and the lady was in hospital and being properly treated shortly afterwards. Will that be the future pattern for London?

Is my right hon. Friend also aware that, just a few years ago, Labour-controlled Ealing council put £500,000 on the rates of Ealing hospital and other medical or hospital institutions in Ealing, so much did they care about the health service for my constituents—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already said that interventions must be brief.

Mrs. Bottomley: My hon. Friend is right about the significant developments in the London ambulance service, which for many years has been a troubled and unsatisfactory service. We now see extremely encouraging progress: better manning and staffing arrangements, clearer leadership and, above all, a better service for the people of London, including my hon. Friend's constituents.

Ms Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): The Secretary of State will know that last year one of my constituents suffered third-degree burns to 40 per cent. of his body on a Sunday. He had to be taken to hospital in a fire engine because no ambulance was available in north-west London. When I drew that case to the attention of the Secretary of State, the letter that I received in reply led me to believe that new ambulances would be provided for that part of London. A subsequent letter has told me that the proposal to cut the ambulance service within my constituency from its present complement of eight ambulances to two is a step forward. I do not regard that as an advance and nor do my constituents.

Mrs. Bottomley: I shall look into the hon. Lady's case. I can inform her, however, that 180 new vehicles are being provided for the London ambulance service and there is a formidable programme of investment. We have long sought better management and leadership of the London ambulance service, which is one of the few services left that has not gained trust status. It is old-style NHS, not the NHS that we have been so keen to put in place.

As well as the changes that I have described, many other hospitals are being strengthened and improved. I challenge the Opposition to admit that their constituents often see the benefits. The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) is all too keen to criticise, but we rarely hear about the improvements taking place at the Royal Free hospital or the extra investment. The hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) never mentions the £2 million spent on his accident and emergency service.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Secretary of State explain why there was no elective surgery in the Whittington hospital between December and April this year? Why are 3,000 people waiting for operational appointments at the Whittington hospital when she has managed to spend so much money on improving health care in Islington by closing Bart's and the Royal Northern hospitals?

Mrs. Bottomley: Time and again, the Opposition fail to appreciate why it is so necessary to introduce change in London. Waiting times are coming down, but we need larger and better balanced units, A and E services which deliver a high quality of care, and investment in primary care. That is exactly what we are delivering.

Although we hear from the hon. Member for Dulwich (Ms Jowell) about Guy's, she never mentions what is happening at King's—the new neuro-sciences unit, liver unit and magnificent day surgery unit, and the £8 million going into the A and E services. Nor do we hear from the Opposition that by tackling the problems in London we can better help hospitals outside London, which so many of my hon. Friends are concerned about.

Sir George Gardiner (Reigate): Before my right hon. Friend leaves the subject of constituency interests and loyalties, is she aware of the great irritation felt by many patients outside London at the assumption that any serious case must be treated at a London hospital? She will be aware of all the new regional specialist centres that have been founded in recent years. Will she undertake not to seek to pacify pressure groups from London at the expense of funding for the new centres of excellence throughout the country?

Mrs. Bottomley: My hon. Friend is exactly right. What we need is a national health service which serves patients' interests but does not have its agenda dictated by the patterns of the past.

I wonder whether the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson) will speak on behalf of his constituents. Does he still want them to travel 200 miles from Plymouth to the London Chest hospital for their heart operations, or will he have the courage to admit that the changes in London will deliver a new cardiac unit in Plymouth?

The person who deserves a prize for the ultimate cynicism is the right hon. Member for Derby, South. Did we hear a word from her about the £10 million for the Derbyshire Royal infirmary? Of course not. It is the height of hypocrisy for the right hon. Lady to criticise changes in London when similar concentrations of specialist services are taking place in her constituency along with the development of community services, and her constituents are seeing the benefits.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): My right hon. Friend is right to say that Conservative Members do not need advice from the Labour party. When it was last in government, some 60 hospitals a year were wholly or significantly closed down. Does my right hon. Friend appreciate the difference in the complex arguments between central and outer London hospitals and the severe crisis that Edgware General hospital in outer London faces? If its A and E unit is closed down, Barnet General hospital and Northwick Park hospital will be too far away for ambulances to get there in time. Her suggestion of two additional ambulances is insufficient and inadequate. Will she respond to those arguments for Edgware General hospital?

Mrs. Bottomley: My hon. Friend will understand that I have already said that I hope to say more about Edgware General hospital later. I shall refer specifically to the matters that he has mentioned, but he is absolutely right about the Labour party.

The right hon. Member for Derby, South may be an endangered species, as one of the few members of her party to have served in government, but she appears to have forgotten that Government's record, in which I am not surprised that she takes little pride. Sixty hospitals closed in every year that Labour were in office. They cut nurses' pay and cut—

Mrs. Beckett: The Secretary of State has now said two things in an attack on me. The first I find extraordinary. She says that I do not welcome investment in my constituency; of course I do. But why—[Interruption.] I simply add that, when the Derbyshire Royal infirmary, to which she referred, was contacted, it asked where the £10 million was, but we shall not go into that.

I do not know why the Secretary of State should suppose that, because there has been investment in hospitals in my constituency, I should be indifferent to the problems that she is causing in London. That is a peculiar attitude to express.

Secondly, it is untrue that 60 hospitals a year closed under the most recent Labour Government. The figures show that 128 hospitals were built in five years under the most recent Labour Government, compared with 21 under the present Government.

Mrs. Bottomley: We can clarify the figures further at a later time. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] Sixty hospitals closed—[Interruption.] The hospital closure programme of the most recent Labour Government is the least of their record. What about a party that cut nurses' pay, cut doctors' pay and cut national health service spending for the only time in its history? That is what the right hon. Lady—

Mrs. Beckett: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mrs. Bottomley: No, I have given way quite enough. [HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] No, I will not.

That is what the right hon. Lady described a moment ago as exercising political judgment. Those of us who worked in the health service at that time remember what that political judgment was like: it was painful for staff and patients, and none of us wish it to be repeated.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): It is being repeated.

Mrs. Bottomley: That is interesting. The hon. Gentleman said that it is being repeated, but it was a strange use of language because there has been an enormous advance in nurses' and doctors' pay, there has been an improvement in training and, most important, we have opened—not closed, but opened—a new hospital development, on average, every week that we have been in government.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Would my right hon. Friend note that we in north-west Kent, which goes for many of the home counties, resent the fact that so many of our constituents have to travel at great inconvenience all the way into central London for treatment, where added on-costs of 40 per cent. apply? That is because resources have always been concentrated on central London. If my right hon. Friend presses on and releases resources to improve the type of centres to which my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Sir G. Gardiner) referred, and Darenth Park hospital in my constituency, she will have support for putting health care where people actually live.

Mrs. Bottomley: I share my hon. Friend's opinions, but it is important that the specialty services which remain in London—the tertiary services—should become even greater centres of excellence.

The dilemma is that, as fewer patients come to London, for all the understandable reasons, because of the massive building programme that we have established throughout the home counties, when they do come to London they will expect a level of care and a quality of expertise that is among the absolute best. Only by bringing those specialty services together shall we achieve that excellence. That is what the specialty review said. That is what the academics and the researchers said time and again. That is the reason why we have received such strong support for those proposals from the leaders of the profession, especially those who mind about excellence, not only for the present century, but for the century ahead.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mrs. Bottomley: I will not.

Before I leave the subject of the record of the right hon. Member for Derby, South, it is irresistible for me to remind the House about the cuts over which we have indeed presided—the cuts in waiting times. Five years ago, before our reforms, there were 200,000 one-year waiters in the country. It is interesting that the Labour party sneers when it talks about waiting times because, if one asks people what they think about the national health service, time and again they say that they cannot fault the care that they had, but that they waited too long. We have consistently made waiting time a priority. Yesterday we announced that, instead of 200,000 one-year waiters, we now have fewer than 32,000. That is a splendid and remarkable achievement.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): When my right hon. Friend talks about the record of the national health service, for which she is responsible, in Derbyshire, will she acknowledge that not only have new buildings been built at the Derbyshire Royal infirmary but a new children's hospital will soon open in the Derby City General hospital and a brand new hospital has been built in Chesterfield? That is our commitment to the health service and the capital programme, which was cut by the Labour party in Government.

Mrs. Bottomley: Once again, my hon. Friend exactly identifies the issue. The Labour party appears to argue that one can have all the new hospitals, the new developments, the centres, the equipment, the expert staff, without ever closing an old hospital, without ever taking a difficult decision, ducking every difficult problem, pandering to every pressure group. The new Labour party makes Michael Foot's old outfit look like international statesmen.

If we ducked the decisions, the Opposition would have a legitimate cause for grievance, but they know that it is not so, because we are tackling the issues that matter. I have talked about improved hospital services closer to where people live. Improved primary care in London also matters. It matters that the poor, the sick, the homeless and the mentally ill can rely on effective local services to meet their needs.

When the right hon. Member for Derby, South was a Labour party researcher, I was researching in the east end, in Bethnal Green. I know how people in Bethnal Green were deprived of even a moderate level of primary care, of general practice, of the basics of a health service. Yes, there were any number of institutions, but the basics, which must be the essential foundation of a health service, were lacking. I do not take it kindly when the right hon. Lady suggests that I do not know the realities of life in the inner cities, having spent more of my life working in the most impoverished districts in the inner cities than I have in politics, let alone in government.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mrs. Bottomley: I shall come to the hon. Gentleman in a moment, when I discuss his area.

Time and again, the Labour party used to urge us to invest in primary care. It does not make that charge so much any more, because we have exceeded the commitments that we promised at the beginning of the process. The King's Fund and Tomlinson recommend investment in primary care. Tomlinson recommended £140 million for primary care. We have invested £210 million in 1,000 or more schemes throughout London—new general practitioner services, modern health centres, community health teams, hospitals at home. That is a great range of provision. When did the Labour party ever do as much for the people of London? When did it ever do anything for the people of London?

What matters is decent community care. It matters that elderly infirm people are well looked after at home or in homely surroundings. Since the publication of the Tomlinson report, we have committed an extra £338 million to London local authorities for social services. The first fruits of that investment are becoming apparent. An extra 200 nursing beds opened in inner London in the past year, another 800 were approved and there are plans for at least 1,000 more. Those are the necessary services to meet the needs of an aging population.

It matters that patients who need emergency care receive it from a well equipped centre, staffed by highly trained doctors and nurses, with all the back-up that they need—not from old, isolated units where care might become a lottery and lives might be put at risk.

"A small number of larger clinical teams gives the patient the best chance, each team supported by a greater number of intensive care and specialist beds"— not my words, but those of a doctor who works in one of the busiest accident and emergency departments in the capital, Dr. Howard Baderman, who also advises the chief medical officer on A and E services.

The clinical advice is clear and consistent. No responsible Government could construct a health service disregarding the advice about the way to have the best clinical outcomes from A and E services—the basic and fundamental element in our health service.

When the Labour party cannot attack the argument, it plays on the fears of the vulnerable and the sick and spreads scares, but the public have seen through that. They remember Jennifer's ear: that lost Labour the last general election, and it will lose it the next.

What matters is harnessing new technology to treat more patients to an ever higher standard. Many more patients can be treated without staying overnight in hospital or by their GPs. The new specialist centres outside London, to which my hon. Friends have already referred, mean that patients can be treated locally rather than in London. Health authorities have a duty to plan the level and range of services that their areas need, which must, of course, have an adequate and appropriate supply of beds.

The Government do not have a target for bed numbers. We expect health authorities to balance services to needs, year by year. They must take account of the prevalence of disease, the age structure of the population, the formidable advances in clinical practice and all the other factors that affect the demand for services. Contrary to what is suggested in the motion put down by the Labour party, there has been a significant increase in the number of intensive care beds. As the House is aware, we are now looking again at how we can better manage those intensive care beds. Time and again, the advice is to bring them together in larger settings so that the health service can better cope with the ebbs and flows.

Sir Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that most of us understand the special constituency interests of those who represent inner London, who are concerned about hospital closures? Despite that, the reform of health care in London is long overdue and the relevant report has been sitting around Whitehall for far too long. Most of us recognise my right hon. Friend's courage in taking up the reform and her determination to see that good health care is provided not only in London but in the provinces, to which a lot of people from London have moved out.

Mrs. Bottomley: I thank my hon. Friend for those remarks, which I appreciate.

It is important to set the record right about beds. We need the right balance. The number of beds closed in recent years does not match that quoted by the right hon.

[Mrs. Bottomley]

Member for Derby, South. In the past three years, we have seen a 30 per cent. increase in activity [HON. MEMBERS: "Activity?"] The number of beds in inner London has reduced, but the reduction has been more cautious than the level set out by the King's Fund and it is in line with the Tomlinson proposals.

We have always made it clear that the proposals need to be carefully implemented and monitored. We need to be watchful as we take forward those plans, and that is why the report of the inner London chief executives is so important. It is their duty to ensure that they plan services according to local need and get the balance right. Their report, which was published just the other day, made it clear that what is needed is not more acute beds in total, but a better disposition of specialist and general acute beds, and medical and surgical teams to meet the needs of patients. They have set up an action programme to address the problems that exist. It will provide better bed management, better discharge arrangements and will tackle bed blocking. That programme will ensure that there is better co-operation on emergency admissions.

The right hon. Member for Derby, South referred to Homerton. It has always been the case that there have been ebbs and flows in the pressure on hospitals. Co-operating carefully on those arrangements represents the best way of managing the health service. Not only are there more beds open at that hospital, but a great many more are planned. That hospital will be subject to a £30 million programme. The same is true of Northwick Park, where at least 30 beds have been opened this year and 40 will come through next year. We have identified the need for change in those hospitals and are addressing it.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mrs. Bottomley: No.

Ms Abbott: Specifically on Homerton?

Mrs. Bottomley: I hope that the hon. Lady will understand if I do not give way. I have already spoken for a long time and if I do not make progress, hon. Members who want to speak may not have the opportunity to do so. I am sure that the hon. Lady will find an opportunity to speak later.

I must refer to some of the areas that have caused great concern. My right hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) has argued powerfully that the ethos, traditions and culture of St. Bartholomew's should be preserved as services move to Whitechapel. I agree with him. He knows that a task force chaired by Sir Ronald Grierson is examining alternative uses for the St. Bartholomew's-Smithfield site in keeping with its proud past. In addition, a working group led by the Corporation of London has been developing plans for the alternative provision of community services at St. Bartholomew's to meet local needs. Others have suggested that the name of St. Bartholomew's should live on in the title of the trust—I accept that—in practice as well as in spirit. [Interruption.] I am pleased to say that the trust is considering that suggestion and I hope that it will be able to make that announcement soon.

My right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) have queried the pace of change at the Guy's-St. Thomas's development. During consultation a number of modifications were made. Let me reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst that the A and E at Guy's will not close until alternative services are ready to take its place and able to provide better care. Those services include improved primary care, the minor injuries unit and the alternative casualty units at King's, Lewisham and St. Thomas's.

The trust will continue to provide at Guy's a wide range of hospital services, many of them geared to the needs of local people. In fact, 80 per cent. of patients currently seen and treated at the hospital will continue to go there. In keeping with its pioneering traditions Guy's will be at the forefront of developing state-of-the-art diagnostic and day case and out-patient services. It will genuinely be a hospital of the future.

Mr. Simon Hughes: How can the Secretary of State accept the recommendation that a date be fixed for the closure of an A and E department when the number of people presenting to such departments is rising? How can she accept that recommendation when it is clear from the advice of the people who run that department that they need it for the foreseeable future and that it would be unsafe to predict when it will not be needed? The consultants say to a person that to remove an A and E department and leave a major hospital, which treats a huge number of out-patients, and which has in-patient beds, without an intensive care unit, will render it so dangerous that they will find it impossible to operate in those circumstances.

Mrs. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman already knows that informing all our work on A and E services was the report by Sir Norman Browse and his team. We would not dream of accepting proposals if we were not satisfied that they conformed with the advice of the president of the Royal College of Surgeons and his team. The hon. Gentleman will also be aware that I have set not a date when the department will close, but one before which it will not close. I repeat my commitment that until or unless alternative arrangements are in place no final closure can take place.

I have sought not to speak at great length about the opportunities for medical schools and the link-up with the multi-faculty colleges at London university. The merger of Guy's and St. Thomas's offers a unique opportunity to develop the biomedical sciences campus on the Guy's site. It will become a major research and teaching campus as good as any in the country. I should also like to confirm again that Philip Harris house will be properly used—85 per cent. of the services it will provide will be those for which it was originally intended.

The future of Edgware hospital is of particular concern to some of my hon. Friends. A new £60 million hospital is being built at Barnet in north London, which brings to an end 25 years of uncertainty about the way forward for the two hospitals at Edgware and Barnet. Edgware hospital is not closing, because four out of five patients currently treated there will continue to attend.

As a result of the representations made by my hon. Friends, the opening of the proposed new minor accident treatment service will be brought forward to the earliest opportunity. They made a number of suggestions during the consultation period and subsequently, all of which I have sought to heed, take seriously and to match with practical proposals. Both the minor accident treatment service unit at Edgware and the new fully equipped and staffed casualty department at Barnet will be well established before full-scale A and E services move from Edgware.

The trust is already discussing with local GPs a possible GP presence at the minor accident treatment service unit. I have sought and received assurances from the local health authority and the London ambulance service that extra investment will strengthen the ambulance service in that area. The health service is investing in full non-emergency transport at Edgware to serve those who need to go to other hospitals. In addition, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville), is having discussions with the Department of Transport about how we can improve transport arrangements further.

My hon. Friends the Members for Finchley (Mr. Booth) and for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) have argued strongly for the need to improve primary care in advance of the hospital changes. I am pleased to say that the regional health authority has decided to provide an additional £2 million—taking the total to £17 million—for improvements to family doctor and community services in the western part of Barnet, the area that is closest to Edgware hospital.

By 2000 we shall have spent more than £1 billion building a top-class health service in London. The programme of change has been preceded by an unprecedented amount of discussion, consultation and review. Decisions were needed to bring an end to uncertainty and delay for staff and patients alike.

Mr. Dykes: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Bottomley: I hope that my hon. Friend will bear with me, but I must bring my remarks to a close.

Now that the decisions have been made, it is vital that they are implemented sensitively, properly sequenced and carefully paced. For the period of transition, I give this seven-point pledge to the House. There will be no closures until alternative and better services are up and running. There will be modern emergency services, including an improved London ambulance service. We will continue to hold health authorities to account for providing comprehensive and effective services in each area, including a proper supply of beds to meet demand. Waiting times will improve further; the patients charter standards must be met.

Mr. Dykes: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mrs. Bottomley: I will not give way to my hon. Friend again, as I have already done so. We will continue to recruit and retain the very best doctors and nurses. The staff and the public will be involved in the changes so that they can see and contribute to the objectives. Finally, we will support innovation and development in teaching and research so that London maintains its prime position and we can invest in the next generation.

Since 1948, Parliament has given government the statutory duty to provide comprehensive health services for all who need them. We believe that we are building a health service in the capital that will serve our children and our grandchildren well, rather than the one that was right for our parents and grandparents—such is the phenomenal rate of medical advances. We have a crucial opportunity to prepare for the 21st century. The price of doing nothing—the price of Labour—would be to let our hospitals and our health service slip into decline and to fail London and Londoners. We are not prepared to pay that price.

We want a health service in which people can take pride. We shall succeed by holding firm and by being prepared to lead and not surrender. Edmund Burke said—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members may not like what the Secretary of State is saying, but she is entitled to be heard, just as the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) was entitled to be heard.

Mrs. Bottomley: Edmund Burke said:

"A state without the means of some change is without the means of its conservation".

So it is with the health service. The Conservative party did not win four general elections by backing away from tough and sometimes, in the short term, unpopular decisions. We did it by sticking to our principles. Our duty is clear and our courage is intact. We shall hold firm because the interests of our health service, our capital and the rest of the country depend upon it.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next hon. Member to speak, I remind the House of Madam Speaker's decision that there will be a limit of 10 minutes on all Back-Bench speeches.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. In her speech, the Secretary of State had an argument with my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) about hospital closures. The Secretary of State said that she would clarify those figures later. Hon. Members who have tabled parliamentary questions about hospital closures, including me, have received the answer that the Department of Health does not keep that information centrally. Some of us would regard it as inconceivable—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cohen: It must have been lying—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) that when the Speaker or the Deputy Speaker rises, the hon. Gentleman must resume his seat. It is perfectly clear that the hon. Gentleman is raising a matter of debate and of fact. The Chair is not responsible for the content of speeches.

Mr. Cohen: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am not raising a point of debate. I am asking you to investigate the answers to those parliamentary questions because I think that false information was given to hon. Members.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thought that I made my point crystal clear: what is said in the House, whether it is correct or incorrect or falsely made, is not a matter for the Chair.

[Madam Deputy Speaker]

5.45 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Today's debate is crucial for hon. Members who believe that the announcement that the Secretary of State made before the recess is misguided, wrong and not in the best interests of the health service.

I shall address my initial remarks to my colleagues in the House who do not represent London constituencies and who often attend debates on the London health service assuming that London Members are simply trying to persuade Ministers to give London more than it deserves. There is always a danger of a divide-and-rule approach to such debates.

I ask the Secretary of State: does she believe that the money that is currently allocated to the London health service is a fair amount, given the proportion of the population who live in London and who use its health service? It could have been argued some years ago that London received more than its fair share of resources. In general terms, 15 per cent. of the health service was located in London but it received 20 per cent. of the funding, but that is no longer so. There is no evidence to suggest that London receives more than its fair share of resources. Indeed, the rising population in inner and outer London is sufficient to suggest that the balance may need to be readjusted in the future.

No one is arguing against the rest of the country having a decent, renewed health service. Londoners argue that those who live in London and those who are sent here by their doctors or consultants for treatment—some of the centres of excellence in London health provision will continue in our lifetime to treat people from all over the country—should receive a fair share of resources, and that that share should be allocated fairly.

The motion tabled by the Labour party does not argue that all change within the London health service should stop. On that basis, the motion will be supported not only by Opposition Members but by some Conservative Members.

I understand that the Secretary of State receives particularly voluminous advice from many experts and advisers whom she has cited. However, she has not tempered that advice with experience on the ground.

The Secretary of State knows that I have gained practical experience, particularly from the three hospitals that serve the community that I represent—Guy's, King's College and St. Thomas's. The experience of patients and practitioners no longer accords with what the Secretary of State considers to be the unqualified and unalterable advice that she receives from her advisers within and outside the Department of Health.

As to acute services, practitioners are saying that the number of people who are presenting themselves for treatment in casualty and accident and emergency departments is rising, not falling. The number of people on waiting lists for out-patient appointments is rising, not falling. Figures show that people had to wait for 16 weeks in 1991 and for 40 weeks in 1995. The number of people in intensive care unit beds is rising, not falling. Many intensive care units are not just full but overspilling into other bed provision, which is not prepared for intensive care use.

The trend, and this is not invented by politicians or based on political rhetoric, is towards more pressure on the health service in the capital city. The worry, which is supported by evidence, is that when people need the health services of the capital they regularly cannot be admitted to them.

When a doctor rings up for a bed, no emergency bed is available. When patients arrive at a hospital, there is no space in the ward. London hospitals are meant to have enough capacity, but patients end up being sent to Leeds. The evidence is abundantly clear that, day by day, London health services are not working.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: I will not because we each have only 10 minutes and I want to respect that limit.

One hospital after another has regularly had to close its doors because it just cannot cope any more.

Let the Secretary of State not meet one point with an answer to a different one. Nobody argues against new facilities or that we do not want old buildings such as Hunt's house in Guy's hospital knocked down. Nobody argues that we do not want Philip Harris house, which was built at a cost of £150 million, to be opened. We are arguing exactly the opposite.

We want the best facilities. That is why the argument for Philip Harris house is so clear: it is the best building in the health service. It would be madness not to use it for the purpose for which it was designed and built. However, we do not want commitments to changes in the future that the present circumstances do not appear to justify.

The right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) made a hugely important point about the waste of public resources. The health service is expensive, as it should be. It should provide the best possible care for everyone, no matter how poor they may be. It is nonsense to plan new buildings on one site when we have buildings waiting to be used on another. That is not a good use of public resources.

The argument that we are trying to win today, and for which we seek support from Conservative Members, some of whom have declared their support, is not about trying to unravel the health service reforms or changing direction. I am trying to win the argument, as was the right hon. Member for Derby, South, that the evidence does not support the academic and so-called expert advice that the speed, pace and details of the proposals are compatible with the needs of the different parts of the capital city.

Let me choose one example. The Secretary of State for Health wrote to me about Guy's last month and used an argument that I have often heard before as part of her case for closing Guy's accident and emergency department, although I think that she now accepts that it may be impossible to close it even in 1998 or 1999. If it is not possible to close it then, it seems foolhardy to set a date at all because it might take another five, 10 or 15 years or might never need to be closed. Why say that it will certainly be closed when it might not be?

In her letter, the Secretary of State says that evidence shows that between 25 and 40 per cent. of people who attend accident and emergency could be better treated by their GP. That is not uncontradicted advice. It is not even the balance of the advice.

There is strong research evidence that only 20 per cent. or fewer of accident and emergency patients could be treated by their GP better or more safely. In any event, the figure may be much nearer to 25 per cent. than 40 per cent.

It is the failure to accept that there is another side of the story that concerns me as a Member who represents 80,000 people in an area with some of the worst scores on the indices of deprivation, morbidity and mortality. It also concerns the people themselves who are saying, "For heaven's sake, don't ask us to write blank cheques." They do not trust that a better new service will replace the old one until the new service is there and working. When the ambulances turn up, when people are not kept lying in trolleys and when they are seen by nurses who do not leave people unattended because they are so over-stretched that they cannot cope, we will believe that London's hospitals are working.

Today we must ask the Secretary of State why she is unwilling on the basis of what she has said to concede that her proposals are causing concern and fear to users of the service and to accept the advice of practitioners, who are arguing the same case.

I have two other points. First, it is not sufficient to go through a consultation process and then ignore its results. It is no good having a semblance of consultation in the health service without taking account of the concerns of the people who have responded to that request for information.

It would be different if national health service trusts were democratically elected or local health authorities were democratically accountable because then, at the end of day, accountable people would be making the difficult choices, but they are not. The people on those bodies are appointed.

When bodies that meet in secret and are accountable to the Secretary of State, who by definition is a party political person, make such decisions, they do not receive the automatic confidence of the public and the public do not feel that they are being listened to by the people who make the decisions. I ask the Secretary of State to say that no proposal will be pushed forward unless and until it has the support of those who were consulted about whether it was right or wrong.

I shall use our local circumstances in south-east London as an example of my last point, but it applies to Edgware and east London as well. Many of the people who have advised the Secretary of State have made it clear to her that there are preconditions for what she says being acceptable. Our local health commission said that it needed £28 million extra to deliver changes that it was proposing. There has been no guarantee of that extra money, although a request has been made to the region. That is symptomatic of the way in which people are being asked to trust the administrators of a service which at the moment they see is not delivering.

At the end of Secretary of State's speech, she made her pledge, which had seven points. If I had to describe the end of her speech, I would call it a statement made by a Snow White of the health service with seven dwarf pledges following behind. Her pledge was mere words, and it is not borne out by the money that is available or by the evidence.

Nobody argues against renewing the health service. We argue rather that the health service in London should be developed with the consent of the people who use it. As with policing, one should not run a health service without the consent of the people. If the Secretary of State persists, I fear that she and her colleagues will pay the political price. I would rather that she retrenched and retracted now and listened to the overwhelming view of health service users who say that she is has got it wrong and should slow down, listen to the people and look at the facts. They can help her get the health service that Londoners need and deserve far better than her experts and advisers and the people who are not in the front line of the changes that she recommends.

Mr. Peter Brooke (City of London and Westminster, South): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). Before the great Reform Act 1832, when there were six Members of Parliament for what is now my constituency, there were two Members for the rest of Middlesex and two Members for Southwark. It is because we both have ancient seats that we have ancient hospitals and common cause in connection with them.

This debate has been years in gestation—not just the years since the Tomlinson report but the 80 years to which the Government's motion refers. I have spoken in three preliminary debates since Trafalgar day last year. I have expressed my general support for what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is seeking to achieve. There is no point in repeating the arguments that have already been rehearsed. I have stressed Bart's own recognition, as far back as 1977, that London specialties needed to be rationalised and concentrated.

A month ago, I criticised my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for not coming to the House to make a statement. Although I do not think that the Executive should take the legislature for granted, I confess that I felt a little like Shakespeare's second murderer. I admire and respect my right hon. Friend, not least for her courage in tackling London's endemic problems, which have remained untackled for so long, and by so many of her predecessors. However, I have said time almost without number, and not least to my right hon. Friend, that merging an institution as great as Bart's is a highly delicate venture.

The three great opportunities for this country in the post-industrial society are government, education and medicine. Bart's features in two of those. Thus, the survival of its ethos and reputation in the merged institution is critical, as it is a national asset. For them to survive in an atmosphere of intense change requires a high sensitivity to people as well as to detail. On that score, the Government's ultimate handling of Bart's has been inadequate.

I am curtailed by the restraints of time, but I shall cite a series of instances, in no particular order. The background is that Bart's has been happy to engage in the merger but the issue is whether it should be on one site or on two. The failure of public education about Bart's future remains stunning. Long ago, I recall the noble Lord

[Mr. Peter Brooke]

Flowers saying of the urban transportation of irradiated fuel that, although he might know it to be safe, what mattered was that the public should believe it to be so.

The public do not believe the Government's case about Bart's and the health authority's handling of the responses to the consultation will not have improved credibility. I acknowledge that there were several options in the consultation document. Because they did not respond to the document's precise terminology, those who asked for Bart's to remain open, which was implicitly a vote for the two-site option, were treated as having expressed no preference.

In the preparations for the new hospital, there are 32 clinical directorates. A total of 22—more than two thirds—are headed by staff from the Royal London hospital, and nine are headed by staff from Bart's. The Royal London is the host in the merger, and I can see no evidence of a change in welcome such as I said was needed as far back as the Trafalgar day debate last year.

Next I come to the press release of 8 March from the Royal Hospitals trust which is headlined:

"Royal Hospitals Trust hits back at defective report."

I referred to that obliquely in the House on 5 April. The press release was an attack on the motivation of Bart's medical council and the professional reputation of the York Health Economics Consortium. It was issued five days before the health authority met to reach conclusions on the consultation.

Dr. Posnett, the director of the York Health Economics Consortium of the University of York, did not go public with his reactions to the press release. On 17 March he wrote a reasoned letter of rebuttal to the chief executive of the trust. Nearly eight weeks later the chief executive has not replied. Dr. Posnett was specifically seeking to avoid a public row. However, to ignore a professional letter is not professional. Circulation of the correspondence to the trust board was first promised and then denied.

A single press release would not normally warrant such attention, but the conclusion of the York Health Economics Consortium had been that the business case for a £200 million investment on a single site at the Royal London had been insufficiently substantial to warrant not looking at alternative options more closely. In terms of the sensitivity of which I have spoken, the press release was crass and the silence since then has been contemptible.

On 21 October last year and on 5 April this year my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and her hon. Friend the Minister of State said things about Bart's which history has since proved to be inaccurate. I do not quarrel with that because Ministers are only as good as the briefing that they receive. I hope that the briefing on the York report has been better, not least because of the circumstances.

Given the Secretary of State's concern to transfer the ethos of Bart's to Whitechapel and the health authority's confidence in the consultation document that this can be done, the financial aspects, although important, are academic by comparison with the practical consequences of this serial handling.

On 21 October I spoke of the need to ensure that the staff at Bart's should not haemorrhage away if the ethos was to survive. My right hon. Friend will know the figures. Against a background where, historically, few people have left Bart's—11 people have left, or will leave—the medical college since last August, two more are thought to be about to leave and seven others are at risk. Four of those earned absolute stars in the 1992 research ratings competition. A haemorrhage of that sort runs the risk of being fatal.

What should an individual Member do? I feel no sense of community with the chancers on the Opposition Front Bench. The predecessor of the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) said that the status quo was no longer an option in London, yet the right hon. Lady comes to the debate without the courtesy of publishing her party's NHS policies in advance.

As the hon. Member for the City I also represent the western tip of east London. With the other hon. Members representing east London, for whom Bart's is a neighbourhood hospital, I do feel a sense of community. I am careful of the company I keep but hon. Members representing east London are entirely proper company at this time. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said that she will pay attention to the view of the House and I must, on current knowledge, vote against her.

I realise that many of my hon. Friends will wish to give my right hon. Friend the benefit of the doubt. I would not ask them to come into the Opposition Lobby for they do not have the same knowledge of Bart's as I have. However, in a party such as ours, I ask them to pause for a moment to decide whether they should give Bart's the benefit of the doubt and abstain. I have seen the haemorrhage of staff already and I dread the haemorrhage that is to come. I cannot believe that any of my hon. Friends could read the York report, with its commentary on the methodology used to reach the single-site decision, without having a scintilla of doubt about what the trust, the authority and the Department are up to.

The financial figures are, in any case, finely balanced in a world where the Chelsea and Westminster figures could overrun as they did. If the House endorses the death warrant on Bart's, each and every one who votes for it is responsible. I respect the Secretary of State's certainty that she is right, for she knows how appallingly her reputation will be undermined if she turns out to be wrong.

My reading of the Government's capital investment manual reveals that it asks under the heading "Options":

"have there been any changes in available options and/or all these additional options that should now be considered?"

My reading of the York report reveals that consultation on alternative options should have occurred and should still occur.

On Bart's, I close with some words by Larkin, an unbeliever who said in church:

"It pleases me to stand in silence here;
A serious house on serious earth it is,
In whose blent air all our compulsions meet,
Are recognised, and robed as destinies.
And that much can never be obsolete,
Since someone will forever be surprising
A hunger in himself to be more serious,
And gravitating with it to this ground,
Which he once heard, was proper to grow wise in,
If only that so many dead lie round."

6.8 pm

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): It is an enormous privilege to have heard the speech made by the right hon. Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke). We have always held him in high esteem and today, for the first time for a long time, we had a reaffirmation of honour in the House of Commons. We can only salute and applaud the right hon. Gentleman for the grace with which he delivered his speech and for the difficulty with which he has made his decision, for the moment, about his conflicting loyalties. We all know that loyalty to party often conflicts with loyalty to constituents, conscience and principles. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that, for the moment, he believes that it is right that he should go along with his loyalty to his constituents, his conscience and his principles. We salute him.

At the weekend, the Secretary of State called in some of the press and told them that she had a bundle of letters in support of her plans to close hospitals in London. I wonder how her bundle of letters compared in quantity to the 1 million people who signed a petition stating that Bart's should not be closed and to the 1 million people who signed a petition stating that Guy's should not be closed. I wonder how it compared in quality with the letters that Professor Lesley Rees, the dean of Bart's medical college, received from 344 heads of departments from 42 countries around the world and the 245 letters that he received from medical and scientific institutions from around the globe. I wonder how her little pile of letters compared with the shoal of letters—I have a copy of each one—that the Prime Minister received from top medical experts from around the world.

On the evidence of the correspondence that I have seen—I have looked through it all—the Secretary of State has been charged, indicted and found guilty by the public and by the medical establishment, not just in this country, but worldwide. It only remains for the House tonight to pass sentence and to seek retribution for what the Secretary of State has done.

Two weeks ago, the Prime Minister came to Hackney to praise Hackney council for its inner-city initiatives. He said that he wished there could be cross-party support for them and that Conservative boroughs as well as Labour boroughs could follow the example of Hackney. I was delighted to see him there and discussed some of the problems with him.

Hackney council said that it would work with anyone providing that it was in the interests of the council. It said that it would like some support from Conservative councillors on some of the steps that it wanted to take. Conservative councillors have voted for a motion that is an unequivocal indictment of the Secretary of State's proposal to close Bart's and the London chest hospital. They will be delighted with the decision of the right hon. Member for City of London and Westminster, South tonight. I think that they, like many other people, will be wondering anxiously about how other Conservative Members will respond to the debate.

Yesterday I visited Bart's to open an exhibition of paintings by patients in the Strauss ward—the only ward at Bart's that deals exclusively with those receiving treatment for mental illness. The exhibition took place in St. Bartholomew the Less, a beautiful church inside the hospital.

The irony is that the Strauss ward was opened on Wednesday 25 May 1992 by Her Majesty the Queen. Members of the royal family, including the Queen, have all been instructed that they are no longer to pay visits to Bart's, for fear that the anger that already exists due to the impending closure will be made worse. I asked yesterday and I ask the House today: what sort of a society is it where the Queen can be told by second-rate politicians that she cannot go in to the world's oldest and best hospital, even to open new wards or to see and respect some of its past glories?

Over lunch yesterday, I spoke to some of the consultants. I did not intend to stay for lunch, so none of the consultants were hand picked, and we had a general talk about what was going on. It was interesting that they all, without exception, said that they were angry and bemused. They said that, when challenged to produce a profit inside the internal market, they did precisely that. They said that, when asked to enter into a merger with the Royal London hospital, they did so in good faith and thought that it might work, only to be told shortly afterwards that it was not to be a merger, but the closure of St. Bartholomew's hospital. They accused the Secretary of State of bad faith and a lack of integrity.

The consultants used words similar to those that I heard the hon. Member for Hendon, North (Sir J. Gorst) use on television. They said that they thought that the Secretary of State did not listen and that some of her arguments were incomprehensible. Some of the consultants were ruder and said that they thought that the Secretary of State was unintelligent, was living in a fantasy world created by her civil servants and had lost all contact with reality.

I remember when the hon. Member for Hendon, North said movingly on television that there was an important thing called a political process, in which one had to take note of people's fears, people's aspirations and—a phrase that I particularly remember—even people's prejudices. I do not believe that the 2 million people who have signed the petition are all prejudiced, but even if they were, it would be extraordinary for a Secretary of State to say, "You 2 million people have had your say, now listen to the experts. I am going to get on with it and take the advice of my civil servants." That does not seem to be the way to conduct politics seriously.

The right hon. Member for City of London and Westminster, South spoke about the haemorrhaging of the centre of excellence at St. Bartholomew's hospital and of the staff that were leaving. The dean of the medical college yesterday faxed me some updated figures. I am afraid that they are even slightly worse than the right hon. Gentleman said. I have the fax and the names—obviously, I will not read out the names.

The figures show that seven professors and six senior lecturers have already been lost and are going to such places as Sheffield, Manchester, Oxford, University college hospital and the Royal Free hospital. They also show that four professors, three senior lecturers and a recorder are at risk.

Some people may say that the figures amount to only 20 people and there are hundreds of people carrying out research at Bart's, but it is important to remember that each senior figure who goes will take a clutch of research workers with him or her. Those research workers do not just carry out abstract medical research; they help with the provision of clinical services at Bart's. They have been helping, not only at Bart's, but at the Homerton and the Queen Elizabeth hospital for children in Hackney.

One does not need to be super intelligent to realise that the Homerton could seriously suffer in the future because it is no longer linked to a teaching hospital. It does not have the links that it should have with the Royal London hospital and St. Bartholomew's hospital. We need to consider medicine in east London in the context of the Royal London hospital, St. Bartholomew's hospital, the Homerton hospital and, probably, hospitals in Newham, and come up with a sensible solution and sensible amalgamations. There is no need for war between St. Bartholomew's hospital and the Royal London hospital.

A few weeks ago the Secretary of State said that the ethos of Bart's could be transferred to the Royal London. From a sedentary position my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who was here at the time, asked how the bloody hell we could transfer an ethos. I phoned up the Department of Health and was told that it could be bottled and transported. I was told that the extract of Bart's would be issued in bottles to each of the patients moved to the Royal London hospital.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. I call Sir Nicholas Scott.

6.18 pm

Sir Nicholas Scott (Chelsea): Hanging in my office in the Norman Shaw North building is a cartoon that was given to me in 1987. It was drawn by that marvellous cartoonist, Marc. It shows two Back Benchers—I think that my hon. Friends would probably recognise them—and one is saying to the other:

"I used to have this nightmare that she'd made me Minister for Northern Ireland, but lately it's been Minister of Health".

I do not think that many of us in the House envy my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and her team of Ministers some of the difficult decisions that they are having to face as they try to ensure that constituency Members of Parliament and existing institutions are properly looked after while at the same time ensuring that we have a health service for London that is up to date as new developments and new techniques are introduced into the health care of our capital city. They have a difficult job, but we too have a difficult job. I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to understand how difficult that job sometimes is when, as my right hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) said, marvellous institutions with long histories are too easily challenged and face extinction.

We look at the arguments and the statistics in the Tomlinson report. We refer to a report by Professor Jarman, which challenges many of those ideas and statistics. We listen to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and to my hon. Friend the Minister on the "Today" programme, with a soothing and, I am sure, accurate flow of statistics to challenge some of the arguments that are being put against them. We then look at the Evening Standard and the claims of the community health councils. It is difficult for us, as constituency Members of Parliament, to see where the real value in the arguments lies.

I know that my right hon. Friend wants to get it right not just for today's London but for tomorrow's London, and that gives her several difficult considerations.

Sometimes, too little notice is taken of a number of factors other than the existing population and the existing needs of the population of central London. The population of central London does not consist entirely of those who have a residence in central London. We have a huge additional daytime population whose needs must be met by many hospitals in the city centre. We also have a considerable number of overseas residents, visitors and tourists who might need attention by our health service. Many visitors come to this country specifically to take advantage of the excellent health service in central London, and they bring with them other economic advantages to the centre of London.

There are two other factors that we should bear in mind when we look at the pattern of health provision in central London. I understand the first factor, because the Department in which I recently served shared some of the burden of it with the Department of Health. I refer to the policy of care in the community—perfectly proper and perfectly understandable. There is no doubt at all in my mind that a significant number of those who have been released from institutional care and put into community care packages need from time to time to go into mainstream hospitals in central London because of a deterioration in their condition. Perhaps there is no other place to which they can turn to be properly looked after.

We should not ignore the possibility of terrorism as we look at the need for hospitals in central London. I am not talking about Northern Ireland and its influence on this side of the water, which we have had to endure for many years. However, bearing in mind what happened in Oklahoma and the growing number of organisations that seem to believe that they can turn to terrorism to publicise and achieve their ends, we must take account of that trend as we consider proper health care provision in our major cities, particularly in London.

The second factor that all Members of Parliament in central London can regard with pride, and for which we must fight to ensure its continuity, is that London maintains its widely recognised reputation throughout the world as a centre for health excellence. We must not lose that. I know that my right hon. Friend wants to keep that reputation and, indeed, to enhance it, and it should be a major factor in our consideration. We should consider not only the existing population who need such services in central London, but those from across the world who come to take advantage of them.

I have three major hospitals in my constituency. One is the Chelsea and Westminster hospital—a new, flourishing, expensive hospital. Whether in today's terms that hospital would ever have been built is not for me to say, but it exists and it is performing extremely well. It is still not used to absolute capacity. It has an excellent contract with the Kensington, Chelsea and Westminster health agency. I believe that it has a glittering future.

Since that hospital opened in early 1993, the number of in-patients and day-patients has steadily increased by more than 15 per cent. in each of the two years that the hospital has been open. Attendances at the accident and emergency department have increased from fewer than 40,000 in the first year to more than 60,000 this year. I recently paid a visit to that A and E unit, and I speak very strongly in support of the service that it provides.

That hospital has also introduced something that exists elsewhere—I hope that the practice will steadily increase—and that is a rota of general practitioners serving in the A and E department in the evenings. They are able to cope with the less serious visitors to the department, just as GPs would in their own surgeries. We should encourage that development in our hospitals.

The Royal Marsden hospital is also in my constituency. On 21 April, my hon. Friend the Minister was asked whether he had had any meetings about the closure of the Royal Marsden hospital and whether he had any plans for its closure and he answered none to both questions. I hope that I can count on him to continue to use that precise and brief answer to subsequent questions. There is no doubt that the Royal Marsden is a fine institution with a glittering reputation for high-quality research, and it deserves to flourish in future.

The third major hospital in my constituency is the Royal Brompton. My hon. Friend the Minister knows that board members of the Royal Brompton hospital have invited companies to meet them with a proposition to introduce a new ambulatory care centre without beds, to be known as the Royal Brompton clinic, which might be developed using the private finance initiative that the Government recently introduced. The private sector has shown great interest in that proposition. We have the chance, in Sydney street in my constituency, to have a new day clinic for respiratory and heart cases, along the lines of the Mayo clinic in the United States of America, and not costing a penny to the Exchequer but provided by private finance. It would be a tremendous addition to the quality of health care in central London.

I very much hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and her team of Ministers will be able to overcome any objections that may be encountered elsewhere in the Government in order to bring that imaginative scheme to a proper conclusion.

My right hon. Friend has shown great political courage in the way in which she has tackled her job. She needs, too, clear judgment about the future needs of London against the background that I have sought to describe in this brief speech. In the months and years ahead, that will be a difficult task for her, but I wish her well.

Mr. Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West): The right hon. Members for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) and for Chelsea (Sir N. Scott) have injected the reasonable and measured tone that such debates sometimes lack. It is a shame that, on occasions, our debates are reduced almost to cliché and stereotyping. The idea that this debate is an argument about London versus the rest of the country is not only inaccurate but fraudulent, and those who peddle it do so to try to obscure what is happening in London.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) said, the debate is of much greater significance; it is about the shape, nature and purpose of the national health service after the market reforms. What is happening in London hospitals today is only because they have been at the sharp end of those reforms, and it will ripple into other parts of the country before long.

The allocation of resources to health will always be difficult for any Government. I speak as somebody who was a member of the area health authority for Lambeth, Lewisham and Southwark from 1976, and who became a member of the district health authority for Lewisham and north Southwark, which succeeded it.

I and my colleagues on that authority spent many of those 16 years ensuring that we got the best value for money. Many of our decisions were extremely difficult. Sometimes we were comparing apples with oranges, but decisions had to be taken in the best interests of the people in the area.

In one of today's newspapers, the Secretary of State apparently attacks me for not supporting the Government's investment in the improvements to Lewisham hospital, among others. That was another piece of shorthand. Over the years, I was deeply involved in what became phase 2 at Lewisham and phase 3 at Guy's.

Philip Harris house has already been mentioned this evening. I am pleased with what has been achieved. My major concern, and the reason why I am speaking this evening, is that so much of that achievement is being put at risk. The improvements at Lewisham are welcome, but they have not achieved the objective of providing a service adequate to the needs of the area.

When the proposals for the future of Guy's and St. Thomas's were put out for consultation by the current health authority, the majority of responses outside the area immediately surrounding Guy's hospital were from people in my constituency who overwhelmingly used Lewisham and King's. That is because those people know that Lewisham and King's cannot cope at the moment, let alone if the accident and emergency department at Guy's were to the close.

In 1976, when I started on the health authority, there were about 16 hospitals in Lambeth, Lewisham and Southwark. Today there are four. Anybody who says the idea of change is new and needs to be faced now is misleading himself. Change in the provision of health care in London has been a fact of life, certainly since the formation of the national health service.

Many of those hospital closures were bitterly contested at the time. The decision to close Sydenham children's hospital had the capacity to be extremely emotional. I supported the closure of that hospital for a number of reasons, not least of which was how the process was approached. Ultimately, the authority and the clinicians convinced people in the area that a better service could be provided elsewhere—at Lewisham hospital. It was only with some reluctance that the people in the area agreed to the closure of Sydenham children's hospital, and subsequently moved to Lewisham hospital, which is doing very well.

That element of consent is totally lacking in the issues before us this evening. What has been most clear in the process post-Tomlinson is that change has been pushed forward almost with a life of its own. Theoretically, the people of London were consulted, in so far as they were given the opportunity to write letters to the Secretary of State and their local health authorities, but there is a widespread feeling that the consultation was a sham, and that nothing they said, except at the very periphery, was taken into account, and their views had no impact on the decisions that were taken. The issues that we are discussing this evening involve public confidence as well as health care provision.

[Mr. Jim Dowd]

The timetable for Tomlinson was set four or five years ago. A great deal of contrary authoritative information has emerged as the process has unfolded, and there is some doubt as to whether Tomlinson has achieved its objective. For example, since 1992, bed closures across the country have reached some 3,000, and 45 per cent. or more than 1,300 were in London alone. That shows how rapidly health care provision—certainly acute provision—has changed in London. Mention has been made of the Jarman report, the work of the King's Fund and others.

It is not reasonable, particularly in the case of Guy's, though the same case can be made for other hospitals, that no alternatives have been produced. The "Save Guy's Campaign"—I pay tribute to the hon. Members for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims), and to my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Ms Jowell), who have done so much work for that campaign—got KPMG Peat Marwick to carry out an extensive and detailed analysis of the options available under two or three site configurations, in concert with Guy's, St. Thomas's, University and King's College hospitals. Nobody said that it was the perfect blueprint, but those proposals made it clear that there was room for a reasoned and informed debate to decide on an alternative to the current proposals.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House are concerned about the proposals for accident and emergency provision at various hospitals, because the accident and emergency department is the heart of a hospital. All experience shows that, once the casualty department is closed, before the decline of the rest of the hospital is simply a matter of time. It is sometimes accelerated and sometimes delayed, but it is inevitable. That is why the accident and emergency unit at Guy's is critical for people in south-east London who have been at the forefront of change in acute provision in London.

A perfectly reasonable argument has unfolded over the years for the rationalisation of specialties. The arguments are far more technical, although the assessment of their benefit is easier to calculate than that for accident and emergency provision. The rationalisation of specialties will always cause dispute, but there is more broad agreement, certainly in the light of technical and technological developments, about how developments should unfold. Accident and emergency provision is an entirely different matter, as that is how people define their local hospitals.

The hospitals in south-east London, including Guy's, cannot cope with the current demand. Speaking to a friend, I asked after his mother, who is one of my constituents in Sydenham. He informed me that she had been very ill with pneumonia, and that at one stage her GP wanted to admit her to Lewisham hospital. He said that had there been a bed available, she would have been admitted.

When I asked him what he meant by that, he said that, when they had asked for a bed at Lewisham, Hither Green or Guy's, no beds were available, so she stayed at home. Fortunately, she is better now, but those decisions cause not only distress to the individuals concerned but untold distress, inconvenience and worry to their families when they are given medical advice that they should be admitted to hospital but they cannot get in.

I was interested to hear the Secretary of State further refine the delay in announcing the closure of Guy's. She has now given a date before which it will not be closed. That is another tactical retreat, which will enable her to come back and steal the show by announcing a date 20 years on from that, and by then we might have dealt with many of the issues relating to Guy's. The announcement of the delay in itself shows how overwhelming pressure has been against the proposals of the trust.

The trusts are unresponsive, and the performance of the London ambulance service remains a source of considerable concern to all of us in London. Sadly, the figures are deteriorating, after a marginal improvement.

The Secretary of State's decisions are virtually irreversible, but the motion provides an opportunity to think against before it is too late for the people of London and the NHS they prize.

Mr. David Mellor (Putney): It is a pleasure to follow the speech of the hon. Member for Lewisham (Mr. Dowd), who was extensively involved in the health service. I agree with a number of the points he made about health services in London that were refreshingly free of the partisan camp that so often disfigures such occasions. There has been a measured quality to the debate that might not have been anticipated, given some of its pre-publicity.

One of the reasons that impelled me to speak was my anger at the campaign of vilification that has been mounted against my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in recent weeks. It is inevitable in the extremely difficult waters in which she has to fish.

As one of those who took on the job of Minister of Health not long after the cartoon to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir N. Scott) referred, I can assure him that, of all the posts I occupied in 11 years in government, health was far and away the most stressful and difficult. The Archangel Gabriel himself would have difficulty emerging in pristine condition from occupying that post.

It was a genuine pleasure to be in the House to hear the exceptionally eloquent and stylish speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke). The fact that he takes the view that he does is a sign of how difficult is the task of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

All of us who care about the health service in London will be concerned about some things that are happening, and all have reservations about some of the detail of the proposals. However, overall there is no doubt that that which my right hon. Friend is doing needs in some part—probably the greater part—to be done.

It cannot be ignored or avoided by anybody who wants to discharge effectively the office of Secretary of State for Health with any distinction, particularly in the eye of history. I hope that it will be possible to conduct debates without trying personally to vilify the holder of an office merely because that individual cannot shrink from taking difficult decisions.

I need not rehearse the justifications for Government policies. London is no longer the place to which patients from all over the country must come for a range of specialist treatment. It should be a matter of pride that, under this Government, we have for the first time a truly national health service. One can have a heart transplant at the Freeman hospital in Newcastle, and St. James's hospital in Leeds is a European leader in liver surgery. Nobody is far from a modern hospital that can fulfil almost all their needs.

Whether we like it or not, the transformation of some central London hospitals from great centres of excellence offering services to a substantial part of the nation to district general hospitals was always going to be difficult and painful. That does not mean that some of the decisions and detail should not be examined, and I cannot quarrel with a number of the points made on behalf of Guy's and Bart's. It is clear that London could not go on the way it was.

The right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) has left the Chamber. It would have helped if at some point in her speech she had recognised that the process of reducing the number of hospital beds in London began under the last Labour Government, which established the London Health Planning Consortium—although it reported in the first 12 months of this Government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan), who was Minister of State for Health at the time, will remember that the consortium recommended 6,200 bed reductions overall, amounting to 20 to 25 per cent. of central London's bed stock. If, by some miracle, Labour had won the 1979 general election, presumably it would have embarked on much the same course, because it set in hand the first substantive report.

I longed—in the course of a speech that lasted half an hour and seemed much longer—for the right hon. Member for Derby, South to say what Labour, which we are now meant to see as a credible and serious party of government, would do to deal with London's health service. It is deplorable that we were treated to an opportunistic assault on the Government, merely for being the people who must run the health service.

If one day—contrary to our wishes and expectations—the right hon. Member for Derby, South became Secretary of State for Health, the idea that people would be cheering her through the streets six months after she had taken office is ludicrous—the right hon. Lady, in her innermost thoughts, must realise how deeply ludicrous.

It is also ludicrous for the Labour party to imagine for one moment that it can get away, in the run-up to a general election, with making low-road points about the Government. The Opposition must say what they intend. They made that mistake before. They are unaccustomed to answering substantive points, and fall apart in the run-up to an election. In their private thoughts—although they would not admit this—they must be only too aware that that is the likely fate that could still overtake them, however full of optimism they are at the moment.

I will turn to one or two points of substance. I made it clear that I accept that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State must take the steps she has, but it is inevitable that there will be resentment on these Benches and everywhere else if it appears that the health service that was subject to the major reforms introduced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) are still being run according to the principles of a group of faceless people at different tiers, making decisions of fundamental importance as to which institutions remain open and which do not.

I was there at the formation of the policy, and it was always my understanding that the aim of the reforms was to empower patients and their doctors, and that the new mechanisms were to be responsive to their choices. The whole purpose of self-governing hospital trusts was to allow hospitals to respond in a much freer way to patients than before and to offer services whose popularity or otherwise would make it possible, with cash following the patient, for institutions to succeed or fail.

A number of us find it difficult that a number of manifestly successful institutions can nevertheless be challenged by what appears to be a return to the old-style dirigiste principles that I hoped had gone out of the window with the advent of the reforms. I say that in relation to Queen Mary's University hospital, Roehampton. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend and to the predecessor to my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Malone) for determining last year that the threat to which Queen Mary's was subject should be lifted.

Mr. Sedgemore: Now we understand.

Mr. Mellor: I shall fight for the hospital in my constituency, as the hon. Gentleman fights for his. If I do so more successfully than the hon. Gentleman, he can draw his own conclusions.

Of the four hospitals in south-west London that were under scrutiny, Queen Mary's University was the hospital that doctors and patients regarded most highly. That was a reason for promoting its cause, and that cause was successful.

The problem for the health service is that there are too many cooks stirring this particular broth. I particularly draw to the attention of my hon. Friend the Minister the role of purchasing authorities. At present, Queen Mary's hopes to pioneer a new way of making hospitals more responsive to community needs through the rapid diagnostic centre, for which the region has already made £2 million funding available for the coming year. However, Kingston and Richmond health authority is now intervening and holding a pistol at the head of Queen Mary's, saying that, unless it is prepared to announce plans for closer co-operation with Kingston hospital, the investment cannot proceed.

It is the role of purchasing authorities not to usurp such functions, but to facilitate the choices that doctors and their patients make. If I walked down Putney high street today, none of my constituents would be able to identify one member of those health authorities. The Government would get the blame if things went wrong.

As my right hon. Friend and her colleagues have found, trip wires are set for them by people who are grinding their own axes and who hold no responsibility for maintaining public confidence in the health service or for ensuring that a manageable pace of change is promoted. Against that background, it is extremely important that processes go forward with a recognition that there are political elements in this that are too important to be left to the experts.

Mr. John Austin-Walker (Woolwich): It is timely to remind the Minister of the comments of the hon. Member for Hendon, North (Sir J. Gorst) on 5 April, when he asked the Secretary of State:

"Does my right hon. Friend accept that democratic politics is about delivering to people what the majority want, and not about telling the majority of people what they should have?"

He said:

"she is doing the wrong thing, in the wrong way, at the wrong time and in the wrong place."—[Official Report, 5 April 1995; Vol. 257, c. 1738.]

The hon. Gentleman was referring to the problems relating to Edgware general hospital, but the same applies to other Greater London hospitals, such as Oldchurch and Greenwich district.

When I visited Edgware, I was struck by the lobby outside. Those people were not the usual rent-a-crowd lobby that one might have expected outside a hospital proposed for closure. I was handed a leaflet by a constituent of the right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson), who I believe was also a member of his party, relating to Edgware. It said:

"Five CHCs agree with the people, all the local MPs agree with the people, the GPs agree with the people. Those who want to close Edgware have no friends."

The Secretary of State and the Minister for Health seem incapable of listening to any advice from any source with any contact with the service that is being delivered.

One comment that has been made to me in relation to Edgware, which has also been made in relation to the Brook, Greenwich district and the move of Oldchurch to Harold Wood, concerns the beds that will be lost in the process. I am continually told by the Secretary of State and the Minister that the new proposals take into account the changes in practice, developments and techniques, the increase in day surgery and the shorter stay in hospital, and that that is why there may be a bed loss.

That might have some credence if there were spare beds at the moment. But in all those hospitals, not only are there no spare beds, but bed occupancy is higher than the Minister recommends as a reasonable level and it is achieved by the use of trolleys and beds in corridors.

Hon. Members who have been patients awaiting an operation will appreciate that, no matter how routine an operation is for the hospital, for the patient it is a traumatic experience. To have to psych oneself up and prepare for the trauma of an operation only to be told on the day of or the day before the operation that no bed is available is not the kind of hospital service that people in London deserve or expect.

The Secretary of State referred in her opening remarks to the Brook hospital and neurosurgery. She says that she wants to locate neurosurgery services close to an institute of academic excellence, close to the Institute of Psychiatry at the Maudsley. Why does she not talk to the neurosurgeons at the Brook hospital and throughout London who question the rationale of locating neurosurgery with a psychiatric unit?

No one denies that some patients who need neurosurgery may at some stage require some psychiatric services. But neurosurgery should be accessible to patients and located close to a major trauma centre. The hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) spoke about taking services out of central London to the areas that they serve. I remind the Minister that the Brook neurosurgery service and the Brook cardiothoracic service serve the people of south-east London and north-west Kent. To move those services to Guy's, St. Thomas's and King's, further into central London, makes no sense at all to the people of Gravesham, Chislehurst or Old Bexley and Sidcup.

It is not just Labour Members who have made such representations. The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), the Father of the House, has called for a meeting with the Secretary of State to discuss the Brook neurosurgery services. Those services should move with the rest of the Brook hospital services into the new Queen Elizabeth military hospital. But if they were to go to Queen Mary's, Sidcup, I would not complain, because at least they would be located in a key area serving the sub-region.

Dermatology services do not receive a great deal of publicity, and people do not think that they are particularly important, but they are one of the most heavily used medical specialties. We have talked about the loss of beds. London has seen 70 per cent. of dermatology beds disappear. The dermatologists do not argue that all those beds need to be maintained. They accept that there can be some rationalisation of beds and their location in centres of excellence. But with the disappearance of those beds has gone 60 per cent. of the dedicated dermatology nurses who would be required to provide the services in out-patient clinics and in the community. Why were the dermatology services not the subject of a specialty review and why was there no input from the London dermatology planning group in any of the Minister's considerations? Those matters need to be considered.

The Minister will know that the Select Committee has considered the London ambulance service. I do not want to speak at great length about that, but I say simply that it is on the record that almost every person who gave evidence to the Select Committee said that the drastic reduction in accident and emergency units in London had been a contributory factor to the problems of the London ambulance service.

People talk about the response times of the London ambulance service improving, for which, at the end of the day, the Minister is responsible, but in the key area of the rapid response time there has been virtually no improvement during the past two years since the Minister has taken up the matter.

The right hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir N. Scott) referred to psychiatric services. I agree with all the points that he made. We have heard about over-occupancy of beds in London. Nowhere is that more apparent than in the area of psychiatry. My local hospital is talking about bed occupancy rates of 120 per cent. We have heard of patients from Sidcup having to be flown to Leeds for acute services. In psychiatry, it is not uncommon for patients from Greenwich and Woolwich to have to go as far afield as Oxford or Woking on a regular basis. A consultant psychiatrist has said that it is not uncommon for patients to have to wait some 36 hours to be placed and for telephone calls to have to be made to up to 35 different hospitals. That does not imply a pattern of over-provision in London.

I want finally to say a word about the Tomlinson-Jarman debate. Tomlinson was considering acute services in inner London, not the totality of health services across London. I do not think that anyone, certainly not Professor Tomlinson, would dispute the figures that have now been put forward on the totality of care in London by Professor Jarman. In the conclusion of his article in the British Medical Journal, Professor Jarman says:

"It is clear that neither hospital use by London residents, nor the availability of hospital beds, nor considerations of relative efficiency provide a case for a reduction of the total bed capacity in London . . . It is important that any changes should be considered in the context of London's transport system and the particular problems in primary care and social services, relatively longer hospital waiting lists, below average availability of places in residential homes, and the increasing pressure on available hospital beds."

That is why so many Conservative Members are so concerned. We all accept that there is a need for change in London, but the pace of change and the kind of change that is being proposed are wrong.

With regard to the Government's assumption about the improper use of resources, we all accept that primary care in London is underdeveloped, but the secondary care should not be taken away before the improvements in primary care are put in place.

Sir Rhodes Boyson (Brent, North): The proposals for Edgware hospital have probably given rise to the greatest cause for concern in my constituency in the 21 years that I have represented it. People in London have a certain expectation of their hospitals. They are used to having specialist hospitals—such as Bart's and Guy's—in the centre, with a spread of friendly little hospitals around. That is why they feel so strongly about Edgware hospital.

We all accept that there must be reorganisation. We all accept that experts must be consulted. But I do not believe in the rule of experts. Experts can change their minds. It was the experts who ruined education in Britain with the discovery method and comprehensivisation, from the shackles of which the Labour party is now freeing itself.

What worries me about my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, for whom I have obvious respect, is that she spends so much time talking about the experts rather than the people at the bottom of the pile who know what it is like in their area. The same applies to the size of schools and hospitals. Schools have now returned to their previous sizes. I have always said that in 10 years' time the present fashion will change, and change will be necessary.

Consultation has been mentioned. There has been no real consultation with the man and woman in the street, although various semi-quango committees have given their opinions. Perhaps ordinary people should have written letters, gathered in the streets or marched. In any event, the lack of consultation with them has made the position more difficult.

I have been re-reading some of what has been said about elective dictatorship. A Parliament is elected for five years; a large number of us are members of the Government, and a certain number are parliamentary private secretaries. They are all very good people; I am surrounded by them, so I am living dangerously. The Executive, however, has taken over Parliament, and it has become more difficult to ask whether the system is working and whether it is possible to do things in a certain way.

Between 1986 and 1990, Edgware's accident and emergency department was rebuilt; three years later, its future was threatened and it began to be run down. It seems that, if we live long enough, we are bound to be in fashion at some point.

Leadership means convincing our constituents that we are acting in accordance with their best interests. I accept that that is difficult when it comes to the health service. Last week, the mayors of our three boroughs came to the House. They were seen not by the Secretary of State or the Minister of State, but by the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville). Bolton must be a good place; certainly the football has not been too bad this year. What the mayors reported to the council, however, did not make the council feel very confident that its views had been properly represented. Some higher contact would have been useful.

Another problem is travel. It takes 45 minutes to travel from Edgware to Northwick Park on the 83 bus, and it costs 80p; it costs about £1.20 to travel to Barnet, and the journey can take up to an hour and a quarter. By that time, a person could be dead. As for ambulances, we do not know when they will arrive—and how fast they can move through the street: in many instances, they can move no faster than a bus. If an ambulance is stuck behind a bus for 10 minutes, there may be another two fatalities in that time.

A letter that I received this week from a rabbi in my constituency shows the level of concern. He wrote that the closure of Edgware general hospital would "not only put at risk the lives of my own members, but also of all the residents of Brent . . . I therefore earnestly request that you make known our concerns at the highest levels. It seems totally criminal that the Government is determined to effect their policies, without any regard for the welfare of the population."

That is the feeling not just of the rabbi and his congregation, but of many people in the area. If we are to get things right, a good deal of public relations and change will be necessary in Edgware and elsewhere. I hope that the Department will see to that in the morning, and will consider what we can do in Edgware to set people's minds at rest.

In the current circumstances, I cannot support the Government tonight. It gives me no pleasure to say that, but we are debating a major issue, and I speak on behalf of my constituents. I hope that there will be further discussions in the long term, which will reassure both them and me.

7.4 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I have probably discussed the Black Paper of the right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) with him for as long as 30 years. I believe that he would be a much better author of a White Paper on health than the Secretary of State.

I wish, however, to return to the point made by the right hon. Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke). Exactly six weeks ago, he, my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) and I attended on the Secretary of State to beg for a different decision on east London. I think that the right hon. Gentleman struck the right note: in this debate, constituency interest has properly overridden older and, perhaps, more permanent loyalties.

I believe that the health service reflects—in the minds and hearts of the people of this country—the common faith shared by some hon. Members: the same faith that motivated St. Bartholomew. Some of us could deliver sermons about what has happened to saints in the past—and, indeed, to the originator of our faith. We might draw parallels with what is happening to St Bartholomew's hospital.

I do not think that the Secretary of State understands what she is about. I try not to say anything about people that I am not willing to say to their faces. Some time ago, when the right hon. Lady was struggling to give answers to questions on a statement, a benign Opposition voice shouted, "Come on Virginia, you can do better than that." "Oh no, she can't," someone said. I am afraid that that is true of the right hon. Lady's performance.

The Government amendment refers to benefits to be gained from "new and better services". That may apply to some services, but far more are worsening and diminishing. Newham general hospital has only seven posts of an establishment of 11 in its accident and emergency department. In the past few weeks I have learnt that it is not a requirement of the Royal College of Surgeons for qualified surgeons seeking membership to serve in such departments. I learned that from a parliamentary answer given by the Minister of State. What on earth has the Secretary of State done about it? Surely the Royal College of Surgeons recognises that such service is a national duty—but, if it does not, the right hon. Lady should have advertised the fact, and perhaps changed the policy of the college.

The Secretary of State's plans consist entirely of projections—the projections of Tomlinson, the King's fund and so forth. We have heard a great deal about her projections in regard to the ambulance service. I have said time and again that they were inadequate and that the Secretary of State had got it wrong; I have been told, "Oh no, it is all right. We have the funds." After five or six years, an extra £14 million had to be injected into a service that is nowhere near as complicated as the health service as a whole. If the right hon. Lady and her colleagues have got it wrong in regard to the ambulance service—and they have, to the tune of £14 million—how can we expect them to get it right in regard to beds in London? I do not believe that we can.

On 26 April, I secured a half-hour debate in which I made various accusations about what was going on. The Minister was good enough to write to me and did not deny some of the points that I made. I mentioned Homerton hospital. Despite the warnings, the right hon. Lady has lauded it to the skies when clearly it is not adequate for the task.

In her speech, the right hon. Lady mentioned the London chest hospital. I agree with her. Why should people come from Plymouth to be treated at the London chest hospital, which deals with respiratory diseases—a problem that is on the upturn in London, particularly among children? They should not have to do so, but people from Petticoat lane will not be treated there, because the hospital is being closed. The Minister cannot deny that fact.

Nor can the Minister deny the fact that a teenager desperately in need of psychiatric assistance had to be put in a police cell in Newham because secure accommodation was not available, and that 250,000 people in the borough of Newham had one psychiatrist in post a week or so ago. For all I know, that position continues today. The right hon. Lady, those who advise her and those who support her have no grip of what is really going on.

I refer now to the speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor). A deeper malaise has yet to be identified. Surely within the organisation of the health service, a number of vicious, declining spirals exist. Units, trusts, authorities—all of them have had their marching orders. Because of that, they are unable to co-ordinate together.

Health provision is not a business. Sainsbury's and Boots provide only what they wish to provide, unless they prescribe medicine. They take goods, cut them up, put them on the shelf, freeze, process and transport them. There is a willing buyer and a willing seller—that is the market. But each of us is unique in our health requirements. Health provision is a service, not a business, and in their White Paper entitled "Working for Patients" the Government have tried to turn what was essentially a service into a business.

Last Monday, I could not rejoice. The post-war period was one of consensus. I know that party differences existed, but for nearly 40 years from about 1950 to about 1990 a consensus existed among the people of this country and in the House about the national health service. I hope that we get it back because it has been shattered, as have other services. The health service especially affects the needs of the elderly and of women.

I could not rejoice last Monday because we have lost the unity for which those who died and those who risked their lives strove. We have lost it in the House. I hope that we can get it back, that the debate will enable us to do so and that many Conservative Members who share something of that vision will decline to support the Government in the Lobby tonight.

Mrs. Marion Roe (Broxbourne): As Chairman of the Select Committee on Health, I should first like to inform the House of what the Committee has been doing in connection with London's health service. Its members have not only conducted an inquiry into London's ambulance service and prepared a report, which is about to be published, but kept a watching brief on the implementation of the proposals in the Tomlinson report. We have taken oral evidence from Sir Bernard Tomlinson and his team, the Secretary of State for Health, Department of Health officials, Sir Tim Chessells, the former chairman of the London Implementation Group, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport when he was Minister for Health.

As our evidence-taking sessions are in public and frequently televised, we believe that the questioning of our witnesses provides the opportunity for greater understanding of the issues, both inside and outside Parliament. We shall interview my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health tomorrow afternoon, when no doubt my colleagues will probe for further clarification and information on the controversial matter of London's health services.

We have visited many London hospitals on fact-finding missions—Bart's, Guy's, St. Thomas's, Kings College, Charing Cross, Westminster and Chelsea, the Royal Marsden, Queen Elizabeth hospital for children and Hammersmith. This morning, we visited the Edgware and Barnet hospitals. We have arranged to visit London hospital and St. Mary's, Paddington within the next few weeks. You can therefore see, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the future of the national health service in London has an important place in the programme of the Committee, and we shall give it the focus that it deserves in the future.

As a Member of Parliament for a constituency in Hertfordshire, I am acutely aware of the reasons why so many reports have been commissioned on the future of London's hospitals—20 in all. Immediately before the war, the resident population of Greater London was nearly 9 million; today it is 6.9 million. Londoners have moved out of the capital to new towns, the home counties and beyond. It was deliberate Government policy to encourage a shift in the population out of inner-city areas.

I know from personal experience that those former Londoners now wish to receive high-quality health care where they live today, not where they and their families used to live. They do not wish to travel considerable distances into London for hospital services that are more expensive and less convenient than local services.

It has always been a bone of contention in Hertfordshire that, over many years, the NHS funding available through the regional health authority was being drawn into London, and that our area was underfunded as a result. In truth, there has been resentment that London's hospitals have taken more than their fair share in the allocation of resources. I make that point because I fear that that important aspect of the debate is frequently forgotten or ignored.

So often we hear only of complaint, accusations of failure and gloom and doom in relation to London's health services, yet some outstanding successes should be recognised—for example, St. Mary's NHS trust, covering St. Mary's hospital, Paddington. The trust has achieved a balanced budget for four years in succession. It has treated 57,023 patients in 1994-95—an increase of 2 per cent. on the previous year. It has cut the average waiting time for an operation to four months. It treated 8 per cent. more people as in-patients and day-care cases in 1994-95 compared with 1992-93. It has treated 40 per cent. more cardiac patients since 1992-93. It has taken 40 per cent. more kidney failure patients on to its end-stage renal failure programme, including dialysis and kidney transplant, since 1992-93. It has treated 15 per cent. more people in accident and emergency in 1994-95 compared with 1992-93. There has also been a 20 per cent. increase in ophthalmic accident and emergency cases. It has cut by 10 per cent. the number of non-clinical managers, although many are clinically qualified. It has appointed a woman chief executive, who was formerly the hospital's chief nurse.

The trust has introduced a number of successful innovative services at St. Mary's. For example, as one of the first hospitals in the United Kingdom to establish a general practitioner's service located in the A and E department, St. Mary's is committed to the increased effectiveness of that model of care. I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will understand that a mobile local population, many of whom are not registered with a GP, can gain access to appropriate primary care, and that GPs and hospitals benefit from increased co-operation and understanding.

St. Mary's has developed a number of new services provided on an out-patient basis and designed according to the needs of patients and their GPs. The new one-stop breast care service allows GPs to refer patients with palpable lumps to a clinic where they will be seen within a week. The multi-disciplinary approach incorporates a consultant cytologist, a consultant radiologist, a specialist breast surgeon, an oncologist and a specially trained breast care nurse specialist. It is designed so that patients are supported through the necessary steps to determine their condition. Tests are performed on the same day so that concerned patients can be reassured or treated as quickly as possible.

St. Mary's has undertaken a successful pilot to make pathology test results available immediately to GPs in the surgery. Using simple technology and incorporating existing equipment, an effective link has been tried and tested. That system will result in NHS savings where the need for duplicate tests by a hospital doctor and GP will be removed.

Cited frequently as a blueprint for other units, the minor injuries unit at St. Charles' hospital, which opened in 1993, is one of the first of its type. One thousand patients per month have used the new nurse-led unit, which offers quick and effective care.

St. Mary's has developed an innovative policy of integrated care pathways for individual patients, which ensures that patients can be discharged as soon as their condition allows and with a high level of follow-up care and treatment. A discharge planning group, which reviews and changes practices both within the hospital and in social services, has reduced lost bed days dramatically during the past two years. Not only does that benefit patients: it increases the number of beds available for new cases.

Patients are brought from across the United Kingdom, often using an air ambulance, to the very specialist paediatric intensive care unit at St. Mary's. The trust continues to pioneer care for very sick children and it commands an international reputation for excellence. It has demonstrated its commitment to that specialist service by investing to increase to six the number of PICU beds during 1995-96.

St. Mary's is a centre of excellence for the provision of care to cardiology patients and those requiring cardiac surgery. About 1,000 cardiac cases will undergo surgery during 1995-96 and they will receive a service among the best in the world. Patients wait an average of just two months for surgery. Care is patient focused, including a pre-admission visit where patients and their carers or family watch a video, meet nursing and medical staff and have an opportunity to share their concerns in a familiar and supportive environment. Surgery is followed through with a rehabilitation support group.

The trust has taken steps to increase the number of ophthalmology patients treated effectively on a day-care basis at the Western eye hospital. A newly formed department using highly trained, existing hospital staff to provide answers, advice and support to patients, visitors, carers, family, friends, general practitioners and purchasers has been set up. It includes a free phone care line. In addition, the trust has even managed to pay the nurses' pay award in full.

I believe that hospitals that achieve should be rewarded. It can be bad for morale when hospitals that seem to be profligate or inefficient are apparently rewarded with additional cash and support, while those that demonstrate tough management are not. When doctors and nurses make sacrifices and change working practices, their efforts should be recognised. We seem to hear not much good news about health services in the capital, but there are hospitals that have not only embraced the health reforms but have actually proved that they can and do work to the benefit of patients.

My Committee and I look forward to welcoming my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State before us tomorrow so that this debate can be further explored.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): The reality of life in London is that there is a long and frustrating wait for operations that involves great pain, causes stress to immediate family and friends, and means the loss of very many working days. The waiting list in London now totals more than 180,000. The health service in London simply is not working. The staff are strained to the point of breaking, while those desperate for an operation cannot get one.

The information provided throughout this debate and the numerous inquiries into London's health service leads to one inescapable conclusion—that the experience of most Londoners is of constant closures, threats and a decline in the local health service and the ability to obtain treatment from it.

Professor Jarman, who has frequently challenged both Government statistics and the Tomlinson inquiry, has provided information showing that 7,000 beds were closed between 1982 and 1990. More than 3,200 have been closed since 1990. In 1982, London health districts had 26,000 acute hospital beds; there are now only 17,000, with plans to close even more. The number of long-stay beds for the elderly has dropped to 6,000 and the number of psychiatric beds has been reduced by 3,000 over the past three years.

The list goes on and on—yet the Secretary of State heads blindly towards oblivion, telling us that somehow or other things are getting better, that it is all an Opposition plot, and that we exaggerate the problem. The problem is there, it is real and it is very serious.

The debate has been presented as though there is some competition between London and the rest of the country. There is nothing of the kind. We are not discussing the centres of excellence, the specialties or the fact that people have to travel to London for such treatment; we are discussing ordinary people with ordinary illnesses who need good hospitals. Those hospitals are constantly threatened with closure.

We must recognise that in London, as in the rest of the country, no real planning is taking place in the health service. It is impossible to plan if the health service is run by the pressures of an internal market economy, where the buck is passed from the Secretary of State to her junior Ministers, to the district health authorities, to the health service trusts and then back to the Department. The merry-go-round goes round and round. The London group of Labour Members recently interviewed the two regional chairs, but all they told us was that they were sending things back to the districts. Nobody takes responsibility.

When questions are asked of the Secretary of State, we are told that apparently no figures are kept centrally on anything any more. We are told to write to our health authorities, but they tell us to get in touch with the Secretary of State. They think that it is easier for us to meet her than it is for them to do so. Unfortunately, they have rather serious illusions about the power of parliamentarians.

The closures that we are debating this evening are tragic beyond belief. Many of my constituents in Islington, North and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) use, love and cherish Bart's hospital—not just because it is 800 years old, not just because of its traditions and excellence, but because it provides a good service. The closure of Bart's is a monstrous act of vandalism. There is no other way to describe it. The same is true of other hospital closures.

The knock-on effect of the closure of Bart's is enormous. It has already been felt in casualty units, and in the waiting lists that are developing elsewhere. The same is true with the closure of Guy's, Edgware and the Brook. The closures are wrong, they are not necessary, and they do not even save money. Indeed, the cost of closure is far greater than any potential savings.

In previous debates, I have referred to hospital closures in my borough—for example, the Royal Northern hospital. Before I was elected to this place, there was a huge campaign to defend that hospital's casualty unit. One of the first pieces of correspondence I received as a new Member of Parliament in 1983 was from the then Minister, the hon. Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan), saying that the Government were withdrawing their previous undertaking to maintain the Royal Northern, and that it would be closed. The hospital has been closed, and the site sold for property development. It has not even been sold for social development.

There were pleas from the Islington Pensioners Forum and many other people to provide nurse-managed beds at the Royal Northern. Indeed, I raised the matter with the Minister during one of our previous debates. Nevertheless, the concerns and the demand were brushed aside, the hospital closed and the site sold to the highest bidder. Of course, highest bidders are those who can afford to speculate with their money on property development; they are not elderly people who need somewhere with nurse-managed beds where they can recuperate from treatment. The opportunity to provide that service has now been lost.

We need to consider the problems facing the emergency service. I wrote to the Minister on 21 March requesting a meeting after cancer patients had been turned away from the Whittington hospital because the emergency service had taken over several wards at that hospital following the closure of Bart's, which had forced patients to look to the emergency service. The casualty unit is working at more than 100 per cent. capacity.

One morning recently, 16 people were waiting on trolleys to be treated—but there was even a waiting list to get on a trolley. Some nine people had to wait for a trolley even before they had to wait to be treated.

The Government always say that the alternative to overcrowding and to the pressure on hospitals is to develop primary care facilities. It is not either/or—we need hospital facilities and primary care facilities. We need more GPs, better GP facilities, better primary care and far better health education. We also need to understand some of the causes of people becoming ill, such as the number of homeless, unemployed or very poor people in London.

I speak proudly as a member of Unison, and I think that we must look at the work that is done by the staff in hospitals. Morale in hospitals is at breaking point. Ancillary staff and manual workers are earning less in cash terms than they were many years ago, and their jobs are put up for sale to the lowest bidder every so often as the contractors try to move in and take over their jobs.

One has to wonder who is running the health service, and in whose interests it is being run. An attempt has been made by the Secretary of State to break up national pay bargaining, and to tell local hospitals that they must fund 2 per cent. of the 3 per cent. nurses' pay rise. What is going on is simply wrong. We must look ahead.

The Secretary of State says that the Labour party has no policies on the matter. I shall tell her straight—we have a lot of policies on health. First, we must address the democratic deficit in the running of the health service in London. No one knows who the members of the district health authorities are. They are faceless people, who are carrying out the Government's policies. We need a democratic, Londonwide health authority, and the necessary planning which goes into that.

We must also look at the poverty which people in London face. One of the most interesting documents I have read recently was the chief medical officer for health's report on Camden and Islington. The report showed that the borough's mortality rate was 25 per cent. above the national average, and that the borough had higher rates of infant mortality, drug abuse and homelessness. That is not unusual to my borough, and it can be replicated in borough after borough across London. We need some understanding of the causes of ill health in London, which are in part the environment and in part poverty. The health service in London must be able to meet those needs.

I conclude by referring to a letter which I received from the Islington Pensioners Forum, which I believe was sent to many inner London Members of Parliament. The secretary of the organisation, Angela Sinclair, said:

"The pensioners have paid for the NHS through national health insurance all their working lives, and that they depend on it in their old age. They feel bitterly let down when chunks of the family silver are sold off."

That is a plea to keep Bart's and the other hospitals open, and to develop a health service in London that we can be proud of and upon which we will be able to rely.

Sir John Gorst (Hendon, North): I acknowledge the need for reform, and there can be no doubt that it is necessary. But it must be done with flexibility, not rigidity. It is a difficult problem, and one might say that what is important is not so much what one does, but how one does it.

I do not overlook the importance of preserving the national monuments—the hospitals such as Guy's and Bart's. They have been described as international centres of excellence, but I personally regard them as medical cathedrals, because they attract talent from all over the world. Other hon. Members—particularly my right hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke)—are greater experts on Guy's.

I will concentrate my remarks on the accident and emergency department in Edgware general hospital in my constituency. I would like to confine my remarks to amplifying four points which I made on 5 April, to which the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) referred.

When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State answered questions on the London closures, I said that closing Edgware hospital was "doing the wrong thing, in the wrong way, at the wrong time and in the wrong place".—[Official Report, 5 April 1995; Vol. 257, c. 1738.]

At the outset, I shall make one concession—if that is the right word—to the Government. I recognise that they have addressed themselves belatedly to both the timing and the manner of the closures. They were important considerations, but they were not relevant to the central issues. Of course it was never right to scrap an accident and emergency department until something was up and running in its place. I welcome the Government's willingness to correct that. But we must recognise that that is a palliative, or perhaps I might say a sedative. It is not a concession.

However much of a delay there may be before the closure takes place, regardless of the improvements in ambulance performances, and taking into full account the expanded capacity at alternative hospitals, the very distance and remoteness of those hospitals remains an obstacle to people living in Edgware. In short, we are left with an insuperable argument against closure. The measures are being taken in the wrong place, and will affect the wrong people. That is why 40,000 petitioners have united with one voice against the proposals.

I have repeatedly tried to point out to my right hon. Friend that Edgware general hospital has certain unique features. I have pleaded and argued for 18 months behind closed doors that those features should be recognised. As we are now discussing the matter publicly, I may regret those discussions, but I make no apologies.

Edgware general hospital serves an area with special social problems, and that is why the outcry has been so loud and so angry, and may perhaps be so prolonged. People on low incomes live within walking distance of the hospital, as do a large proportion of elderly and disabled people, many of whom are housed in purpose-built accommodation because of their disabilities. A significant number of refugee immigrants from troubled parts of Africa, with their attendant health and language problems, are also housed near the hospital.

To force those hard-pressed citizens—few of whom have their own transport—to struggle to find medical attention in an emergency not a few steps away from their doors but up to an hour away is a blind and, in my view, insensitive form of planning. After all the Government's palliatives, postponements and assurances, people on low incomes and elderly people will still be living there, and onerous travel will still be something that they have to face. As there have been no meaningful concessions by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, I shall be voting against the Government tonight.

I am not impressed by the emollient Government amendments, which are couched in what I must describe as blandly seductive language. Beyond the confines of Westminster, the niceties of who tabled what, and whether the amendments were expressed in harsh or moderate terms, is immaterial. Through the media, everyone knows that the vote tonight is about whether certain hospital facilities will be closed or kept open. My vote will be for the latter. The provenance of the motion is of secondary importance to the achievement of the objective.

The debate is significant in two respects. First, are the Government going to prove to everyone that they really mean what they say about listening to people at the grass roots? In the case of Edgware, that means listening to what 40,000 petitioners have been asking for.

Secondly, we in this House must be responsive to something more than cost-efficiency and clinical factors. We must acknowledge the weight that must be accorded to ordinary people's fears, desires, prejudices and conveniences. We are their servants, not their masters. Through their taxes, they pay the bill for what we run up on their behalf. The demands of those who elect us may outstrip the economies which Ministers' deskbound advisers think prudent. Obviously, Ministers must heed such cautious advice as they receive but, in the final analysis, they must also balance and reconcile it with what ordinary people want.

I therefore end my speech with this observation: human beings, not balance sheets, come first.

7.39 pm

Ms Margaret Hodge (Barking): For every London Member, today's debate is of critical importance. The blinkered destruction of the national health service in the capital, driven by dogma and devoid of common sense, will leave the people of our capital not with a first-rate health service fit for the 21st century, as the Government proclaim, but with a second-rate two-tier service, where money means more than lives, and where flashy computers are valued more highly than the Dr. Kildares of the past.

Like others, I listened to the Secretary of State on the radio yesterday morning when she talked enthusiastically about how the changes in London's health services have been driven by the needs of technology. The Opposition have called this debate because we want a health service that is driven by the needs of the people. That is the fundamental principle on which the health service was founded almost half a century ago, and we reaffirm that principle today. Technology should be the servant of humanity, not its master.

What do the Government's proposals mean to ordinary people? I am currently dealing with three tragic deaths in my constituency, which, on the face of it, could have been avoided had the health service not been ravaged and fragmented. That is shocking. I am just one Member of Parliament; I do not know how representative my caseload is, but never a surgery goes by without three or four people coming to see me with yet more desperate stories of delays and incompetence in the local health service in dealing with their health needs.

At its most devastating, there are the deaths. In January this year, a constituent, Maria Ayling, died tragically at her home in Barking. She was only 20, and she died of a deep-vein thrombosis in her leg. She had been desperately trying to get into hospital for nearly two months before she died. Had she been seen and properly diagnosed, her untimely death could have been avoided.

Last Friday, I met the chief executive of Redbridge Healthcare, along with Maria's father and his solicitor. The day after Maria died, a letter arrived from the hospital giving her an appointment. It is not just the hospital that is to blame in this case; what the chief executive said about that letter says it all about the state of our national health service.

Maria was given the appointment not because the hospital had finally realised that she needed urgent medical care, but because the purchasing authority had unexpectedly released more money so that more people could be seen and new appointments made. That appointment came too late for Maria. What an indictment. That tragic case well illustrates the current state of the health service in London. It is always worth while reminding ourselves of the human reality that lies behind the statistics, which is what the Government fail to do.

Tonight, the focus is on north London, but what is happening in north London is also happening in east London. It is a national scandal that the Government determine their programme of hospital closures on the basis of simply buying another Tory Member's vote and thus buying another discredited day in government. That is Tory decibel planning at its worst. It is not just the closure of the A and E services at Edgware that matter, but the closure of A and E departments across the capital. If it is wrong for one constituency, it is wrong throughout the capital, and all hon. Member have a duty to their constituents to vote with us tonight.

My constituency has no hospital. The Government closed Barking hospital, despite a vigorous campaign led by my predecessor, Jo Richardson. The borough of Barking and Dagenham has no hospital, as the other hospital was also closed by the Government, and soon we shall lose our next nearest hospital, Oldchurch.

Despite universal condemnation, Ministers have decided to go ahead with the closure of the A and E department at Oldchurch. Hon. Members on both sides of the House, including the hon. Members for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) and for Romford (Sir M. Neubert), have said that they oppose that proposed closure. If they mean it, they will vote with us to-night. If they do not, their constituents will know that they are not prepared to defend the national health service in their areas.

Closing accident and emergency departments is the most disastrous and dishonest way for the Government to proceed. If the A and E department of any hospital is closed, that hospital is condemned to a slow and painful death. Most admissions come through the A and E route; if those admissions are stopped, under the rigidities of the market, unit costs will increase, and the hospital will price itself out of existence and be forced to close. The Government do not even have the guts to tell us the truth

When they close the A and E department at Oldchurch, Bart's or Edgware, they are passing the death sentence on those well-loved and much-needed hospitals.

"But ah!" the Secretary of State will say. "We're opening minor injuries units to serve local communities." Those are another con. The minor injuries units will not even be able to set a broken leg. If all they can do is stitch cuts, that service should be provided by GPs in modern surgeries, and it is no substitute for an emergency unit.

If the vote of hon. Members from north London has been bought by the promise of a minor injuries unit, they have been conned. The units will do nothing for those who need an emergency service. They will still have to travel much further; they will still be dependent on the inadequacies of the London ambulance service; and they will still be transported far from their homes and families, as doctors desperately hunt for an empty bed. Primary health facilities are simply not in place to take over the burden created by the closure of hospitals.

Let us look at the reality facing real people in real communities like mine in Barking. "Don't worry about losing Oldchurch," we are told. "There's always Newham, Harold Wood and King George's." This morning, I rang those hospitals to establish whether, on their most recent figures, they could cope. As we know, and as the Secretary of State persistently refuses to acknowledge, they could not cope on the Minister's guidelines for an acceptable occupancy level.

Newham hospital told me that its occupancy level is over 100 per cent. It had to open 46 extra emergency beds to cope with the pressure from Homerton, which could not cope with the pressure caused by the closure of Bart's. Havering hospitals are running at nearly 96 per cent. occupancy and, on Friday, King George's was running at 93 per cent. occupancy.

The knock-on effect of other closures in that chaotic and fragmented market will add pressure on those hospitals. For example, closing Bart's will mean added pressure on the London hospital, which will therefore have to push people towards Newham hospital from the west, while we add pressure on Newham from the east with the closure at Oldchurch.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Ms Hodge: No, I do not have time.

Opposition Members do not deny the need for change in the pattern of health services in London. What we oppose is the headlong rush for change being pursued with such zealousness by the Secretary of State. There are simply not enough beds, and there is a critical and urgent need to stop, think and listen, before the Government destroy what we all value. Our plea to every hon. Member, and particularly to the Secretary of State, is this: take the medicine of listening; swallow hard, and do the right thing—and withdraw the inept, penny-pinching proposals to close yet more hospitals.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): I have been involved in public life in London for a good many years now and I am pleased to speak in this important and serious debate. The subject has engendered a great deal of discussion in this Chamber and other parts of the House for a long time between my colleagues and me and the Secretary of State and her junior Ministers, so there has been no lack of serious discussion of the points behind it.

In studying the history of health discussion in this place, it is interesting to note tha. the subject of London health and London hospitals has been turned over for at least 100 years. There is on record a report on the subject from a Select Committee of the other place in 1892. As the Government's amendment to the motion on the Order Paper says, the discussion has been going on seriously for 80 years. In a recent letter to The Times, Lord Annan recollects very serious discussion going on for 30 years.

The fact which repeatedly emerges from accounts of that debate is that on all occasions there has been a strong argument for changing the pattern of health treatment in London—the hospitals and the primary care of our people. In an account that I have read in the past few days, a professor at the university of York who studied the subject concludes:

"the ... problems ... have remained largely unresolved for lack of political courage."

Unfortunately, that message has been expressed to me many times by people who, although they may not be so passionately involved in the subject as hon. Members on both sides of the House naturally are, nevertheless realise that there has been a fundamental change in the population patterns in our capital city and in the various needs for treatment.

Unquestionably, the London hospital pattern suited the needs of the past. The large hospitals in central London were set up many years ago to treat serious ailments on behalf of the country. That is no longer the position. As many colleagues have said earlier, people now want to be treated closer to their homes and progress in the technology of surgery and in the technology of treating ailments has made that possible. That is at the root of the Government's health reform policies.

Tonight we are discussing the pattern of health care in London, and we must concentrate on that, especially those of us who are London Members, but we must also heed the cries of colleagues on both sides of the House—most of whom, admittedly, are Conservative Members—for resources to flow out of London to their constituents, who previously may well have been transported to central London to be treated at Bart's or Guy's or St. Thomas's or any of the other great hospitals.

Mr. Mackinlay: The Government are even closing accident and emergency departments outside London.

Mr. Tracey: There has been a change, as I said, in the pattern of treatment.

I do not believe that any Members of the House have sufficient knowledge to disagree with the President of the Royal College of Surgeons or the President of the Royal College of Physicians. They are on record as saying that, because there are now methods of day surgery, methods of cold surgery and various other forms of treatment for many ailments, allowing patients to be treated quickly so that they may leave hospital and return to their homes, we no longer need the vast number of acute beds that were previously required.

Therefore, conclusions have been drawn, in all the studies commissioned by the Government, including the one by Sir Bernard Tomlinson—backed up, incidentally, by Professor Jarman, who has been quoted by Opposition

[Mr. Tracey]

Members—that the pattern of surgery is changing and there may not be so great a need for acute beds as there once was.

The hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) made a sedentary intervention about accident and emergency departments. A wealth of study and research—carried out not only in this country but in other parts of the world, in war zones and in other large conurbations on the other side of the Atlantic and so on—shows that the pattern of accident and emergency treatment is no longer the same as might once have been considered necessary.

A fact which emerges from those studies is that one of the most important aspects is to bring paramedic treatment to the scene of an accident as soon as possible. Studies undertaken in the United States of America show that, when paramedics reach the scene quickly, with properly equipped ambulances—in London, paramedics do not necessarily need ambulances because there are high-powered motor cycles to take them to the scene of the accident—the treatment they administer at the scene can do a great deal more to help save a life or prevent serious injury and its consequences for those unfortunate people than simply sending an ambulance and rushing them to hospital as soon as possible.

The evidence is there. Documentation is in the Department of Health—I believe that it has also been deposited in the Library—showing that accident and emergency treatment of that newly researched type is more successful than maintaining a proliferation of A and E departments in every hospital throughout the capital.

The Government have suggested to my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) and my hon. Friends the Members for Hendon, North (Sir J. Gorst), for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) and for Finchley (Mr. Booth), that the proposals for the hospitals in their constituencies may well solve many of the problems that they have rightly drawn to the attention of the Secretary of State. Obviously, that is a problem for them to resolve, and I have every sympathy with them in trying to resolve it in the best possible way for their constituents.

The hospital which treats my constituents and those of my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont) is Kingston hospital, which has grown in stature and expertise in the past few years. There has been considerable investment in the maternity unit—£7.5 million in recent times—which is much welcomed by local people. A sum of £1.5 million has also been spent on the Royal Eye hospital unit in Kingston hospital. As part of the reforms, there have also been considerable improvements in primary care in our part of south-west London. Ninety-four per cent. of the population of the Kingston and Richmond health authority are now treated by general practitioners who are fundholders. We have the largest percentage of fundholders, who have accepted that important advance in health care, in our part of London.

The reforms must progress. They should be pursued with resolve by the Secretary of State, and thereby the health of London will be considerably improved.

Ms Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): The hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) suggested that his constituents wish to be treated near where they live. That is also true for people who live in inner and outer London boroughs. They, too, wish to be treated near where they live.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Hendon, North (Sir J. Gorst), who was an example to every Member of the House in the way in which he defended so honestly and openly the interests of his constituents and, I thought, even more, the interests of some of his most vulnerable constituents.

That is true for all of us, because we are attempting to defend people who, in many instances, are suffering from illnesses that they do not understand or are recovering from accidents which, by their very nature, came upon them when they were unprepared. To exacerbate those people's concerns by possibly making them travel for treatment to an area that they do not know, which makes it difficult for relatives to visit them to offer comfort as they recover, acts against the basic tenets of medicine and health care.

The hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe), in her guise as Chairman of the Select Committee on Health, gave us a comprehensive list of the London hospitals that she intends to visit and listed the witnesses from whom the Select Committee intends to take evidence. I hope that the Select Committee will also find time to take evidence from a constituent who earlier today submitted a green card asking to meet me. When I went out to Central Lobby, she told me of her grave concern about the outcome of the debate. She works in the cancer department at Bart's hospital and I am afraid that I could not reassure her that the outcome of the debate would be that Bart's will continue to flourish and to serve people as it has done for 800 years. She is a dedicated worker in the national health service and she told me that what is happening within the NHS in London is "a disgrace", to use her words. She cited instances where people suffering from cancer have had to wait more than four weeks even for an appointment, let alone any kind of treatment.

I regret that my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) is not in his place, as he made a salient point about the availability of health care, which impacts on all hon. Members who represent inner London constituencies. He said that there is obviously a need for primary health care in London, but an equal need for hospital health care. He argued that the health care provided for millions of Londoners at accident and emergency departments should continue to be offered until primary health care facilities are up and running.

As he said, it is not an either-or situation. Undoubtedly, it could end up as a neither-nor one, because many people in London—possibly hundreds of thousands—are not registered with any general practitioner. They look to the A and E departments of their local hospitals for treatment. If those departments are closed, some of the most vulnerable people in London will be left without any health care at all.

Various figures have been bandied today about the actual population of London. Some Conservative Members have argued that, since 1979, which seems to be a watershed for some of them, the London population has fallen. The hon. Member for Kensington (Mr.

Fishburn) made a valid point, however, when he said that the population of London is not just made up of those who are residents, but includes the vast influx every morning of those who work in our capital city. They, too, require health care and health services when they are in what could be deemed the city of London, even though they live outside it.

In the past few years, there has also been a great influx of people looking for work and for homes in London. In many cases they appear on no register or census. My constituency seems to have an increasing population of homeless men. In many cases their homelessness has been exacerbated by problems occasioned by drug and alcohol misuse. It is extremely difficult for them to obtain any kind of medical treatment unless they register with a GP. In many cases pride, foolish though it may be, prevents them from doing so. They can, however, use the facilities that are provided by A and E units.

My central concern undoubtedly rests with the hospitals in my constituency, the Royal Free and the Whittington. We hear about restructuring day by day—on occasions, it seems like hour by hour—including the closure of Bart's and the possible closure of the A and E department at Edgware. If such facilities are lost, the hospitals in my constituency will be expected to take up the slack. They will be expected to be able to provide services for the sick and those involved in accidents.

Camden and Islington health authority has been told by the Department of Health that, in the next five years, it must look to a reduction of £25 million in its budget. I have asked the Secretary of State directly where the money will come from to expand facilities, as will be necessary, at the Royal Free and at the Whittington and to pay for the additional staff, but answer comes there none.

I add my voice to those of other hon. Members who have urged the Secretary of State to call a halt to the seemingly mindless rush to change existing health care provision in London. As my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms Hodge) has already said, we are talking about the treatment of patients—individual human beings. It is their needs that we attempt to serve through the NHS in London.

I regret that the Secretary of State is not in her place. Surely she can take on board what constituency Members from London hear day in and day out, not only from our constituents but from people who are daily at the sharp end of NHS delivery in London. They all say that there is something wrong with that service provision. Day in and day out, we hear that the NHS in London is under inhuman pressure and that, in many cases, it is beyond the point of restitution and is suffering from internal decay. We are told that it is failing to do that which it was set up to deliver and to which those people who have dedicated their lives to working in it are still committed: to make the ill well and to ease the suffering of those who, for whatever reason, are particularly vulnerable.

I urge the Secretary of State to listen. She has been asked by hon. Members on both sides of the House to listen to the people who know best—not just the patients who use the health service, but most definitely those people who provide that service.

8.7 pm

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) said that the health service was failing generally, but such characterisation is a great insult to the people who work in it. That has never been my experience of the health service when either I or my family have used it.

In the seven or so years in which I have been a Member of Parliament, I have seen improvements in NHS provision in my constituency. There are still some problems, which were highlighted today by the Opposition, but they have not offered us a shred of evidence that they have a policy to deal with those problems. One must warn the Labour party that shroud waving did it a disservice at the previous general election—it partly cost it that election—and that shroud waving does not win it any votes.

As we were told that this debate is a non-party political occasion—

Mr. Mackinlay: Eh?

Mr. Hughes: Yes, that is what we were told on the radio by the Opposition, who said that the debate was about the health service. Presumably that is why the leader of the Labour party did a photo-call at Bart's this morning and why the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) made such a highly political speech. I therefore thought that I would look back at the last debate on the health service when the Labour Government were in power.

On 15 March 1979, there was a debate in the House during which it was revealed that 600 hospitals were dealing only with emergencies, nine had closed completely and 5,500 beds were out of action. That did not cause cries of alarm at the time because that was an improvement on the situation when the House had last debated the subject the previous November. That is what the Labour party did to the health service when it was in government—it closed hospitals, reduced nurses' pay and cancelled the hospital building programme. Labour party members have no standing in this debate.

I came to the debate wondering on what evidence my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had based her plans to allow the closure of the accident and emergency department at Edgware. The subject has been covered disgracefully by the Evening Standard and by other media outlets. I heard a journalist on London News Radio say, "Doubtless the Secretary of State will provide an argument for the closure, if there is one." That is a disgraceful way to approach the debate.

I tabled a question to my right hon. Friend asking for the scientific evidence upon which she had based her decision. I put that evidence before the right hon. Member for Derby, South and my questions clearly caught her on the hop. The fact that she had not examined the scientific evidence proved the emptiness of her arguments. I think that that is a disgraceful performance by a leading Labour party spokesperson.

The review of that evidence is available in the Library of the House of Commons—it is not hidden away—so the right hon. Lady and her colleagues may examine it if they can be bothered. It talks about the relationship between the size of accident and emergency departments and clinical outcomes. If we are talking about providing the best possible health service, we must talk about clinical outcomes. What happens when people use the accident and emergency facilities? All the evidence suggests that more lives will be saved in the future when the changes are implemented. I put that point to the right hon. Lady, but she did not seem to understand it.

In 1992, the North West Thames task force suggested that accident and emergency departments with fewer than 50,000 new patients per year did not have the necessary throughput for cost-effective care. It said that departments should have the capacity to deal with at least 50,000 new attendances per year as smaller departments are unable to employ experienced staff at night and at weekends. I argue that this matter does not revolve around financial considerations; we must examine what happens when A and E departments are concentrated in one area.

The results of a survey carried out in Orange county in the United States indicated a severe reduction in the number of deaths judged preventable. Labour Members may read about it in the "Archives of Surgery"—which I think is rather more authentic than Labour party briefing notes read by Labour Members. [Interruption.] Labour Members should listen to this, because it is important for their constituents as well as my own.

In a one-year experience, trauma care in Orange county California, where patients were taken to the closest hospital, was evaluated and compared with San Francisco county where all trauma victims were brought to a single, centrally-located trauma centre. The survey concluded that

"73 per cent. of the non-CNS deaths in Orange County might have been prevented if the patients had been taken directly to a trauma centre".

That idea is not restricted to the United States; nor is it anything new. The hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge) suggested that the measures were being rushed through. It was first suggested in 1961 that there could be an advantage in changing the accident and emergency arrangements. That suggestion has been ignored many times since then by many Secretaries of State and I pay enormous tribute to my right hon. Friend for having the political strength and courage to carry through the reforms.

Residents in Edgware will be no more than five or six miles from an A and E department. I appreciate the traffic problems in that part of London and I will turn to that issue in a moment. Some £60 million is being invested to upgrade the Barnet general hospital.

A scare story has been circulated in my constituency that that will put extra pressure on the Northwick Park hospital. That sounds reasonable on the face of it, but it is not true. As was said earlier in the debate, 30 new beds have been opened at Northwick Park hospital this year and it is planned to open another 60 beds next year. Admissions through the accident and emergency department currently total 13,000 and it will have the capacity to deal with 16,500 admissions in April 1997—the date of the proposed changes at Edgware hospital.

In addition, Northwick Park hospital will employ more staff and the hospital is about to engage a second consultant in the accident and emergency department so that it has the expertise to enable it to realise the scientific evidence which indicates that large, well-staffed A and E departments will save lives.

I agree with the remarks by my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) about the lamentable record of the London ambulance service. The Pinner ambulance station in my constituency answers only 60 per cent. of calls within 14 minutes. Anyone who is familiar with the Harrow and Pinner area knows why that is so—the ambulances are concentrated on what must have been a very good site for that area many years ago, but it is no longer suitable. We need to disperse those ambulances. We need to implement some of the radical changes—I must explain it in shorthand because my time is brief—adopted by the Northumbria ambulance service.

It has made enormous improvements and I am sure that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) would confirm that fact. It has a first-class ambulance service, which is measurably the best in the country. If it is good enough for Northumbria, it is certainly good enough for London. I hope that the ambulance service will introduce radical changes and use the extra money wisely. The service would benefit from employing paramedics on motor bikes who would get medical assistance and equipment to accident victims quickly.

Mr. Stephen Timms (Newham, North-East): Six months ago, when we last debated the health service in London, I raised concerns about the future shape of community health services in east London. At that time deep anxiety was expressed about the proposal to have a single trust-run community health service for Newham, Tower Hamlets, Hackney and the City. I was delighted when the Government announced at the beginning of December that there would be three separate trusts, and I welcomed the Government's response to the points that were made during the debate.

We were anxious that there should be separate trusts in order to expose how much money was being spent in each of the three areas. Our suspicions about funding disparities were confirmed when advertisements for senior positions in each of the new trusts were published. The published budget for Newham per head of population was less than half of that for the rest of the area. That fact highlights the issue of health service funding in London upon which I shall concentrate my remarks this evening.

The Government's amendment to the Labour party's motion on the Order Paper

"commends the Government for its record in investing in . . . the long-term interest of . . . the people of London;"

That choice of words betrays a complacency which rings very hollow all over London. There is growing and compelling evidence, including work commissioned by the Government, that areas such as Newham are deeply under-resourced and yet are still being cut back further in the allocation of national resources.

Two weeks ago the King's Fund published a report, called for by the former Government chief medical officer, entitled, "Tackling Inequalities in Health". The report's conclusions were forthright and unequivocal. It says:

"People who live in disadvantaged circumstances have more illnesses, greater distress, more disability and shorter lives than those who are more affluent."

It continues:

"During the 1980s social divisions accelerated at a rate not matched for such a sustained period by any other rich industrialised country. Not surprisingly, the impact that this increase has had on health is now beginning to emerge. Death rates in some of the most disadvantaged areas in Britain not only worsened in relative terms between 1981 and 1991 . . . but among some age groups, such as young men, the death rates actually rose."

That cannot be accepted as just an unfortunate fact of life. It must be addressed by those responsible for the health service.

The King's Fund report also says:

"The injustice could be prevented but it will require political will. The situation could be substantially improved if the political will existed to recognise that tackling inequalities in health is a fundamental requirement to social justice for all citizens. The question is: can British policy makers rise to the challenge?"

We cannot afford to ignore that challenge. The spiral of poor health and under-achievement cannot be allowed to continue. The social and economic costs as well as the moral responsibility will be borne by us all.

In October, the Centre for Health Economics at the University of York reported to the Government on the distribution of health resources. Its findings were unambiguous. It said:

"The current formula (introduced in the early 1990s) has resulted in a shift of resources away from the poorer and sicker areas."

The York report produced a new capitation formula which would yield a significant shift of resources to the inner cities.

Tragically, the Government's response has been to water down that report and we are now told that in my area of east London we are to lose out even further when the Government's adaptation of the formula is fully in place. We will lose out by £14 million in a budget of £322 million. The pattern is the same elsewhere in inner London. It is a travesty of the York report's recommendations and the figures show that the Government are moving in the opposite direction to that recommended by the York team.

There is a crisis in the health service in London. Departing general practitioners cannot be replaced. In our accident and emergency unit at Newham general hospital, only seven of 11 vacant posts could be filled in the last recruitment round. The work load for many health workers is far greater than would be tolerated in more prosperous areas. There is a shortage of children's nurses, and orthopaedic wards have to rely on agency staff.

I want to raise deep concerns about what has happened to the funding that has been earmarked for primary care improvements in east London. The Secretary of State made a great deal about the need to redirect resources into primary care. We all welcome improvements in primary care and there is no doubt that, by one means or another, the Government have made some funds available. What has become of that money? Where are the improvements that it is supposed to bring?

I have with me an astonishing document. It is the latest district audit management letter on the City and East London family health services authority—the body that is charged with the responsibility for overseeing the primary care improvements that the Government have promised in east London. Those improvements are, without doubt, desperately needed. The document talks about the affairs of the authority and it says:

"there have been clear failures to recognise that there are legal limits on the powers of the FHSA . . . there have been instances where officers have maintained unofficial bank accounts in respect of FHSA funds . . . little regard was given to recommendations at audit for improving the management and financial affairs of the authority."

Those serious allegations are documented in the report, which goes on to conclude that "such failures have resulted in the consequent loss of scarce resources to health services in the area."

The document tells us that significant sums of money have been wasted.

I am aware that there have been personnel changes at that FHSA, but it has shown itself wholly unable to oversee the capital projects that the Government have required it to deliver and which the Government have promised to the people of east London.

The Star Lane medical centre in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) was allocated a grant of £1.9 million in the first year of the London implementation zone programme. Three years later there is no sign of a single brick being laid. I have tabled a parliamentary question asking where that money now resides.

This morning I received a letter from the Newham GP forum which says:

"We are at the bottom of a major recruitment crisis as well as suffering from rock bottom morale."

The root of the problem is a catalogue of projects involving GP premises which have gone catastrophically wrong. The letter lists five of them. About one project it says that, because of his experiences with the FHSA, the doctor "is on the verge of a nervous breakdown and bankruptcy."

It says about another project:

"Despite this length of time and commitment no clear path has been agreed as to how these premises can be developed any further."

That "commitment" involved a dentist putting in £150,000 of his own money.

About the next project the letter says:

"there is a strong possibility that recently started building works will be stopped before completion because"

the doctor's bank has "advised him that he has too much negative equity."

Another doctor secured a promise of £700,000 towards the cost of the premises from the London Docklands development corporation, subject to the work being started by 1 July this year. The letter states:

"there is no likelihood of any building works commencing before the deadline and as a result the whole project may have to be shelved."

The letter adds that if that happens the doctor has decided to leave his practice, and Newham.

That is a catalogue of appalling mismanagement. Far from improving primary health care in east London, it is literally wrecking it. Those charged with delivering the improvements have been wholly incapable of doing so. I call on the Secretary of State to make an urgent and thorough investigation of what has happened to the London implementation zone funding for east London, because I am increasingly worried that terrible damage has been done.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): I have been amazed by some of the speeches in the debate. When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was speaking, some hon. Members from outside London were suggesting that the health service in London was somehow overfunded. I do not believe that that is true. For example, there is a 23 per cent. shortfall in psychiatric beds in London. One has only to look at the performance of the London ambulance service, which, by common consent, is the worst in the country. If one looks also at the difficulties that sometimes affect the supply of intensive care beds in London, one recognises why people in London do not believe that the health service is overfunded.

For colleagues from outside London to talk as if the health service in London is overfunded does a disservice to the debate, because it is not true. It was true in the 1970s when the then Labour Government instituted the resource allocation working party formula, which affected resources in London in the late 1970s and throughout the 1980s. Now those resources have been removed. It is wrong for people to recycle the speaking notes that they have used for the past 20 years and assume that they are still accurate. I know that in politics it is a great temptation to do that, but we should not seek to follow it.

I heard one comment about Edgware, which suggested that the hon. Member concerned probably did not know either its geographical location or even how to spell it. He suggested that it might be in central London.

When the Secretary of State announced in a written answer that she had approved the closure of Edgware accident and emergency department, I subsequently made a number of points. I said that she was proposing a system of primary health care whereby most of the extra £15 million would be spent after the Edgware accident and emergency department was closed, which seemed unacceptable.

I am pleased to say that this afternoon the Secretary of State has come to the House and agreed to spend an additional £2 million—as I understand it, £1 million this year and £1 million next year—mainly in the western part of the London borough of Barnet, which includes a significant amount of my constituency. Obviously, it is difficult to be too beastly to a Secretary of State who has this afternoon given some money to my constituency.

However, I have a number of questions that I want to ask about the other four issues that I have raised with the Secretary of State. The first involves the London ambulance service. We are told that there will be two additional ambulance crews in the Edgware district. We are told that the London ambulance service will continue to be monitored against the patients charter standards. If the London ambulance service fails to meet those patients charter standards—

Dr. Ian Twinn (Edmonton): If it continues to fail to meet them.

Mr. Marshall: As my hon. Friend says, if it continues to fail to meet those patients charter standards, what will the Secretary of State do? Will further additional resources be put into Edgware? Will there be a radical reorganisation of the London ambulance service, or what?

I have raised the issue of transport links with the Secretary of State on a number of occasions. This afternoon she said that she was setting up a working party—50 per cent. of that working party is sitting on the Government Front Bench and the other 50 per cent. is to come from the Department of Transport.

Transport links between Edgware and Barnet are particularly poor. During the Easter recess, my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) and I were due to meet the chairman of the Wellhouse trust at Barnet. We arrived on time at 2 pm. The chairman arrived at 2.15 pm and said that the trouble was that transport links between Edgware and Barnet were not what they should be. I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mr. Booth) had a similar experience and was kept waiting even longer. The chairman was not trying to be discourteous or to prove a point, but the point was very well made. I am glad that the Secretary of State is setting up a working party.

We have a right to know when that working party will report. Will it report to the House? How will we hear what it decides? If it recommends significant expenditure, it might be open to the Secretary of State to reopen the issue of the closure of the accident and emergency department at Edgware because, if a lot of money is to be spent on roads, further questions must be asked.

We are told that the minor accident unit at Edgware will be opened as soon as possible—it will be opened in 1996 rather than 1997. That is of benefit, in that it will be up and running before any closure takes place. We have been told in a letter from the Secretary of State that there could be a general practitioner presence in the minor accident unit, which is currently expected to be solely a nurse-based unit. We should like to see that possibility fleshed out. We should like to know how likely it is that the unit will have a GP presence rather than just a nurse presence. That is an important question that must be answered, as the matter will clearly be of concern to us over a considerable period.

Everyone who knows me well knows that the past few weeks have been particularly painful. I think that even the Government Whips Office would accept that I am normally a loyal Government supporter. I have rebelled only twice: once over the social security reforms in 1988—

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Twice?

Mr. Marshall: I should remind my hon. Friend that the Government changed their mind within 10 days of my rebellion, so I was right. I rebelled for a second time in 1989 over the Football Spectators Bill and again I was right as the Government tore up the Bill, so I shall not take any lessons from my hon. Friend about when I should and should not rebel. I accept that, in the role that I have held for some time of parliamentary private secretary to one of the most decent and nicest men, I have had obligations.

I hope that never again will announcements about Edgware hospital be made by way of written replies on the day before Adjournment debates on the future of that hospital. Such a procedure was discourteous to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes), who instituted the debate.

I believe that this will not be the end of the saga and I suspect that it will be revisited from time to time. This evening, in view of what the Secretary of State announced earlier, I am minded to support the Government. But before my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) gets too broad a grin on her face, I should tell her that if her grin becomes much broader, I certainly will not support them.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): There is an enormous amount of public anxiety and anger at the consequences of the mishandling of the national health service in London. Some of the blame is put at the door of the managers, but most of it is laid at the door of the Secretary of State for Health and the Government.

I pay tribute to the few hon. Members who have spoken out and stood up to be counted tonight. They made eloquent speeches, fighting for their constituents and for London hospitals. They made a good point when they said that the Secretary of State refuses to listen to the concern of Londoners and refuses to acknowledge the reality of what is going on in the health service. I shall give some examples of the realities.

Casualty Watch recently published a report stating that it carried out 11 spot checks in London hospitals between April 1994 and February 1995. It found that more than 170 people had been waiting more than five hours on trolleys in those London hospitals and that most of those who were waiting were elderly. It even found one woman of 101 years old who had been kept waiting for six hours at Queen Mary's university hospital in Roehampton in January this year.

I have taken up the issue. In late February, I complained that my hospital of Whipps Cross had a shortage of hospital beds and a shortage of trolleys. That shortage meant that patients were left on the ambulance trolleys that had brought them, thus tying up 10 ambulances that would be needed in an emergency. The chief executive of the Forest Healthcare trust said that the hospital was overwhelmed.

Waltham Forest community health council has just published a report giving examples of the crisis in the district. It stated that one woman who had a burst appendix was a priority 1 patient; she had a four-hour wait to see the doctor. She was in great pain and had to wait a total of seven and three quarter hours before she was found a bed. Another woman with a priority 2 illness was finally treated after a nine-and-a-half hour wait. An elderly woman with diabetes who had recently had a triple bypass operation was seen briefly by a doctor after half an hour, but she was then left on a trolley for seven and a half hours without any food or drink.

Another case involved an elderly disabled woman who had a nine-hour wait for a bed. Three months later, she went back to the accident and emergency unit with pleurisy. On that occasion, she waited 12 hours on a trolley for a bed, which eventually was not available, and she was sent home.

Those are just four examples in a recent report from my local community health council. It points out that Whipps Cross has one of the busiest casualty departments in the country, with more than 80,000 patients. The number of patients has increased by 3,000 in the past three months because of the closure of Bart's accident and emergency department and the knock-on effects of that; there has also been the staff shortage that was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing).

The CHC takes apart the official patients charter, to which the Government keep referring, to say how wonderful things are. It says that the "official patients charter statistics disguise the major problems patients face when using A and E services."

It goes on to say:

"it is claimed that 97 per cent. of patients at Whipps A and E have an 'initial assessment' within five minutes, but this does not acknowledge that they then have to wait for a proper assessment to be carried out. That can take one hour."

Official Forest Healthcare trust figures relating to patients in each priority group seen by a doctor show that 78 per cent. of priority 1 patients are seen within two hours, 82 per cent. of priority 2 patients are seen within four hours, and 84 per cent. of priority 3 patients are seen within four hours. My CHC asks, "What of the patients who are not seen within those times—how long do they wait?" Even after being seen by a doctor, a patient may wait hours for further attention because of the pressure of work on the A and E Department.

Several hon. Members have referred to the London ambulance service. We all know that it descended into a shambles when the computer broke down. Many of us would blame the Government in their pressure to privatise the service. Whatever the situation, let us look at the current position. Mr. John James, who is responsible for the service, has written to me saying:

"Overall, the total cost of the emergency services has risen from £63.9 million in 1994-95 to £82.2 million in 1995-96, an increase of 28.6 per cent. However, because £4 million in 1994-95 was met from central funds in 1994-95, which were not made available in 1995-96, the overall increase in cost to DHAs was 37.2 per cent."

That means that district health authorities in London have had to find an extra £22.3 million from their hard-pressed budgets to pay for that London ambulance service shambles and to try to get the service back into order. That £22.3 million has been taken out of patient treatment in London, whereas the Government should have provided that money.

The hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) talked about the £2 million for Edgware that has bought his vote tonight. A couple of million will come out of patient care in Edgware and in Hendon to pay for the London ambulance service. The money with which the hon. Gentleman has been bought off has been swallowed up very quickly. [Interruption.] That certainly is true. I have done a survey and I can show hon. Members the results.

The House of Commons Library presented for me figures that show that 83 hospitals in London have closed between 1979, when the Government were first elected, and March last year. On top of that, there have been a large number of accident and emergency unit closures. Many more are in the pipeline. All that has occurred without any publicly stated Government policy or anybody's policy on accident and emergency provision in London. Those closures are carrying on apace because trust managers regard them as the best way of further reducing acute beds in their areas. A and E closures are financially driven.

Our vote tonight is the last chance for London Members, particularly Conservative Members, to save the health service in London, particularly A and E provision in London. Even if some A and E units are not under threat now—and many of them are—the Government will come for hon. Members' accident and emergency units if they carry the day.

In the 1980s, the Government said—they have continued to try to use the phrase—that the health service was safe in their hands. There comes a time when that phrase must be proved, and we shall find out tonight. We shall discover whether the Conservatives can stand by it. Unless London Conservative Members show courage, as some who have spoken tonight have done, a significant proportion of the NHS in London will slip like sand through our fingers.

8.45 pm

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): I have previously commended my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for her courage in tackling the issue of London hospitals, and I do so again today. The amendment refers to the 20 or more reports that have recommended action that is clearly overdue. The action that was needed my right hon. Friend has initiated. To bring everything to a complete halt now, as the motion appears to demand—indeed, those were the words of the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) a few minutes ago—seems to me to be unacceptable. If the Opposition thought that the wording of their motion would seduce me into supporting them, they have failed.

Of course, these are matters in which, whatever decisions are taken, some people will be upset. Every hospital has a loyal following of local residents, patients, general practitioners, doctors and nurses at the hospital, and doctors and nurses who have trained there and perhaps have moved on. If we always bowed to all their wishes, there would never be any changes. But, if it is proposed to close a hospital or substantially to change its character, there must be a process of consultation. That, surely, is a moral obligation as well as a legal obligation. Consultation surely means listening to the views expressed and considering them, and not being averse to responding to reasoned arguments.

The Secretary of State and the Minister for Health have their advisers—political advisers and medical professional advisers—but they should take account, too, of what may be different advice offered by others who are as well qualified professionally and of those who are as able, if not better able, to reflect the views of the communities affected, including, of course, local Members of Parliament. I fear that that is not always done. My right hon. Friend enjoys my admiration as a most able, enthusiastic and dedicated Secretary of State, but a Minister must also be a politician, and in politics one is more likely to get things done if one listens to what people have to say and tries to take them with one.

My concerns, as the House will be aware, are with the proposals concerning Guy's and St. Thomas's hospitals. Let me make it clear that the issue is not about spending money on those hospitals in inner London as against expenditure further outside London or in the suburbs. Indeed, I shall want the Bromley hospital trust to be given adequate resources to enable it to develop a new hospital on the Farnborough hospital site. In this case, the issue is not about closing down complete sites, because both sites will remain open.

It is certainly not a Guy's versus St. Thomas's contest. The issue is the need to obtain the best possible use of limited resources—that is buildings, equipment and staff. It is, to quote the words of the Secretary of State in a letter that she wrote to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), "to ensure the most efficient and clinically coherent balance of services between its sites".

On 29 March, when the consultation process was completed and the proposals were on the Secretary of State's desk awaiting a decision, I secured a Wednesday morning debate on Guy's hospital. I summarised the original and final proposals for the two hospitals and the consultation process. I spoke of the work of the Save Guy's Hospital Campaign, of which I am joint chairman. I outlined our concerns and raised a number of issues.

A week later, the Secretary of State announced that she was confirming the proposals without modification. Of course I accept her word that what I and others said in the debate was read and considered, but I am sure that she will understand that some people have the impression that our words were completely ignored. Personally, I was surprised that no attempt was made to answer the points that were raised in the debate before the decision was announced. I have since had a letter from my right hon. Friend, but some of the issues remain unresolved.

It would be unreasonable of me to repeat the speech that I made on 29 March, even if time allowed, which it obviously does not, but the Government amendment invites me to call on the Government to ensure that their decisions on London hospital services are carried forward.

If I subscribed to that, I would be endorsing, among a number of other propositions, first, leaving the City of London and its 300,000 daily commuters—some of whom are my constituents—after 1998 without any accident and emergency facilities to deal with another Cannon street train crash or Bishopsgate bomb outrage; secondly, not using to the full Philip Harris house for the purposes for which it was designed and built at a cost of £154 million; thirdly, using Guy's for day surgery, elective surgery and minimally invasive therapy without any intensive care facility on the site; fourthly, the separation rather than the integration of out-patient and in-patient services for specialties such as renal, oncology, cardiology and ENT; and, fifthly, I would be endorsing the expenditure of £90 million on new building and refurbishment at St. Thomas's to accommodate the services moved from Guy's, while leaving some 19 floors or 35,000 sq m of unused space at Guy's.

I cannot in all conscience endorse such plans, so the House will understand why I shall not support the amendment which calls for their implementation.

8.52 pm

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): I consider that London's hospitals are underfunded and I appreciate all the arguments advanced by hon. Members representing part of Middlesex and London in respect of the Edgware general hospital. Before I came to the House, I worked in Golders Green for 12 or 13 years and I empathise with local people who appreciate and want to keep the accident and emergency department open in Edgware. I shall return to that in a moment.

The motion refers to London's health service. Strictly speaking, there is no such thing: there are two regional health authorities. My area of Essex is part of the North Thames region and in the context of today's debate I would argue that it is part of London's health service.

I am unique inasmuch as I am the only Opposition Member representing Essex and the counties that skirt London or the M25 ring. I can legitimately claim to speak on behalf of those constituents who are not represented in the Chamber at the moment, except by the Government Whip, the hon. Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), who has to remain silent.

We listen to the Government's argument that the closures will provide additional resources for counties outside London, but that is not the experience of my constituents and those who live in areas surrounding London. Frankly, we do not believe the Government. [Interruption.] Somebody from a sedentary position said, "Rubbish," but my constituency of Thurrock endured the pain and anxiety of losing the accident and emergency department at Orsett hospital.

Regrettably, only when the closure of the accident and emergency department at Edgware general is proposed, or hon. Members representing Westminster and the City are aggrieved, does the House pay attention to a crisis that is not peculiar to the old GLC area, the boundaries of which resulted from a decision made in the House of Lords at 2 am in 1963 and which do not represent "London" in the context of this debate. London is much wider, especially with regard to health provision.

Conservative Members are aggravated by the political fallout that was demonstrated in stark terms last week. As we approach a general election, they want to distance themselves from the Government's policy of cuts in the national health service. They did not speak up when the accident and emergency department in my constituency was closed or when accident and emergency departments were closed elsewhere around the M25 ring.

It is time to make it clear that the Government are cutting hospital provision for many people in London and elsewhere. I heard all the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) excusing why he would not support the Opposition motion tonight but would sustain the Government. They involve palliatives and promises that extra facilities will be provided as compensation for losing A and E departments. They are not worth the paper they are written on.

I should say, as a lesson for other hon. Members who are considering supporting the Government, that when our accident and emergency department was closed in Thurrock, we were assured that the rest of Orsett hospital would be maintained. They were solemn and binding undertakings, but a few months ago it became clear from a leak that they intended to close the whole hospital.

My constituents and others joined in a massive campaign to retain Orsett hospital, or what was left of it. We succeeded, but we do not believe that that will the prevent faceless men and women who run our health authorities and the trust from again trying to close totally our Orsett hospital.

I use my constituency as an example of what could happen elsewhere. It is in the fastest growing area of south-east England outside London—the Thames gateway—yet the madness of Government policy and their lack of planning led to an attempt to close our hospital.

My constituents now have to travel to Basildon to get hospital care, which has put an inordinate extra burden on Basildon and other hospitals. My hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms Hodge) described how Oldchurch hospital would close and put extra demands on Harold Wood hospital. Since my local accident and emergency department closed, my constituents are putting extra demands on Harold Wood hospital, because that is one of the places where they are taken by bus or ambulance to receive accident and emergency and other treatment. It is foolish that this policy should be allowed to continue.

The motion calls for a halt and a major review. That is prudent. It would be appropriate to encompass in any review everything in an area wider than the old GLC area—everything around the M25 ring—as we are as vulnerable to the cuts as elsewhere.

There has been some commendation of the few Conservative Members who have said that they will not support the Government tonight. I join in that, but there is a danger of going over the top and implying that the hon. Member for Hendon, North (Sir J. Gorst) is equivalent to the Archangel Gabriel. I give him full marks but where has he been all this time? He is faced with the closure of an accident and emergency department on his own doorstep now, but he would not have dreamed of supporting me in defending the A and E department at Orsett. I do not suppose that he knows where Orsett is to be found.

If Conservative Members generally are concerned about the thrust of Government policies, they must support the Opposition motion so that the Government will pause and rethink the totality of the policies on which they are now embarking. I do not know whether it was implied or said by an Opposition Member on radio this morning that this is not a party political matter. If so, I dissociate myself from that remark because it is party political. In the months leading to the next general election, I shall unashamedly point the prosecutor's finger at Conservative Members who do not join us in the lobby tonight. They are all the same and they are all to blame by acquiescing through their silence in a rundown and haemorrhaging of the NHS in and around London. It is time to spell that out without ambiguity.

I cannot find words to describe the lasting resentment among my constituents at the Government's deceit and betrayal over hospital care. I include in that the people of Basildon, whom our loss at Orsett also affects. My constituents now have to be sent to Basildon hospital and endure inordinately long waits on trolleys and in the casualty department. In addition, many of my constituents are taken not only to Harold Wood hospital but across the River Thames to Kent, such is the absurd lack of planning.

I welcome being able, perhaps for the first time, to muscle in on something that is wrongly described as a "London debate": it goes much wider. It affects people in Harlow, Basildon, Thurrock, Gravesham, Dartford, Slough and other constituencies around the London area, which are not being properly represented in the House, and whose national health service is not being championed by Conservative Members.

Mr. Hartley Booth (Finchley): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) who, as usual, was robust in his remarks, and on this occasion robustly wrong.

The debate has been characterised by a mirage of the past, suggesting that the health service in London was always better then—a sort of never never land of wondrous results. In fact, we are dealing with the same problem that has existed for hundreds of years.

[Mr. Hartley Booth]

Liverpool Street and Broad Street railway stations are built on the foundations of a medieval hospital that was well known at the time. Some people might think that it would have been better if it had been kept as a hospital. A retired doctor from St. Thomas's reminded me that 30 years ago patients were left on the floor in a crisis. Only in 1968 was the first accident and emergency consultant in the country appointed. Today, such consultants can be found everywhere. We have been improving, and we should put that fact on the scales tonight.

The Opposition motion criticises the closure of accident and emergency facilities in London, while the Government motion stands for new and better services and says that the Government will take due account of concerns. I hope so. I do not accept that the description "closure of . . . facilities" is apt, accurate, balanced or fair in respect of Barnet. A new hospital costing £61 million is being built, and we are promised that a new casualty unit will be kept open in Edgware. However, I shall be making some demands of my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench.

Edgware hospital is being kept open, and there is a list of improvements for the new area trauma centre to be built at Barnet General hospital, costing £1.5 million. It will offer a major treatment room with greater availability of specialist piped medical gases, decontamination showers and a sound attenuating examination room. The "physical specs", as they are called, state that the centre will be 250 per cent. larger than the present A and E department. There will be an operating theatre for major trauma, diagnostic imaging and a pneumatic tube system—all costing an arm and a leg in more senses than one.

I asked an orthopaedic surgeon at Barnet General for his thoughts on the centre. He welcomed it. He had possibly wanted a new hospital situated midway between the two existing hospitals, but he is grateful and delighted that there will be a new hospital in Barnet—not least because he currently has to travel between Edgware and Barnet in rush hours and in crisis situations. I shall refer to transport later, if there is time. At present that consultant has to cover two hospitals.

Do we want to retain the A and E department on the same basis as at present, as suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North (Sir J. Gorst), whom I deeply respect? No—we want to improve on that situation. Are we against all change? Of course not. At present, there is an orthopaedic consultant only at Barnet General and none at Edgware, and there is no maternity department at Barnet. That cannot be left as it is. There must be change.

Safety is paramount, as was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes). The Royal College of Surgeons states that 25 per cent. of all deaths in A and E departments are avoidable. I could not have deaths on my conscience, so I must speak out tonight to say that such deaths are avoidable if we have the improved A and E departments that our new hospitals and constituents deserve. We must satisfy the public's fears.

How do we do that? I have been fighting for better transport links across the A1, which is a huge physical barrier. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for saying that she will bear that in mind. We shall be watching for such improvements. We certainly do not want people dying en route to hospital.

I hope that the Edgware injury clinic—the new casualty department, as the chairman of the local NHS trust calls it—will not only have 80 per cent. of current casualties, but that it will be supported by general practitioners, not just nurses or paramedics. We need better transport links and I am glad that we have improved community medicine, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) referred. On behalf of the people of Barnet and Finchley, many of whom cross the A1 to Edgware, although many more go to Barnet, I thank the Government for the new hospital that we are getting. It would be niggardly not to be grateful for it. We shall keep Ministers to the four promises that we have heard today. We shall be watching.

We ask what Labour, whose debate this is, would be doing. Would it reverse the decision over Bart's? Would it reverse the decision to give us a new hospital in Barnet? Would it keep Edgware open? Answer comes there none. The Labour party is vacuous in the absence of real answers to difficult questions in this area. Literature has been quoted to us this evening by my right hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke). I will quote Shakespeare: the Labour party is > "full of sound and fury, > Signifying nothing."

9.11 pm

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I offer my apologies to the House for having missed the first part of the debate. I am Chairman of the Select Committee on Northern Ireland, which has been taking evidence this afternoon.

I want to speak, if only briefly, on a number of matters. First, I wish to make a point which I suspect may have been made before, so I shall therefore make it briefly: the fundamental problem with the Tomlinson report was that it did not take into account the impact of outer London on inner London. One of the powers and strengths of Professor Jarman's report was that it recognised that inner London could not be treated as though there were some dividing fence between inner and outer London. Once that artificial fence is taken away, the problem in London is seen to be not so simple as Professor Tomlinson's report made out. That is why things have gone badly wrong.

My second point, and one of the prime reasons why the Secretary of State is in such serious trouble, is that the main problem in the health service—one which has to some extent been there since the 1974 management changes, but dramatically more so in recent years—is the lack of an effective method of consultation. As a Conservative Member said, people felt that consultation was not working. That is certainly my experience in west London. The feeling is that things happen without a strategy. I acknowledge that the Secretary of State has said that she wants a strategy for health care in London, but the various community groups, including the community health councils and others who should be taken into the confidence of the hospital management structures, do not feel that they know what is happening or why.

The general feeling about consultation is that a paper is published, people are asked for their views, which they give, but at the end of the day the rubber stamp comes down reinforcing the original proposal without people's views and comments being taken into account in any effective way. Consequently, there is much anger and lack of understanding when decisions about hospitals' futures are made. A simple but dramatic example occurred in west London when the new Chelsea and Westminster hospital was built, massively over cost—more than £200 million. In retrospect, that was an incredible decision. Had it been made by a local authority, it would probably have led to councillors being surcharged.

The Secretary of State was then faced with the unenviable decision whether to close Charing Cross hospital or Hammersmith hospital. Charing Cross hospital was only 20 years old, but Hammersmith hospital is the world's premier postgraduate medical school with an immense reputation in Britain and overseas. Eventually, the right decision was made and the two hospitals were merged into one trust. However, that still leaves the question of what is to happen to the three large hospitals in west London. It is not that there is over-provision; rather there is under-provision in certain key areas. I receive the same sort of letters as other hon. Members about the lack of bed space and the lack of time for operations.

The closure of an accident and emergency department in effect means the closure of the hospital. That is why there is such concern—certainly in west London and, I suspect, elsewhere—that the purchasing authority, which in my case is the Hammersmith, Hounslow and Ealing authority, will choose to buy from only one hospital, perhaps Charing Cross, leaving Hammersmith, which has had less investment in its accident and emergency department, more vulnerable. If we get into the ball game in which the purchaser decides which accident and emergency department survives, in the long run the purchasers will make the decisions about which hospitals survive. That is not the most sensible way to proceed.

I suspect that psychiatric patients have not been discussed in any great depth today. In my area and, indeed, throughout the capital, the provision of beds for such patients is a major problem. Care in the community is clearly a good policy, which we all endorse—provided that the community facilities are there; if they are not, the policy becomes a disaster. In that event, there is no care in the community. There have been some horrendous cases in recent years.

The provision of housing, hostels and follow-up nursing care is vital, and the lack of psychiatric beds poses a major problem to the safety of patients and, indeed, the public at large. Some of the patients are very disturbed; some, though not all, are offenders. We should bear in mind that the regional secure units also feed into the system of care in the community. There is a human problem for the individuals concerned, but a drastic problem for the health service and the general public.

Let me say this to the Secretary of State: for heaven's sake start looking at a management system which is so secretive that people feel—rightly, in my view—that they do not know who is making the decisions, how those decisions are being made or how they themselves can have any impact on those decisions. The problem with the NHS, in this context, is that it is paid for by the taxpayer but the taxpayer knows virtually nothing about what is being proposed and how the money is to be spent. We need to think long and hard about the sort of management structure that is necessary in the health service to deliver an efficient health care system combined with accountability to the public.

Finally, I do not think that we shall have the morale in the health service that we ought to have until we provide a proper pay structure for nurses, midwives and other key groups who currently feel battered and undervalued.

9.16 pm

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Thank you for calling me at this late stage, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I appreciate it very much. Having launched an Adjournment debate on 5 April which lasted much longer than usual, and having made a long speech on that occasion, I do not resent the fact that others have spoken earlier than me today, and I am glad that the Chair made those selections.

It behoves me to say—as did my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson)—that I shall not be able to support the Government tonight after what I have heard so far. I am extremely disappointed that the Secretary of State was unable to make any significant concessions to alter the drastic position in which we find ourselves.

For geographical reasons, my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North (Sir J. Gorst) and I—with the permission, approval and support of our other colleagues—have led, for over a year, the great campaign to save the accident and emergency unit of Edgware general hospital from closure. The closure is proposed by the district health authority, and supported by the regional health authority. We continue to think that a grave mistake.

The position is not the same as that of the old central London hospitals—although I wish them well, and do not want them to be closed, either. This vital unit in an outer London borough is heavily used, efficient and popular; as my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North has said on many occasions, it is also part of a much-loved social institution. It is on the Edgware road, on the border between my constituency and that of my hon. Friend. If it is closed, the journey to Barnet, the Royal Free hospital in Hampstead or the Northwick Park hospital will be too long in congested traffic.

The Northwick Park hospital, incidentally, is the most important district general hospital in my area and the constituencies of Brent, North and Harrow, West. I wish it and its future development well; that does not contradict what I am saying about Edgware general hospital.

I am disappointed. During the last minutes of the debate, the Minister has the chance to make the additional concessions that we would require to support the Government tonight. I would not have any pleasure in supporting a Labour motion. I cannot remember the previous occasion when I did that. That is not the job of a Government-supporting Member.

I strongly support all the Government's policies, but we need extra movement, an extra concession and extra realism from Ministers. They should not respond only to the medical bureaucrats in their Department, whose easier solutions are to combine units to try to save accounting costs at the margin. Everyone can do that. It is not a particularly difficult exercise, despite the obvious complexities, but for the sake of all our constituents—the human beings in our constituency—we want the hospital to be saved.

If the A and E department goes, the hospital dies. That is an obvious reality. Everyone knows that. Every medical expert knows that. If the Minister could make extra concessions saying that closure would not take place by the target date, that further time would be given for consideration, and that the Government were not humiliated or embarrassed by having second thoughts on an unwise proposal, I could reconsider my position. From what has been said so far, I doubt whether that will happen, but this is the last opportunity for the Government to say, "Yes, we have listened not only to the people, but to our own Members of Parliament."

9.20 pm

Mr. David Congdon (Croydon, North-East): This is our fourth debate on London's health in the past 13 months. That shows the level of interest in and concern about the future of health care in London.

One of the most depressing things about today's debate has been the unwillingness of Opposition Members to face up to the difficult challenges involved in taking decisions on health care in London. We have had a bit of a pretence that London is not over-resourced in terms of teaching hospitals and specialist facilities, but the facts stand for themselves. In 1993-94, average spending per capita in inner London was £565 per person compared with the national average of £370 per person. That shows that London is over-resourced.

In saying that, I recognise that today pressures exist on beds in London. That is why I have urged, and am pleased to urge again, caution on the pace of change in London. Many changes are occurring at the same time. We have care in the community and the internal market. All those issues must be taken into account.

In listening to the debate, especially in relation to Edgware general, Barnet, Bart's, St. Thomas's and Guy's hospitals, I am struck by the need for us to redefine what we mean by accident and emergency services. People who are injured in a major road accident, who suffer a severe stroke or cardiac arrest or who need intensive care, do not care which hospital an ambulance takes them to, so long as they receive first-class treatment. Frankly, they do not want to be taken to a third-rate A and E department where no consultant is on duty, where perhaps a junior has worked for only a few months, and where their chances of surviving are slight. We need to distinguish firmly between what I would define as major trauma centres and minor injuries departments.

My plea to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would be this: we need to be clear what we are talking about when discussing minor injuries departments. I should like them to be open 24 hours a day with a general practitioner on duty. It is rightly said that one of the problems in London is that the people of inner London use their hospital rather than their GP surgeries. That is partly because of poor primary care. We will not change that and, in a sense, I am not sure that it really matters, so long as those people receive the care they need. That is why local provision of minor injuries units could go a long way to allaying public concern about the closure of major A and E departments.

My only other main point, because I know that time is short tonight, relates to Bart's and the Royal London hospital. I have no axe to grind in relation to whether Bart's stays open or closes, but I have a concern, which I have expressed before, about the capital costs involved in relocating to the Royal London, which in gross terms amount to about £240 million. Given the comparatively small scale of the saving involved—£30 million a year—I am concerned about whether that represents good value for money, especially bearing in mind the fact that the dual-site option would achieve roughly half the savings at a small capital cost.

We all know the extent to which capital costs can be underestimated and revenue savings overestimated. I urge my right hon. Friend to ensure that the figures for Bart's and the Royal London are subjected to close scrutiny. As an outer London Member who for many years has been pressing for major capital investment at the local Mayday hospital, and who now knows the large sums that will be invested in the facilities at the Royal London, I must question whether that is the best value for money. We need rigorously to assess whether the single-site option is always better than the dual-site option.

I have no reservation in supporting the general direction of the changes proposed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. She has taken courageous decisions, and she deserves our support.

9.25 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): My hon. Friends the Members for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) and for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) echoed many of the speeches made during the debate when they asked the Government to think again. Whatever can be said for the Government's position as it has been represented tonight, it cannot possibly be said that it commands public support.

The petition to save Guy's hospital has been signed by more than 1 million people. Three mayors from three separate boroughs, one Labour, two Tory—at least, that was the roll call at the time—visited the Under-Secretary of State to discuss the Department's plans for the Edgware hospital. They represented 700,000 residents in north-west London. They were bluntly dismissed, told that the decision had already been made and that the time for negotiations had passed. The right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) expressed concern about that, as well he might. Some 183 local councillors have expressed their opinion on the Government's plan to close Edgware hospital. Only one has said that he supports the Government's position; the others do not.

Today, we have had the promise of a minor injuries unit at the earliest possible date. What sort of promise is that? Why was not it promised for the earliest possible date before today's debate? As my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms Hodge) pointed out, such a promise is a con; it is nothing of any substance.

Some 1,244 people responded to the consultation on the Government's plans for Bart's—88 per cent. opposed the Government's plans. More than 1,000 people attended the health care crisis in London conference, which was organised by the National Health Service Support Federation last February. The conference unanimously adopted a resolution demanding an immediate halt to the shutdown of accident and emergency departments, to bed reductions and to hospital closures—a call that has been echoed by Labour Members throughout the debate.

The right hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), no doubt unintentionally, made our point for us. While defending the broad thrust of Government policy, he also said that he has fought hard for local provision in his constituency. We can understand him saying that, so why cannot he allow his parliamentary colleagues the same right to fight for Edgware and the service that it provides to their constituents? My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) pointed to the hypocrisy of some Conservative Members who support the thrust of Government policy, but defend provision in their own areas while not supporting other Members of Parliament, including Labour Members, who are trying to defend similar facilities in their constituencies.

Much has been said in the debate about political courage. My hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) referred to the political courage of those Conservative Members who will not support the Government in the Lobby tonight. That takes courage, and I applaud them for that.

The political courage of the Secretary of State for Health has also been mentioned. I am all in favour of political courage, but not when it is providing the motivation to do the wrong thing. As has been said frequently in the debates which we have had on these topics, the Tomlinson report, on which the Government's decisions are founded, is fatally flawed. Tomlinson got it wrong. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) said that the claim that London is over-bedded is inaccurate. London is not over-bedded. We are all grateful to Professor Jarman for the work that he has conducted which has shown that London is not over-bedded, but may well be under-bedded.

The hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) talked about the over-provision of resources for London, but that is not true. It used to be believed, as the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) pointed out, that London got 20 per cent. of the funding for only 15 per cent. of the population. However, the figures which the Department of Health publish include the costs for London allowance and for teaching facilities, and when allowance in the calculations is made for those additional costs, the funding and the population figures are broadly in line.

It was believed when Tomlinson reported that somehow primary care provision—I shall have more to say about this later—would reduce the demand for hospital services. It is my view that that is a false premise. By increasing the number of people who see a GP, the rate of diagnosis will be increased, and this will increase the number of referrals to London's hospitals.

Tomlinson believed that the location of casualty services was unimportant, but a number of hon Members—not least some Conservatives—have said that they do not accept that point of view. The closer a seriously injured person is to a casualty department, the more likely that he will be saved. Clinicians talk about the golden hour, which is vital. Certainly, a patient's chances are substantially diminished if the method of treating him is to put him on a helicopter and fly him up to Leeds. The right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) made that point rather well.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) said that it was a mistake to assume that the two London regions can perform like an average English region. London is in many ways a special case. It has a large transient population, high levels of social deprivation and poverty, more mental illness, a lower than average provision for personal social services, and poor provision for the long-term care for the elderly. That puts extra pressure on accident and emergency units, and to some extent it is right to say that accident and emergency units are being used as a substitute for GP provision and good primary care.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) made the point very well that Tomlinson misunderstood the relationship between inner and outer London. Tomlinson believed that patients from outer London do not make significant use of inner London hospitals. That is just wrong. Recent research carried out by the King's Fund shows that, of the 500,000 in-patients treated in inner London, 150,000 came from outer London and from other parts of the country. My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Dowd) made reference to the service which Guy's hospital provides to his constituents.

When calculating the level of hospital provision in the capital, the Tomlinson report did not make a distinction between different types of hospital bed; it should have done. There is an important distinction between surgical beds, which are mostly used for elective cases, and medical beds, which are mostly used for emergency cases. The broad-brush proposal to close some 4,200 beds ignores the complexity of maintaining sufficient medical beds for urgent cases. If that were not understood at the time, we are informed every week of the outcome of that misunderstanding by the local press, who have yet another incident to draw to our attention.

The Tomlinson report referred several times to transitional funding. It was regarded as necessary to facilitate hospital closures and the development of primary and community services. The report did not cost those programmes and the Government provided no new money for them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Timms) spoke of a spiral of poor health and under-achievement, and referred to the recent King's Fund report. That is of enormous importance for the whole country, but it has specific and special relevance to inner London, so it is right that we should look at primary care provision in London.

The Secretary of State is fond of quoting specialist experts—usually employed in her own Department—who support her point of view. Professor David London of the Royal College of Physicians said:

> "London, like other big cities, needed a degree of rationalisation and that was always going to be painful. But it needed to be thought out. Money should have been put into it to ease the change, instead of being the cash-saving exercise it now appears to be."

The hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) spoke about improvements in primary care. My hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker) made the sensible point that it is neither fair nor right to get rid of hospital beds before enhanced primary care provision is put in place.

[Mr. Nicholas Brown]

Between 1984 and 1992, the number of general practitioners per head of the population increased by 10 per cent. in England, but that was not so in London. Over the same period in inner London, there was a 2 per cent. decrease and only a 2 per cent. increase in outer London. Yet, not surprisingly, London has the highest percentage of waiting lists of a year or more. The Secretary of State made much of the fact that the figures are coming down, but she should have said that London still has the highest figures and the lowest reduction in waiting lists from December 1994. London has fewer family health centres per thousand of population than Newcastle, Leeds, Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester or Bristol. It thus has a specific primary care problem, which the Government have not yet resolved.

It is no secret that we hope to encourage Conservative Members to support us in the Lobby tonight. The House should be treated to some advice, which I hope it will respect because it was commissioned by the Government. It comes from the chief executives of the inner London health authorities whom the Government appointed. In their recent report, they say:

"On the basis of the evidence presented to us there are reasons for anxiety about the ability of the system to cope with a further round of bed closures."

Yet assuredly, if our motion is defeated tonight, the system will have to cope with a further round of bed closures. They say:

"Some hospitals were found to be operating at 100 per cent. occupancy much of the time, and an average of 90-95 per cent. was common . . . generally speaking an average level of 85 per cent. occupancy is to be preferred."

So the hospitals are working at capacity. They said:

"The overall conclusion is that London's acute hospitals are operating under very considerable pressure."

I have not quoted those comments to make a party political point. We all have a duty to represent our constituents in this place and, as we consider how to vote tonight, we should consider those points, which come not from me but from the chief executives of the London health authorities. Every hon. Member would do well to bear them in mind.

Mr. Alan Lettin of the Royal College of Surgeons, speaking for health care professionals, says:

"Consultants feel the facilities are inadequate for the service we are expected to provide. We did warn the Government. The basis on which the cuts have been made was the King's Fund report, which has now been discredited.

What consultants would say to the Government is: 'We never believed your figures because there are too many patients waiting for beds, emergencies and for routine surgery.'"

My hon. Friend the Member for Barking echoed that point.

If I am to encourage Conservative Members to support us in the Lobbies tonight, perhaps I should quote from someone whom I know that they all respect—the Secretary of State for Wales. In a speech on 4 April 1995, he said:

"I do not wish to see bed reductions while waiting lists are still quite long"— but waiting lists in London have just reached an all-time high of almost 180,000. He said:

"Make sure there are enough intensive care beds"—

but recent tragedies in London and the south-east have shown that there are dangerously few intensive care beds.

One of the saddest aspects of the debate is to go, as I did recently, to Phillip Harris house to see the newly installed provision for intensive care beds. It was explained to me that all that provision is to be ripped out and smashed to pieces, even after it has been paid for, because the Government are no longer willing to provide the revenue funding. That is a shame. It is an act of vandalism, and should be resisted by the House.

The Secretary of State for Wales said:

"Make sure there are enough general medical and surgical beds."

That is what our motion says, so I invite him, at least, to vote for it tonight.

The Secretary of State for Wales said:

"I suspect it is a myth that it is cheaper to close the older hospital and do everything in a new large one."

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) made the same argument. He may not often be found on the same side as the Secretary of State for Wales, but he made the same argument when he said that the transfer of services from the Bart's site to the Royal London hospital is by no means a move that will save money, let alone do anything else.

The Save Guy's Campaign commissioned a report by independent consultants, which showed that a retention of an accident and emergency unit and in-patient services at Guy's was financially viable. Those arguments deserve consideration and, dare I say it, reconsideration.

The motion does not demand—as the Labour party would ideally like it to—reconsideration by an independent organisation. It asks only for reconsideration by the Secretary of State for Health. It asks her to think again.

The Secretary of State for Wales, who may be the next Secretary of State for Health, said:

"The local hospital remains a cherished institution."

Of course, he was speaking for Wales, but he might have been speaking for Edgware as well. He said:

"I am asking the health authorities to slow down their passion for reorganising. It must go at a pace people accept."

He is certainly not the only Conservative Member of Parliament to have said that recently. He also said, referring to reorganisation:

"It must be based on health arguments, not financial considerations."

The hon. Member for Hendon, North (Sir J. Gorst) said:

"human beings, not balance sheets, come first."

That remark found a cheer from the Opposition, at least.

I urge the House to listen carefully to what was said tonight by Conservative Members as well as Labour Members, worried for their constituents. This is the last chance for health provision in London. The Opposition's motion deserves the support of the whole House in the Division tonight.

9.42 pm

The Minister for Health (Mr. Gerald Malone): Never has there been a more unlikely suitor of Conservative Members than the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown). It was an astonishing performance, in which he admitted that he had not even been able to table the motion that he wanted to.

I wonder who stopped him. Is it yet another story of a split between the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett)?

Mr. Nicholas Brown: It is self-restraint.

Mr. Malone: Doubtless, when he takes over, we shall see the end of all that, shall we not?

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): When my hon. Friend takes over?

Mr. Malone: From his right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South.

I thought that in this, the fourth debate about health in London in which I have spoken as Minister of State, we might have heard something positive from the right hon. Member for Derby, South or from the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East. However, I agreed entirely with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) when he said that there was no policy; that we had heard nothing in the debate about what the Labour party would do. On four successive occasions, health in London has been debated and we have heard nothing positive. That point was reiterated by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-East (Mr. Congdon).

Today's debate gave the Opposition the opportunity to fill in the blank pages of their policy. They could have told the House what they would do about London's health service. They could have told it, and Londoners, about their plans to improve primary care and prepare hospitals in London for the 21st century. We heard nothing about that. The Opposition could have made commitments to validate their charge, perhaps, that the Government have got it wrong.

With any charge from any responsible Opposition that the Government have got it wrong comes an important corollary: they must have an argument about what they would do to put it right. I thought that if we did not hear it from the right hon. Member for Derby, South, we might hear it from her hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East, but we heard nothing.

Let me sum up the Government's case briefly. It is in three parts. First, clinical excellence is very important for London's hospitals. That means bringing specialist services together. It means, of course, that some hospitals have to change and, indeed, that some have to close. There was consensus on that under the reign of the right hon. Lady's predecessor, but that seems to have disappeared. Other hospitals—for example, Edgware, which has been quite rightly mentioned frequently in the debate—will have to change in character to community hospitals, delivering care closer to patients than they were able to do before. That change is in the interests of the community.

It is extremely important to meet the challenges of technological change, as well as those associated with increasing day care, earlier discharge and the falling number of referrals from outside London—not just from outer London to inner London hospitals, but from the home counties and the rest of the country.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): Has my hon. Friend had the chance to study the letter that I sent to him from my health authority? It explained that the rapidly accelerating switch to treating people locally meant that, last year, North West Surrey health authority had to encourage my local GPs and local consultants to persuade their patients to go to central London rather than be treated locally, to use up contract money. I must tell my hon. Friend that my constituents want to be treated locally, not bundled off to central London to help to keep other hospitals viable.

Mr. Malone: I have read the letter that my hon. Friend sent me. He made a valid point, which will be echoed by many hon. Members.

It is important that London meets the challenge of changing referrals. It is essential to ensure that funds that are allocated to health authorities in London go on patient care and are not swallowed by high-cost institutions.

The investment that the Government have made in primary care for London—£210 million in recent years—is second to none and is transforming the face of primary care in the city and bringing new facilities on stream on a day-to-day basis.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) asked the fundamental question: is London being overfunded? If he looks at the weighted capitation basis of funding, he will see that it is overresourced by £91 million. That does not take into account top-sliced funding that goes towards transitional payments to maintain institutions. That overfunding is not the main argument, because the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members who clearly have constituency interests in the city should ask themselves whether they want to see the resources that are given to their health authorities, which are meant to be spent on patient care, absorbed by institutions that are not run on an efficient basis. I suggest that, in their constituency interests, that should not be so.

My right hon. Friend the Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) asked specifically about consideration of the York report. I can tell him that it was given proper consideration. The Treasury has scrutinised the business case and it said that the case for a single-site solution seems robust and well founded in contrast to what was put forward.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Putney made a number of valid points about the difficulty of the detail. I agree that the detail is difficult. That is what the Opposition find difficult to understand. Until now, they have all gone with the policy for change and argued that change is essential, but when we get down to the agenda of change, they disappear over the horizon without an idea to bring to bear on the argument.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Putney asked about the role of the purchasing authority with regard to the hospital in his constituency. The health authority is still to be persuaded about that case, but I have no doubt that my right hon. and learned Friend will follow up the representations that he has already made to me, and that he will continue to press the authority very firmly about that matter.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir N. Scott) raised an important point about the Royal Brompton hospital. My Department and the Royal Brompton are currently looking at various development possibilities and I know that my right hon. Friend continues to make strong representations on the hospital's behalf. My hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) emphasised the technological advances that have been made in health care. It is important that we recognise technology changes and build hospitals for the 21st century; we must not be left behind.

I now come to the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) and my hon. Friends the Members for Hendon, North (Sir J. Gorst) and for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes). They have clear constituency concerns, and I must admit quite frankly that I cannot meet all the points that they raised. However, I ask them to bear in mind the fact that Edgware hospital will not close, as has been suggested in the popular press. I know that they recognise that fact.

Edgware hospital will remain as a community hospital that will deliver patient care to the community. It will provide a minor accident treatment service, which will cater for approximately 50 per cent. of those who use the current accident and emergency service. Some £60 million will be invested in the hospital in Brent in order to turn it into a first-class facility.

Sir John Gorst: So that I may be absolutely certain that I will enter the correct Division Lobby this evening, I ask my hon. Friend to leave aside the palliatives, sedatives and tranquillisers that have been dressed up as concessions and, even at this 11th hour, to give an undertaking that the accident and emergency department at Edgware hospital will remain open.

Mr. Malone: I cannot give that undertaking, because it would be the wrong thing to do. The Government will put in place new, worthwhile facilities, and I hope that hon. Members in the area will be able to reassure their constituents about service provision. If my hon. Friend were to visit some minor units that have been established already—for example, the St. Charles's hospital minor injuries unit that was referred to in the debate—he would find that they are first-class facilities that could meet the needs of his constituents extremely well. [Interruption.] I hear an intervention from a sedentary position that no one believes me. I do not ask Labour Members to believe what I say; they should go and see for themselves what those units, which are close to the community, can provide. They are excellently run and they have zero waiting times. They are first-class facilities.

Mr. Dykes: Even if the Minister cannot give that concession to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, North (Sir J. Gorst), can he not at least postpone the closure of the A and E unit at Edgware hospital and confirm that there will be additional ambulance provision pending further examination of the whole question?

Mr. Malone: My hon. Friend knows about the additional ambulance provision that has been promised already. I cannot promise any further delay or postponement of the closure of the A and E unit at Edgware hospital. However, I emphasise the pledge that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has given, that we will put in place equivalent, if not better, facilities that will soon be up and running. That is not merely a pledge from Ministers or from the health authorities; buildings of bricks and mortar will be occupied by doctors and nurses who will run the facilities in a proper way. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept my assurance.

I come to the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe), who is Chairman of the Select Committee on Health. She referred to the way in which the Committee scrutinises the Government's policies. That scrutiny is very welcome and I know that my right hon. Friend, fresh from this debate, is looking forward to appearing before the Select Committee tomorrow.

The hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) talked about London waiting figures. May I say to the whole House that there has been a tremendous achievement on waiting figures in London? In the 12 months up to March 1995, the number of people who had been waiting for more than one year fell by 26.3 per cent. That is an enormous achievement. I do not know why Opposition Members who claim to support the health service denigrate it when it makes such achievements, and try to cast it down.

I tell the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East that the health service in London is not as good as in other parts of the country because we have got to get London's health service into the same shape as the health service in other parts of the country. It is the Opposition motion that stands exactly in the way of that.

The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) made an interesting speech. He gave a historical analysis of what has happened in health, with which I do not quite agree. He harked back to the good old days before 1990, when he said that there was a consensus on health policy. I remember being in the House between 1983 and 1987. To echo the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), if that was consensus before 1990, God help us if war had broken out, because the truth is that the Opposition have attempted to thwart every attempt made by the Government since 1979 to reform the health service and make it more efficient.

The hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker) talked about resources and said that we would have to be extremely careful not to take away care provision before we had provided other facilities. That is right, and it was one of the pledges that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave the House; I am pleased to reiterate it in my winding-up speech.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) welcomed the primary care initiative. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House should settle down and hear the last minutes of the Minister's winding-up speech. The House is much too noisy. Too many meetings are taking place.

Mr. Malone: I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South welcomed that initiative. I assure him that the pledge to continue to improve the London ambulance service will be honoured.

The right hon. Member for Derby, South made much in her remarks about the NHS building programme. I have to tell her, on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, that my right hon. Friend stated that there had been one new building programme a week in the five years to March 1994. I have to apologise on behalf of my right hon. Friend, because she misled the House. That would have led to a total of 260 building programmes over that period. There were, in fact, 375 building schemes, each costing over a million pounds, completed in an NHS programme worth over £1 billion nationally. Since 1979, the Government have put £22.5 billion into NHS building programmes.

What we get from the Opposition is impresario politics. Today, as the right hon. Member for Derby, South was speaking, we saw that the soundbites were taken by the Leader of the Opposition as he appeared in Bart's hospital. I have a question that everybody in Bart's hospital would like to ask the Opposition. If they take the political credit for appearing to save Bart's hospital, are they prepared to stand up at the Dispatch Box today, tonight, at this moment, and say that they would save Bart's hospital?

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The Minister will find out in the Lobby in three minutes' time.

Mr. Malone: The hon. Gentleman gave no policy commitment or anything of that sort. There never has been from the Labour party.

At the core of this debate is the point about hospitals.

"There is a tendency in some quarters to defend the very small hospital on the ground of its localism and intimacy . . . but everybody knows today that if a hospital is to be efficient it must provide a number of specialised services. Although I am not myself a devotee of bigness for bigness sake, I would rather be kept alive in the efficient if cold altruism of a large hospital than expire in a gush of warm sympathy in a small one."—[Official Report, 30 April 1946; Vol. 422, c. 44.]

I wonder whether the Opposition agree with that. They probably do not. That is from the speech of Aneurin Bevan in moving the Second Reading of the National Health Service Bill on 30 April 1946. The Opposition have resiled from what was promised then. They have no policies. Bevan took on the challenges, which the Opposition are not prepared to do. That is why the House should reject the Opposition's motion.

Question put, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

MADAM SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House noting that the problems of London's health service have been the subject of at least 20 reports in the last 80 years, all of which have come to broadly similar conclusions, believes that a better service for patients lies in implementing decisions and not a further review; commends the Government for its record in investing in modern hospitals, first class specialist centres and primary care and for its determination to take necessary decisions in the long term interest of the Capital's health service and the people of London; and calls on the Government to ensure that the decisions are now carefully carried forward taking due account of concerns that they should be properly paced so that patients continue to benefit from new and better services before old ones close.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.),

That the Farm and Conservation Grant (Variation) Scheme 1995 (S.I., 1995, No. 890), dated 23rd March 1995, a copy of which was laid before this House on 28th March, be approved.—[Mr. Bates.]

Question agreed to.

National Health Service (Wakefield)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Bates.]

10.32 pm

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise serious concerns about the future direction of health provision in the Wakefield metropolitan district—concerns that I know are shared by my hon. Friends the Members for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) and for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien). I know that they hope to catch your eye later, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

At the centre of those concerns is the fear that Wakefield Healthcare, the health authority purchaser, is considering a strategy that could result in the closure of either Pinderfields general hospital, Wakefield, or Pontefract general infirmary—or, indeed, both. Such is the level of public concern that I feel that the Government must be made aware of local feeling in the Wakefield district, and made to address their own responsibilities for the future health care of our constituents.

I make that specific point because I believe that the direct consequences of the Government's health policies are at the root of proposals that could totally undermine existing services. In short, the internal market is not working in Wakefield district. To try to make it work, Wakefield Healthcare is contemplating options for change that could result in cuts in service provision that are unacceptable to my constituents and to those of my hon. Friends.

Before I set out in detail my concerns, I want to make it clear that, although most of my constituents use Pinderfields hospital in Wakefield, I have no desire for that hospital to be sustained and developed at the expense of Pontefract general infirmary. My personal agenda—and I believe that of yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and my hon. Friends—is to ensure that the future of both hospitals is secured. Both are popular, well used and major employers in a region that has recently suffered more than most from job losses.

Under the provisions of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990, for the past two years Wakefield Healthcare has been the major purchaser of health care in Wakefield district. Under the Government's health changes, that body is responsible for strategic planning of health care, and for determining its overall direction.

The three major providers in the region are the two trusts based at Pinderfields and Pontefract hospitals, and the Wakefield and Pontefract Community Health NHS trust. It would not be unfair to the health authority to say that, from the outset, it would have been preferred the establishment of one single trust, covering acute provision and based primarily in Wakefield and Pontefract. Indeed, the authority has proposed the amalgamation of the Pinderfields and Pontefract trusts—an option, as you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that is strongly resisted locally, because real fears exist that it would lead to the rationalisation of services and a serious loss of provision.

In recent years, my constituents in particular have seen significant closure programmes, and they simply no longer trust local health managers' assurances. Through the House of Commons Library, I have calculated that, between 1979 and the last general election, more than 1,000 hospital beds have been lost in hospitals serving my constituents in Wakefield. They have good reason, therefore, not to trust assurances given in the local health service.

As you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will recall, we lost Snapethorpe hospital after being given assurances of alternative provisions which came to nothing. During consultation on the closure of County hospital in Wakefield, we were promised purpose-built geriatric provision on the Pinderfields site. It never happened.

More recently, during consultation on the closure of Manygates maternity hospital in Wakefield, where I, my son and my daughter were born, we were promised a purpose-built maternity unit on the Pinderfields site. That never happened either, so when new proposals emerge under the title of "Reconfiguring Hospital Services", my constituents and those of my hon. Friends know what to expect.

I learned of the proposals in a conversation with the chairman of Wakefield Healthcare, Mr. Brian Hayward, on the evening of Monday 6 March. I was left in no doubt that serious consideration was being given to the closure of both Pinderfields hospital and Pontefract general infirmary on the basis of building a new hospital somewhere between the two. He confirmed his statement on the following day, when we had a further conversation over the telephone.

On Friday 10 March, the Wakefield Express weekly newspaper reported Wakefield Healthcare's chief executive, Mr. Keith Salisbury, as stating that discussions about the idea of a new hospital were only "tentative", and that there was no question of closing Pinderfields. On that same day, however, I was telephoned by Mr. Roy Cusworth, chairman of Pinderfields hospital NHS trust, who, along with his chief executive, Mr. Peter Ward, had that week been made aware of the possible closure of Pinderfields.

Bearing in mind the fact that that trust had only recently published revised proposals for a major redevelopment of the hospital, and that it had been given approval to seek private financing for the project, the trust chairman was understandably incensed at suggestions of the hospital's closure. I know that he discussed his concerns at the time with the chairman of the Northern and Yorkshire regional health authority, Mr. John Greetham.

On the following Wednesday, 15 March, the chair, vice-chair and chief executive of Wakefield Healthcare met you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) and myself at the House of Commons. We discussed in some detail the issues facing the authority. I was alarmed to be told that any decisions about investment in new hospital provision at Pinderfields, Pontefract or on a new site would be a matter for the private investors under the private finance initiative. I would welcome the Minister's comments on that specific point.

I gained the clear impression that, regardless of the proposed development at Pinderfields or other options that might be suggested by the Pontefract trust or the health authority itself, the central determinant would be the choice of those investing private capital. I know that it was not just me who gained that impression. The minute of the Pontefract and District community health council meeting, held on 10 April, recorded your view, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The minutes state:

"Mr. Lofthouse said in his opinion, the issue would be totally influenced by private capitalists investing monies. At the end of the day, these people were looking for returns on their monies and this would be the biggest consideration."

I recognise that Wakefield Healthcare has been landed with an extremely difficult task in implementing Government policy in the Wakefield district. The extent of those difficulties is made clear in its health strategy document, which I saw for the first time only yesterday. That document itemises various changes that have a bearing on the future plans of every health purchaser, including changes in professional practice, shorter hospital stays, day surgery and moves towards primary care.

In its specific policies for hospital provision in the Wakefield area, it makes particular reference to the reduction in junior doctors' hours, shorter training and the specific funding problems affecting Wakefield as a result of the Government's new allocation formula.

The Minister will recall that I previously raised the allocation formula with him in another Adjournment debate. As he knows, the formula assumes that Wakefield is overfunded by 4.9 per cent, or £7 million at current levels. The health strategy document states:

"It is therefore likely that development funds will be scarce during the strategic period and that there will be a continued need for redeployment of resources."

As well as serious resourcing difficulties, the other key element affecting Wakefield's health care strategy is that it has one of the highest concentrations of general practitioner fundholders in the country. Fundholders now cover 75 per cent. of the district's population, and by next April the health authy will be a minority purchaser.

We have to ask, how on earth can a health authy, supposedly in the context of public consultation, be expected to develop a strategy as a purchaser when, in future, the main purchasers will be groups of fundholders whose only tentative link to accountability is to the regional office of the national health service executive. If we throw in the fact that Wakefield has five practices with 55,000 patients moving to total fundholding, is it any wonder that, to the objective observer, the planning of health provision in Wakefield appears to be degenerating into total chaos?

The health authority's four options for the future pattern of provision are all, for various reasons, unacceptable. The first option of no change is dismissed by the health authy itself. The second option of redistribution of specialisms between Pinderfields and Pontefract means constituents being forced to travel miles for care that is currently provided within their own localities. There is concern that specialties cannot be traded between sites because of the need to reflect best clinical practice, to ensure linkages with other specialties and to make the best use of equipment and support facilities.

The third option, of providing most emergency work at one hospital and most elective work at the other, would mean massive duplication of equipment and support facilities. More importantly—as you well know, Mr. Deputy Speaker—it would result in serious delays in treating accident and emergency cases, and could cost lives.

My hon. Friends the Members for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) and for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien), and you yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker, are probably more aware of the exact time it takes to travel by road between Pontefract and Wakefield, but I would say that 25 minutes is a reasonable estimate. In that period, people moving to either end of the district could die. That is what happens if access to accident and emergency units is delayed in the way in which it may well be as a result of the suggestions put forward by the health authority.

The fourth option is establishing a new hospital. The report that I have seen does not make it clear whether or not that would entail closing existing hospitals. It will inevitably result in the loss of many existing services at previous sites, inconvenience to patients and—of course—serious job losses.

The strategy document accepts that Pinderfields trust has been given permission by the regional health authority to explore the potential for private financial support for the redevelopment. While the trust states that it "would not wish to adversely affect this private finance bid", it would surely come as no surprise to Wakefield Healthcare to learn that potential private investors attracted by Pinderfields may be somewhat put off to be made aware of the options in the strategy document, and their implications.

A backdrop to the Wakefield health pantomime is the current review of health provision in Leeds. Wakefield Healthcare's inability to defend regional neurosurgery provision at Pinderfields from the raid by the United Leeds Hospitals trust does not exactly inspire confidence in its willingness to rebuff the further predicted incursions in the direction of other regional specialisms within Wakefield.

Pinderfields—as you well know, Mr. Deputy Speaker—has a proud record in many of its specialisms, with its burns unit, plastic surgery provision, spinal injuries and younger disabled units, and other services which are very widely respected. But the Government's internal market means that such key services can be grabbed and moved elsewhere. There is a scarcely hidden agenda within the Leeds review, of shifting further specialisms to Leeds and leaving Wakefield's hospitals as mere satellites.

That is not acceptable from my point of view, or from the point of view of my hon. Friends who represent the Wakefield district. It is not acceptable that the Government can avoid responsibility for the problems which are now being faced within Wakefield. It is not acceptable for the Minister to give me parliamentary answers of the kind he has given to me on this issue in the past few weeks.

I shall quote two of those answers before I end my speech. On 16 march, I asked whether the Secretary of State

"will seek reports regarding the future of Pinderfields hospital, Wakefield from (a) the chair of the Yorkshire and Northern health region, (b) the chair of the Wakefield health authority and (c) the chair of the Pinderfields trust; and if she will make a statement."

The answer from the Minister was:

"This is a matter for Wakefield Healthcare. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. Brian Hayward, chairman of Wakefield Healthcare, for details."—[Official Report, 16 March 1995; Vol. 256, c. 707.]

Having spoken to that gentleman, I am none the wiser

[Mr. David Hinchliffe]

On 27 March, I asked the Secretary of State

"if she will make it her policy to ensure that Pinderfields hospital, Wakefield, remains open as a district general hospital maintaining regional specialisms."

The Minister answered:

"This is a matter for the Northern and Yorkshire regional health authority. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. John Greetham CBE, chairman of the authority, for details."—[Official Report, 27 March 1995; Vol. 257, c. 422.]

In conclusion, I would say that this is a matter for the Government. I want answers to some questions tonight.

10.47 pm

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): May I pay tribute to all that you have done, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in the campaign in the area? I would not have time tonight to reveal all you have done. I wish to make some short but extremely important points. My constituency has seen Southmoor in Hemsworth slimmed down, Ackton hospital in Featherstone closed down and Warde Aldam in South Hensall pulled down. That is what we have found from the internal market in my constituency.

On top of that, the threat to Pontefract general infirmary is simply not acceptable. My hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) has just referred to the time it takes to get to Pinderfields in terms of accident and emergency units. Attention has not been paid to the difficulties in transport at certain hours. I myself have spent over an hour getting into the centre of Wakefield in a small car. That is not unusual in the rush hour when such accidents can occur.

The internal market has been a disaster for our area. The only body that has benefited from it is a doctor's practice, which made a record surplus, enabling the doctor to extend his surgery in a totally unnecessary fashion. Yet that is the main capital expenditure that Wakefield has had. If that is an example of the internal market, we have had quite enough of it, and the Minister must take control and do some indicative planning.

10.50 pm

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): It is not long since the Minister came to our area and agreed to close the accident and emergency unit and other facilities at the Castleford and Normanton hospital, which serves a large part of my constituency. People in the Ossett area of my constituency would have to travel tremendous distances if the Pinderfields hospital is somehow to be moved to the east of Wakefield. There are strong rumours that that could happen.

I want the Minister to be honest and open with us tonight, and say what future he envisages for hospital provision in Wakefield. There is strong opposition to the proposal to close Pinderfields hospital and Pontefract general infirmary with a view to building a smaller hospital in the area. People in the metropolitan area of Wakefield will not accept that proposal.

There are now strong rumours that the hospice services could face difficulties because general practitioners in the area will, in due course, be responsible for purchasing services at the hospices in Pontefract and Wakefield. People are tremendously concerned about the future of hospice services, because the Government are contemplating the purchase of such services in the future.

Will the Minister assure us that constant provision will be made for people who need hospice services in Wakefield and Pontefract? I hope that he will assure us that no changes will be made to hospital provision in Wakefield, and that the hospices in the area will continue to receive the same resources to maintain their services in both towns. That is important to our area, and we look to the Minister for assurances on that provision.

10.52 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): I am grateful for an opportunity to reply to this debate. I am aware of the strength of concern felt by the constituents of the hon. Members for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe), for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) and for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien), as well as your constituents, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You and I have corresponded about local health services and had more than one meeting at Pontefract hospital and elsewhere to discuss those matters.

The question of resources has come up a couple of times in the debate.

It has been alleged in a previous Adjournment debate, and it was mentioned in this debate, that the Wakefield health authority is over target, and it has been said that therefore there will be cuts. I must tell the House that, in the current year, there is an increase of 4.4 per cent., and that means a real increase in resources.

Although, compared with some other districts, Wakefield may be above the target, it is unlikely, given that there is likely to be a continuation of real increases in health resources in the years to come, that any over-target district health authority will lose resources in real terms as a result of redistribution. Fears raised about future resources should therefore not be exaggerated.

There are other reasons why Wakefield health authority, like many others, must consider the future pattern, not only of hospital acute services, but of all health services throughout its district. Obviously, resources come into it, but the pattern of health services is evolving. The hon. Member for Wakefield mentioned some of the reasons—the growth in day surgery and the increase in the numbers of patients who will be seen in primary care settings rather than in hospitals in future. All sorts of changes are taking place that will make it necessary to reconsider the number of acute beds and acute hospitals in each region and each district.

It goes without saying, therefore, that it would be irresponsible of Wakefield or any other health authority not to look very hard at the pattern that it envisages for the future, looking 10, 20 or 30 years ahead and making proposals now.

I also refer to what the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) said about hospice services. I will inquire into that matter. There has been anxiety that, because the central funding of hospices and palliative care has been devolved to districts, there would be a detrimental effect on local hospices. There is no reason why that should happen, but I will inquire into the matter for the hon. Gentleman, because the resources that are provided centrally by the Department of Health for hospices have increased sharply in the past, and I am sure that we intend to continue to support that sector, in which the country has such a splendid record.

On the subject of Wakefield Healthcare's health strategy document, which lies at the heart of the anxieties of the hon. Member for Wakefield, consultation on a proposed health strategy in Wakefield between July and October 1994 was extensive. It covered the needs of the whole population of the Wakefield metropolitan district council area. About 1,000 copies of the proposals were issued, and a further 125,000 copies of the summary were printed and issued through the free press or distributed at various local events.

Representatives of Wakefield Healthcare spoke to several local groups about the strategy, as well as holding meetings of the three local national health service trusts and two community health councils in Wakefield and Pontefract. It is worth emphasising that the Wakefield health strategy discusses the way in which services in the Wakefield area may be shaped in the next five years and considers the need for any shift to primary care that may be appropriate.

Wakefield Healthcare set up a sub-group to consider responses. The group included three local general practitioners, the director of public health and two directors of Wakefield Healthcare. The two community health councils were invited to contribute, especially about the proposed move of some services to the primary care sector.

The sub-group looked at four main options, which were: option 1, to do nothing; option 2, to redistribute specialities over two hospital sites; option 3, to identify one hospital to undertake elective care and one for emergency care; and option 4, to build a new hospital on a new site. Those options were discussed informally with local Members of Parliament and other representatives. Since then, the focus of attention has understandably been on one section of that strategy—the possible reconfiguration of acute services.

It has been stressed a number of times that the discussions are at an early stage. I am therefore unable to give any definitive idea to hon. Members as to which option will finally be recommended. I understand that the proposed health strategy will be published later in May. Wakefield health authority also proposes to take a series of steps—for example, to explore the cost benefit and feasibility of each of the four options with local hospitals and, in particular, the three trusts.

Services that support any future configuration will be reviewed. There will be further consultation on the proposed way ahead with hospital clinicians, GPs, community health councils and all other local organisations. I understand that that is likely to begin in the summer. It will be followed by confirmation of the preferred option for the future configuration of services for the district.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Will the Minister specifically address the problem of fundholding that I raised? Will he consider the difficulty in which the authority will find itself next year as a minority purchaser?

Mr. Sackville: It goes without saying that the health authority will continue to be a major force and a major purchaser of acute services for all fundholding GPs in the district. It would be wrong to suppose that it is not possible to plan health services where there is a wide distribution of fundholding.

I reject the hon. Member's description of health planning descending into chaos, or words to that effect. The consultation exercise must be gone through, because health services are evolving. It will be for the health authority, principally, to decide what option should be recommended. Those matters must be planned coolly and rationally, because they affect the pattern of health services for decades to come.

I assure hon. Members that the outcome of the deliberations will mean a better and more modern health service for the entire district for generations to come.

Domestic Economy

1. Mr. Gapes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on prospects for improvement in the state of the domestic economy. [22225]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): The outlook remains highly favourable. The economy grew by nearly 4 per cent. last year and inflation was at its lowest level for over 30 years.

Mr. Gapes: If the outlook is really favourable, why did we have a £10.5 billion deficit on trade in 1994, why has the pound devalued by 35 per cent. since the Prime Minister took us into the exchange rate mechanism at DM2.95 and why is the weakness of our economy being reflected by a weakening of our currency, day by day?

Mr. Clarke: First, our trade performance continues to improve. The hon. Gentleman will know that this morning's trade figures show exports up by 9 per cent. in volume compared with a year ago and he will also know that the current account last year was extremely favourable despite the strong recovery. We even showed a surplus in our dealings with Japan last year. The hon. Gentleman's sudden concern about the exchange rate is very reassuring. He will be glad to know that we are strengthening against the deutschmark today.

Mr. John Townend: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the unemployed, small business, the construction industry, many of the service industries and much of the retail trade are relieved and grateful that he did not put up interest rates? Will he confirm that the grounds for that decision were purely economic and based on factors such as low wage inflation, the flat housing market and the quarterly survey by the Forum of Private Business showing that for the past four quarters the rate of growth had gone down? Will he confirm that if inflationary pressures rise he would have no hesitation in putting up interest rates?

Mr. Clarke: I confirm all those things. As my hon. Friend says, small businesses in particular want stability and certainty in the Government's policy. We are pursuing steady recovery with low inflation and every policy action that I take is aimed at that conclusion. I congratulate my hon. Friend on expressing an opinion on the decision that I took on Friday. Nobody in the Labour party has yet seemed to have formed an opinion one way or the other as to whether the decision was welcome.

Mr. Sheldon: Is the Chancellor of the Exchequer aware that no Government can allow the Governor of the Bank of England to determine economic policy in this country? The Government, of whatever party, must determine such matters, and they are judged right or wrong by the events as they unfold.

Mr. Clarke: I do not know why the right hon. Gentleman should tell me that. His own shadow Chancellor needs to be told that. Everybody will discover in six weeks' time in the usual way the opinion of the Governor and myself at last week's meeting. Everyone can see from the Governor's speech this morning that the Governor of the Bank of England and I are entirely agreed on the object of policy and we believe that that policy has been delivered successfully.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), the shadow Chancellor, has now got the monthly monetary report and the Governor's own inflation report; he has seen the judgment of the markets; he has heard every financial commentator give an opinion and he has heard my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) give an opinion, yet he has no opinion at all on the subject one way or the other. The shadow Chancellor does not even cast a shadow one way or the other. He would just wait to see what the Governor told him to do.

Mr. Renton: Has my right hon. and learned Friend had time in his busy morning to read an article in today's edition of The Times headed "Three cheers for Clarke, the best post-Jenkins Chancellor"?

Is he aware that Mr. Kaletsky, the author of the article, congratulates him on being his own man in standing up against the City and the Bank of England and their pressure for higher interest rates?

Is my right hon. and learned Friend also aware that many of his hon. Friends would disagree with Mr. Kaletsky's conclusion that he should become President of the European Commission, but expect him to remain as an extremely successful Chancellor for many years, leading and guiding the improvement in the economy of the country?

Mr. Clarke: I read the article and I am, of course, grateful to Mr. Kaletsky and to my right hon. Friend. I have no aspirations to be President of the European Commission.

Mr. Budgen: Yet.

Mr. Clarke: I am unlikely to be put forward for that post by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen).

One thing with which all my critics have always agreed, as much as my supporters, is that I endeavour to be my own man. I take my own decisions. I am extremely candid and clear about why I have taken those decisions. I am faced by an opponent who has no opinions and no decision-taking capacity on the subject.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: Does the Chancellor agree with the Governor of the Bank of England and the chief economist of the Bank of England that interest rates will have to rise sooner rather than later? Is he still serious about keeping inflation under 2.5 per cent. by the end of this Parliament?

Mr. Clarke: I shall set interest rates, as I have always said I shall set them, after discussion with the Governor of the Bank of England, to pursue the objective upon which we are both agreed of keeping inflation between the 1 to 4 per cent. range and getting it under the lower half by the end of the Parliament. I shall continue to do that.

If the hon. Gentleman wants to know the opinion of the Governor on that, he will know that he made a speech in Aberdeen this morning in which he said:

"Notwithstanding the current excitements, I am convinced we remain in better economic shape than we have been for a very long time. The Chancellor has made it clear that the macro economic policies that have brought us to this point remain in place—and it is important, from my perspective, that they should."

I agree with that. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman agrees with that, and I have not a clue whether the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East agrees.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Will the Chancellor answer the question put to him just a minute ago? The Bank of England said this morning that under the present policies, the Government's last remaining target—an inflation target of 2.5 per cent. by the end of the Parliament—will not be met. [Interruption.] That is what the Bank of England said this morning. Will the Chancellor now reaffirm in clear words that the inflation target of 2.5 per cent. by the end of the Parliament will not be changed?

Mr. Clarke: I have just said that it will not be changed. There has been no change of policy. What the Bank of England's inflation report this morning says is that it has revised its forecast up slightly because of recent changes in the exchange rate. It stresses that the certainties about inflation are vague—it does not give a spot figure. We will continue to set interest rates to achieve the target that I have given. That is a clear policy.

If the hon. Gentleman believes that forecasts of inflation are cast in concrete, he is mistaken. If he wants a guide to policy, he should not just look at one forecast of inflation, but look at the commitment of the Government and the Governor to low inflation and the fact that, in the past 19 months, we have produced the best inflation record the country has seen since 1961.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: May I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his courage last week in not putting up interest rates? He knows my views about the importance to the country of the manufacturing and construction industries. Does he accept that a real guide to the true economic strength of the country is the strength of construction and manufacturing? If they are doing well, all the other indicators are, in my view, irrelevant. Would he comment on that?

Mr. Clarke: Much as I would love to agree with every word of my hon. Friend, in the end he underestimates the complexity of delivering sustained recovery with low inflation, which has eluded the country ever since the war. We now have the best prospects of achieving that. The present recovery is being led by manufacturing and our export performance with the outside world is particularly encouraging, because we are rebalancing the economy in a much healthier fashion.

I am glad that my hon. Friend considers my decision courageous, because it is exactly the same type of decision as those I have taken for the past two years. We are pursuing a consistent policy to give manufacturers and others the stability that they require and the certainty they need about the way in which the Government intend to take economic policy.

Mortgage Interest Relief at Source

2. Mr. Fraser: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy that an unmarried couple owning a house and who have jointly borrowed £60,000 or more are not penalised in terms of MIRAS. [22226]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Sir George Young): Since 1 August 1988, mortgage interest relief has been restricted to a loan of £30,000 per residence, regardless of the number or marital status of the people buying together. That rule ensures that married and unmarried couples are treated in the same way. Unmarried people buying a house together before 1 August 1988 can keep any higher level of relief to which they were entitled, as long as their circumstances do not change. However, if they move, replace the loan, or marry, their limit for relief falls to £30,000 between them.

Mr. Fraser: Does that mean that, if an unmarried couple who bought their house before 1988 get married, the Government put a tax on marriage and legitimacy? Surely that is not Government policy. Is it not about time that the law was changed, so that those cohabitees who do marry do not suffer a tax penalty?

Sir George Young: The law was changed to remove exactly the injustice to which the hon. Gentleman refers, because, under the old rules, an unmarried couple could obtain as much as twice the amount of mortgage interest tax relief as a married couple. That was the injustice that we removed in 1988. We also gave transitional relief to those who had bought under the old rules, until such time as their circumstances changed.

If we were to do what I believe that the hon. Gentleman wants us to do, we would simply continue to entrench an injustice that Conservative Members, at least, find unacceptable.

Mr. Devlin: Surely it is right that married couples should be in no worse a position than unmarried couples, and therefore the restriction that took place in 1988 was perfectly just and well thought out. In fact, we should have done it earlier.

Sir George Young: I agree with my hon. Friend, and I find it perverse that a decision that we took in 1988, which I am not aware was criticised by Opposition Members at the time, has now come in for rather belated criticism from the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser).

Privatisation

3. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the effect on the Exchequer in the last financial year of industries privatised since 1979; and what was their effect in 1979. [22227]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In 1979, nationalised industries cost the taxpayer about £50 million each week. In 1994-95, privatised companies paid about £55 million each week into the Exchequer.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that those figures demonstrate the outstanding success of our privatisation policy, which has been widely recognised throughout the world by such regimes as North Korea and Cuba? Does he not find it strange that the last bastion of socialism, the new Labour party, has yet to appreciate the effects of privatisation?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. The Labour party held a special conference to try to pretend that it no longer agreed with the North Korean communists, but only a week later, when the first privatisation proposition came before Parliament, it was opposing it again and backing the keeping of nuclear fuel in state-owned hands, in spite of the fact that privatisation will bring a dramatic fall in electricity prices in England, Scotland and, indeed, all parts of the United Kingdom.

Ms Armstrong: Does the Chancellor recognise that the Treasury will make about £5 billion from the two privatisations that the Government are pursuing—£5 billion for tax cuts before the general election, which will have to be paid for by the British people to the tune of £10 billion in the costs of decommissioning power stations and subsidies to British Rail? What sort of bargain is that for the taxpayer?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Lady has at least worked out that the proposal to privatise the nuclear electricity industry has nothing to do with tax cuts. It has to do with putting in place commercial disciplines and private sector management, which those in the industry want, and reducing the costs of electricity to consumers throughout the country. That is the purpose of the privatisation.

If it has become the policy of the Labour party to seek tax cuts—I have no knowledge of the direction in which it intends to go in that regard—tax cuts depend on tight control of public spending and the reduction of public borrowing. If the Labour party ever gets round to having an economic policy, perhaps Labour Members will give us the benefit of some of their opinions about some of those elements—tax, spending and borrowing.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the capacity of the privatised and other industries to invest and deliver wealth to the nation, jobs to our people and revenue to the Exchequer depends critically upon the level of interest rates? Does he agree that choking off investment every time we fear a tremor of inflation is a formula for the progressive debilitation of our economy?

Mr. Clarke: That is right, but I am sure that my hon. Friend also agrees that inflation has killed off fast recovery and poses the biggest threat to the confidence that people must feel before they will invest in increasing industrial capacity. That is why we make the judgments we do on the basis of a clear inflation target. That is why we look at the real economy, as well as the monetary aggregates and the exchange rate, when we make those decisions. I believe—judging from his speech today, the Governor believes it also—that we have been remarkably successful in getting the right balance over the past two or three years.

Drugs

4. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what currently available figures he has for the quantities and value of drugs seized at United Kingdom airports over any conveniently available recent 12-month period. [22228]

The Paymaster General (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): During 1994 Customs and Excise seized 47 tonnes of cannabis and four tonnes of cocaine, heroin and synthetic drugs, with a total street value of some £551 million. Some 10½ per cent. by value of these drugs were seized at airports.

Mr. Dalyell: May I ask a question of which I have given Treasury officials notice? Could they put in the Library an account of what a senior Customs official, Mr. Philip Connolly—whom I do not criticise in any way—said to senior Pan American airways security officers Michael Jones and Jim Berwick about controlled drugs delivery? Will the Minister consider asking a senior Treasury official to watch carefully the two-hour film about Lockerbie which is to be screened tonight on Channel 4? The significance or otherwise of my question will then become apparent.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The hon. Gentleman did me the courtesy of giving me notice of his intention to raise the Lockerbie case. A British Customs officer did give information to an American court about the Lockerbie bombing, and confirmed that bag-switching is a technique used by drug smuggling organisations. However, there is no evidence that that was the way in which the bomb was put on the flight in question; nor were British Customs involved in any controlled delivery of drugs on that ill-fated flight. I shall ask my officials to watch the programme to be screened this evening, and I will supply any additional information to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Allason: Will my hon. Friend agree to look at the Treasury's policy relating to foreign rewards paid to British police forces for drugs seizures overseas? Is he aware that the Drug Enforcement Administration is prepared to pay very large sums in return for information that leads to drug seizures abroad? Under Treasury rules, all of that money must go directly to the Exchequer whereas, under DEA rules, the money must go directly to the drug squads involved. Therefore, Britain is denying itself large sums of money that would be available from the United States in the fight against drugs.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I am not sure whether my hon. Friend is quite correct in what he says. The proceeds of international drugs seizures can be recycled to drug enforcement agencies, including those in this country. I will obtain the details and write to my hon. Friend about the matter.

Financial Supervision

5. Mr. Corbett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what new proposals he is considering on banking and financial supervision. [22229]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Banking and financial supervision is a large subject. Therefore, with respect, this is a rather wide question. At any one time a variety of issues will be under consideration. For example, my hon. Friend the Minister of State announced at the beginning of the year the outcome of our review of the Building Societies Act 1986 and, more recently, the Treasury released a consultation paper on open-ended investment companies with proposals for legislation to allow their formation in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Corbett: I thank the Chancellor for that answer. Does he accept that, following the rip-off of people on modest incomes who were persuaded to buy private pensions and mortgage-linked endowment policies, there is a need for more effective regulation of banking and financial services; or will those people simply become more casualties of the Government's indifference?

Mr. Clarke: The response to the problems that have arisen with personal pensions shows how successful we are in having the right regulatory regime in place, and how responsive the authorities have been in making sure that individuals who might have suffered loss as a result of mis-selling are considered. We are going through a huge process of identifying any persons who may have experienced mis-selling of personal pensions and of making sure that those responsible put such people in the position in which they should be. Similarly, we already cover endowment-based mortgages under the Financial Services Act 1986.

Strong arrangements are in place to provide consumer protection. It is not the right response to demand yet another quango and more Acts of Parliament—particularly when the present arrangements in this country work so much better than anything almost anywhere in the world.

Mr. Budgen: As banking is affected by monetary policy, I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on not having increased interest rates, for two reasons. At long last, he understands the advantages of floating exchange rates, and he demonstrates that, under our constitution, the Chancellor of the Exchequer must be responsible for monetary policy and that it cannot be delegated to an independent Bank of England or, worst of all, to an independent central European bank.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend and I have always agreed on rather more of economic policy than he ever cares to concede. I do know that one has either a floating exchange rate or a fixed exchange rate, and that one should not have a target exchange rate when it is floating. The exchange rate is something that one takes into account when setting monetary policy. My hon. Friend gave an impeccable statement of the constitutional position when he said that the Chancellor is responsible for monetary policy in this country but acts on the advice of the Governor of the Bank of England. I have made matters more open than ever before, by allowing the Bank of England to publish an unedited inflation report and by publishing the minutes of meetings after six weeks, to give it more credibility with people, such as my hon. Friend and myself, who want to see such decisions taken on economic grounds.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on yet again giving an opinion one way or the other about last week's decision. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) had one chance to do so, but he went on about something that I have already forgotten. The hon. Gentleman failed absolutely to be the first member of the Labour party to say whether he would have increased interest rates, taken them down or done anything at all last Friday.

Rev. Martin Smyth: While I welcome the Chancellor's statement that he does not want any more quangos, does he agree that it is time that the Treasury relaxed some restrictions on friendly societies, to allow them to give more benefits to their members, whom they have been looking after well for years?

Mr. Clarke: That matter has been reviewed from time to time and we consider representations on the subject. We think that there is some scope for change.

Mr. Brazier: Surely the most important purpose of banking supervision is to keep an eye on the overall level of lending and the money supply. Will my right hon. and learned Friend take it from me that many on this side of the House believe that when broad money is in the lower half of our range, 80 per cent. of bank lending to small businesses is secured on domestic property and there is still strong anecdotal evidence of tightness of credit in the economy, my right hon. and learned Friend is absolutely right to resist pressure to raise interest rates?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is right. Broad money as well as narrow money, which has remained above its target range for some time, are two of the items that one considers. I repeat my congratulations to my hon. Friend. He gave an opinion that may provoke a response, but the entire Labour party is sitting there like a stuffed duck because Labour Members do not know whether they are meant to get up and say that they agree or do not agree with last Friday, because the man in front of them has not yet made up his mind. He is incapable of making up his mind on any aspect of economic policy.

Mr. Darling: I ask the Chancellor to return to the original question. Does he accept that pensions being mis-sold or people being given inappropriate advice about endowment mortgages is due in no small part to the fact that we live under a regime of self-regulation, where the public interest takes second place to the trade interest? Does he accept that public confidence in the industry will not be restored until the nonsense of self-regulation is brought to an end?

Mr. Clarke: With the greatest respect, I do not agree that that case is made out at all. The statutory framework that we have is set under the Financial Service Act 1986. There is no evidence that making the whole regime statutory would improve a system in which the self-regulatory bodies contain a large number of people with detailed experience of how the industry works.

Of course, we have to look at the serious problems that lie behind the mis-selling of so many personal pensions. I am confident that the new Personal Investment Authority will improve matters and exercise tighter supervision. I am delighted that more than 5,000 firms have applied to join that authority, and I am sure they will strive to obtain higher standards in future.

Public Borrowing

6. Dr. Spink: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the reduction in public borrowing (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in other EU countries in the last year. [22230]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The public sector borrowing requirement for 1994-95, was £10 billion lower than in the year before. Government borrowing is falling faster, here in the United Kingdom, than in any other major European economy.

With permission Madam Speaker, I will publish the detailed information requested on other countries in the Official Report.

Dr. Spink: Does my right hon. Friend agree that paying taxes is fundamental to keeping down the public sector borrowing requirement and to the financial well-being of everyone in the country? Will he therefore join me in deploring the fact that some of the newly elected Labour councillors on Castle Point borough council are facing committal proceedings—

Madam Speaker: Order. That is hardly the responsibility of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Much as I am devoted to Castle Point, I doubt whether the Chancellor has any responsibility for activities there.

Dr. Spink: What would happen to the public sector borrowing requirement if, like the Labour councillors in Castle Point, the rest of us refused to pay our local taxes, as has Jim David of Canvey Island on Castle Point?

Mr. Clarke: I believe that all citizens should pay the taxes to which they are legally liable, properly and on time. I also believe that taxation should be kept down to the lowest possible level consistent with the public spending required to provide good high-quality services.

Mr. Enright: Will the Chancellor compare and contrast the differing definitions of public sector borrowing in different countries in the European Union?

Mr. Clarke: It is a perfectly fair point, and it is done as part of monitoring the convergence criteria under present arrangements within the European Union. Attempts are made to compare like with like across the European Union. We follow international definitions. The conventions that we follow are recognised to be in line with the best of international practice, and the PSBR figures that we produce are trustworthy and reliable, and show what remarkably good progress we are making in getting our public sector borrowing under control, in contrast to the total failure of the last Labour Government to deal with the public sector borrowing problems following recession when the International Monetary Fund eventually had to sort them out.

Mr. Tim Smith: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree with the European Monetary Institute that continuous efforts towards reducing—[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] I am quoting. [Interruption.] I am paraphrasing. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that continuous efforts towards public sector borrowing are needed if we are to have a growing economy and improve the supply side? Is it not the case that most European Governments are overspent and over-borrowed and that only the British Government have a clear programme for reducing spending and borrowing as a percentage of national income?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is right. There is a growing international consensus that in current circumstances a low level of fiscal deficits, low inflation and low debt to gross domestic product ratios are essential to keep an economy on course. That is wholly consistent with the policy of the Conservative party over the years. All the members of the European Union are committed to achieving those goals. As I have just said, Britain is reaching them rather faster than any of the major economies on the continent.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

7. Mr. Connarty: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest estimate of the Public Sector Borrowing Requirement for the present Budget year; and if he will make a statement. [22231]

8. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give his latest estimate of the public sector borrowing requirement. [22232]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jonathan Aitken): The Budget forecast of the PSBR for 1995-96 was £21½ billion.

Mr. Connarty: Given that the Bank of England is now calling into doubt the Chancellor's inflation forecast, and that the PSBR outturn was £1.3 billion more in 1994-95 than predicted, how can the British people be asked to have confidence in the Chancellor's predictions for the economy when he is turning into the Michael Fish of Budget forecasting?

Mr. Aitken: The hon. Gentleman is in danger of misrepresenting the views of the Governor, who clearly said today that we are "in better economic shape than we have been for a very long time."

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will at least acknowledge that the public sector borrowing requirement has been on a good downward trend for some time. It fell by £10 billion last year and is forecast to fall by £14 billion this year.

Mr. Griffiths: Does the Minister accept that the PSBR is being reduced only by imposing more Tory taxes? The latest—the transport tax, which is to take effect from 1 January next year and will add £10 each to some 12 million holidays—is the 21st Tory tax. Why does the Minister not listen to businesses and ensure that those proposals are withdrawn?

Mr. Aitken: The hon. Gentleman ignores the fact that one of the main reasons why the PSBR is falling at a satisfactory rate is that my right hon. and learned Friend and I managed to reduce public spending over the survey period by no less than £29 billion. That is a major contribution to bringing down the PSBR.

Mr. Nicholls: What representations has my right hon. Friend had from the Opposition about the need to reduce public expenditure—bearing in mind that their claim to be elected is now based on the fact that they can be safely elected because they are Tories as well?

Mr. Aitken: My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor referred a few moments ago to Opposition Front Benchers as a lot of silent stuffed ducks. That strange characteristic is repeated exactly in the case of my hon. Friend's point about public spending. The Opposition will not tell us whether they want lower public borrowing or what they intend to do about public spending. Away from the Dispatch Box, however, they are still the big-spending party: currently promising to spend more money on income support for 16 and 17-year-olds, on regional assemblies and development agencies, on an emergency employment programme, and on a defence conversion agency, more money from capital receipts, and more money on a growth strategy for Europe. All that adds up to much more borrowing and higher spending. It is about time that they stopped being stuffed ducks and admitted it.

Mr. Batiste: Does my right hon. Friend agree that reductions in public borrowing create resources which can be made available for other purposes? As the Opposition have called repeatedly for increased spending on education and hospitals, can my right hon. Friend think of any recent occasion when they have offered support for creating the economic circumstances that will make that possible?

Mr. Aitken: I can think of no such example. I have listened to wave after wave of sound bite waffle emanating from the Opposition, and I am longing to hear a single constructive fact or proposal from them. They have indeed been well named the stuffed duck Front Bench by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Will the Minister confirm that, in 1994, public borrowing as a percentage of gross domestic product was higher in the United Kingdom than in any other European Union country, with the exception of Italy, Greece and Spain? Will he further confirm that that imprudent situation was dealt with only by the Government imposing on the typical British family extra taxes of £800, in breach of the Government's election promises?

Mr. Aitken: The hon. Gentleman draws a one-sided and erroneous picture. In fact, the British Government's borrowing is falling faster than that of any other major European country. Among European Union countries, we have the lowest general Government debt-to-GDP ratio, with the exception of Luxembourg. So our record on public borrowing is good by European standards.

Economic Performance

9. Mr. Spring: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the editor of the Financial Times about Britain's economic performance and that of the rest of Europe. [22233]

Mr. Aitken: My right hon. and learned Friend and I are regular readers of the Financial Times.

Mr. Spring: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, according to the latest Financial Times survey of Europe's 500 largest companies, the United Kingdom accounts for no fewer than 16 of the top 25 by profitability, and no fewer than 11 of that 25 by market capitalisation? Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is yet another sign of the growing resilience and success of British business?

Mr. Aitken: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. He is right to draw attention to that upbeat Financial Times survey, which showed that British companies are riding high in the European league table of successful businesses. In addition to the figures to which he has drawn attention in terms of profitability and market capitalisation, six British companies are in the Financial Times top 10, 21 in the top 50 and no fewer than 179 in the top 500. That is three times more than the German score and twice that of the French. The figures show that British companies are exporting more and growing faster round the world than most of our European Union competitors.

Mr. Tony Banks: That is all very interesting, but why does Britain rank only ninth among the 15 European Union countries in terms of per capita gross domestic product? If there is such a great success story for Britain, why are Italy and France ranked above us in the per capita GDP league?

Mr. Aitken: In fact, Britain is out-performing most European countries. We have the fastest growing economy in Europe right now. Last year, it grew two and half times faster than Germany's, one and a half times faster than the French, and eight times faster than the Japanese. Unemployment is falling by 1,000 a day. There is plenty of good news by any international comparison standard. Opposition Members should recognise that.

Spare Capacity

10. Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of spare capacity in the economy. [22235]

Sir George Young: There is no unique measure of spare capacity in the economy. But recent data and evidence from business surveys all point to strong growth in business investment this year.

The UK is experiencing a healthy well-balanced recovery, with falling unemployment and underlying inflation below 3 per cent. The Government's policies will ensure that economic growth is sustained with low inflation.

Sir Thomas Arnold: With three quarters of the economy outside manufacturing, will my right hon. Friend acknowledge that inflationary pressures remain subdued? Is it not ludicrous, therefore, to be talking about a boom-bust cycle and an interest rate increase to counter the threat of overheating?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend is right. The Confederation of British Industry survey of capacity covered about a quarter of the economy. As for the other three quarters, to which my hon. Friend has referred, there are sectors in which there is clearly spare capacity, such as housing, construction and retail. We must examine the entire picture when we come to decisions.

Ms Primarolo: How does the Financial Secretary reconcile the Government's continued claim that the economy is in great shape with the Bank of England's view, as published today, that capacity constraints in manufacturing industry are prompting inflationary pressures? What do the Government intend to do about that conflict of interpretation?

Sir George Young: As the hon. Lady will have heard, the Governor has said that the economy is in better shape than it has been for many years. I do not agree, therefore, with the analysis that she has outlined. Investors would like to know where the Labour party stands on taxing, spending and borrowing. We have had no responses from Opposition Members for three quarters of an hour on key economic questions.

Retail Prices Index

11. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are his estimates for the retail prices index one month, six months and one year hence; and if he will make a statement. [22236]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The November Financial Statement and Budget Report forecast that underlying inflation would be 2½ per cent. both in the fourth quarter of 1995 and in the second quarter of 1996.

Mr. Fabricant: Whatever the absolute rate of inflation, does my hon. Friend agree that the relative inflation rate—that is, our rate of inflation against those of competing nations—is of equal importance? Does my hon. Friend further agree that it is the relative rate of inflation which defines our competitiveness and our ability to create jobs? That being so, what was the relative rate of inflation under the Labour Government when the average rate was 15.9 per cent., and what in my hon. Friend's estimation would be our current rate of inflation if we had committed £13 billion more public expenditure this year, as the Labour party had promised in 1992?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The underlying inflation rate of 2.6 per cent. for the year to April is lower than the comparable average for the EC as a whole. Between 1974 and 1979, the Labour party's inflation record was not only disastrous at home but extremely poor by international standards. All the clause IV waffle that we hear is less eloquent than the fact that Labour cannot be trusted on inflation. The real lesson that the British people have learnt is never to give it another opportunity.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 11 May. [22255]

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Prentice: Today, with the publication of the Nolan report, will the Prime Minister take full personal responsibility for the tide of sleaze that has engulfed his Government? Will he now admit that it is quite wrong for Ministers to move seamlessly from the Cabinet room to the boardroom, lining their pockets in the process?

The Prime Minister: I invite the hon. Gentleman to read the report before he comments on it. He will then see what Lord Nolan has to say about the great majority of men and women in British public life, their standards and their ethics, and he may just regret the way in which he and some of his hon. Friends have attempted, time after time, to issue general smears about specific matters.

Q2. Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 11 May. [22256]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Dame Jill Knight: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the size and scale of public rejoicing on Monday stoutly reaffirmed the love that the British people have for this country? They were waving Union Jacks, not tatty-looking red roses. Is it not appropriate to remind people that Labour's devolution policy would split this country more irrevocably and fundamentally than all Hitler's armies could possibly have done?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend makes clear, last week's celebrations were a remarkable occasion. They struck a perfect balance between commemoration and celebration, and I think that they brought a great deal of pleasure to the many men and women whom we were honouring for their service during the war so many years ago. I believe that they also showed that the sentiments that unite us as a nation are far stronger than those sometimes presented as though to disunite us. That is very healthy for the nation as a whole: it is an enormous strength for this country—a strength that should not be put at risk by misguided policy.

Mr. Blair: People of all political persuasions enjoyed VE day, and I do not think that political capital should be made out of it. Now—is 2.5 per cent. still the Prime Minister's inflation target?

The Prime Minister: We set out our inflation target some time ago. It is between 1 and 4 per cent., and in the lower half of that range by the end of this Parliament. It remains the same.

Mr. Blair: Does the Prime Minister then disagree with the Bank of England, which says that he will not meet that target?

The Prime Minister: The Bank of England has made it perfectly clear that it supports the policy that we are carrying out. If the right hon. Gentleman had read the speech by the Governor this morning—I will quote it to him if he wishes, for clearly he has not—he would have seen that the Governor makes very clear the importance of maintaining a strong control of inflation, saying that in recent years we have been very successful in that.

I remind the right hon. Gentleman that the nearest that the last Labour Government got to low inflation was 8.4 per cent. on rigged figures over one quarter. We have had inflation below 3 per cent. for more than a year.

Mr. Blair: I do not think that the Government are in any position to talk of rigged figures—no, indeed. The Bank of England clearly does not agree that the Prime Minister will meet his target. How does a public rift between the Government and the Bank of England do anything other than damage the credibility of the economy? Does not the fact that rises in interest rates are even being contemplated at the moment, when for millions of people they have barely moved out of recession, show the fundamental weakness of the economy that the Government have never addressed?

The Prime Minister: I do not think that the Governor of the Bank of England thinks that it is a weak economy, as the right hon. Gentleman will see if he reads the Governor's speech. The reality is that, as usual, the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues are playing both sides of the same policy. They criticise when interest rates go up and they criticise when interest rates do not go up. They simply do not know what they wish to do, except, whatever happens, to criticise it and to make short-term party political capital out of it; they do not give a fig for the long-term health of the British economy.

Mr. Churchill: Is it not clear that the French people—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must be heard in the House.

Mr. Churchill: Is it not clear that the French people have no greater love of socialism than the British? Will my right hon. Friend neglect no opportunity to expose the fact that, behind the innocent cherubic face that the Labour party seeks to present to the world, is a party which, every time it has been in government, has wrecked the economy, destroyed business confidence and boosted taxes to very high levels on ordinary working people?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is quite right about that. There is one matter in which Labour Governments have always been consistent: unemployment has always gone up, interest rates have gone up, taxes have gone up and prospects have gone down.

Q3. Mr. Simpson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 11 May. [22257]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Simpson: Can the Prime Minister confirm that, under the regulations governing the national lottery, the fingers crossed symbol is the property of the Secretary of State for National Heritage? Does he appreciate that it has come to represent the symbol of his party in that it is all that remains of his strategy for winning local government elections, his guarantee of emergency care beds for the people of London and his own prospects of leading the Conservative party towards its next electoral catastrophe?

The Prime Minister: During the past four years we have taken decisions that are in the long-term economic and social interests of Britain. Many of them have been difficult and unpopular, but as a result we have inflation lower than we have seen for a long time, unemployment falling faster than anywhere else in Europe, investment showing that British industry is growing and exports which show that in eight or nine months out of the past 14 we broke new records. When did the Labour party ever preside over an economic circumstance remotely like that?

Mr. Thurnham: When my right hon. Friend next meets Mr. Chirac, will he congratulate him on his presidential victory and remind him how much better it is to be outside the social charter, especially now that unemployment in France is 50 per cent. higher than in this country?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend about the problems of the social chapter. There is no doubt that right across the rest of the European Union the social chapter costs jobs. Here it does not cost jobs, because we are not part of it. I can reaffirm to the House that neither in the short term nor in the long term will we become part of it.

Q4. Mr. Beith: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 11 May. [22258]

The Prime Minister: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Beith: Is the Prime Minister aware of the announcement within the last hour that the Asea Brown Boveri train building works at York is to close with the loss of 700 jobs? Does he recognise that that is a demonstration of the dreadful chaos of rail privatisation and that investment in the railway industry is grinding to a halt as a result? What chance is there that our rail system will have investment and that trains will be built in this country at all?

The Prime Minister: Of course I know of the job losses at ABB, and I very much regret them. But privatisation is no more responsible for those job losses than it is for an outbreak of measles. The right hon. Gentleman is simply wrong to blame privatisation. It was the Government's private finance initiative which gave ABB the opportunity to bid for contracts such as the Northern line, the Heathrow express rail link and the Jubilee line extension. Unfortunately, ABB did not win any of those contracts, and that is the problem.

Sir Michael Neubert: As unemployment has come down by 632,000 since the last general election, is continuing to come down by an average of 1,000 per day and is below the European Union average, would it not be absolute folly to reverse that progress by adopting a national minimum wage? If such a policy is to be offered to the British people, do they not have an unchallengeable entitlement to know the level at which it will be set and how many hundreds of thousands of jobs will be lost as a result?

The Prime Minister: There seems to be some dispute among Opposition Members about whether they should proceed with the minimum wage and what its level would be. Certainly, despite their clarity that they wish to have a minimum wage, they are less clear about the level at which they would set it, and I find that rather odd. The right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) is keen enough to tell us that he would enter a single currency in many years' time, which is a major decision, yet he cannot tell us, even perhaps two years ahead, were he to win the election, what he would do on a relatively minor decision such as the level of the minimum wage.

The reality is that the Opposition know that a minimum wage would cost jobs and they know that if we knew its level we would be able to calculate that loss. On any reasonable assumption, more than 750,000 people would lose their jobs as a result of Labour dogma.

Q5. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 11 May. [22260]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Flynn: Is the Prime Minister not shocked by the news that the number of children who were hit and killed by road vehicles increased last year by a staggering 28 per cent.? Is he aware that that was mainly because the fronts of some vehicles are designed for appearance and not safety, with the addition of rigid bull bars which concentrate and multiply the force of accidents at the level of a child's head? Does he agree with his Ministers that those bars are useless, macho fashion accessories, and will he move swiftly today to avoid future tragedies by banning these deadly bully bars from all public roads?

The Prime Minister: I was not aware of the statistics that the hon. Gentleman mentions or the reason that he ascribes to them. However, in view of what he says I shall certainly ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to examine the matter and, having done so, provide me with his advice. If the hon. Gentleman's statistics are right, it is of course regrettable. I am glad to say that, overall, the position on road accidents is improving, and I hope that that will continue.

Mr. Hendry: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the positive reaction in my constituency and throughout the country to yesterday's White Paper, "Tackling Drugs Together", which contains the most comprehensive anti-drugs strategy of any Government? Does he agree that the key message to young people should be that all drugs are wrong? Does he also agree that any move by the House to legalise even soft drugs should be rejected because it would fundamentally undermine that message?

The Prime Minister: I strongly agree with my hon. Friend on the question of drugs, and I take the view that the legalisation even of soft drugs would be a very substantial mistake, not least because soft drugs are so often the route towards people seeking to experiment with harder drugs. It is very unwise for people to experiment with any drugs and we have no intention of legalising them. The proposals that we set out yesterday on tackling drugs have been very widely welcomed. Many experts have commented not only on the comprehensive nature of our proposals, but on the fact that no country in western Europe now has such a comprehensive plan in hand to deal with the desperate problem of drugs.

Q6. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 11 May. [22261]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Mackinlay: Who is to blame for, and what is the cause of, all the negative equity that is blighting hundreds of thousands of households and families? What will be the consequences for the economy and for business if negative equity continues to grow, and what does the Prime Minister intend to do about it?

The Prime Minister: Fortunately, the amount of negative equity is now half the level it was at its peak and it continues to fall. Clearly, while there is negative equity, it is acting as a drag on the housing market. The more the economy grows, the more unemployment falls, and the more confidence begins to return, the sooner we shall begin to see the complete elimination of negative equity. When that occurs, it will be a very welcome development.

Post Office

3.30 pm

Madam Speaker: We now come to a statement by the President of the Board of Trade. [Interruption.] Will hon. Members who are leaving please do so quickly?

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Heseltine): Madam Speaker, I wish to make a statement on the Post Office and to set out a number of changes that I intend to introduce to the present arrangements.

In the case of Post Office Counters, we agreed last year that it should offer the services of the network of 20,000 post offices—19,000 of which are run as private businesses—to a wider range of clients. That policy has led to a number of new services being offered or trialled at post offices, such as bureaux de change services, travel insurance and the free payment of gas bills. Post offices are also the largest retailer of national lottery tickets. I welcome those developments, which should help strengthen the network of post offices, not least those in rural areas.

I intend a number of changes to the financial regime of the Post Office, notably the external financing limit, or EFL. Although no responsible Government could undertake to ring-fence the Post Office entirely from the pressures on public spending, I am prepared to agree that in future we shall aim to set the EFL at about half the Post Office's forecast post-tax profit. I hope to make progress in that direction this autumn.

I intend to adopt a more strategic corporate plan process and to remove the formal limit on the Post Office's capital expenditure, together with the associated detailed scrutiny of investment projects in its core business. Those measures should enable the Post Office to plough back the benefits of additional efficiency into improving services for customers.

I now turn to the board's wish that the Royal Mail should be able to extend its activities into adjacent markets. Although I am prepared to consider such requests, I have told the Post Office that in doing so, I would expect a considerable increase in the use of the private financing initiative, in respect of both activities in associated fields and increased opportunities for the private sector to participate in its existing activities.

There are certain provisos on my willingness to make those changes. First, there must be real pressure on the efficiency of the Post Office. I am about to appoint consultants to carry out a performance review of the Post Office's operations.

Secondly, the Post Office must generate the funds for any expansion from increased efficiency and not from increased prices. I therefore greatly welcome today's announcement by the Royal Mail that it intends to maintain its current domestic tariffs until at least March 1996. That means that there will have been only one domestic tariff increase in the first four years of this Parliament, a considerable achievement.

Finally, I have told the board that I would expect all new developments to be separately accounted and, where practical, to be developed through separately established Companies Act subsidiaries. As a first step towards that, I have agreed with the board that it will convert the main operating units of the Post Office into Companies Act companies.

Before concluding, I would like to thank the Trade and Industry Select Committee for its very helpful reports on these issues. My Department is replying in detail to its most recent report today.

The measures that I have announced today represent a pragmatic and balanced package for the Post Office and its customers. I commend them to the House.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): I have the pleasure of giving a general welcome to the statement, especially as it is a modest step. These are modest measures in the direction of policies for the Post Office for which we in the Opposition have argued for several years. The whole House should congratulate the management and all employees of the Post Office on the announcement today that it will hold steady prices for the Royal Mail. That is a significant achievement—an achievement in public ownership and in the public sector—by everyone engaged in the Post Office.

The President of the Board of Trade has just announced that, yet again, he is to appoint consultants to examine the Post Office. Is he aware that we know that he has already spent £2 million on engaging consultants to examine the Post Office? Even after that expenditure, funded by the taxpayer, he has come forward with only a very modest response to our requests, the requests of the management of the Post Office and the requests of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry for change.

What is new about the right hon. Gentleman's announcement that, in future, he will aim to set the external financing limit at about half the Post Office's forecast taxed profit? That is the status quo; it is not a change. It is recognition of the circumstances that exist in the Post Office and of its arrangements with the Government today. That is no change—no step forward.

Why has the right hon. Gentleman apparently abandoned his previous commitment, although he said that it was his lifetime ambition to set the rest of his political career in the track of privatising the Post Office? Is the reason that he knows that there is no majority in the House for the privatisation of the Post Office? Does he recognise that he is, again, admitting defeat on his principal personal objective?

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, a year ago, he told the House, the Select Committee on Trade and Industry and everyone in the Post Office that he was not in favour of the private financing initiative for Post Office operations? Why has it taken him a year to change his mind? Why, during that time, did the Government insist that the Post Office, which wanted to lease trains for the mail, should spend £50 million in cash to buy those trains when, using the initiative announced today, it could have saved that expenditure for other capital investment?

Is not the reality that the Government could now, without legislation, remove altogether the current capital expenditure limits on the Post Office, relax even further the scrutiny of specific projects, free altogether the Post Office management from the DTI's nit-picking interference, give new freedoms to Post Office Counters Ltd., end the closure of Crown post offices, and get off their backside and get on with the private financing initiative about which the right hon. Gentleman has prevaricated for so long?

Is not it also clear that the only way in which the public, who overwhelmingly oppose privatisation of the Post Office, can ensure the defeat of that privatisation is to ensure the defeat of this Government?

Mr. Heseltine: The right hon. Gentleman may not have read the Green Paper that we published a year ago as carefully as I would have hoped, because, far from rejecting the option of the PFI, I said on page 15, paragraph 9:

"The relaxations discussed in paragraph 6, together with use of joint ventures under the PFI, would be of some value to Royal Mail."

That is not what one would call rejecting the option, then or now. It is quite clear that we looked at that option. It was not the best option, but it was an option and it was the one that, in the light of the circumstances, we have decided to pursue.

I cannot accept for one moment that there is an argument for halting the closure or conversion of Crown post offices into sub-post offices. The fact is that the record of achieving that has been considerable. The benefits and efficiency that have been achieved have followed as a consequence. It is a matter for a management decision of the Post Office. It is continuing to do that, because it believes that it is in the interests of its customers.

The right hon. Gentleman is also wrong about the issue of the EFL. The fact is that it is true today that it is closer to 50 per cent., but it has been moving in that direction from higher percentages. It is because we want to try to discuss arrangements with the management of the Post Office for a more stable relationship in the future that we have attempted to quantify, within the constraints that I have set out, what that EFL might look for in the future.

I was again amazed that the right hon. Gentleman should be surprised that in taking this step to help the Post Office, I should be appointing consultants to look at the books within the Post Office.

Dr. John Cunningham: Again.

Mr. Heseltine: It is not a question of again. Does not the right hon. Gentleman realise that business is a dynamic process? If I am going to have to look at a whole range of judgments on the efficiency of the Post Office, it is no use relying on evidence that was given to me a year or two years ago. I have to see facts as they are and as they will be in the future.

That is a classic example of why the right hon. Gentleman and his party have never understood the weaknesses and frailties of nationalisation. They rely on the advice of the managers, as interpreted by their officials. I want to make sure that I have got someone inside the Post Office who can see the books and advise me about what is actually happening.

The right hon. Gentleman accuses the Government of attempting to adopt the policies of the Labour party. That, if I may say so, is rich. The party that says that it has abandoned nationalisation, is trying to dissociate itself from the trade unions and trying to repeal clause IV now somehow suggests that we are pursuing its policies. Exactly the opposite is the case.

When the right hon. Gentleman says that I have abandoned a lifetime's ambition to privatise the Post Office, let me say that I recognise that I failed to persuade some 10 of my Conservative colleagues to move to a privatisation process. I got a lot closer to persuading 100 per cent. of my party to back privatisation than the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) got in persuading his party to abandon clause IV.

What the right hon. Gentleman's opposition to our proposals revealed clearly is that he still hankers after a public sector solution. It is all very well to talk about getting rid of clause IV, but when the chips are down, that is where the Labour party's hearts and minds belong.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): May I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement on his general relaxation of some of the rules relating to the Post Office? Could he say a little more about the future of sub-post offices? Already, some 19,000 post offices are in private ownership. There is a great feeling that they ought to be given far more commercial freedom to take on far more activities. The only way that rural post offices will survive is by giving them greater business opportunities. Will my right hon. Friend say a little more on that matter?

Mr. Heseltine: I am delighted to respond as positively as I can to my hon. Friend. Let me tell the House what I have said to the officials in my Department. I asked them whether we have turned down any requests for further freedoms. I am not aware of any requests from Post Office Counters that we have turned down. If any right hon. or hon. Member has some ideas that we should pursue to free up the rural and urban post offices, I shall be immensely sympathetic. To the best of my knowledge, they have the freedom to move in an increasingly wide area and I do not know of any additional freedoms for which we have been asked.

Mr. Nick Harvey (North Devon): I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's statement and his conversion to the policy that he has outlined, albeit a little belated and perhaps rather grudging. Will he go one step further and remove the uncertainty that might arise from his decision to change the operating companies into Companies Act companies? Will he confirm that it is not his intention to come back later to try to privatise any of those companies? Will he tell the House why he intends to continue to levy an EFL of 50 per cent. of post-tax profit, which is clearly a higher financial burden on the Post Office than on any of its rivals or on any other private sector companies?

The right hon. Gentleman said that he intends to appoint consultants. In a previous answer, he sounded as if he intended to keep them on virtually a permanent basis. Does not the Post Office's achievement, which he rightly applauded, of managing to keep mail prices down, provide some evidence of good performance? Is it really necessary to use consultants on a permanent basis and at further expense?

The post office network has been referred to. Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House whether the Government will invest in smart card technology in the rural post office network?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman will know that the automation of sub-post offices is now the subject of advanced negotiation. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security has negotiated an eight-year contract for the benefit arrangements. There will be a much more sophisticated facility available through a PFI arrangement to the sub-post offices, and I welcome that as one of the developments of their potential.

[Mr. Heseltine]

On the appointment of consultants, if I am to be expected to make judgments about how the business can expand, it is important that I have full access to the facts and figures. The hon. Gentleman made the assumption that keeping prices down has followed as a result of continued efficiencies. That is perfectly true. The question that has to be asked is how such large efficiencies were achieved after years in which the business had been a public corporation. That is a hard question, and there is only one answer: it had not been efficiently run in previous years. I am determined to do all that I reasonably can to change the climate. The 50 per cent. EFL is a matter of judgment and negotiation. I must have regard to the interests of the public Exchequer in securing a reasonable return by way of the dividend that the EFL represents.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. It appears that every time there is a ministerial statement I have to remind hon. Members to be brisk with their questions and to put only one question to the Secretary of State. As hon. Members know, at statement time I try to call every hon. Member who wants to intervene. That is unprecedented; my predecessors have not done so. I cannot go on doing that if hon. Members make statements and ask several questions. I shall have to look at statement time again if hon. Members do not co-operate with the Chair. One question each, please.

Mr. Jim Lester (Broxtowe): As one of the 10—although I think that there were rather more than that—who opposed the privatisation of the Post Office, I congratulate my right hon. Friend on a pragmatic and coherent policy statement that will carry with it many people, particularly the general public who were worried about potential changes. It gives the Post Office and Post Office Counters a way forward that we can all support.

Mr. Heseltine: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend. I know that he was one of the small number of my colleagues who disagreed with my views. I do not believe that this is the ultimate and correct solution. It is the politically possible solution, and that is a step on from where we were. When I see what is happening across the world and the potential for the Royal Mail if we had turned it into a first-class international trading company, I must say that I do not bring this proposal to the House believing that we have ended the job.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): I thank the President of the Board of Trade for his response to the Select Committee. I hope that we can get that into the public domain as quickly as possible, because there is a great deal of information there in which hon. Members will be interested. May I also thank him for at least agreeing that the status quo is unacceptable and that there should be some move towards commercialisation, even within the public sector borrowing requirement? How are the Royal Mail and Parcel Force to use the PFI if the private sector is not to be a major stakeholder?

Mr. Heseltine: The whole point of the PFI is to bring the private sector into partnership with the public sector. My announcement today merely indicates the ways in which we can move in that direction.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): While many of us have complained from time to time that a letter has been unexpectedly delayed by the postal services, is it not a fact that postal services in other advanced countries are a joke compared with our service, which is extremely efficient? Is my right hon. Friend aware that the postal service in this country has improved enormously in the past few years? Is he not wise and sensible to put the utmost pressure on it to keep that up?

Mr. Heseltine: I agree that the Royal Mail provides a very high quality of service. The standards have improved, and the returns that the Exchequer is achieving have improved. I take the view—this is where I disagree with some hon. Members—that I should build on a success where I see it and give it a wider opportunity. The Labour party, by and large, takes the view that it should be constrained and limited to ensure—[HON. MEMBERS: "We do not."] It is no use Labour Members saying that they do not. We all know what they did. Capital investment in the last five years of the previous Labour Government, in today's money terms, was less than half what it has been in the past five years of this Government.

In the last five years of the previous Labour Government, the Post Office lost £300 million. In the past five years, under this Conservative Government, it has made more than £1 billion. That is the real world. There is no point in Labour Members lecturing us about what they would or would not do. We know what they do when they get power and that is the best possible argument for keeping them where they are, without any power.

Ms Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): The President will be aware that the public will—generally—be very supportive of the small measures that he has announced today. The public, and hon. Members, will, however, want to know why it has taken three years—it could have been agreed three years ago—and £2 million of consultants' fees to reach a general agreement. Why has it taken that long?

Mr. Heseltine: Because I was investigating ways in which to make what I thought was the right step. To do that was a time-consuming business. It certainly took a proper period of time, and I make no apologies for that. What matters is not whether it took time to make the decision, but whether it adversely affected the Post Office in the meantime. One need only look at the results—the rising profitability—to realise that it has not affected the opportunities of the Post Office.

In real terms, we are talking not about nit-picking details, but about where the future of this great company will be among the increasingly sophisticated multi-media operations and world-class competitors of tomorrow. What the House will not face and has not faced is why American multinational companies should be free to come and trade in this country and take the business from our Royal Mail while we deny our Royal Mail the opportunity to fight on its own terms.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): Does my right hon. Friend accept that that is precisely the point? If Opposition Members had found that it was possible to commercialise the Post Office, they would have done it. Unless the shadow Chancellor allowed another Labour Government to pay absolutely no regard to the disciplines of public sector companies, we can now go only one way and free those companies as far as possible. The statement, welcome as it is, is inadequate in one essential area. The companies should be totally free to raise the investment that they need when and how they need it in the private capital markets of the world. We should be privatising the Royal Mail. My right hon. Friend has not gone far enough.

Mr. Heseltine: I cannot in any way improve on what my hon. Friend has said. That is exactly my view. But from where we were, I have taken a step in the right direction.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): In welcoming the President's statement, may I ask him about its European implications? In considering adjacent markets, would he allow the Royal Mail and Parcel Force to engage in joint ventures with—possibly—private sector operators in Europe so that the British Post Office may conquer the European mail market, which is critical for the future? Will he also categorically resist any attempt which, as I understand, will be forthcoming from the European Commission, to impose VAT on postal services in view of Swedish entry? That seems to be absolutely vital for the future. Will he guarantee a minimum level of the national network for Post Office Counters?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that we are doing everything possible, and far more than any other Government have ever done, to enhance the potential for Post Office Counters and sub-post offices. I am extremely grateful to the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters, which has widely praised what the Government are doing. There is absolutely no doubt about support for our policy.

Were we to inject a statutory minimum number of post offices, that would involve a degree of prescription that is economically unrealistic. Why should we stop at rural post offices? One could think of an endless stream of desirable features of an economic society that one could underpin with a state guarantee. That is an unrealistic suggestion, and it merely reveals the difference in approach between Opposition Members and those on the Conservative Benches.

As to how we deal with the European opportunities, it flows from my statement that I shall discuss them with the Royal Mail and the Post Office. The position there is changing a great deal. As the House knows, the Germans and the Dutch are moving to a private sector solution for their mail. I am prepared to look at a PFI solution, but I shall take into account the two-way nature of such activity. There are significant operations within the Post Office that open themselves up to partnerships with the private sector. If I am expected to move in one direction by extending the opportunities, I shall expect the Royal Mail and the Post Office to do exactly the same with their activities.

Mr. Hain: What about VAT?

Mr. Heseltine: I have no reason to believe that there is any threat to the present status.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): I thank my right hon. Friend for reinforcing support for sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses throughout the country. He has asked for suggestions to assist them. May I therefore suggest that, if all sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses were able to issue motor vehicle licences, which they have wanted to do for a long time, that would be greatly welcomed by people living in country districts? That would be a great step forward.

Mr. Heseltine: That is a constructive suggestion from my right hon. Friend. I keep asking for advice as to whether there are any outstanding requests. I am not aware of any, but I shall certainly consider that made by my right hon. Friend and write to him.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Minister aware that he is in a very odd constitutional position? Three times already this afternoon he has bemoaned the fact that he cannot get through the policy he really wanted—that is, to privatise the Post Office. He has then come along and attacked people because they have put forward alternatives, saying, "Well, it is not really my policy. It is second best." Why does he not do the decent constitutional thing, as he did over Westland, and resign and launch his counter-attack from the Back Benches?

Mr. Heseltine: Of all the hon. Members to ask that question. Am I now to understand that, within the Labour party, the hon. Gentleman is against trade unions and against nationalisation, and is now abandoning his support for the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament? If he is not, why has he not resigned from the Labour party?

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Given the parliamentary arithmetic, most people would accept that my right hon. Friend's statement represents a sensible, pragmatic way forward. Can he explain whether there is any logic in the state owning a commercial organisation to which he has given full commercial freedom? There is no logic and no point in that.

Mr. Heseltine: There is no logic. My hon. Friend is entitled to great praise for the remarkable work that he did when he was with me at the Department of Trade and Industry to explore the very ideas under discussion. As he will know, logic is not always the controlling influence in politics.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The right hon. Gentleman's blast to Bolsover will not quite do. Is the President aware that, in his candid, truthful, revealing and much-to-the-point answer to his hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester), he said, "Look, I don't believe in this policy."? Is it old-fashioned to think that when he and I came to the House all those years ago, a Secretary of State in such a position would have asked the Prime Minister at least for transfer to other work? Is it not a serious matter when a Secretary of State quite obviously does not believe in the policies that he is putting forward?

Mr. Heseltine: If my blast at the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) will not do, I am happy to have a blast at the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell).

I have made the position absolutely clear. The policy that I am putting forward today is better than the policy that is in place at the moment. It is not as good as the policy that I tried to persuade the House to adopt a year or so ago, but it will enhance the position of the Royal Mail in an acceptable way.

[Mr. Heseltine]

There is a better way, a better tomorrow, but if I am to be told that one must stay where one is unless one can reach the ultimate objective, I have to tell you, Madam Speaker, that none of us would ever move anywhere in politics if we did that.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I am grateful for my right hon. Friend's remarks in relation to the Trade and Industry Select Committee, but I would not want him to think that some of us who are members of that Committee believe that what we proposed was the ultimate objective. I think that he has made that clear. Nevertheless I would like him to reiterate that we are making the best of a job—[HON. MEMBERS: "Bad job."]—and it is a pragmatic solution as we stand, but I hope that that is not the end of it and that there may well be bluebirds over some cliffs of somewhere or other.

Madam Speaker: Order. I was waiting for a question in all that. In fact it was a comment, and there was not a question. This is the time for questions on the statement. Perhaps the Secretary of State will make a stab at responding to that non-question.

Mr. Heseltine: I was about to burst into,

"We'll meet again—don't know where, don't know when", but I welcome another trimmer in the art of politics, my hon. Friend.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Does the President of the Board of Trade agree that some of the commercial activities to which post offices cannot return are the services that were provided by Girobank, which the Post Office lost when it sold Girobank to the Alliance and Leicester building society against its will, and to which post offices are banned by the conditions of sale from returning?

Mr. Heseltine: That is an important issue. I know that discussions are going on—I am not sure what stage they have reached—with clearing banks about what facilities might be made available through the post office network. I do not have a specific statement to make on that subject, but there are interesting potentials out there.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on realising that politics is the art of the possible, and may I welcome the statement that he made today—not least on the new arrangements for the Royal Mail? Does he agree that those arrangements will further enhance the service that is given to the customer? He has already announced that the price is to remain as it is, and all my constituents will welcome that.

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is right. They will enhance, but they will not maximise. That is the difference between us.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): It is great to be discussing a public sector success story, but it is odd that, although the statement has been generally welcomed by Opposition Members, the President of the Board of Trade does not agree with the statement that he is making.

Will the President of the Board of Trade at least accept our gratitude for enunciating the new doctrine of permanent consultancy, whereby consultants report and he and his Department take a year to consider the report, by which time it is time for consultants to report again? It is a very lucrative doctrine for the consultancy industry.

Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that article 100(a) of the treaty of Rome will remain the only legal basis for any policies adopted regarding Post Office liberalisation in future? It is a very important matter at present. Does he also recognise that the policy of closing down Crown post offices is despised in hundreds of communities throughout the country? If he does not recognise that after the local elections, he certainly missed something. Anyone who has visited places where the local post office has been shoved into the back of a supermarket knows that everyone resents what has been done and wants to retain a Crown post office in the town centre.

Finally, does the right hon. Gentleman accept that what we are discussing today, above all, is a defeat of his ambition to privatise the Post Office? The only way to ensure that that defeat is maintained is to defeat the Tories.

Mr. Heseltine: I am not aware of any changes in the relationships that we have with the European Union with regard to the Post Office. If that position changed, I would of course inform the House.

I am very interested in what the hon. Gentleman has to say about the continued unease of constituents in places where Crown post offices have been converted to public post offices. Such a conversion has taken place where I live. I cannot remember when I last heard anyone talk about it.

The service is perfectly satisfactory. There are 19,000 sub-post offices. I do not receive letters of complaint. Our proposals have been warmly welcomed by the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters. As usual, the only people who are completely out of touch are Labour Members who have listened to what the unions have said about the matter. They are so ignorant about the situation that they do not know that 19,000 out of 20,000 post offices are already privately owned.

Business of the House

4.4 pm

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): May I ask the Leader of the House for details of future business?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 15 MAY—Progress on remaining stages of the Gas Bill.

Motions on the conditional fee agreements order and the conditional fee agreements regulations.

TUESDAY 16 MAY—Conclusion of remaining stages of the Gas Bill.

WEDNESDAY 17 MAY—After the usual Wednesday morning Adjournment debates, Opposition Day (12th allotted day). Until about 7 o'clock there will be a debate entitled "The Further Erosion of Rail Services due to Privatisation" followed by a debate entitled "The Costs to the Country of Privatising the Nuclear Power Industry". Both debates will arise on Opposition motions.

THURSDAY 18 MAY—Debate on the report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life (the Nolan Committee) on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 19 MAY—The House will not be sitting.

The House will also wish to know that European Standing Committee B will meet on Wednesday 17 May at 10.30 am to consider European Community document No. 4523/95, Relating to Energy Policy.

MONDAY 22 MAY—Progress on remaining stages of the Child Support Bill, to be brought to a conclusion on either Tuesday or Wednesday.

[Wednesday 17 May:

European Standing Committee B—Relevant European Community documents: 4523/95 Energy Policy; Relevant European Legislation Committee Reports HC 70-ix (1994-95) and HC 70-xiv (1994-95). ]

It may also be necessary to take some Government business on Thursday 25 May. The House may wish to be reminded that, subject to the progress of business, it is proposed that the House should rise for the spring Adjournment on Thursday 25 May until Tuesday 6 June.

Mrs. Taylor: I thank the Leader of the House for that statement, and I ask him to confirm that the Wednesday morning debate the week after next will take the form of a spring Adjournment debate.

As to next week's business, the House will be pleased that we are to have an early debate on the report of the Nolan committee. As the committee was set up by the Prime Minister, will the Prime Minister open that important debate? Will the Leader of the House confirm today that the Government will accept the main recommendations of the Nolan committee as a good starting point for rebuilding public confidence in our democratic system? Will the Leader of the House ensure that, following next week's debate, there will be an early opportunity to make the necessary changes so that we can implement the recommendations in the Nolan report within the time scale that the committee advised?

The House will have noted that next week the Opposition is again providing an opportunity to debate some of the issues that greatly concern the public. Given the widespread and deep public unease about privatisation by the back door without any further reference to Parliament, what steps will the Government take to gain the approval of the House before there are any more sell-offs of public assets?

What time will the Government allocate to discussing the disaster that is unfolding at York, where the hiatus in railway investment is causing serious problems? Those problems should not be dismissed, as the Prime Minister dismissed them today, as simply the equivalent of an outbreak of measles. There will be dramatic job losses in York and another indigenous British industry will go to the wall as a direct result of privatisation. The Government should allow time to debate such an important issue.

Turning to another subject, does the Leader of the House recall that, when he was Minister for the Disabled, he praised the Labour Opposition for devoting half a Supply day to debating the 15th anniversary of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970? Will the right hon. Gentleman, in his present capacity, find time for a debate on the 25th anniversary of that legislation at the end of May, which is of great concern to many people throughout the country?

Finally, as the Government's economic policy has reached a new low in credibility, will the right hon. Gentleman say when the Government expect to make their summer economic statement and when the House will have a chance to debate it?

Mr. Newton: I should have said that I expect the debate on Wednesday week to be of the kind that the hon. Lady has in mind, when I sit here for three hours and attempt to answer problems from all quarters.

I anticipate that the debate on Lord Nolan's report will be opened by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who was responsible for much of the evidence that the Government submitted to the Nolan committee. That would seem appropriate. I was not absolutely clear whether the hon. Lady was referring to the proposals that are for the Government or those directed more at the House.

As to the recommendations concerning Ministers leaving office and appointments to what are known as quangos, the Government welcome and accept their broad thrust, but obviously they need careful and detailed examination. As to recommendations directed at the House, the report itself recognises that our rules and procedures are for the House to decide. However, the Government hope for wide agreement on a positive response to the report, which is in line with the hon. Lady's remarks.

On privatisation, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade said in his statement earlier this week that there will be a debate, and obviously we will look at that again in the light of the Opposition debate scheduled for next Wednesday. There is not much that I can add to the remarks of my right hon. Friend in Prime Minister's questions today about the ABB closure at York. He made it clear that the problem is due to a number of factors including the completion of major contracts for Central line trains and some others and the firm's failure to win contracts for the Jubilee line, Heathrow Express and Northern line. The hon. Lady might at least have acknowledged that.

The hon. Lady referred to something that I said about the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1972 when I was Minister for the Disabled. Substantial time has been provided this year for the Government Bill designed to build new rights for disabled people. That may be the most appropriate form in which the House will return to debate those matters in due course. At the specific request of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), I have agreed to open the exhibition starting on Monday to mark the 25th anniversary of the 1972 Act, which I shall do with pleasure.

As to the hon. Lady's over-aggressive final question, I will consider the timing of the summer economic debate, but I would do that with more enthusiasm had the hon. Lady not made absurd remarks about the credibility of Government economic policy against a background of the Labour party having no economic policy whatever.

Dame Peggy Fenner (Medway): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the way in which the Nolan report was made available to right hon. and hon. Members today? Will he direct this question to whoever is responsible for passing information to right hon. and hon. Members? Instead of the report being handed out as usual by the Vote Office in a perfectly competent and efficient way, the small Corridor next to the Members Board is full of individual envelopes. Am I supposed to look through them all to find F for Fenner? Busy Members of Parliament do not have time to do that. I ask my right hon. Friend to make sure that such communications are delivered in a more efficient manner.

Mr. Newton: I hope that those words have fallen on the ears of those who will immediately check that there are copies in the Vote Office. I understand that Lord Nolan thought that it was a proper courtesy on his behalf to arrange for copies to be sent to all hon. Members.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Can the Leader of the House ensure that, when the Secretary of State for Transport takes part in the debate next Wednesday, whatever the precise terms of the motion, he takes the opportunity to range over all the damage that is being inflicted on the rail industry and the rail network by the continuing failure to invest when the threat of privatisation is hanging over the industry? I am not thinking only of ABB at York, to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) referred during Prime Minister's Question Time: I am also concerned—as I hope are the Leader of the House and the Secretary of State—about the continuing failure to bring forward the programme for maintenance and safety on the rail network.

As the Leader of the House may be aware, there are fears within British Rail and Railtrack that the hiatus caused by the problem is creating real difficulties in terms of speed restrictions, weight restrictions and threats to safety. Will he give an explicit assurance that the Secretary of State for Transport will address that question during the debate?

Mr. Newton: I can give the hon. Gentleman an explicit assurance that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will cover all matters that he considers relevant to the debate and, no doubt, touch on points of interest to the hon. Gentleman. He may also make a number of points that the hon. Gentleman has not made, including reference to the fact that British Rail has invested £4,000 million in new rolling stock since 1979.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Will my right hon. Friend remind the House that the Jopling reforms were introduced on a Sessional Order, and that, unless they are renewed or become Standing Orders, they fall at the end of the Parliament? At his request, the Procedure Committee is attempting to monitor their working and in order to obtain the opinion of all Members of Parliament, a short questionnaire will be circulated to all right hon. and hon. Members so that both sides completely understand whether Members of Parliament consider the reforms to be a success or a failure. It will be helpful if all right hon. and hon. Members respond to the questionnaire.

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend is certainly right to remind the House that they are Sessional Orders, although he marginally slipped in saying that they will fall at the end of the Parliament. They will fall at the end of the Session. I am happy to be used as a verbal notice board for the advertisement of the questionnaire of the Procedure Committee.

Ms Angela Eagle (Wallasey): With respect to the debate on the Nolan report, which I welcome, the Leader of the House told us that it will be on a motion for the Adjournment of the House. As a member of the Select Committee on Members' Interests, I carefully examined the recommendations that relate specifically to the House, rather than the Executive and other Government appointments. I notice that Lord Nolan has made three types of recommendation: those that he wants implemented immediately or as soon as possible; those that he wants implemented by the end of the year or the start of the new Session; and those on which he wants progress by the following year.

As the report would abolish the Committee on which I serve, and that Committee is in a difficult position at the moment, it would be extremely helpful if the Leader of the House could let us know when we can make progress on the changes that Lord Nolan recommends to how the Register of Members' Interests is formed and policed, as they have a direct impact on some of the complaints with which we are wrestling. It would be enormously helpful if the Leader of the House could give us an early indication of when progress will be made on those recommendations.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Lady has given quite a good illustration of why I feel that a wide-ranging debate on the Adjournment is the first step. They are complex and varied recommendations. Many of them require much detailed work to translate from the recommendations of the committee into resolutions that the House could pass. The right first step is not for me to prejudge what the House will wish to say next week or any other discussions that might be necessary to provide an opportunity, as I am doing, for the hon. Lady to make any points she might wish to raise.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): Now that the House has had 24 hours to digest the excellent White Paper "Tackling Drugs Together", will my right hon. Friend give urgent consideration to a debate on it in Government time? There seems to be a fairly short period before the deadline, especially for local arrangements to be made, and it would be useful for local authorities to have some guidance from the House and for hon. Members to be able to discuss it. That would also provide the Liberal party with an opportunity to explain how it will come to terms with the rather strange decisions taken by its last conference—to legalise cannabis, for instance.

Mr. Newton: As my hon. Friend will have heard yesterday, the Liberal Democrats who spoke then were also led into some rather curious contortions. As I said then, I do not particularly want to engage in their internecine warfare: I shall leave it to them to get on with it.

As for my hon. Friend's suggestion, nothing would please me more than to be able to arrange time for a debate on this well received and important report. I shall use my usual best endeavours to do that.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): May I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to early-day motion 1030?

[That this House, concerned at the anger felt amongst the British Sikh community about the impact on the employment prospects of Sikhs of the Personal Protective Equipment at Work Regulations 1992, introduced as a consequence of a European Directive, notes that British Sikhs have for many years been exempt from wearing hard hats in many areas, including service in the British Army and on construction sites; and urges Her Majesty's Government to introduce amending legislation urgently so that British Sikhs may continue to work in all non-construction employment whilst wearing turbans.]

That highlights the continuing concern among the Sikh community at legislation, introduced as a consequence of a European directive, which compels them to wear protective headgear in non-construction employment. Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise this continuing concern? The Sikhs believe that it will lead to a loss of jobs for them. Will he raise this matter urgently with the Secretary of State for Employment, and if possible arrange for a debate on the topic in Government time?

Mr. Newton: I shall certainly bring that question to my right hon. Friend's attention, but the United Kingdom was obliged to implement the directive, and granting a universal exemption could have run the risk of challenge.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): Further to today's statement on the Post Office, can the Leader of the House confirm that we shall have a debate on that paper in the near future, and that it never was the Government's intention to privatise Post Office Counters? Deliberately misleading propaganda on that front frightened many small postmasters in rural constituencies—they are the lifeblood of villages. Does my right hon. Friend agree that these same sub-post offices should be given the chance to have vehicle licensing facilities if they want them?

Mr. Newton: I will of course consider the question of a debate, as it would be right for me to do. As for my hon. Friend's second two questions, I do not think that I can give off-the-cuff undertakings about particular aspects of future Post Office business; but I can certainly confirm what he said—that there was a widespread and perhaps deliberately engineered misunderstanding about Post Office Counters. We should bear it in mind too that the overwhelming majority of their work has always been privatised because it is conducted in sub-post offices.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Now that we have had Nolan, would it be possible shortly to arrange for a statement on setting up a committee to give guidance to Members of Parliament—particularly Tories—on voting? Has the right hon. Gentleman seen tonight's Evening Standard, which carries photographs of 44 Tory Members who betrayed their constituents last night by their disgraceful voting behaviour? As we do not yet have such a committee, is it not useful that the newspapers at least can highlight the way Tory Members are willing to give far greater loyalty to the Whips than to their constituents?

Mr. Newton: It is pretty silly to suggest that Members of Parliament whose judgment is at least as good as that of the hon. Gentleman, looking at the interests of their constituents in the round and at the need to reshape London health services, not least to improve primary care, should not have come to the conclusion that they should vote for the Government's proposals.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I notice that the Opposition have called for debates next week, first against the privatisation of the rail services, and then against the privatisation of the nuclear industry. We have heard earlier today how they are against the privatisation of the Royal Mail. Does my right hon. Friend wonder why there has been such an enormous commotion over the abolition of clause IV when the Opposition continue to oppose privatisation serially, in case after case, as they always have done?

Mr. Newton: I shall indeed ponder that question, but without much expectation of either being able to provide an answer or getting one from anyone else. I am interested also in how the Labour party will explain what it would describe as the disadvantages of moving from a position in which nationalised industries used to cost £50 million a week to one in which privatised industries generate £50 million a week in tax revenue.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): May I preface my question by saying that the Table Office, as always, has behaved impeccably and has simply been doing its job. However, as six questions to the Crown Office on Lockerbie and one to the Prime Minister have been refused because of the artful way in which Ministers block questions, and as the Lord Advocate is not answerable to the House, could we have some form of Government statement to follow the two hours of television this evening on Channel 4 about Lockerbie?

Mr. Newton: I was not aware of the position that the hon. Gentleman describes about questions being refused so I shall not attempt an immediate comment. I shall, of course, consider the point that he has made when I read it in Hansard.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): May I remind my right hon. Friend that, in July 1994, our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister described Mr. Santer as being the right man in the right place at the right time? He no doubt then believed that that was the high point of Euro federalism. Will my right hon. Friend arrange an early debate on the Commission's proposals for constitutional change in Europe so as to give the Government the opportunity of responding to the overwhelming will of the British people to reject all further moves towards federalism, and most of all to grasp the opportunity of using the issue to resuscitate the fortunes of the Tory party?

Mr. Newton: I have not had an opportunity to study the report in detail. There appear, however, to be some things in it with which we can agree—for example, that there should be no new powers granted to the Community, and the importance of subsidiarity. There are also quite a few things with which we, and no doubt my hon. Friend, disagree, such as the analyses of the scope of qualified majority voting, the powers of the European Parliament and the future of the intergovernmental pillars. Our views on those subjects, like my hon. Friend's, are well known.

Mr. Stephen Timms (Newham, North-East): The Leader of the House will be aware that we have just been through a period of exceptionally severe air pollution, the worst in Britain for 40 years. The committee that advises the Government on the medical aspects of pollution episodes has drawn attention to the serious health risks that arise from such episodes. Will the right hon. Gentleman offer us an early opportunity to debate the measures that need to be taken by government to deal with the problem of worsening air pollution?

Mr. Newton: I think that I was asked that question last week. I can only repeat—[Interruption.] That is an observation, not a complaint. The question leads me to repeat what I said last week: air quality is an environmental priority for the Government. That is precisely why we are bringing forward appropriate legislation in the Environment Bill, which will be enacted in the near future, to implement the widely welcomed proposals that we published in January.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the fact that Mr. Santer's press conference yesterday was used to publish the Commission's submission to the reflections group? Would it not put flesh on the bones of the Government's determination to increase the role of national Parliaments in the European Union's affairs if we had a full debate on the Government's submission to the reflections group? Would not that give us the opportunity to expose the fact that the Labour party wants to give away more power to Europe, is irrevocably committed to a single currency and wants to increase qualified majority voting, which is deeply unpopular throughout the country and would be detrimental to our interests?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend, as ever, gives an absolutely accurate account of the Labour party's position. I shall do everything that I can to help him, or anyone else, gain it wider publicity.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): May I reinforce the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall) about early-day motion 1030, which has been signed by 68 Members from all parties? May I ask the Leader of the House to press the Secretary of State for Employment not to hide behind the directive but to urge that there is an exemption—a derogation—throughout the European Union to allow Sikhs, wherever they live within the EU, to be able to continue wearing their turbans and not to face what they consider to be blatant job discrimination?

Would it be best for me to seek the support of the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), who could add the matter to his list of demands for the forthcoming intergovernmental conference? Would that be the best way of resolving this objectionable issue, as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Newton: Leaving aside the hon. Gentleman's last comment, I note that he underlined what was said a while ago by his hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall). I cannot add to what I said on that occasion, but I shall draw the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): Before next week's debate on the subject, will my right hon. Friend draw to the attention of the Secretary of State for Transport early-day motion 71?

[That this House welcomes the bid from GEC Alsthom for a 20-year service provision package, including new rolling stock, for London Underground's Northern Line and the job security which the award of this tender would bring to its factories in Birmingham and the North West; calls upon London Underground to make its tender decision strictly on the quality of the product and value for money; and commends the bid to London Underground on these criteria.]

In the motion, a number of leading Labour politicians called for the latest contract that should have been given to ABB to go to GEC. Today, they are standing up in the Chamber and complaining about what has happened.

Mr. Newton: I will certainly do as my hon. Friend requests. No doubt Opposition Members who pressed in that direction will communicate with their hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Bayley).

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): May we have a debate about sport as soon as possible? I am particularly concerned that the activities of a minority of football supporters have led to the majority of supporters travelling abroad being treated as though they had no civil rights, or had left them on these shores when they went to see their team play in Europe. The behaviour of the Spanish, Italian and Belgian police has been despicable. These are important issues, and people outside who support football are concerned about them.

Mr. Newton: I note the hon. Gentleman's concern. There is currently a wide interest in a number of issues concerned with sport, and I shall bear his request in mind.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): May I support the calls for a debate next week on pollution of the atmosphere—particularly in London, where, paradoxically, the better the weather the more polluted the atmosphere seems to be? Will my right hon. Friend assure me that provisions in the Environment Bill will allow measures to be taken to control vehicle exhaust emissions, which seem to be the main culprit in producing dangerous and obnoxious pollution in London?

Mr. Newton: I cannot make the precise promise that my hon. Friend requests, but I have already referred to the importance that the Government attach to the matter, and have said that I expect a debate to be possible at an appropriate time.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): When may we have a debate about the worrying trend for people to do jobs that are beyond their training or ability? In the past, we have heard of a hospital porter and a nurse acting as assistant surgeons; today, we hear of school dinner ladies acting as teachers during teaching time in a school in Bournemouth.

Did not the public express great concern about the matter last Thursday, when they sent the thunderous, deafening message that they consider one person to be doing a job way beyond his abilities or attributes? Should not the Prime Minister take on a job that is suitable to his character, becoming a bus conductor or perhaps a rose grower?

Mr. Newton: What can I say? I have never heard such a barmy question: that applies to all its ingredients.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Has my right hon. Friend seen early-day motion 1111?

[That this House deplores the deceit of the Labour Party in failing to declare a figure for the national minimum wage; notes the report in the Guardian of 10th May that the husband of the honourable Member for Peckham, Mr. Jack Dromey, and challenger to Mr. Morris for the TGWU leadership, said that the TUC should campaign to persuade Labour to adopt a minimum wage figure of between £4 and £5 per hour before the election. He said he was confident that the TUC's policy will be £4 per hour-'indeed, if you look ahead two years, it may be closer to £5 per hour . . . we should seek support for that from the Labour Party'; further notes that studies by the OECD and IMF have stated that the policy of the minimum wage would cost jobs; recognises that a minimum wage in Britain of £4 per hour, with only a half restoration of differentials would cost 750,000 jobs; reminds the honourable Member for Peckham of the comment of the Deputy Leader of the Labour Party on LWT, 25th May 1992 that 'I knew the consequences (of the minimum wage) were that there'd be some shake out (in the jobs market), any silly fool knew that'; and calls on the Labour Party to come clean on the level of the minimum wage and end this gross deceit of the British people.]

The motion contains Labour's plans for a national minimum wage. Can my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the concept of the minimum wage? That might give us an opportunity to tease out of the Labour party the level of such a wage. If, as expected, it would be between £4 and £5, it has been estimated that three quarters of a million people would lose their jobs, at a time when more people are being employed: 632,000 have come off the unemployment register since the end of 1992. I believe that it would be catastrophic to introduce a minimum wage in this country.

Mr. Newton: I agree with my hon. Friend. That is one of the best suggestions for a debate that I have had this afternoon. The only thing that my hon. Friend got wrong was the use of the phrase "tease out". It is increasingly clear that we shall only get anything out of the Labour party with forceps.

Mr. Mike O'Brien (Warwickshire, North): May we have an early debate on the Government's policy on the proliferation of large-scale weekend car boot sales in rural areas, which are causing great concern to the villagers of Marston and Furnace End in my constituency, and in other parts of north Warwickshire, who are having to put up with the inconvenience of large numbers of cars travelling to those car boot sales? I am sure that that is a problem in many rural areas in Britain.

Mr. Newton: I can certainly confirm that I persistently find myself caught in considerable quantities of traffic, usually on Sunday mornings in my constituency, as a result of car boot sales. On the other hand, it also has to be acknowledged that that means that the boot sales are attractive to large numbers of people.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): My right hon. Friend will be aware that there was widespread concern following the collapse of the Matrix Churchill trial about the use of public interest immunity certificates, an issue which is being looked into by the Scott inquiry. Without prejudging Lord Justice Scott's recommendations, is my right hon. Friend aware that yesterday a public interest immunity certificate was issued in the Taylor case by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland? Without prejudging the issues there, would it not be better for evidence which affects national security at least to be given in private rather than to have the evidence suppressed altogether, which is bound to cause allegations and recriminations? Will my right hon. Friend ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to come to the House next week and make a statement on precisely why that evidence could not be given at least in private if it cannot be given in public?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend will understand that that is not a matter on which I would want to make any comment whatever from the Dispatch Box beyond undertaking to bring the question to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Why does not the Leader of the House reconsider the request that has just been made for a debate about the minimum wage? Such a debate would allow us to explain that Members of Parliament have a national minimum wage. Every single one is on £33,000 a year and no one can starve on that. Another 200 are picking up money on the side by moonlighting. That could be explained in the debate. All those issues could be brought to the attention of the people outside. If a national minimum wage is good enough for Members of Parliament, it is good enough for everyone else. Coincidentally, is it not true that in the 30 years since my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) became a Member of Parliament, we have not lost Members of Parliament, but we have increased the number. It was 625 when my hon. Friend came into the House. Now it is 651.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): It will be 659 after the next election.

Mr. Skinner: Far from jobs being lost in this place, their number is being increased. Let everyone have a bit of the action.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman might like to ask his constituents whether they think that the sum of money that he is paid is worth it for having him come here and advocate policies which would undoubtedly cost a number of them their jobs.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): Will the Leader of the House arrange for a statement on two items raised in today's Financial Times? The first relates to activities by National Power. I know that the Government are reluctant to intervene to tackle poverty pay, but may we have a statement on the public interest and public acceptability of National Power's decision to pay a golden hello to its new chief executive, Mr. Keith Henry, of £100,000, to supplement his meagre salary of £280,000? It would be helpful if the House could understand the Government's position on such payments.

The second, which it would be useful to clarify before next Wednesday's debate on nuclear power privatisation, is the suggestion that City investors would contemplate acquiring such shares only if the Government guaranteed a heavy discount on prices. It would be helpful, before we have a debate, for hon. Members to know whether the Government will give the City that discount.

Mr. Newton: I shall give the President of the Board of Trade advance notice of a point that the hon. Gentleman may seek to put to him next Wednesday. With regard to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, no doubt the point that he has raised, which is clearly one for National Power, also raises issues which might conceivably be felt appropriate for the Greenbury committee to consider.

ABB Carriage Works

4.39 pm

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the announcement earlier this afternoon that the ABB carriage works in York are to close with the loss of all 750 jobs."

This afternoon, the Prime Minister claimed that the Government are no more responsible for that closure than they are for somebody catching measles. The man is suffering from amnesia. Did not his Government claim, when rail privatisation legislation was going through the House, that there would be no hiatus in rail investment? Is the Prime Minister not aware that last year, for the first time in British Rail's history, it did not place a single new order for rolling stock for London commuters? Has the Prime Minister forgotten the statement made a year ago by his own Minister of State, Department of Transport that an order would be placed by September 1994?

This closure is an unforgivable act of industrial sabotage. In this week when the country is commemorating the 50th anniversary of the victory in Europe, the Government have achieved what Hitler did not achieve in the war—the destruction of a fine British manufacturing industry. Ministers should come to the House to say, in debate, what they intend to do to provide alternative work for the 750 men who are to be made redundant.

Already this afternoon, I have had commitments from York city council and North Yorkshire training and enterprise council to provide £50,000 each to look for alternative work. Will the Government match that pound for pound from their single regeneration budget? The Government have caused this crisis. They have a responsibility to find solutions and a duty to answer in debate for that catastrophe.

Madam Speaker: I have listened very carefully to the hon. Gentleman, and I have to give my decision without stating my reasons. I am afraid that I do not consider that the matter which he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20 and I therefore cannot submit his application to the House.

Points of Order

4.41 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Because you have been so indulgent to me this afternoon, I feel almost embarrassed about raising a point of order, but not quite, because it is a matter of some substance. May I ask you to call, from the expert Clerks of the Table Office, for an account of the circumstances of what actually took place during the rejection of six questions to the Crown Office and one question to the Prime Minister relating to why photographs of timers rather than the timers themselves were shown to the Scottish police in relation to Lockerbie?

There is the gravest doubt as to whether evidence held by the Crown Office is authentic. For two hours this evening, there will be a film and a long discussion—I hasten to say to my colleagues that I am not party to the discussion, and probably rightly so—among serious people about what is after all the biggest crime against western civilians since 1945.

Will you, Madam Speaker, ask the Table Office whether the artful way in which the Government are bypassing Parliament by cleverly wording answers to reject legitimate questions is bringing us all into disrepute? I hold that it is a matter for you, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's comments about my indulgence. I do not often receive such compliments.

On behalf of the Table Office, I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his earlier comments about the way that it handles his questions. The Table Office volunteered an explanation to me about why it was not able to accept the questions that the hon. Gentleman mentions. I know that he knows the answer. The Table Office is simply carrying out the rules and regulations of the House to see that our procedures and orders are upheld. The hon. Gentleman has raised such issues with me a number of times. I always look very carefully at the questions that he wishes to table and I know that he is helped enormously by the Table Office and, I hope, by my office as well.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I am sorry to press your indulgence still further but you will remember that yesterday I raised with you the matter of the powers of Select Committees in relation to public interest immunity certificates. You were good enough to explain that the powers of Select Committees were not matters for you. Therefore, I have consulted the Clerks, and the guidance that I have been given is that, in their view, the powers of Select Committees to call for persons and papers includes the power to request Ministers who issue such certificates to attend a Committee to justify their action. From that, I assume that it is open to any Select Committee to exercise that power if it so wishes.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has understood the procedure perfectly accurately.

BILL PRESENTED

Criminal Injuries Compensation

Mr. Secretary Howard, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Jonathan Aitken, Mr. Attorney-General, Mrs. Secretary Bottomley, Mr. Secretary Lilley, Mr. Secretary Lang, Mr. Secretary Redwood and Mr. David Maclean, presented a Bill to provide for the establishment of a scheme for compensation for criminal injuries: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon 15 May, and to be printed. [Bill 121.]

Church of England Pensions

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Dr. Liam Fox.]

4.36 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I shall begin by thanking the Leader of the House for expeditiously finding time for this debate. I confess that when he said during last week's business statement that the debate would be this week, I thought for a moment that perhaps the right hon. Gentleman, who is a clever political animal, had some difficult statement in store for us today and wished to clear the Opposition Benches to ensure that the Government had an easy ride. I say that only to dismiss that thought from my mind, because he clearly acted from far nobler motives.

Some people, sometimes following genuine inquiry and sometimes mischievously, ask why the Select Committee on Social Security carried out an inquiry into the activities of the Church Commissioners and specifically into the impact of recent events on the payment of clergy pensions. In answering that, I shall recall a statement by Aneurin Bevan. Unlike my Front-Bench colleague, I am old enough to know what Woolworth's was like in the old days. Its counters were neatly divided into little boxes and nothing was priced over sixpence. After listening to Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain, Aneurin Bevan said that the speech was like a trip round Woolworth's: everything was in place and nothing was priced over sixpence.

Perhaps those who question the right of the Select Committee on Social Security to inquire into these matters have the Woolworth's mentality that life should be in neat little boxes and nothing should cost more than sixpence. I hope that, as the debate evolves, it will be clear why the Committee was involved and was concerned about this issue, and why it is the right of any Committee of the House to set its own agenda.

Although the debate may dwell on the darker side of what has happened in the Church Commissioners lately, this is also a tale of heroes and heroic events. I shall touch on the heroes at the beginning of my speech. The press nowadays comes in for a fair amount of stick because of the way in which it is said to lower public standards. If there is one recent hero in the media, it is clearly John Plender, and perhaps it says something about the close-knit community of the media that he does not seem to have gained any awards for his investigative journalism, from his base in The Financial Times, on the Church Commissioners.

One tends to think that, like organisations everywhere else, the media are a closed little body that award prizes to their friends. I have nothing against awarding prizes to one's mates. Indeed, one day I hope to find some mates who will have won some prizes, but it is of note that John Plender's work has not been publicly rewarded by his colleagues, as one might expect.

The Financial Times is somewhat remiss in the matter. The Archbishop of Canterbury told the Committee that he first found out the full extent of the nature of the crisis from reading the Financial Times, and I would have thought that it could have been a little faster off the blocks in placing advertisements so that business men could realise that, if they wanted to know what was going on in their company, they should read the Financial Times, like the archbishop did. John Plender is certainly one hero.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): Surely the hon. Gentleman is not suggesting that, if the matter related to some Government quango, the media's attention would have been much more engaged, but that, because it had nothing to do with the Government, the rest of the media chose to ignore it.

Mr. Field: That was the last thing in my mind. As I have already had to confess today to one evil thought about the Leader of the House, I shall not follow the hon. Gentleman's comments.

The second hero of the story is the Archbishop of Canterbury. It is difficult to think of anyone in public life who readily takes the blame when events go wrong, but it is exceptional for someone to take the blame for events when he is clearly blameless. During the period under consideration, the archbishop was a diocesan for short time, and archbishop for an even shorter time, yet he immediately said that he, among others, was responsible for the events under discussion.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I would certainly lead efforts to get awards to the hon. Gentleman for his good work on this and other matters. Does he agree that, as a result of the actions of the Church Commissioners, the archbishop will have a new and bigger responsibility than he has had so far? He will have to give real leadership to ensure that clergy pensions are paid and that clergy and other workers in the Church of England are not undermined in terms of their pay and how and where they live. He alone can do that. I hope that he will acknowledge that, because, so far as I can tell, his position has not changed. He has the same emoluments, the same pay and all the rest of it.

Mr. Field: In considering the matter, we should get away from debates about whether the whole financial problem can be solved by bishops living in two-up and two-downs. Such decisions are for them to make. The financial crisis is so serious that it will not be solved by such matters. I have no doubt that, given the type of leadership that the archbishop has shown, he will successfully see through the crisis into which the Church has been plunged because of events at the Church Commissioners.

Immediately after the archbishop read the Financial Times reports, he announced that an inquiry would take place. The commissioners like to conduct their affairs in secret. There is much less secrecy now, thanks to the advent of Sir Michael Colman, but clearly people there still wish to conduct their affairs with as much quietness as possible and would have pushed for the inquiry to be knocked into the long grass. The establishment of a Lambeth group and the publication of a report was the last thing that they would have wanted.

I do not want the debate to pass today without us paying a proper compliment to the archbishop for his leadership, for affirming his belief in openness, and for his resistance of the 150-year-old tradition in the Church Commissioners that such matters are best sorted out in private and that, at all cost, one should stop debate erupting into the public domain.

Mr. Greenway: I support what the hon. Gentleman has said. Does he agree that the Church of England will be in the position somewhat of, say, the Church in Australia? Its members will have to raise the stipends of priests and others. Leadership and inspiration to achieve that will have to come from the archbishop. People will be looking to him for that.

Mr. Field: I agree with that. I shall touch on that point later, if I may, but I do not think that we shall find the archbishop wanting in that respect.

Sir Michael Colman is the third hero. It would not be amiss if I told the House that, when Sir Michael first came before Committee members, we asked him to introduce his team. He introduced with ease those who were sitting with him at the table, but he somehow thought that we meant that he should introduce the whole of the party from the commissioners, and he found some difficulty in doing so. I caught the eye of two of the Conservative members of the Committee. They were looking at one another and the expression on their faces said, "Oh dear, we are clearly going to have some difficulties here."

By the end of that meeting, however, the honesty with which Sir Michael had answered our questions was such that the whole Committee was won over to him and had a certain admiration for the qualities that he was bringing to his task. I give just one example. When one of the Committee members asked him about activities in the Church Commissioners, he said if they had gone on in his company, that would have been unlawful. There was no pulling of punches, no wish to disguise, no intention of hiding the seriousness of the events under consideration. It is good news that Sir Michael was chosen; the way in which he has gone about his business since then is also good news.

The last events that I shall describe as heroic—because they are events and not people—relate to the commissioners' pay and pensions record. They have been slightly defensive about, and critical of, the report in that they believe that it should have emphasised their record more. I am sure that other hon. Members will rightly do so, and I have no wish to steal their thunder, but it is important to understand that the reason why the Church Commissioners are there, and the reason why they have stewardship over national resources, is to pay pensions and to help supplement stipends. I am anxious to compliment them on their record, but they are in business to do that.

Let me turn to the main substance of the debate, to its seriousness and how it will impact on the established Church and the parish system. It is important to put on record the fact that, because of gambling with borrowed money and speculation in the property market, at least £800 million of the capital base has been wiped out. It does no one any credit when some in the Church Commissioners continue to pretend that that had something to do with the movement of markets.

In our report, we cite funds that, although not identical—no fund is identical to the moneys held by the Church Commissioners—are similar to the portfolios held by the commissioners. We showed that, in the period during which the capital base fell by £800 million, other funds were successful in increasing the real value of their capital base. Therefore, I hope that, from this day, we shall have no more of such talk and complacency, with some commissioners still peddling, in public debates, the idea that the markets are really accountable and responsible for what has gone on.

[Mr. Field]

The charge against the commissioners is simple. By their actions, they have so undermined the capital base that the stream of income to the commissioners has been permanently curtailed. If there had been wiser stewardship, the capital base would not only have recovered to the extent that it has recovered in the past few years, but become much larger.

The second impact of the commissioners' actions—apart from up to £800 million being wiped off the value of the assets—is that, because the Church is now plunged into such a crisis over the payment of pensions, a sum will have to be transferred from the much-reduced capital base into a pension fund to meet past pension commitments. In a moment, I shall discuss the sums that the Select Committee recommended. At a minimum, one is talking about £700 million to £750 million. If we add together what will need to be transferred and what was needlessly lost from the capital base, we see that we are talking about a period of stewardship that has almost halved the size of the capital base that the Church Commissioners had not many years ago. That is a record of which most people would be ashamed.

A number of sores remain, to which the Select Committee drew attention in its report, and which will not go away. Some of my hon. Friends, if they manage to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will raise those issues, so I shall not dwell on them in detail, although I want to list them.

The first is the string of private companies that the Church Commissioners established so that they could undertake some of the property development work. The procedure was designed so that they could get round the legal limits on exempted charities. There are many private or joint property companies. Last night, the Church Commissioners kindly put on the board for me, and for other hon. Members, perhaps, a note that they had prepared on these bodies. The list was too large for me fully to digest before the debate today, so it is a matter to which we shall return.

I cite one paragraph of our report, which shows the activities in which the Church Commissioners were engaged. I refer to paragraph 3 of appendix 10, which is a letter from the National Audit Office to the commissioners. It says:

> "The Commissioners have paid out £3.2 million ostensibly for professional services provided by CC Projects but for which no services have been provided. Indeed the company has no staff".

Those sums, which were moved around to overcome the restrictions placed on the commissioners to prevent them from eroding their capital base and converting it into income, are of continuing concern to many people. The role of those companies will not go away.

The second issue that will not go away is what is euphemistically called the Ashford great park development. I use the word "euphemistically" because, according to the pictures I have seen, the area is still farm land. No development has taken place and no planning permission has been gained, but £80 million has been spent on the site. The Select Committee's recommendation was that the archbishop should seriously consider establishing a further committee of inquiry to examine how £80 million could disappear from the commissioners' assets into land that is not terribly good farming land and that remains without planning permission.

I am almost lost for words in trying to describe how £80 million could have been spent on that development. A careful investigation to try to trace those to whom that £80 million went from the commissioners might yield some interesting answers, and might even result in some people wishing to pay back some of the funds to the Church Commissioners.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): Is not the whole investment in Ashford symptomatic of what happened in the crisis? The Ashford development was not mentioned in the Church Commissioners' reports until 1991, by which time £72 million had been spent on it. It was valued then at between £10 million and £20 million, and today it is valued at £3 million. The problem was the secretive way in which the commissioners went about their work. They did not tell anyone who was closely involved with the Church what was going on under their investment policy.

Mr. Field: It is worse than that. From looking at the annual reports, one could be fooled into thinking that the Church Commissioners were being open. Property portfolios were listed by value, up to certain sums. None of the figures was incorrect, but some of them were misleading. For example, a huge shopping development in the north-east which cost £360 million could be put under the heading of developments of more than £20 million. Although it would not be wrong to say that that development cost more than £20 million, some might think that the information was there to mislead people rather than to help them to have an informed debate. I very much endorse the point about secretiveness made by the hon. Gentleman.

The third issue that will not go away—the Select Committee has recommended that we follow it up—is the role of the National Audit Office in this tale. We asked the commissioners to provide us with their correspondence with the National Audit Office, which had been established as their auditor. We shall want to know why, for example, over the years, when the National Audit Office expressed its disquiet at some of the activities of the commissioners, and particularly at the way in which they presented their accounts in public, so little attention was paid by the commissioners to that, and why the National Audit Office did not take matters further. The Select Committee has already decided that it will look at that issue in greater detail at a later stage.

I now focus on some of the issues about which I and my hon. Friends are concerned and which help to point the debate to the future. I had intended to bill the first issue as the question of openness, but the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) put the other side of the tale and referred to the commissioners' excessive secrecy. There is a need for the archbishop and Sir Michael Colman to break the culture of secrecy within which the commissioners have worked for more than a century. It will be hard for the commissioners, who have served long in the commission, to throw away this wretched habit—one can get hooked on such things—but it is necessary for them to do so.

I quote from a letter from Dean Webster which I received this morning and which illustrates the strength of the secrecy. He says:

"I was a Church Commissioner for fourteen years and served on the Board of Governors, the Assets Committee and the General Purposes Committee. The borrowings for property investment and the CC Projects were never revealed to the Commissioners."

That letter is from somebody who was at the very heart of the elected structure of the Church Commissioners. He was excluded from the key decisions, not only in the preparatory stage and in their execution, but for some time after the decisions had been executed. The first thing that the archbishop and Sir Michael Colman must do is break the culture of secrecy to which so many of the long-established commission staff are so addicted.

Secondly, the Government need to look at exempted status for the commissioners and for other charities. Not so long ago—in 1985—the House passed, almost with acclamation, the Charities Act. In our debates then, we were assured that the exempt charities would continue their status and we were told how well run they were. The commissioners are an exempted charity, which raises questions about who advised Ministers on how exempted charities were run. Those questions obviously centre on the Church Commissioners today but also go beyond them to the other exempted charities.

There are two other important matters: the pension fund and the reform of the commissioners. There are clearly those who are pushing, from among the commissioners and, no doubt, from within the Synod, the view that a very large sum of money should be taken from the remaining assets of the Church Commissioners and transferred to a pension fund. The Committee is anxious that a pension fund should be properly established. It is anxious that that will, in a sense, act as the outward, visible sign to those who are retired or have earned pension commitments that past pension commitments will be met. It seems to us the proper way to advance.

We are not mindful to advocate that the sort of the sums suggested by the chairman of the pension board should be transferred into that new fund. We went for the lower figure, which Sir Michael Colman put forward to the Committee, about £730 million. That may need to be topped up in the future, but it ought not to be so topped up now that the commissioners are crippled in doing any of their other work or so that we would need another Bill before Parliament to transfer any surplus funds back to the commissioners. We need to establish a fund and it needs to be properly, but not excessively, funded.

The second major reform that follows from what I have said and from the inquiry that the Bishop of Durham is conducting involves the changing structure of the commissioners. That great reforming Prime Minister Robert Peel, when he first established the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, created a tightly drawn body of people who worked hard, made the decisions and ensured that they were carried out.

It was only when the bishops felt left out, and the other clergy felt unrepresented, that Lord John Russell extended the Church Commissioners to their present scope. We believe that the body needs to return to being the tightly organised, effective group that Peel originally established. However, in considering how to effect that and the pension fund, the question arises as to whether they should be dealt with by a Measure or by a Bill. Some people have all too readily ascribed to some of us who are pleading for a Bill motives that they would not wish to be ascribed to themselves. When I debate the issue, I try to put aside partial affections for the Church of England and view things as rationally as possible.

It seems to me, as I hope that it seems to other hon. Members, that if those two major reforms come to the House as Bills, the House will be able to debate them fully and amend and improve them if need be, before they become effective. I am told that there are some in the General Synod who will wish to move by a Measure. A Measure, put simply, will mean that we shall have an hour and a half of debate. We shall not be able to amend it in the way that we could amend a Bill. We shall be able only to approve or to reject it.

Before those siren voices in the Synod try to gather support for that campaign, let me again detail the difficulties that the House had when considering the Measures dealing with women's ordination and compensation. We were told that those Measures were linked, and that we could not debate them separately. Perhaps we should have probed whether that advice was correct. My view is that the House would have approved women's ordination by something like 500 votes to 10 votes and disallowed by not quite such a wide margin the Measure that dealt with compensation. Those of us who wanted women's ordination felt trapped because we had to support a compensation Measure that put us in the position of paying people to exercise their consciences.

Many of us pleaded that the Church should be as tolerant as possible of those who did not agree with the reform introducing women's ordination—after all, before the vote, they were in the majority. However, if those people decided that it was so abhorrent to them, they should have left as non-jurors, and gone without the money. Our views were not heeded. Not only is compensation costing about £3 million a year—it might eventually cost the Church £50 million—but it is clear that some unscrupulous clergy are using the Measure as an early retirement deal rather than in connection with their objections to women priests. Had we had the chance, the Church would have had its Measure on women's ordination, and that on compensation would have been rejected.

We need a Bill, because the necessary legislation will be immensely complicated. Any complicated piece of legislation can be improved by open debate. There is nothing to lose by having such a debate. The House does not want to overturn the 1919 enabling legislation. That is accepted. We argue that the issues of the pension fund and changes to the Church Commissioners' constitution go beyond what was envisaged in the 1919 legislation, which delegated to the Church the authority to act on legislative matters within its day-to-day running and to bring more significant changes in the canons over to the House to be approved. We now want to change a structure which had been approved before 1919 and, therefore, I hope that wiser counsels will prevail in the Synod when it debates whether Measures or Bills will come to the House.

We take an interest in this matter not only because of pensions and the need to safeguard the pensions of people who are already pretty poorly paid but because we know that parish priests everywhere carry out an important role in our constituencies. However, we are also interested and involved in the debate because the Church of England predates the state. It is impossible to think about English history without thinking about the Church of England. When the modern state was invented, the Church was coterminous with it. It is only much more recently, with growing secularisation, that there has been a clear division between the two.

It is as an English person that I speak today. I am grateful for the role that the English Church has played in our national life and much concerned about the future of that role, given what has happened to its historic resources, the gambling with borrowed funds in the property market and the need to create a pension fund with some of the remaining capital.

It is because I am concerned to try and get the right decisions for the Church of England that I have approached this debate, and the Committee's report, in this way. I hope that it will find favour on both sides of the House.

5.18 pm

Mr. Michael Alison (Selby): I congratulate the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), in his distinguished capacity as Chairman of the Select Committee on Social Security, on having taken the initiative in including the Church Commissioners in his Committee's comprehensive study of pension funds. I congratulate him and our other parliamentary colleagues who have served on the Committee on its examination and for the thorough-going and assiduous study that they have made of the Church Commissioners' fortunes in the widest, and also in the narrowest, sense. The resulting report, whatever else one may think of it, is a veritable encyclopaedia of useful and essential facts about the commissioners and their responsibilities.

As the Church Commissioners are directly and specifically accountable to Parliament, as well as to the Church of England, today's debate and the report that we are debating are both timely and relevant. Many of our constituents have a direct or indirect stake in the issues raised in the Committee's examination.

In his eloquent and intriguing speech, the hon. Member for Birkenhead produced his tripod of heroes—the journalist, the archbishop and the First Church Estates Commissioner. I endorse entirely his designation of those heroic figures. I only wish that I could label as heroes all the members of the Social Security Committee, including its Chairman. The trouble is, there are no heroes in Parliament. If one is a hero on one side of the House, one is an anti-hero on the other. Nevertheless, the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues have done a splendid job.

Paragraph 17 of the report, a seminal paragraph, refers to the significance of losses. It mentions the £800 million loss, putting the word "loss" in inverted commas, thereby slightly pulling the punch. In a verbal presentation, which the hon. Member for Birkenhead has just given, it is beyond the wit of man to include inverted commas.

Nevertheless, the famous paragraph 17 about the losses could be set as an examination piece for candidates aspiring to be journalists, archbishops or Church Commissioners. It could examine the way in which losses can be presented as grotesque and unbelievable or as not nearly as bad as they appear. There are many different ways of looking at the figures. The hon. Member for Birkenhead produced a slightly gloomier version in his speech than he did in his report. I make no complaint about that, because his report has laid bare many important and significant figures.

My inescapable role today is to speak on behalf of the Church Commissioners. I shall focus on the Select Committee's main recommendation which is that a separate, contributory pension fund should be established for future clergy pensions. The need for that was spelt out in the hon. Member for Birkenhead's speech and is mentioned fully in the report. It is vividly illustrated by the figures in table 1 of paragraph 15, again a seminal paragraph and set of figures.

The commissioners are 100 per cent. responsible for clergy pensions, and the larger the growth in the burden of pensions, the smaller is the contribution by way of subsidy that the commissioners can make in other directions such as the day-to-day costs of the clergy and the parishes. I am glad to be able to tell the House that, having worked intensively on a package of pension reforms since last autumn, the Church of England has been able to reach broad agreement on the establishment of a new contributory pension fund for future service.

At a national conference held a fortnight ago, the Church Commissioners, together with the Church of England pensions board, representatives from the 43 dioceses in England and the central board of finance—the General Synod's financial agency—agreed the principles and guidelines for setting up the new fund. It will probably be in place from the beginning of 1998. The little list that I have given of all those involved in the consultation and agreement is a vivid illustration of the complex intermeshing of interests and representative groups, organisations and administrative and executive bodies which make up the differential which drives the axle in the Church of England. It is difficult to escape from that clumsy and, in some ways, easily overheated piece of administrative machinery.

From the beginning of 1998, the Church Commissioners' pension liabilities will become limited and calculable because of the proposed cut-off point of liability, and the new contributory fund will start on its era of future liability. It will be the dioceses—ultimately, the parishes and their individual supporters—that will be the contributors, not the pensioner beneficiaries.

I shall list the recently agreed guidelines which will be presented to the Church of England General Synod for discussion and ratification in July this year. The first is a recognition that the present financial subsidy from the Church Commissioners to the ministry of the Church of England cannot keep up with the growth in its current and prospective costs and that the laity will have to contribute more. Sir Michael Colman—I am delighted that he made such a splendid impression on the Select Committee when it took evidence from him—in a heartfelt aside when being examined by one of the hon. Members present today, asked:

> "Do you realise that pensions in payment in the Church of England have increased from £18 million in 1981 to £70 million today?"

That was in December 1993. It is an illustration of the gigantic growth in pension liability and of the unavoidable necessity of getting extra lay support.

Secondly, extra contributions from the laity will have to be forthcoming, via parochial and diocesan contributions, to the new separate fund to provide support, particularly for the cost of future pensions. In effect active parishioners will have to recognise for the first time that the cost of a future pension for a serving clergyman is part and parcel of the current cost of maintaining him in his daily work as an incumbent. They are already quite used to supporting and sustaining him in that daily work.

Thirdly, the commissioners have confirmed their continuing ability to meet their existing liability for past service, including pension increments. Fourthly, transitional measures will have to be put in place to help poorer dioceses and parishes to work up their pension contributions. Finally—the hon. Member for Birkenhead touched on this in an important passage in his speech—legislation will be needed to give the Church Commissioners the power that is at present denied them to use their capital for pension purposes. I shall talk more about legislation in a moment.

I hope that the House and the hon. Member for Birkenhead will feel that considerable progress has already been made in the essential dimension of pension security, which has, in many ways, been the Select Committee's overriding concern. The report's recommendations in that area are, in some ways, an endorsement of what is proposed as much as a trigger for change. They are none the less welcome for that.

The Select Committee in its report and the hon. Member for Birkenhead in his speech have been trenchant and unsparing in their criticism of the stewardship of the Church Commissioners in the recent past. I am glad that they have also been positive and constructive. It might help if I summarise briefly how the commissioners have sought to respond to constructive criticism. I do not believe that they can be accused of complacency. After all, in July 1992 the Financial Times article—the manifestation of the first new hero of the hon. Member for Birkenhead—picked up and blazoned in a headline story the serious implications of financial malaise that the 1992 Church Commissioners' annual report had somewhat over-technically and guardedly laid bare.

The Select Committee's report reasonably and fairly states in paragraph 3:

"The Archbishop of Canterbury responded immediately to this news by establishing an inquiry (known as the Lambeth Group), whose report was published in July 1993."

That is the first appearance of the second hero, and I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman gave the archbishop credit so early in his report for a response to that article. Much had already been studied, scrutinised, suggested and set in train by the time that we had reached today's debate. Incidentally, members of the Lambeth group represented a majority of non-commissioners over commissioners.

The group's 1993 recommendations have been acted on vigorously and promptly. On receiving the Lambeth group report, the Church Commissioners' board of governors immediately put in hand the pension fund reforms to which I have just referred. To assess long-term liabilities, an eminent actuarial firm, Watson, was appointed to give independent actuarial advice on our expenditure commitments, particularly clergy pensions. Its findings echoed those of Bacon and Woodrow, another leading actuarial fund which had provided similar advice to the Lambeth group two years ago. The Watson report provided the actuarial basis for the on-going work of the funding of clergy pensions.

The board tightened its regulation and oversight of the Church Commissioners' Assets Committee, which is effectively the investment engine room of the Church Commissioners. The board established an independently chaired audit committee in 1993 to scrutinise matters relating to, among other things, the appointment of an external auditor, the presentation of the commissioners' accounts and internal financial controls, and to consider any representations made to it by any person. On the matter of the appointment of an external auditor, we have consulted the Treasury, as we are required to do in the 1947 Measure governing the commissioners, and have been given the go-ahead to embark on a selection process.

An independent firm of surveyors were appointed in the spring to scrutinise the commissioners' property portfolio and to give strategic advice on it. The commissioners' new property group is working with the benefit of that advice. It is worth noting that the report by the surveyors found that, with few exceptions and taking into account certain admitted imbalances, the commissioners have a prime UK property portfolio.

The commissioners have long acknowledged, however, that we are too heavily weighted toward property in our investment portfolio and that re-balancing needs to take place. That is happening. For example, the House will probably know that the Metro centre in Gateshead is up for sale. That highly successful shopping centre, owned by the commissioners, is expected to fetch a sale price well above cost.

To strengthen internal management—

Mr. Jenkin: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Alison: Certainly.

Mr. Jenkin: I hope that my right hon. Friend will forgive me, but I hear in his comments an echo of some of those made when the Select Committee was taking evidence. The Church Commissioners may well have a prime portfolio, but the Committee's assessment, from the evidence that it took, of the internal rates of return on the money invested simply does not match what the commissioners should have been able to generate. It is most important to emphasise that point. The Church Commissioners may well have some prime properties, but the prices that the commissioners paid for the development or purchase of them has never been justified by the returns.

Mr. Alison: My hon. Friend has to bear in mind the fact that the property portfolio taken in the round includes the agricultural estate. That estate is inherited and we have no control over the assets contained in it. The returns from each farm vary considerably and significantly and are themselves subject very often to rent controls, over which we have no real power or authority. Taking the property portfolio in the round and discounting the fact that we have very little control over the agricultural sector and very little ability to change the assets or get out of a particular farm, because of the tenancy restrictions, and isolating the property assessment purely to, let us say, commercial or retail shopping premises, the returns could be seen to be somewhat better, given manifestly failed enterprise investments such as Ashford great park, than my hon. Friend suggests. Certainly, for the most part, such investments were the result not of wild speculation but of considered advice from reputable agents such as Chesterton.

Mr. Jenkin: There may well be a residual agricultural property holding with the commissioners, but that does not explain why, for example, as table 3 in paragraph 35 shows, UK retail property rose from 7 per cent. of the portfolio to 32 per cent. of the portfolio by 1993. The Committee also demonstrated in the report where the quality of advice and analysis of those retail developments was substantially lacking.

I return to my main point. The money invested by the commissioners in retail property as a portfolio is not justified by the holdings of the Church Commissioners. It is incumbent on all the commissioners to be realistic—I am not questioning my right hon. Friend's motives in any way at all—about the fact that the performance of their property portfolio has been very disappointing indeed.

Mr. Alison: With the indulgence of the House, I shall repeat the point that I was making when I initially gave way to my hon. Friend. The commissioners have long acknowledged that they are too heavily weighted towards property in their investment portfolio and that re-balancing needs to take place. I make no bones about that. I do not dispute that, within that over-extended investment, there have been some disastrous investments.

I am reasonably arguing, however, that, within an over-extensive cornucopia, there are some good, solid assets which have been bought and in which we have invested on the advice of reputable, competent professionals in the field. I am trying to explain ways in which we are seeking to improve the advice and control that are to be put in place increasingly under Sir Michael Colman's leadership. That will mean that more and more highly competent professional advice will help us to isolate and pin down assets within a much smaller property portfolio, which will produce the kind of returns which my hon. Friend is correctly seeking and postulating.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: An examination of each section of a commercial pension fund against an index of performance of other pensions funds is undertaken every quarter at least. In his capacity as a Church Commissioner, would my right hon. Friend tell us whether that happens in the Church Commissioners' fund? In his opinion, is the re-balancing happening—quickly enough? The Lambeth report recommended that the property section of the fund should be reduced. I note from the Social Security Select Committee report that a normal commercial pension fund would have a property portfolio of no more than 16 per cent. whereas, even today, the Church Commissioners' property portfolio is 32 per cent.—double the amount.

Mr. Alison: My hon. Friend is slightly misconceiving the nature of the Church Commissioners' assets and investments portfolio, because it cannot properly be described as a pension fund or even be considered analogous to a pension fund. It is not a closed pension fund with regular income flowing into it. It is quite a different kind of investment portfolio for which no new money comes in.

In relation to its income, it is possibly over-capitalised. The problem is not too much capital but too little income flowing from it. To attempt to regulate and assess it, and measure it by reference to a proper pension fund is misleading and precisely one of the difficulties which has arisen in focusing the management of a fund which was not originally a pension fund. It had no new money coming into it, but it began to manifest vast new pension-oriented obligations, which, not being a pension fund, it was not properly equipped to dispose of or to handle.

In reply to my hon. Friend's intervention, may I say that I do not think that Sir Michael Colman, his advisers and, probably, the Church of England's pension boards look at the assets of the Church Commissioners, now and in the future, in precisely the same way as those responsible for a closed pension fund of, for example, a trade union, would assess and evaluate it. They are two different creatures.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I fear that my right hon. Friend has slightly missed my point. Any investment fund can be measured on its performance against a basket of other funds. Therefore, it is quite possible to measure whether the Church Commissioners' fund in agriculture measures up to other pension funds in agriculture. It is quite possible to measure whether the Church Commissioners' equity fund matches the equity performance of other funds. Can my right hon. Friend tell me whether the Assets Committee or the commissioners regularly review their own performance against an index of other funds?

Mr. Alison: Indeed they do. They do not necessarily always compare the fund with other pension funds, but they compare it with other comparable investment holdings and investment trusts. The assets of the fund are regularly measured, and we in the Assets Committee get regular sight of comparable movements. The fund is not assessed and evaluated in terms of its performance precisely as though it is a pension fund. It is reasonable that it should not be so assessed.

I should like to elaborate on the attempted responses that the Church Commissioners have made to the criticisms of the hon. Member for Birkenhead and those of the Lambeth group. We have sought to strengthen internal management by creating two new professional posts on the Church Commissioners' staff. One is a deputy secretary responsible for finance, Mr. Christopher Daws, who wrote to the hon. Member for Birkenhead, who, in turn, mentioned that letter today. The other post, that of chief surveyor, is now held by Mr. Andrew Brown, who is in charge of the property portfolio.

They are both highly professional officers. Mr. Brown has been working in particular on long-range financial planning. It can therefore be said that we have acknowledged past mistakes, heeded criticism relating to them and acted on them in every area. I hope that the House will agree that such swift and comprehensive action for reform is not evidence of complacency.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): In advance of the Turnbull report, have the processes followed by the commissioners been relaxed, so that meetings are open rather than closed, to enable members of the General Synod and others to attend? Has any attempt been made to make the organisation far less hierarchical? The only representatives of the ordinary members of the Church appear to be deans, who are hardly at the bottom of the hierarchical pile when it comes to representing the person in the pew. It does not look as though the organisation has been subject to much democratic scrutiny so far. Has that failing been noted and has it been, or is it about to be, corrected?

Mr. Alison: I am bound to tell the hon. Gentleman that, in advance of the Turnbull report and the recommendations of the Select Committee on Social Security, apart from a fresh breath of stimulating air and ozone that has come through the arrival of Sir Michael Colman and the appointment of the two important new officers, whose names I have just given—after all, "the spirit giveth life", not the body necessarily—no fundamental structural changes have yet been made. The proceedings of the committees are governed as heretofore by the same regularity, membership and attendance.

There is no point in tinkering with that aspect of the machinery, which is under the intense scrutiny of the Select Committee and Turnbull, in advance of what those experts will deliver to us. Nothing fundamental has changed in the mechanics and nuts and bolts, but a new spirit is abroad in the commission as a result of the appointment of the new First Estates Commissioner and the new leadership.

Mr. Frank Field: I talked in general terms about complacency, which was unfair on the commissioners' staff. The right hon. Gentleman has been clear about how matters have changed, but, on 24 April, the first, leading letter published in The Times came from Mr. E. G. Nugee QC. Much of that letter revealed such complacency. In the House we are expected, even pre-Nolan, to declare interests. That gentleman could have well declared his interest because, if I am right, he was the commissioner to whom other commissioners went for a legal opinion on whether the commissioners could borrow. They did so to pursue the wretched policy that has led to the events that we are debating today.

Mr. Nugee gave a legal opinion on what the commissioners' position would be on borrowing. That was a highly contentious opinion. The Select Committee asked for that opinion, but we were given only part of it. We did not press our powers to ask for all of it. Mr. Nugee then had the nerve to write to The Times and referred to "loss", suggesting that, somehow, the market brought about the paper losses. I had in mind people like Mr. Nugee when I spoke about complacency. I did not have in mind the good members of staff who serve the commission well, the new breed of staff who are coming in or the first three Church Estates Commissioners currently in post. A group of commissioners, however, are still unbelievably complacent about their stewardship.

Mr. Alison: The hon. Gentleman has introduced a non-hero to offset the three heroes whom he presented to us earlier. I am not responsible for that non-hero—alas, I wish that I could be responsible for the three heroes who were presented to us earlier. I am responsible for neither.

Mr. Nugee's letter was not stimulated by me and I doubt that it was stimulated by Sir Michael Colman or his staff. Mr. Nugee expressed his own views, but, to do him justice, he mentioned the £800 million "loss", as does the Select Committee in the famous paragraph 17 of its report. Mr. Nugee has done nothing more significant than to quote a relevant passage from the report of the hon. Member for Birkenhead.

As I have said, there are various ways of presenting a fascinating assemblage of figures—paragraph 17 of the hon. Gentleman's report has produced such a fascinating assemblage of figures. Mr. Nugee, our new anti-hero, has produced an interpretation of those figures with which I know the hon. Gentleman disagrees. I am not responsible for Mr. Nugee, but I take note of what he has said. It is reasonable for someone like Mr. Nugee to demonstrate that there are different ways at looking at sets of figures. Statistics are notoriously malleable and elusive when one tries to pin them down to reveal the reality and their ultimate truth.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead referred to legislation. Let me focus at once on the Select Committee's recommendation that legislation to set up a separate pensions fund and to reform the Church Commissioners should be enacted by a parliamentary Bill rather than a Measure passed by the General Synod and subsequently considered by Parliament. Although there is likely to be much common ground between the Church of England and the Select Committee on other recommendations contained in its report, I fear that there will not be quite such ready agreement on that recommendation.

There is likely to be a strong objection to the proposal for several compelling reasons, as the Church of England sees it. The Select Committee bases its argument for a Bill on three grounds. First, it argues that the historic resources of the Church of England were contributed to directly by the monarch and that they belong not to the Church but to the nation as a whole. Of course the resources of the Church of England are at the service of the nation as a whole, and it intends that they should remain so, but, as the Church would argue, they derive mainly from Church, not state, sources.

When the assets of Queen Anne's bounty and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were combined in 1948, 32 per cent. came from Queen Anne's bounty, but 68 per cent. from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, whose assets derive from Church sources. Those are resources, in short, in which the state and the nation both have a proper interest, but the Church of England has a proportionately greater one, according to those figures.

Secondly, the Social Security Select Committee argues that a Bill would maximise the opportunities for debate on the future of the Church Commissioners. However, although a Bill would undoubtedly maximise the opportunities for the opinions of the House and of another place to be taken into account, there remains as a result an acute dilemma. It would necessarily deprive, to that extent, the Church of England of an opportunity to have, through the elected members of its General Synod, a parallel and proper voice—at least in terms of the constitutional understanding dating from 1919.

The matters that we would debate in a Bill in the House are crucial to the future of the Church of England. A Measure, it can be argued, first debated in Synod and then in this and another place, would give an opportunity for all the interested voices to be heard.

Mr. Frank Field: No one disputes that we could hold a debate on it, but we could not amend it. Surely there is nothing to prevent Synod from debating the Bill before it came to this place and another place, so that it goes through all the stages that we would go through.

Mr. Alison: Later I shall suggest a way in which one might proceed roughly along those lines.

[Mr. Alison]

Thirdly, the Social Security Select Committee argues that there is an urgent task in deciding to whom the commissioners should be responsible and that an Act of Parliament would appear the least contentious way of resolving that. Alas, I am advised that a Bill would be very contentious—at least, in Church of England eyes.

In 1919, Parliament decided to delegate a significant, although not a final, say in ecclesiastical legislation to the Church of England through the Church Assembly and its successor, the General Synod. In the past 75 years, Church and state have held to that understanding, including at the time the Church Commissioners, who were brought into existence, by Measure, in 1947. If a Measure were the right course then, it is arguably the right course now.

The arrangements for legislation on Church of England matters in the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act 1919 embody a partnership between Church and Parliament. It is a balanced partnership, in which both parties have a voice. As a member, like the hon. Member for Birkenhead and others, of the Ecclesiastical Committee, I am, however, well aware of the frustration that several of my colleagues and I feel at their inability to influence the details of legislation on Church matters. It is a take-it-or-leave-it position.

I can tell the House that the Church of England authorities are ready to consider ways in which Members of the House and of another place might be enabled to express their opinions in connection with the details of legislation on the important matters covered by the report, and likely to be contained in any prospective legislation. In other words, my heart is with what the hon. Member for Birkenhead seeks to secure. I believe, from comments made by Sir Michael Colman in the evidence that he gave to the Social Security Committee, that he would be only too happy for Parliament to have an important say in all that.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I should be grateful if the right hon. Gentleman would explain what he proposes. I intend to mention that issue in my remarks. I felt that there was a certain circumlocution in what the right hon. Gentleman said. What precisely is he suggesting?

Mr. Alison: To be honest, we have not worked through the ways in which there might be variations on the existing machinery of the General Synod, through its Legislative Committee, sending across a Measure to our Ecclesiastical Committee, but it might be possible to turn the Ecclesiastical Committee into a type of Standing Committee to consider a Measure before it is crystallised in final Measure form, so to speak.

I shall attempt to elaborate what might happen. A tentative Measure might be informally passed to the Ecclesiastical Committee, so that we had the chance to consider it, make suggested amendments, take evidence about it and send it back, before the whole thing was crystallised and came across as an unamendable Measure.

It is not beyond the wit of man to think of a way in which that might be considered. However, we are seeking to discover whether an experimental innovation would be feasible, to satisfy the aspiration that we have in the House to get into the text and detail of a legislative proposal on a subject that is very important to Parliament.

Mr. Michael: If I understand him correctly, the right hon. Gentleman continues to suggest that the Measure would come before the House in a means that was not open to full debate, amendment and the type of consideration that the members of the Select Committee considered appropriate.

Mr. Alison: It would not come before the House to the Chamber of the House, sitting as a Committee of the whole House. However, it might come to the Ecclesiastical Committee in a form in which that committee was asked what amendments it might want to make if the Measure were to come before it in a full-bodied Bill form and, in that tentative way, return to the Legislative Committee of the General Synod with our suggested amendments before the full original panoply of unamendable Measures came before the Ecclesiastical Committee and the House.

I think that the hon. Gentleman has agreed that in that respect there might be some scope for innovation, but that is a tentative, uncharted area, so I do not pretend that it is definitive.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): I wonder whether that can be right, because the Ecclesiastical Committee is not a Committee of Parliament. It is a statutory committee, set up by Act of Parliament in 1919, and the only things that it can do are those matters that are laid down in the statute itself. Therefore, if my right hon. Friend suggests that the Ecclesiastical Committee should proceed in a way that is not laid down in the statute of 1919, there will need to be a prior Act of Parliament to enable it to do that.

As it would be absurd to pass a prior Act of Parliament to enable the Ecclesiastical Committee to proceed in the manner that my right hon. Friend suggests, I am afraid that the solution that he now proposes is inappropriate and impossible to achieve. Will my right hon. Friend and his advisers seriously consider the impossible roadblock that that will create?

Mr. Alison: I take note what my hon. Friend has said. He has sat on the Ecclesiastical Committee for as long as I have and as frequently as I have, and he knows the extraordinary flexibility that it can deploy when it wants to discuss an issue. We witnessed some of those unusual, original and surprising forms of consideration when we considered the Measure regarding the ordination of women.

I am not attempting to lay down or to expose or propose anything final and definitive. The hon. Member for Birkenhead—he strikes a sympathetic note with me in this—wants Parliament to have the powers that it has in considering a Bill, to be able to make amendments and consider the matter in its full analytical role, as is usual for us here. That would be extremely difficult for the Church of England to think of—an irresistible force and an immovable object.

If it is possible to find a compromise that will enable the House of Commons to have some say in the details of a legislative proposal before it is finally crystallised, it might be, in some informal way, along the lines that I have suggested. If that proves to be impossible, I suspect that we shall not be able to have a Bill and that it will have to be a Measure. However, I would like to discover whether it is possible to find some way in which the circle might be squared, or vice versa.

Mr. Simon Hughes rose—

Mr. Jenkin rose—

Mr. Alison: I must proceed; my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) may be able to make his argument in a speech.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead referred to subsidiary companies. For the sake of brevity, I shall, with the hon. Gentleman's permission, skip the passage that I was going to offer the House about subsidiary companies, because he has received a rather more definitive answer in a letter than I can offer in a short paragraph this afternoon. He is at liberty to pursue the matter further if he wishes.

The hon. Gentleman was quite emphatic about the Ashford great park project. There is no evidence to suggest that we need a new, full-blown and inevitably expensive inquiry into the project along the lines that the Select Committee report recommends. However, we are anxious to be responsive and helpful to the Committee in that respect. Therefore, the Archbishop of Canterbury has agreed that the new Audit Committee, with additional independent and external expert assistance, is an appropriate body to carry out an independent investigation that will be set in train forthwith. The Archbishop of Canterbury will take a strong personal interest in the matter. I hope that the hon. Gentleman feels that that is a positive and constructive response to the anxieties that he and his colleagues have expressed in the report.

Many of the issues raised by the Committee are very much at the heart of the work of the so-called Turnbull commission which is reviewing the Church's central structures under the chairmanship of Michael Turnbull, the Bishop of Durham. The Select Committee report contains a particularly felicitous and intriguing historical passage. There are some real nuggets in paragraphs 9 and 10—I suspect the direct imprimatur of the hon. Member for Birkenhead.

Thomas Arnold said that no human hand could save the Church of England, and that phrase rings out quite early in the report. Echoing Thomas Arnold's gloomy prophecy, the hon. Gentleman may also have been tempted to think that no human hand, not even the Turnbull commission, could save the Church of England. As part of its functions, the commission will consider the Select Committee's various recommendations in the next few months. If no known human hands can save the Church, I think that we may find that we are getting close to salvation in the shape of the hero of the day, the hon. Member for Birkenhead, and his team from the Social Security Select Committee. Those human hands have done a lot of valuable work in this area; the Committee has made some constructive suggestions, which the Turnbull commission is taking into account.

We hope that Thomas Arnold's gloomy prophecy will be laid to rest by the new body that will emerge in the spring. We hope that new growth and new prospects will arise from the hon. Gentleman's studies and criticisms and from the Turnbull commission—our new deployment of heroes. The prospects are very good. I reiterate the commissioners' thanks to the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues in the Select Committee for their work in producing the report.

6.2 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Nicholas Baker): I would like to pay my tribute to the work of the Social Security Select Committee, whose report we are debating today. I have listened with interest to the arguments put forward by the Committee Chairman, the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), and the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison).

It may be helpful if I intervene at this stage to explain the Government's position. I shall comment briefly on some of the points in the report rather than try to provide an answer to the matters raised in the report or in the debate—that is not my function today.

The Coopers and Lybrand report and the report of the Lambeth group, together known as the Lambeth report, have allowed the Church of England to examine in depth the performance of the Church Commissioners and to consider the way forward. The Lambeth report made several specific criticisms of the management of the Church Commissioners' assets, and went on to address a number of long-term financial questions, including the mounting cost of clergy pensions. The report contained recommendations designed to prevent any recurrence of the events and my right hon. Friend has told us how the Church of England is now acting on those recommendations and I believe that the House will be impressed by its spirited and speedy action.

The review conducted by the Turnbull commission included an examination of the relationships between the executive functions of the General Synod, the Church Commissioners, the Church of England pensions board and the staff of the Archbishops of Canterbury and of York. The commission is due to report later this year.

The Social Security Committee report looks ahead to what may emerge from the Turnbull commission. It argues strongly for greater parliamentary intervention in the process by which the Church of England chooses to organise itself to face the future and urges that the legislative mechanism used to give effect to any proposed changes should take the form of a public Bill. I shall briefly address that issue.

Since 1919, when the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act was passed, Parliament has delegated to the Church of England—first to the Church Assembly and now to the General Synod—considerable powers of initiative over its own affairs. Ultimate control, however, has always remained with Parliament which can debate Synod Measures and accept or reject them.

All Synod Measures are scrutinised in detail at several stages within the Synod and there is opportunity for debate and revision, just as there is in this House and in another place. It seems entirely right that the way forward for the Church of England should be led by the community of that Church. Of course, Parliament continues to play an important role in scrutinising each Measure—for example, ensuring that there is nothing in it that adversely affects the interests of the nation in any wider sense—and, in exercising its final dispensing power, may accept the measure or reject it.

One of the reasons why the 1919 Act was passed was that the vast increase in parliamentary business in the 19th century meant that very little time was available for ecclesiastical legislation. Time and again, ecclesiastical business failed to proceed. It is evident that the position is, in principle, no different today. Indeed, we all know that the pressure on parliamentary time is even greater.

I am afraid that I cannot accept the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Birkenhead because of the House's limited time and capacity to deal with the details of Church Measures. I draw comfort—as I hope the hon. Gentleman will—from the clear endeavours to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby referred to find ways in which there may be greater input, even if there may be difficulties with his suggestion.

It is also an established convention nowadays that the Government should remain neutral on all Church matters. We do not yet know what the findings of the Turnbull commission will be. If, when the commission has reported and its findings have been considered, the Church of England decides that it wishes to proceed by means of a Measure, I cannot foresee any grounds that would be likely to impel the Government to object.

Another point raised by the Select Committee Chairman was that the Government should satisfy themselves on the exempt status of each of the other charities that maintain their status in the legislation that follows the Government's White Paper "Charities—A Framework for the Future".

Mr. Jenkin: There is some difficulty with my hon. Friend's earlier point that there is an established convention that the Government should remain impartial in these matters, as several Ministers are also Church Commissioners. The system of accountability among Church Commissioners has broken down, and to that extent they have, as a body, rather forfeited Parliament's trust. That was not just the argument of the hon. Member for Birkenhead; the proposal was also adopted unanimously by members of the Social Security Select Committee. I urge my hon. Friend to consider the matter more carefully.

Mr. Baker: I take my hon. Friend's point seriously. The constitution of the commission not only was considered by the Select Committee but is an aspect on which we may hear more from the Turnbull commission. I imagine that the commission will want to address my hon. Friend's point, and we will have to examine it as well—for the reasons that he gave.

The Government do not accept that what has happened to the Church Commissioners gives grounds for instigating a review of the status of all exempted charities—those listed in schedule 2 to the Charities Act 1993. They include many universities, grant-maintained schools and certain museums and galleries. It is evident that the Church of England has recognised that mistakes were made in the past and that it is working to develop systems and structures that will prevent them from being repeated.

The Church Commissioners may give advice to exempt charities if it is sought. I understand that they are most willing to discuss with any exempt charities ways in which links providing access to that advice can be strengthened to the benefit of exempt charities. That is certainly a welcome offer.

The issue of pensions is certainly important and one on which the Lambeth report and the Select Committee made recommendations. My right hon. Friend the Member for Selby described action by the commissioners, with which I am sure we are all impressed. Any new scheme for Church of England and clergy pensions will have to comply with pensions legislation, including the requirements of the Pensions Bill now before Parliament. One aim of that Bill is to establish a clear framework of statutory obligations for employers, trustees, scheme professionals and others associated with pensions schemes.

It is clear that the Church of England is facing a formidable challenge as it seeks to address complex financial and organisational issues. The Government wish the Archbishop of Canterbury and his colleagues well as they begin to identify solutions that will permit the Church of England to learn from the mistakes of the past and to tackle the issues that it faces. The Select Committee report makes an important contribution to that process.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and to the members of his Committee, who have done a great service to the long-term interests of the Church of England and the House. The report was undertaken with two clear objectives. One was to find out what went wrong and what lessons could be drawn for the future operation of pension funds. The other was to establish how Parliament could ensure that structures imposed by law on the Church of England are efficient and appropriate to contemporary conditions. In exploring the second area, the Committee has given us much food for thought in respect of the operation and accountability of exempt charities—an aspect that the Minister rather dismissed.

My hon. Friend looked for heroes in describing what is in many ways a sad and sorry tale. I join his tribute to the Archbishop of Canterbury and welcome the many positive responses made to some events. The Committee concentrated on ensuring that the events in question will never be repeated and on protecting the interests of the clergy and the public, which must be right.

The right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison), responding on behalf of the Church Commission, rightly acknowledged the report's importance as a source document. He referred to it as an encyclopaedia. He acknowledged also the accountability of the Church Commissioners to Parliament as well as to the Church. The right hon. Gentleman put on record the Church Commission's current position and the responses made to a variety of events. That was welcome, as were the right hon. Gentleman's assurances on a number of points.

The right hon. Member for Selby suggested that figures and statistics are elusive and difficult to pin down, but that is no excuse for not trying, and why it is important to deal with figures professionally and with integrity. The right hon. Gentleman's description of the historic sources of the Church's finance is not a ground for seeking to diminish public interest in the events that occurred.

The right hon. Member for Selby was right to stress the importance of having the right people in place who will operate with integrity. On a recent visit to the Clerks office I saw on the notice board a quotation from Gibbon's "The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire":

"The operation of the wisest laws is imperfect and precarious. They seldom inspire virtue, they cannot always restrain vice, their power is insufficient to prohibit all that they condemn, nor can they always punish the actions that they prohibit."

Nevertheless, the House has a responsibility to try to form laws which prevent the triumph of evil and encourage virtue. That is what structures for accountability are all about.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead outlined points of detail from the report which must be dealt with, but I will concentrate on issues of wider public interest and the Government's duties in responding to them. I was disappointed by the Minister's response, which was lightweight and dismissive of Government responsibility. Is that really the Government's considered response to a catastrophe—as it has been described—threatening not only the Church of England's parish work but the health of communities in which the Church works throughout the country? The Minister missed the public interest issue which led the Home Office to despatch a Minister to the Chamber to answer the report.

The Minister responded as though this were just ecclesiastical business, but public interest goes beyond merely ecclesiastical issues. This is not a party political issue in any sense, but the Opposition have a right to demand evidence that Ministers have understood their responsibilities, considered the evidence and findings of the Select Committee, and identified actions which the Government must take to resolve the matter. The Minister's response was lacking in each of those areas.

The House may consider that I approach the subject with the right balance of concern and objectivity, having been born and nurtured in the Welsh Presbyterian Church and being a regular communicant of the Church in Wales. I therefore observe the situation in England as an Anglican, but from the healthy perspective of disestablishment.

As a youth and community worker in my own city of Cardiff and in my constituency, I have seen at first hand—as in other parts of the country—the work of the Church and the leadership offered by fine priests in deprived areas, in which the priest and the minister are sometimes the last professionals to live in the communities they serve. At its best, and with the best leadership, the Church is often a beacon of hope in communities worst hit by economic and social decay.

I do not say that the Church and its leaders have been perfect. Neither do I limit my remarks to the Anglican Church. Members of the clergy in the United Reformed Church, Methodist Church and Roman Catholic Church also stand out in my experience—not least when they work together ecumenically, yn cytyn, across boundaries of Church organisation. My experience confirms the Select Committee's point that the loss of clergy from inner cities and housing estates would be a tragic impoverishment of communities already buffeted by poverty and despair. That is not to discount the spiritual gifts that the Churches bring to their work, but public interest issues should be of great concern to the House.

Today's debate is an occasion not just for looking inward at the interests of the churchgoing community but for considering the wider public interest. The Government have a clear responsibility to ensure proper regulation of those responsible for charitable funds. As the Minister acknowledged, the Church Commission is an exempt charity. That concept is often confused in the public mind, and it may have become confused in the minds of some commissioners during the events which led to the tragedy.

The Church Commission is therefore exempt from the requirements to register as a charity and the Church Commissioners are not subject to regulation by the Charity Commission. Let us be absolutely clear that they are not exempt from all responsibilities under charity law, nor should their moral and legal responsibilities of duty and care be taken any more lightly than those which apply to the trustees of charities that are registered and regulated.

It is clear that the culture of our times has led to a lowering of standards and the suspicion that the Church Commission is not the only exempt charity to have fallen below the highest standards. I do not accept the Minister's view that there is no need to look again at the way in which the law operates in respect of other exempt charities as issues arising from the events involving the Church Commission read across into concern about how charity law applies to exempt charities in general.

We may debate on another occasion whether the system of registration and regulation is satisfactory. I feel that in some cases the Government interfere when they should keep their nose out, while in others they fail to ensure a proper degree of public accountability. That was well illustrated in the debate in Committee on 29 March on the Charities (Trustee Investments Act 1961) Order, but it is not the point today.

The Church Commissioners are subject to charity law and all the legal and moral responsibilities which apply to trustees. The Minister said that there is nothing to stop them making use of the expertise of the Charity Commission, particularly in respect of trusteeship and investment policy. To be sure of my ground, I spoke to the Chief Charity Commissioner yesterday. He felt that it would be not be right for him to discuss any specific charitable bodies, but he confirmed that many exempt charities make use of the services of the Charity Commission and maintain a close working relationship with his office. The Charity Commission's guidance and advice and publications are also readily available.

It is right that the Chief Charity Commissioner, Mr. Richard Fries, should observe the courtesies of confidentiality while confirming the general picture, but the Minister has a more specific role. In preparing for today's debate I expected him to have investigated with the Church Commissioners how they carried out their functions and the relationship that they enjoy with the Charity Commission, as the body established by Parliament and the instrument of Government in regulating charities.

[Mr. Alun Michael]

I am more than willing to give way to the Minister if he wishes to respond to that or other issues that I have raised. I expected him to cover such issues in his own speech, but I am happy to let him remedy that fault in an intervention.

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the category of exempt charities should be withdrawn or abolished?

Mr. Michael: No. I am suggesting that the category of exempt charity needs to be considered in the light of what happened in respect of that particular exempt charity and the findings of the Select Committee report.

The Minister has not responded to the Select Committee report, which raises important issues. Nor does he appear to have discovered the relationship between the Church Commissioners and the Charity Commission. He made no comment about that, except to refer to the potential for a relationship between an exempt charity and the Charity Commission.

Is it the business of Parliament? Yes, it certainly is. As Parliament grants the Church Commissioners freedom of operation and the protection of their charitable status, they are accountable to Parliament, which has an important role in scrutinising the way in which they discharge their duties. The Select Committee report needs the most careful study and a detailed response because it is the instrument by which the House is enabled to carry out its obligations. If the Select Committee had not undertaken an investigation, we would not be debating the issues and there would have been no accountability in matters of great public interest. The Government also owe us a specific explanation, as it is an issue on which Home Office Ministers have pontificated in the past. Proper regulation of the Church Commissioners was a subject for concern before the Government's last major foray into legislation on charitable law.

I shall not repeat the comments of the hon. Member for Birkenhead, the Chairman of the Select Committee, but the House must accept that the debate has massive implications. The Daily Telegraph described it as a metaphor for our times. Perhaps it would be more appropriate to refer to it as a parable for our times. It was clearly a matter of careful and considered judgment which led the Select Committee to attribute £800 million Church losses to "unbelievable naivety" and to describe past speculation by the Church Commission as "foolish and reckless". The Government are accountable to the House for their failure to put protections in place for the Church, the clergy and the public.

In the 1989 White Paper, "Charities—A Framework for the Future", the then Home Secretary referred specifically to the Church Commission, saying:

"Their constitution and arrangements, approved in the past by Parliament, already contain satisfactory measures for ensuring that the objects of the trust are carried out and that their property is safeguarded, rendering Charity Commission involvement superfluous."

The Minister has, in effect, admitted that the then Home Secretary got it wrong and that the analysis was a poor excuse for exemption from the Charities Act.

Given that Ministers failed to protect the public in that regard, will the Minister give a firm undertaking that there will be a review of all other charities which have exempt status and that consideration will be given to whether the requirements of that status need to be changed. Is there not the strongest possible case for ensuring that the writ of the Charity Commission should operate in respect of exempt charities, at least in requiring evidence that accountability and standards are being maintained?

The Minister also owes the House an explanation of the double standards with which the Government appear to approach trusteeship and charitable involvement. The Minister will remember our debate in Committee on 29 March, when he failed to explain why the Government insist on maintaining the limit of a 75:25 split between broad-range and narrow-range investment for those charities that fall under the relevant provisions of the Trustee Investments Act 1961.

The Charity Commission considers an 85:15 split more appropriate for those charities which change their constitution and regulations. Where charities are free of those restrictions, the pattern dictated by prudence, as the duty of care still exists, generally leads to a 90:10 split. It has been estimated that the earlier 50:50 split was losing £450 million a year to charities and money continues to be lost to charitable causes by that regulation. Yet the Government maintain their tight regulatory stance despite the advice of their own deregulation task force that the requirement "interferes unwarrantedly in trustees' exercise of their discretion, and prevents them from maintaining the real value of their assets and investment income".

The point of referring back to that debate is that it illustrates the muddle at the heart of Government thinking. In the case of the Church Commissioners, where massive investments have enormous importance for communities in every part of England and involve wider public interest, the Home Secretary in 1989 was guilty of massive complacency. In the case of some of the smaller trusts whose functions are important but touch more lightly on the general public interest, the Home Secretary hangs on to his right to meddle and interfere.

The House has a right to demand an explanation of Government thinking and for Ministers to account for their stewardship. If the Minister cannot explain Government thinking, it will become all the more urgent to debate wider issues in the near future. Where is the coherence of thinking in the Government? That question demands an answer.

Does the Minister accept the need to look again at the position of exempt charities? Yesterday in another place, his colleague Lady Blatch acknowledged the considerable powers given to the Charity Commissioners in sections 8, 9 and 11 of the Charities Act 1993. Those powers enable the Charity Commission to undertake inquiries, require information and use sanctions in regard to a charity or charities and to suspend trustees and even to appoint a receiver. The problem is that the key paragraph of section 8 contains the words:

"but no such inquiry shall extend to any exempt charity."

In view of the experience with the Church Commission, does the Minister now accept that the situation needs to change?

As exempt charities—I am deliberately referring to the class of which the Church Commission is a member—receive their status, their mandate and a significant element of their income as a result of decisions by the House, is there not a need for public accountability, including the publication of information and accounts and a power for the Charity Commission to undertake inquiries in certain circumstances? There is a need for large, rich charities to act properly and to be subject to appropriate regulation. But will the Minister also concede that it is invariably the poorest groups and communities who suffer most when charities are improperly regulated or overseen? Surely the Government have a vested interest in the health and sensible regulation of the voluntary sector, particularly in relation to its financial management, so as to avoid pressure to pick up the tab for any failings.

The Minister referred to the effect of the Pensions Bill [Lords], but I would say that the relationship between Government and charities in this context is not especially clear—surely it, too, needs reviewing?

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North-West): How do I explain to my constituents the fact that charities such as Barnardo's and Age Concern, which have good reputations for helping the needy, are quite properly regulated by the Charity Commission and have to publish financial accounts, while so-called charities such as Eton and Winchester, which serve the privileged, are secret societies which do not have to account to the Charity Commissioners or publish their financial accounts?

Mr. Michael: My advice is that my hon. Friend would have great difficulty in explaining that with any conviction. It is also clear that there is a major difference between some exempt charities, such as the Church Commission, and a number of bodies such as those that my hon. Friend mentioned. They, too, are related to the churches and have their roots in the Christian community. There are certainly some serious anomalies.

I am the first to accept that one needs to be very careful about changing charity law in a way that may have unforeseen consequences. I simply say that in 1989 the Home Secretary claimed that there was no need to consider the position of the Church Commission as an exempt charity. It is clear that that was massively complacent and wrong, and that there is a need to review the situation now. I regret that the Minister does not seem willing to agree to instigate such a review.

Coming next to the position of retired clergy and the pensions of clergy who are still in office, I had hoped to hear that the Minister had gone into the matter in some detail and was able to give us a considerable amount of information about it. The remarks of the right hon. Member for Selby in this context were to some extent helpful, but I am not clear about the Government's response to the proposals emanating from the Church Commission. I am not sure whether the Government are satisfied that all concerned will be fully protected and well served by the new arrangements. There is considerable anxiety among the clergy and their parishioners about the situation described in the Select Committee report.

The Minister should also be aware of concerns for the welfare of the former wives of divorced clergy. I do not know whether that matter has received any attention, but I know that some hon. Members have been approached about it. No doubt the Minister and the right hon. Member for Selby are aware of the organisation Broken Rights, which is campaigning on behalf of the women concerned following the break-up of their marriages. I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead has given personal support to, and taken an interest in, the work of that group. What has the Minister done to satisfy himself that the rights and interests of these women have been protected? Many of them gave up their own careers and employment-related rights to support clergymen in their work, and have been left at a considerable personal disadvantage after working for many years as additional, unpaid curates.

Several of my right hon. and hon. Friends have contacted me to express their concerns about issues that we are covering in this debate. I refer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) and my hon. Friends the Members for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) and for Pendle (Mr. Prentice). They and others have been contacted by clergy with worries to express, and by members of the Church Commission—all of them anxious that this debate should look forward as well as looking closely at the lessons that need to be learnt from the past.

The Bishop of Bradford has acknowledged to colleagues in his area that the House could spend all its time on what he described as "justified but repetitious criticism", and on seeking scapegoats. If he reads Hansard he will find that our debate has not been like that—although it was a fair point to make.

The Select Committee has underlined the seriousness of some of the lapses that have occurred. Paragraph 114 of the report, for instance, states:

> "The growth of subsidiary companies and the choice of partners in such activities, which were designed to circumvent the restrictions placed on the Commissioners by their charitable status—a development which began in earnest under the late Sir Ronald Harris as First Estates Commissioner in the late 1970s—needs further investigation."

The right hon. Member for Selby said that there had been some examination of these issues following the Select Committee report, and I welcome that. I repeat that the public and this House have an interest in the fact that the way exempt charities operate generally needs to be re-examined in terms of the requirement for legislation. The Minister should undertake to look into this.

The investigation called for by the Select Committee should not be undertaken to find scapegoats; it should be done to learn from mistakes and to ensure that arrangements are put in place to prevent these disasters from ever being repeated. Assurances are not enough, in view of past complacency—but I shall not repeat what I have said about that.

The bishop made the point that a committee under his chairmanship has had the duty of bringing about the implementation of the recommendations of the Lambeth group. That important point was covered in more detail by the right hon. Member for Selby. Many recognise the need to establish a separate pension fund; indeed, the Select Committee report makes specific recommendations on that point. It was also acknowledged by the right hon. Member for Selby when discussing the agreement to establish a contributory fund. That is most welcome.

It is perhaps not unfair to remind the Minister that this leaves the police and fire services as the two great areas of difficulty with unfunded pension requirements, which in turn are creating enormous problems in the public service.

I am sure that the House will concur with the view that the pension fund so established should be independent of the commissioners. There is concern in some quarters to the effect that Parliament may set specifications which are too onerous when defining the assets required for such a fund, but the experience of recent years shows the dangers inherent in failing to ring-fence pension funds and to ensure that they are adequate to meet all the claims that may be made on them. In view of the real dilemma facing the Church, it is important to face up to financial problems and not to cut corners when establishing the pension fund in a way which might cause pain in future. The right hon. Member for Selby sought to assure us on that point, and it is reassuring to know that it will be taken seriously.

Next, I come to the important point of difference between the views of the Select Committee and those of some leading figures in the Church Commission. The Select Committee notes at paragraph 115:

"The Church has two options concerning the nature of the proposed legislation . . . It can attempt to legislate by Measure, or it can propose a Bill."

Views expressed on behalf of the diocese of Sheffield to Members representing the area, including my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth, urged us to encourage the processes recommended by the Lambeth group and expressed concern that a statutory pension fund containing every known safeguard in the interests of retired clergy might prove less flexible and more expensive than the commission's current proposals. It is important to understand that fear. It is certainly reasonable to ask Parliament not to be unreasonable, but it is also right for Parliament to make sure that adequate safeguards are in place and that the details of the new scheme, including its independence and accountability, are sound.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead said that it was important not to cripple the Church Commissioners in their other work. I hope that similar observations from both sides of the House will act as some reassurance to the commissioners that there is no intention to be unreasonably onerous. But it is also important for them to realise that there is keen interest in these issues in this House, and that Members will need to be reassured on various points. That is why I concur with the Select Committee's view that change should be brought about by means of a Bill, not a Measure.

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Before the hon. Gentleman moves on, I remind him that he did not answer my question about exempt charities and their registration. It is clear from everything that he has said that he intends that that category of charity should be removed. I ask him to bear in mind that that approach will apply not only to the schools that have been mentioned but to the National Curriculum Council, the Curriculum Council for Wales, the School Examinations and Assessment Council, all universities, according to my understanding, further education councils and trustees of museums throughout the land. Enormous changes in bureaucratic requirements will be placed on them all. In the requirements that he envisages, the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that mistakes made by the commissioners, whose activities we are discussing, should lead to burdens being placed on great bodies which have not made similar mistakes.

Mr. Michael: That is without doubt the most foolish and incompetent intervention by a Minister that I have heard. It had nothing to do with the passage of my speech that I had reached and was clearly inspired by an adviser from Conservative central office rather than by professional advice. It arose from a total and deliberate misinterpretation of every comment that I have made.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Stupid.

Mr. Michael: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. It was a stupid intervention.

The Minister will not gain anything by deliberate misinterpretation. He must not seek to recount words that I have not said. I simply ask him to accept that events that have taken place, as chronicled in the Select Committee's report, reveal failings on the part of an exempt charity and should give Ministers cause for concern. They should give Ministers reason to reconsider the Home Secretary's remarks at the time of the White Paper, when it was claimed that everything was so perfect in the regulation of the commissioners and of exempt charities that there was no need for change.

The Minister has fabricated the purport of my speech. That is disgraceful. It is an example of the way in which he and others, including the Prime Minister, have sought to invent things that have not been said by Opposition Members. Having made their inventions, they have gone around the country misrepresenting us. The Minister made a disgraceful intervention. I trust that I have answered it satisfactorily.

I return to the serious point to which the Minister seems not to wish to respond. It has nothing to do with his intervention. It is an important issue which was properly engaged in by the right hon. Member for Selby—namely, whether the issues that we are debating should be dealt with through a Measure or a Bill.

The right hon. Member for Selby suggested that there should be a debate in the Church. He appeared to take the view that the introduction of a Bill would inhibit debate in the Church about the provisions to be contained in whatever legislative Measure needed to be passed. It is clear from our exchanges that there should be consideration within the Church before a Bill comes to the House and that consideration in this place of that Bill should not be inhibited by our procedures.

The problem—I do not believe that the right hon. Member for Selby took it on board—is that we are dealing with something which goes beyond an ecclesiastical issue to embrace wider public interest issues. That is why it should come before the House in a form which allows full debate, including amendments. It should not be confined to a debate of one and a half hours. It should not be knocked on the head, as it were, at that stage. There must be real consideration of the issues. A debate of one and a half hours would not allow for proper accountability. We should not be satisfied with such a procedure when the issues are so serious.

Mr. Jenkin: May we take it that the hon. Gentleman's remarks constitute an undertaking on the part of his party that in the event of an accident of history which leads to his party, by some curious happenstance, forming a majority in the House in future, it would give time for legislation of the sort that he has in mind? May we take it that such a House would provide time for such a Bill, and that the hon. Gentleman is giving an undertaking on behalf of his party?

Mr. Michael: I am trying to respond to the serious issues raised by the Select Committee and by the remarks of the right hon. Member for Selby. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not take it amiss if I take the Select Committee's report and the right hon. Gentleman's remarks rather more seriously than his own intervention. The right hon. Member for Selby has outlined the issues, including the question of what form of Measure should come before the House. It is—[Interruption.]

I said earlier, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that it would not be appropriate to respond to the issues before us by conducting a party political debate. It is regrettable that one or two Conservative Members seem to want to indulge in a bit of knockabout. The issues are serious. How do we—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. It is time that we cooled it and got on with the debate.

Mr. Michael: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The real issue is whether we should proceed through a Measure which allows us to have only a short debate. We would not be able to seek to make changes through the tabling of amendments. The alternative is a Bill.

The right hon. Member for Selby sought to find a way of proceeding by means of a Measure without running into the difficulties that private Bills often face. Given the seven years during which I was involved in the private Bill that provided for the Cardiff bay barrage scheme, I have come to understand some of the obstacles that can stand in the way of private legislation.

I appreciate that the right hon. Gentleman was tentative in his remarks. In effect, he would be asking the House through the Ecclesiastical Committee to pre-clear or pre-vet a piece of legislation before it came before the House to be debated for an hour and a half. I have some reservations about that. Accountability to the House and by the House would be severely limited. The right hon. Gentleman might need to suggest to his commissioner colleagues that such a course might not be acceptable to the House. That applies not only to the Government and the Opposition but to ordinary Members and the protection of their interests.

I am trying to respond to the wish of the right hon. Member for Selby that we should be creative rather than offering immediate solutions or giving undertakings. Indeed, I am not in a position to give undertakings. We should be creative, perhaps, in trying to find a way round the difficulties. It might be more appropriate to consider the ways in which we might deal with a private Bill and allow it to pass efficiently through the House by means of agreement on the necessary procedures. That might be the appropriate approach.

The right hon. Member for Selby has accepted that there is a problem. He recognises that there is a need to deal with legislation and at the same time to provide for accountability and full discussion. That might be a more creative approach. There have been suggestions in some quarters that a Bill should be brought forward by the Government, as a Government Bill or a hybrid Bill. That might be one way round the difficulty, but I suspect that it would raise more difficulties. It would certainly be appropriate for the Government to provide drafting assistance and other help to the commissioners in the introduction of a Bill given the public interest issues that are involved. It would be right for both sides of the House to deal with it expeditiously. The independence that is inherent in terms of charitable status surely means that the Measure should be a private Bill.

As I have said, we are dealing with important issues that need careful consideration. It is helpful that the right hon. Member for Selby has spoken his mind and encouraged an atmosphere of full debate. I hope that Ministers will respond positively. I am certain that we, the Opposition, would be willing to listen to concerns and to respond in a helpful way to means of reaching the conclusion that we all desire.

It is clear from the history of the subject that parliamentary scrutiny is needed to provide confidence and security for the future. That cannot be achieved through a Measure that is not open to amendment, and will receive only cursory scrutiny. At some point, the Minister should tell us what discussion he has had with the Church Commissioners about that.

Many of the required changes highlighted in the report are complex. The idea of a new relationship between the Charity Commission and exempt charities needs careful thought, and might appropriately be considered, on an urgent basis, by the Select Committee on Home Affairs.

The Minister appears to want to subject suggestions that we should consider the position to various interpretations. As I said at the beginning of my speech, I believe in "hastening slowly" in relation to change as it affects charities: if change is undertaken without proper discussion and thought, we may unintentionally disturb arrangements that have come into being over many years, and harm good practice in seeking to root out bad. We must be very careful before initiating legislative change. None the less, examining the position and the evidence, and asking questions, is an important element of the process. That is all that I have suggested, and I am disappointed that the Minister did not respond positively.

If the Minister sought to suggest earlier that I was proposing any action that would lead to a change in the status of any organisation as an exempt charity, he would be propagating a lie. I am sure that he would not wish to mislead either the House or the public; I hope that that makes the position as clear as it can be.

In relation to the Church Commission, there is a need to pursue the streamlining of procedures, the improvement of public accountability and other issues that have been given close attention in the Church. The House has a responsibility to ensure that changes brought about in practice and statute are adequate to restore confidence for the future. It is clear, however, that the events described in the Select Committee report are extremely serious—indeed, potentially devastating—and should remove for ever the temptation for the Church Commissioners or the Home Secretary to be complacent. The complacency shown by the Home Secretary in 1989 was seriously misplaced, and demonstrated once again the House's responsibility to scrutinise the Executive.

I hope that the Minister will take that clear message away with him, and that we shall soon debate substantive changes in a new Bill that will deal with all the important issues that have been raised today. I also hope that, in due course, the Minister will respond positively to wider issues relating to exempt charities.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): The House owes a great debt to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and his Committee. I am delighted that we have a full opportunity to discuss the Committee's report this evening.

Time was when Parliament used to discuss matters relating to the Church of England rather more regularly and fully. It is often forgotten that when Lord Beaconsfield—Benjamin Disraeli—won his great general election victory in 1874, he had no legislative programme to hand for his first Queen's Speech; he did not come to office pledged to change all the existing laws, as modern Governments do. Because the parliamentary Session required some legislation to occupy hon. Members' time, he suggested to the Archbishop of Canterbury, Archbishop Tait—who was very concerned about matters relating to ritual and so forth—that it might be appropriate for the first Session to be taken up largely with ecclesiastical legislation.

Of course, there was chaos in the House for months. It was then decided that it would be very bad for the House to devote too much time to discussing legislation relating to the Church of England. Nevertheless, we should welcome a modest opportunity—extending beyond an hour and half—to reflect on what is a great scandal for the Church of England, and its consequences. The Church, too, owes a great debt to the hon. Member for Birkenhead and his Committee, not least for the moderate and considered way in which he introduced the debate.

The House also owes a debt to my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison). He has occupied his present office for some years, with the highest distinction but also with perfect parliamentary manners. It would be easy for someone occupying such a position to inflame the minds of a number of hon. Members, and for Church issues to spin out of control; my right hon. Friend's capacity—near-genius, indeed—to keep matters in perspective has been a marvellous parliamentary sight over the years. Although he will receive few plaudits in the House for his conduct, he deserves a considerable tribute. I am happy to tell him now how much I appreciate not only his speech this afternoon—which was very helpful in explaining what is now under way—but the general conduct of his office over a long period.

As I have said before, I am the son of a clergyman who was, for a time, a pensioner of the Church of England. I therefore have some personal knowledge of the way in which payment of both stipend and pension to the clergy has worked in practice. I am also vice-chairman of a body involving Members of both Houses, called "Church in Danger". Hon. Members who take an interest in such matters know that I am nothing if not a high Tory, and a high Tory always believes that the Church is in danger.

The great sermon preached before the Lord Mayor by Dr. Henry Sacheverell established the phrase "Church in danger". He so enraged the weak Government of the day that they decided to impeach him. A great impeachment trial took place in Westminster Hall, and the London crowds were much exercised by the good divine's sermon. In due course he was convicted, and his sentence was that the sermon should be burnt. Accordingly, the hangman—on Tower hill, I believe—burnt the good doctor's sermon. Of course, it subsequently became the best-selling sermon of all time, as it richly deserved to: those who preach that the Church is in danger not only tug at the consciences of high Tories such as me, but underline one of the most profound truths about the Church of England.

Only two or three years ago, a diocesan bishop told me that the Church today faced three great dangers. The first was the secularisation of society; we would all agree with that. The second was the danger of schism, which was sharply focused at the time by the ordination of women. The most profound danger, however, lay in the financial consequences of the scandal that the Select Committee has brought to the House's attention so effectively—although I see some truth in the claim that the Committee merely brought all the evidence together, and highlighted it for the benefit of a wider public audience than readers of the ecclesiastical newspapers and press releases. But it is certainly the case that the generous tribute which has been paid to the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury for the speed with which he acted when the scandal first came out was entirely appropriate.

There are those who say, and one still sees it in the columns of certain newspapers, that the Church Commissioners should apologise for what has happened, so I was delighted earlier this week to see the Bishop of Chelmsford, who for a short time was in the Gallery, reiterate in The Times that he had indeed, on behalf of the Church Commissioners, made a handsome apology to the Synod on a number of occasions. There is absolutely no question but that the Church Commissioners generally have admitted, and admitted handsomely, that serious errors of judgment were made. It is on the consequences of those serious errors of judgment that I want to make a few remarks this evening.

I would say, in parentheses, that the Church Commissioner who was most responsible for the scandal, Sir Douglas Lovelock—we have, alas, heard too little from him about his own personal responsibility in this—was a distinguished public servant. But his undoubted distinction as a public servant came as a tax collector, not as an investor of public funds. I hope that those who are responsible for the selection of appropriate people to act as commissioners and trustees of Church funds look to those with relevant experience in the handling of these matters, not merely to whether they have had a distinguished public career which has been brought to a conclusion by the compulsory age of retirement for our civil servants.

One of the main issues that has arisen here this evening concerns the question whether there should be legislation to deal with the consequences or whether, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby said, speaking on behalf of the Church Commissioners and, I think, on behalf of the Church of England at this stage, it should be by way of Measure.

I entirely support the remarks made by the hon. Members for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael). There are wider public issues in the reforms that must now be made than exclusively ecclesiastical ones, and the Church Commissioners and the Synod must understand that the legislation is bound to involve wider public issues than lie strictly speaking in their remit. Therefore, the agreement whereby Parliament would stay out of Church matters has to be read in the light of the fact that there will be Church matters that legitimately and genuinely involve wider considerations. At that point, Parliament is the appropriate body to handle it, not the Church.

Secondly, the machinery by which any kind of consultation could exist for what my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby suggested is, alas, pitifully inadequate. The Ecclesiastical Committee is not a committee of Parliament. It is a statutory committee established by Act of Parliament, and it can carry out only those functions laid down in the 1919 statute. Most of us who serve on the Ecclesiastical Committee—a number of us are here present this evening—think that that statute is in need of urgent revision, and I would be the first to make that point.

I hope that my right hon. Friend, in talking to those with whom he is involved, will say that the time has now come for a committee to be established between Parliament and the Synod which would revise the functions that are carried out by the Ecclesiastical Committee. The only duty we have on the Ecclesiastical Committee is to decide whether legislation is expedient. In the best legislative tradition, the word "expedient" is simply not defined, and not one of us really has any sensible idea of what it might mean.

Leaving that aside, the Ecclesiastical Committee cannot amend and, if it recommends amendments, and those amendments are subsequently accepted by the Synod, the Synod has to begin the whole legislative process again because the Measure that it has sent to the Ecclesiastical Committee, and ultimately to Parliament, is incapable of amendment when it has completed its entire passage in the Synod. Therefore, the Ecclesiastical Committee can make only recommendations and, in due course, both Houses have to decide what they make of it, if they do so at all.

In order for the Ecclesiastical Committee to play a more meaningful role, it would be necessary to revise the legislation under which the Ecclesiastical Committee sits, and that would require a fresh Act of Parliament. It must be obvious to the House, as I outline these procedures, that that is not a way forward.

Therefore, I hope that my right hon. Friend will not only reflect on what has been said—I am sure that he will—but that he will be quite firm with those with whom he works in the Church Commissioners and in the Synod and say that they must really pull themselves together and recognise that this is a matter pre-eminently involving the Church today which must be dealt with properly by a Bill before Parliament because the issues themselves are wider than ecclesiastical issues. That surely is conclusive.

Having said that, I want to move on to some of the consequences of the scandal. Whatever the sum of money that has been forgone may be at the end of the day, there is no doubt whatever that there is a financial hole which is of considerable importance for the future. There are now more clergy pensioners than there are clergy. That is an entirely new situation, but it shows the financial burden which now has to be met in order to deal with pensioners. The truth of the matter is that that balance is likely to move more in favour of pensioners in the future.

We are already experiencing the consequences of that. I called upon the incumbent of one parish in my constituency the other day and he told me that, before he came to the parish, there was a four-and-a-half-year interregnum—four and a half years without a resident clergyman. There were, of course, plenty of retired clergy prepared to conduct divine worship, but that is only part of a clergyman's duty. A clergyman's duty extends way beyond the duty to be in church on Sundays and to conduct divine worship. There is the pastoral work, work to be done in Church schools, and much else besides, and none of that was done because of the long interregnum. It is not surprising that the congregation fell apart.

Another parish in my constituency has a large population of rising 9,000. It may be that there are parishes in our big cities which have a larger nominal population than that, but in Northamptonshire that is a large parish. That parish has been without a clergyman since August last year and, as I understand it, there is no imminent prospect of one arriving. Of course, there are clergyman to conduct divine worship on Sundays, but in a parish of 9,000 the pastoral work needs to continue. The reason why there is no clergyman at the moment is that there is no money to pay him. The phasing through of appointments, lengthening those interregnums all the time, is one of the most serious consequences which is already being experienced.

There are those—my father was one of them—who thought that after world war two the most pressing problem that the Church faced was a re-endowment and that there should have been a major effort to boost the overall funds of the Church. A brilliant administrator such as Archbishop Fisher may have been the right person to carry out such a reform. Unfortunately, Archbishop Fisher allowed himself to be drawn into the cul de sac of canon law reform, and most of his time at Lambeth spent on administrative matters was taken up with matters that would now be regarded as being of comparatively little importance. It would have been a great help if the urgency of financial reform, which the projection of pensions had made plain would be a major charge on the Church, had been recognised. That opportunity was missed and today we face the consequences.

The Bishop of Durham is conducting a major inquiry into the Church's future needs. The bishop is not the person that most people think of as the Bishop of Durham but rather his successor Bishop Turnbull. The report of that inquiry is eagerly awaited, and I have no doubt that it will contain important provisions for the future.

I should like to make a plea on behalf of the rural parish which is an important part of the Church of England. My father was a rural clergyman all his life. Nowadays one village is being added to another, until up to six villages may be joined. That happens because of financial difficulties.

As the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth said, one of the glories of the Church of England has been the resident clergyman. But in far too many places the clergy are no longer resident: they frequently live 10 or more miles from their parishes. That is not healthy, and I hope to see it reversed, not least because so much of the strength of the Church was in the rural areas. I do not exclude the importance of urban areas, but the Church's strength in the countryside has been of the upmost importance in terms of the loyalty and affection of the people of England.

Not only are there many parishes with no resident clergymen but I have found, as may have other hon. Members, that the vicarage, in so far as it is used, is sometimes merely an office. Married female clergy tend to live with their husbands somewhere else. More than one parish in my constituency have active vicarages, but they are merely offices, because the woman priests may live 16 to 20 miles away and come over for the day if that is appropriate. I am talking about weekday work and not about conducting divine worship on Sundays. The clergy are no longer the residents that they used to be.

Some savings can and must be made in Church finances. I shall start at the top. The Church of England has far too many bishops. Suffragan bishops were instigated to carry out confirmations, of which there were many in those days. Of course the diocesan bishop had other functions. I find the world of Parson Woodford and Trollope much more agreeable than many aspects of today's Church. It was the function of the diocesan bishop to attend the House of Lords and support the Government there. He had to make improving sermons before Parliament on occasions of national importance, such as our deliverance from the gunpowder plot. They conducted large confirmations. Archbishop Wake used to sit the whole day and confirm perhaps 10,000 people one after another.

In more modern times suffragan bishops did that and frequently combined that office with the office of archdeacon. The income came from the archdeaconry and not as a special income to the suffragan. Every diocesan bishop seems to think that he needs a suffragan. In the dear old diocese of Peterborough, of which I am obviously so fond, our last diocesan bishop had an assistant bishop. Our present bishop, splendid man that he is as we both know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, felt that he needed to be the last diocesan to get a suffragan. But he did not need one.

When I tell suffragans that they are unnecessary, they are very offended and say that their jobs now are to chair committees and visit clergymen in distress and so on. I have no doubt that there are more clergymen in distress than there used to be, but archdeacons and rural deans could visit them. Perhaps there are now more archdeacons and rural deans in distress. There is a plethora, an ever-expanding number, of committees, as we see in the Synod, which is producing more and more legislation.

A miscellaneous provisions measure came to the House a few days ago. It contained some tidying-up provisions to which nobody took any great exception and there seemed to be no great urgency about them. However, one provision was unnecessary and undesirable. It was that the regius professor of ecclesiastical history at Oxford university should no longer be a clergyman. But the clergy need to have ecclesiastical historians among them, and there must be an incentive for Church historians to become ordained. If there is a regius professorship at Oxford, so much the better. It would be a great misfortune if the Bench of Bishops contained people who knew nothing about Church history or the history of the Church of England.

We expect bishops to have many admirable qualities. We expect them to be godly and saintly men, to say their prayers and mean them, to understand something of pastoral life, and be able to teach the scriptures. Those are important matters. I do not regard the management of money and the Church's finances as among the most important qualities that are needed by bishops. That is why the Church Commissioners must be reformed. This vast body of people all trying to get in on the act and all of them spawning committees here, there and everywhere has become inappropriate to our age. Let us leave the management of money not to bishops and archdeacons, but to people who have experience in those areas and are able to carry out their functions, which must be tightly drawn in law, in a proper and appropriate way.

There are also too many dioceses in this country. Some of them are enormous and the strain upon the diocesan bishop may be sufficient to require him to have one suffragan. The bishopric of London has an enormous number of parishes and, alas, a great many problems. The diocese of Chelmsford is a huge burden on its diocesan bishop. My father was a canon of Chelmsford and at least two of the four bishops of Chelmsford I knew suffered broken health as a consequence of having a diocese which runs from Dagenham and East Ham all the way to the Suffolk border and contains a huge variety of circumstances.

Some dioceses have three counties, but the diocese of Portsmouth seems to be just the Isle of Wight and the city of Portsmouth and not much else. That is far too small in this age. We need to look hard to see whether the structure of the dioceses that we have inherited is appropriate for the age in which we live and whether substantial savings could be made from reorganisation. Some hon. Members have said that every reorganisation leads to increased costs. That factor will have to be considered.

The upkeep of our cathedrals, many of which are among the finest buildings in the world, is of considerable national interest, but I suspect that one or two of them need not be cathedrals at all. That is certainly the case with the cathedral church of Chelmsford. I am sorry to identify it as such—I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) is present—but it was the parish church of Chelmsford before the decision was taken to upgrade it into a cathedral, and it does look more like a distinguished parish church than one of the glories of European architecture and heritage.

The consequences of the scandal will be felt throughout the Church for decades to come; there is no escaping from that fact. The people in the pews—the people who matter—are of course appalled by what they have discovered. Serious errors have been made. I have been delighted to learn from my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby about what has been and is being done to put matters right, but I urge him not only to reflect on what he has said tonight, but to do what he can, at his persuasive best, to convince his colleagues in the Church Commissioners and in the Synod to pay serious attention to this evening's discussions.

The only way to proceed which will command the confidence of the public generally and the Church of England public in particular is to introduce an Act of Parliament, however inconvenient that may be to people who would like to put the matter away in a little corner and not let too much light be thrown on what is going on.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): During the speech of the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell), I was beginning to think that I was a student attending a lecture about the management of the modern Church and its historical perspectives. As those of us who have been in the House and served on the Ecclesiastical Committee with the hon. Gentleman know, he speaks from great experience, knowledge and commitment.

It think that this is a unique occasion. I do not remember an occasion in the House when a whole day was set aside, from the end of questions and statements until the Adjournment debate, to discuss Church matters. Suddenly, we have been able to focus our attention on that. Even when we debated the ordination of women, we started later in the day and did not have so much time allocated.

Mr. Frank Field: We had one and a half hours.

Mr. Hughes: Indeed.

Normally, we discuss the matter only when a bit of Church or Ecclesiastical Committee business comes to this place for approval or disapproval and, conventionally, one and a half hours is allocated. For no other reason, therefore, we should pay tribute to the fact that the Select Committee on Social Security, chaired by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), decided, I suspect at his suggestion originally, to consider this matter of wide general concern. That consideration happens to be within the context of the management of the Church of England, and principles that the House has been concerned about in relation to a range of issues have been applied.

The fact that the Committee has considered an aspect of the management of an important institution's finances, that the matter is considered here, and that we have time to debate it, is important. The debate is specifically about the management of the finances of the national Church, the Church of England, but it relates to many other parallel concerns and debates that we are having. It is timely because a debate is taking place in Committee on the management and provision of pensions in the context of Government pensions legislation. That Bill, which has been through the other place, deals with some of the same issues: whether providers of pensions provide adequately for their employees and how pension fund assets are managed.

Two recent examples have brought those matters into the open and into public debate. They are not parallel, but they have similarities. The first was in the private sector and relates to the way in which Maxwell employees, to put it directly, were ripped off by their employer and placed in huge difficulty. All hon. Members have received representations from their constituents who have found themselves in difficulty. As someone who represents many print workers, I had many such representations.

The second example involves pensioners of the Church of England, that is, the retired clergy. They found, not that their employers—members of the Church—had directly ripped them off, but that those to whom they entrusted the management of finances ripped them off. They did not do so directly; they did so through incompetent, poorly advised, mistaken, foolish investments. The debate centres on that.

Mr. Field: Does the hon. Gentleman recall that the same Select Committee recommended to the Government that the Goode committee should be established to recommend a Pensions Bill, and that, when the Government came to it, it was such a complicated matter that we now have one of the biggest Bills to be introduced in this Parliament? The Government are trying to debate the Bill openly, and are not getting it through in one and a half hours.

Mr. Hughes: I remember that. That is another tribute to the hon. Gentleman's Committee. That matter slightly predates the present debate. I have considered the Pensions Bill. I had a briefing with my noble Friend Baroness Seear, who dealt with the matter in the other place the other day. That Bill is hugely important; such matters are complex but important.

One of the things that most affects people's sense of security throughout their lives is what the state of their pensions will be and how secure that is. People have a great interest in knowing how their pension managers are doing. They are big players in the national corporate financial scene. Many of us have experience of the fact that many of the matters that concern our constituents are determined by the decisions of pension funds and trustees, who are now large players and investors.

I should like to make some brief, passing references to the speech of the hon. Member for Corby. He got into a fairly extended consideration of how the Church could reorganise its affairs. It caused me to think of two things. First, there is a danger in the Church, as in the rest of society, that we shall start thinking that administration is all, and that we shall require the people at the top of the professional tree in the Church to have the same skills as those required of the people at the top of the professional tree in other sectors of life, that is, managers, accountants and financiers. But those at the top in the Church may not have those skills. Secondly, one complaint that is made all the time is that the best-paid people in the health service are the administrators, financiers and accountants, not the health professionals. The same is true in the Church.

This is a much smaller matter but, as someone whose sister-in-law—the hon. Member for Corby may not like this—is an ordained priest in the diocese of Chelmsford, may I say that my brother had to follow her to her house, which is in the parish. He had to live where she is living, as it were, on the job. She does not live away from the place. It does not necessarily follow that women clergy or women priests will, by necessity, live further away; it depends on the family's choice. My sister-in-law lives in the middle of her community, which very much welcomes that.

I welcome the report and all its recommendations. I welcome the recommendation that the Church Commissioners should be a smaller, businesslike body. It is nonsense that the Church Commissioners are a huge body of people who, in many respects, are only nominal members. In his earlier intervention, the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) asked questions that related to the fact that more than one hon. Member serves on that body. The Prime Minister is one of its members. All the diocesan bishops are members. It is complete management nonsense that that huge body of people should be responsible, in any serious sense, for the management of these finances. As the Select Committee recommends, the Church Commissioners should be a small body of people who can get on with that, and who see it as their particular contribution to the management of the Church.

Clearly, it is proper—I hope that this will be picked up in Bishop Turnbull's commission—that a pension fund should be established and that it should take in money and pay out Church pensions. There is a management proposal that there should be a single board dealing with paying in and paying out; that is sensible. The people who know what the revenue is should decide what the outgoings are; that is logical. The important point has been made—this was touched on by the hon. Member for Corby—that this whole business is not only about learning the lessons for the future, but about restoring the confidence of the contributors—the people in the pews. They need to be confident that when they pay their money in, it will not be thrown away. There is no incentive for people to give generously if they do not have confidence in those who are managing their money.

There is also the question of how the matter should be addressed in terms of legislation. There is the debate about the procedures that take place in the Synod and here and about the interrelationship between the decision-making processes of the Church and the decision-making process of Parliament.

It is self-evident that the Church misuses, misspends or misinvests its inherited wealth at its peril. There are likely to be dire consequences in rural and in urban areas if the assets of the Church are wasted by bad investment. The Church has a lot of updating to do to get its investment policy right and to get the accountability of its investment policy and processes correct.

The Church Commission was set up so that there could be a pooling of resources by which the poor parts of the Church could be assisted by the affluent parts of the Church. In those days, the system was intended to benefit urban, inner-city missions because the wealth lay in the rural parishes or in the slightly less urban parishes. It will be a tragedy if the consequence of this lack of investment is that there are not only not enough funds with which to pay the pensions, but few funds to go to support the Church in other places. The Church needs to be very conscious of the calamitous results of such a significant waste of its money.

It is always difficult to know how best to invest. The hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) has made it clear that one needs people with appropriate skills to ensure that the best financial and investment decisions are made. The hon. Member for Corby made the similar point that one should appoint not only people from the list of the great and the good, but people who know exactly how to deal with the matters in question.

As everyone has admitted responsibility, it is not now appropriate to go over in large measure whose fault it was. The archbishop has accepted responsibility, technically quite properly, and has tried to ensure that the matter is dealt with fairly. I intervened in the speech of the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) to make the point about openness. I believe that, when the Turnbull commission reports and when we look at the structure again, we shall realise that there needs to be a more efficient, small, compact managerial organisation dealing with those matters and one that is much more open and accountable to the body of the Church. Although secret decision-making and a secret investment policy may be fine for private financial deals and in competing against other people, the subscribers and beneficiaries must, in their own interests, be allowed to see what is going on and must be convinced that the Church is making proper decisions.

An issue lies underneath all this. The Church must face up to the fact that it is running out of historical assets with which to support not just its present ministry, but its retired clergy. The position is changing from having the money available, with some to spare, to having insufficient money to meet all the pension bills. That is why the whole issue is being addressed. I welcome what the right hon. Member for Selby said about the fact that the Church has been working out the problem, and that it has just come to an initial formulation for the way in which it will raise the money for pensions in future. The state faces the same issue. The welfare state will not have enough available from historical, accumulated moneys to pay state pensions indefinitely. The move towards occupational pension schemes is entirely right because it is necessary and because that is the only way in which we shall raise the money. The Church must do the same.

The Church of England needs to face up to the conclusion that most of the rest of the Churches have faced up to. In the free Churches and, to a large extent, in the Roman Catholic Church, congregations pay their ministers. I do not make my next point in the belief that I am any better than anyone else. The old tradition of the Church was that one tithed to pay for a variety of things in the Church, thus furthering the ministry of the Church. The money raised from congregations—I am talking not about the widow with her mite, but about people with considerably more money—is minuscule. My diocese of Southwark has the best level of giving of any according to the most recent records, but still it is minuscule.

If people really want the Church's ministry to work, they must covenant and give, and they must give in proportion to their salaries and incomes. Many people who go to church have large salaries and incomes, but the Church does not, in many cases, see much of that money. The churches have to make a contribution towards the diocese; they begrudge it and they think that it is too big. I am never sure whether they boost their Easter electoral roll or reduce it to affect their levy.

If the Church here is to face up to its responsibilities, as much as the Church in the rest of the world has, it must raise the resources to pay for its clergy parish by parish and community by community. There will, of course, have to be cross-subsidy, and the rich places should take responsibility for paying for the Church in poorer places. None the less, there must be much more self-sufficiency in the Church, not least because the historical assets of the Church will not be sufficient to keep up with rising bills, including the rising pensions bill. The Church needs to face up to that fact soon; it is a real challenge, especially in times of financial difficulty.

There needs to be more democratic accountability of the management of the Church and of the Church financiers. We also need to address the question of parliamentary and state accountability. One can go one of two ways. One can say that it is entirely inappropriate for the state to have any responsibility and that the Church should be allowed to get on with its own affairs. At the moment, the Church puts things to us on a take-it-or-leave-it basis—the phrase used by the right hon. Member for Selby.

Alternatively—this was the burden of the case put forward by the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael)—one can say that there is no reason why the Church should be any less open to scrutiny than any other organisation. I take that view, and I take the view that we should be as willing and ready to scrutinise the interests of our constituents who are pensioners of the Church, as opposed to pensioners of Robert Maxwell, as we are to scrutinise the interests of any other group in society. We must therefore have procedures for doing that.

Outside, it may seem that we are discussing semantics when we debate whether the Church should propose Measures that we take or leave and negotiate beforehand. The hon. Member for Corby was right to say that, even, with the flexibility that the Ecclesiastical Committee has shown in the past, it is inappropriate for us to debate a draft Measure. The conclusion is, therefore, that, if we have the power to scrutinise the structure of the Church Commissioners—whatever structure the Church decides to adopt—as we should scrutinise all other charities, whether exempt or not, we should use that power by means of primary legislation.

I support those who, like the Select Committee, argued that we should have Bills. The Church could have its debates and then send legislation to us. It is a matter of ensuring not only that we listen to what the Church says, but that the Church pays heed to what is regarded as good practice for every pension fund and for every citizen. The Turnbull commission should take that into account.

I guess that what will happen after the debate is that we shall await the outcome of the Turnbull commission. The two debates will coincide, as it were, in terms of looking at the structures of the Church. That is the right way forward.

Many of us hope that the Turnbull commission will be bold, not timid. In the commission's last weeks, as it nears drafting its final report, I hope that the new Bishop of Durham and his colleagues will address the need for the Church to be seen to be organised in a way that minimises bureaucracy, maximises democracy and accountability, but, above all, releases people to get on with the job of the Church. That is a mission not to the people in the pews—if they are in the pews, we are nine tenths of the way there—but to the people who are not in the pews at all and who ought to be much nearer to the Church than they are.

The history of the investments that prompted today's debate has not done the Church any good. I hope that the Church has learned the lesson of that mistake and put that sad saga behind it. Once it has done that, the Church needs to be much less defensive.

I was with two friends—one a Christian, one not—in Rochester cathedral on a Sunday afternoon. They pointed out to me a notice on a board in the cathedral that started by saying that Church of England attendance was not declining. That is hardly a bullish, confident start to a statement about the current state of the Church of England.

The Church must be much more confident about itself, much less defensive, and much more concerned to be the missionary Church that, in many parts of world, it still is, but that the good old Church of England often does not appear to be in Britain. That is why I favour the disestablishment of the Church; that would release us to be a more missionary Church and less careful about being defensive.

Irrespective of whether hon. Members agree with that, I hope that the Church learns its lesson, puts its house in order, modernises its structures and gets on with its real job. That is not to defend the institutional old Church, but to manage itself so that it can deliver the unchangeable and eternal new message, which is about reaching individuals so that Christ can change their lives. That is the principal concern of the Church, and the sooner we can be sure that it is not spoiling that message by bad internal management and that it has its house in order, the better the Church will do.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): I take part in this debate with a sense of sadness. At a time when the congregations of the Church of England are at their historic low point and when some of us, at any rate, who are members of the Church of England, feel that the Church is not giving a sufficient moral and spiritual lead, to heap this financial crisis—as, inevitably, it is—on to that dilemma is a cruel double blow.

I must pay a great tribute to the Social Security Committee; I pay one, too, to its Chairman for the measured way that he introduced his excellent report without which, undoubtedly, we would not be debating this extremely serious issue.

I should like to start where my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell), in a sense, left off. I hasten to add that I shall not speak at such great length. My remarks will be extremely brief. Let us think about the consequences of this financial crisis, as I should like to call it. A substantial sum—mention has already been made of over £700 million—will have to be set aside for a properly funded pension scheme. That will leave the general fund in the Church Commissioners' hands severely depleted for all their other activities.

Those other activities, of course, include the day-to-day stipends of existing clergy. They also include the upkeep of a considerable number of churches. Their upkeep has to be met by smaller and smaller congregations, which are therefore contributing less and less, not only to the upkeep of the churches but to the Church's giving to other worthy causes, in this country and throughout the world.

The inevitable consequence is that there will be less money to fund the stipends of individual clergymen. That means that congregations will be asked to pay more and, because they are declining, the number of clergy will decline. As that declines, so will the number of congregations. It is an ever-decreasing circle that, somehow, we must find a way of breaking.

The consequence of the declining number of clergy will be that the number of parishes administered by each clergyman will grow. In my group of parishes in Gloucestershire, we have an extremely dedicated parson who looks after five parishes with four parish churches and manages to hold a service in each every Sunday. I do not know how he manages to drive between them in the time that he has available. He is extremely ably assisted by his lay reader wife. The consequence of that crisis will be that his and other tasks will become ever-more fraught. If he is being threatened with at least another three parishes to add to his existing ones, he will certainly not be able to hold a service in every church in every parish, every week. That will be an extremely sad day for the parishes involved.

Almost every mistake in the book was made in the financial management that we are discussing. Unfortunately, one or two of the chief executives are still in place, notably the chief executive of the pension side in the Church. The Select Committee report makes it clear that it was he who did, to use the report's words, a back-of-an-envelope calculation of the change in pensions policy to give clergymen and the widows of clergymen a pension increase to two thirds of final salary. That gave rise, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) has said, to a threefold increase in the cost of pension contributions between 1981 and 1991. Over that same period, the benefits of that pension scheme increased 17 per cent. above the retail price index. The intent is laudable but it is somewhat foolish if it cannot be afforded.

Mr. Jenkin: It is important to emphasise that the gentleman in question was not responsible for taking that decision. We spent some time in Committee questioning the source of that decision. What is most disturbing about what we discovered is that decisions of that magnitude simply emerged from a consensus, perhaps driven a bit by the Synod, perhaps driven a bit by some of the commissioners. Those momentous decisions became policy without anybody formulating a paper to consider all the consequences and going through a proper process of decision making. It is wrong to cast blame on individuals in the way that my hon. Friend's comment might be interpreted.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am grateful for that clarification. Nevertheless, the individual concerned has had professional financial training and is involved in a firm that gives pensions advice. He is therefore expected to know something about such matters.

The lesson that must be learnt from the whole debacle is that we need a proper accountable, open, democratic system. As I said to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), part of what has gone wrong in the past is that too many of the sort of decisions that we are discussing have been made in secret by very few people. If the House is to remain the scrutiny body for Church affairs, we need a system whereby the House can obtain all the information necessary in order properly to scrutinise the decisions. That is what has gone wrong in the past.

I am not a Johnny-come-lately to the subject: I have been asking questions on Church affairs since I first entered the House in 1992. Up until then, I do not believe that the House had the necessary information to know what was going wrong. It was not until the 1991 report that we even knew about the disastrous investment in Kent.

I hope that lessons will be learned. We must have a proper, democratically accountable system and proper accounts. After all, the National Audit Office had been asking for properly consolidated accounts for six years prior to 1991 before it eventually got hold of them. Had those accounts been available, it is conceivable that some of the mistakes would have been spotted earlier.

Mr. Jenkin: That is certainly true.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I thank my hon. Friend for that guidance, because he was a member of the Committee that produced the excellent 1991 report.

Undoubtedly, wrong decisions were made. We need a proper financial structure. I should like to see the results of the quarterly meetings at least summarised in the annual report. I should like to see proper accounts showing the performance of each section of the Church Commissioners' fund. We owe it to past clergymen to make a decision as soon as possible to set up a proper actuarially funded pension scheme. There can be nothing more important than the obligation to assure retired members of the clergy that their pensions will be honoured in full. We owe it to them to make sure that we get a decision as soon as possible.

It is now two years since the Lambeth group identified the fact that pensions were not properly funded and pointed out that no fund was earmarked for pensions within the overall Church Commissioners' funds. I do not believe that the Church Commissioners even knew fully what the pension obligations were each year. We owe it to those clergy to set up an independent actuarially funded scheme for past pensions as well as to provide for the pension liabilities of present clergymen. That is where it may be prudent not to fund in full, because nobody knows what those liabilities will be. As the hon. Member for Birkenhead has already said, it may be prudent to set aside a fund with the obligation on Church Commissioners that if there is a shortfall in the fund, it can be made up at a later date. If that is not done, there may be overfunding now and the other obligations of the Church may suffer.

Lessons have to be learned. We need proper systems and proper professionals in place. My right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) has never said whether proper pensions management advice has been sought. I shall be pursuing that in questions. I am not talking about property advisers, to whom I have talked and who I know do an excellent job, and I am not talking about actuarial advice on how much money needs to be set aside. I am talking about pension fund management, which I mentioned in my intervention to my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby. We need to know how well each section of the fund is doing.

When I was involved in property fund management as a chartered surveyor, the portfolios of all our clients were measured against an index. We could tell any of our pension fund managers how their fund was doing compared to a basket of other funds. We could probably find a fund similar to that of the Church, where some 50 per cent. or so of its investment was in property and we would be able to say how well the Church fund was doing compared to that similar fund.

It is essential that, before long, we have a proper annual report with accounts from the Church Commissioners so that we can see how the fund is doing. As the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) has said, it is essential that trust in the people who will manage the Church finances in the future is built up. That is vital if we are to encourage people to give more. I have no doubt that Bishop Turnbull's commission will be urging all of us who are members of the Church Commission to give more. If we are to give more, as our ancestors have done throughout history, we must not be suspicious about the way the funds will be managed. That is one of the most important things for the Church Commissioners to achieve. They must convince all of us in the Church who might be thinking of giving money that it will be properly managed.

I am delighted to have been able to take part in the debate. This is a difficult moment for the Church but, historically, all institutions have their ups and downs and I have no doubt that, given proper leadership and participation from its members—it has had that in the past—the Church can again rebuild the moral and spiritual lead that the nation desperately needs. Our spiritual stock is going downhill. If we are to stem the increased rate of divorce and the break-up of families, we must have that proper spiritual and moral leadership. I look to our leaders in the Church to remedy all the things that I have mentioned.

Ms Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): I welcome the report and its recommendations. I was a member of the Select Committee but I joined only in the latter part of the inquiry. I want to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) for the way in which he chairs that Committee and for the way in which he handles it generally. In spite of the party political differences, the debates that take place in that Committee are conducted in a way that uses those differences in the best interests of all our constituents. My hon. Friend's speech was interesting and made clear the way forward following the report. Much of the excellent report is due to my hon. Friend's consistent and dedicated interest in this subject.

I agree with what has been said by my hon. Friend and other hon. Members who have mentioned opening up the processes in the Church and making it more accountable. There is a great deal of mystique around the Church of England and the Church Commissioners and that must be got rid of. If the report does anything to open up the debate within the congregations across England, it will be extremely useful.

The report refers to Parliament's somewhat laissez-faire attitude to the Church of England and to the way in which it deals with it in the House. If we are to have an established Church—there is a great deal of debate about that—it is important that Parliament takes its involvement more seriously. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) said, there is a public interest and it must take into account the relevance and importance of the Church in England, particularly in the inner-city areas. Just as the numbers who attend some of our debates in Parliament do not reflect the importance of the work of Parliament, so the size of the congregations on Sundays does not reflect the importance of the work of the Church. It is important that we do not measure what the Church is doing by the number of people who go to churches on a Sunday.

It is necessary to have a Bill rather than a Measure, because we must have this important debate. I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth could not commit the next Labour Government to introducing a Bill and could not give a timetable. However, I am confident that we shall find a way to allow much greater debate than just one and a half hours on a Measure.

I should like to pay tribute to one of my constituents—the Archbishop of Canterbury—who acted in a way that showed clear leadership once the results of the inquiries by John Plender in the Financial Times were published in July 1992. Once that "loss" of £800 million on property speculation was revealed, the Archbishop of Canterbury acted promptly. I very much welcome, as the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) did, the fact that independent auditors will be looking at the Ashford development. The Committee found it most disturbing that the Church could even think of getting involved in such a development. It is crucial that independent auditing is introduced.

The subject has not been mentioned tonight, but the Church must consider the whole question of morality and ethics; whether the Church should be involved, and to what extent it should be involved, in property development, speculative developments and in developments which may be perfectly acceptable in other areas of life, but which may not be the ways that the average churchgoing member of the public thinks that the Church should invest. I hope that the archbishop will identify his role in that matter and offer some leadership. We should consider not only that matter when the Church makes a bad investment, but whether the ends generally justify the means.

When Sir Douglas Lovelock gave evidence to the Committee, he asked a question about the end justifying the means and whether the Church took anything to do with ethics into account. It was interesting that he said that the Commissioners were

"there to support the parochial ministry of the Church of England and they should strain every nerve to do it, and that is what we were doing . . . in pursuit of that, we did things which subsequently have seemed to be imprudent".

It is not good enough to question afterwards reasons for involvement in investments which may not be ethical. The Church should draw up criteria after a debate among its congregation. I also believe that there was complacency about the losses, as some hon. Members have said. Other—albeit slightly different—pension funds did much better and were much more capable of dealing with the recession than the Church.

I want to comment on the consequence of that debacle and on what has happened in inner-city areas. In my own inner-city area of Lambeth, there are many churches, but each church does a great deal more than providing a service on a Sunday. One cannot underestimate the work done in areas of high deprivation, poverty and very bad housing, where there are high numbers of young, single mums, few play spaces for children and all sorts of other problems that result from living in the inner city. The work done by the churches and the clergy in such areas is greatly appreciated. The appreciation may not always be shown by more people attending church, but, like many other things, if it were not there, it would be greatly missed.

Some churches in particular have to deal with homelessness. St. John's at Waterloo spends a great deal of time helping people who sleep right next to the church in the bullring. Indeed, every night the church steps are covered with people sleeping rough. St. John's is also involved in youth projects and works in a multiracial community. All those activities are vital in a poorer area where people are not able to contribute as much as they might in other areas, although of course some people contribute greatly.

I was interested to hear the right hon. Member for Selby talk about the transitional arrangements for poorer dioceses. It is absolutely crucial that areas such as the one that I represent are treated differently. Some hon. Members may have received a letter today from the Rev. Richard Thomas, the communications officer for the diocese of Oxford. It is interesting that the Church now has communications officers as well. Perhaps he is on e-mail. He pointed out that Oxford was one of the first dioceses to call for an independent inquiry following the report on the commissioners' losses in the Financial Times, which is very welcome. He went on, however, to criticise part of the Select Committee report. He said that, since the diocese of Oxford finds 92.4 per cent. of its costs from its own resources, it rejects the view expressed in the Select Committee report that the parochial system is under threat in his diocese.

That sounds a little smug. The book "The Historic Resources of the Church of England" shows on a beautifully coloured map those areas of the country which pay more and have high income and high potential. It just happens that Oxford is in the area of highest income and highest potential, yet the inner-city areas to which I have referred are a very different colour; they have low income and low potential. It is not good enough for one diocese, which is especially well off, simply to ignore what happens in areas such as the inner city that I represent.

Mr. Frank Field: If some dioceses are doing so well, does my hon. Friend hope, as I do, that the commissioners would expect such dioceses to cover the whole of their future pension commitments much more quickly than the poorer dioceses which she and I represent?

Ms Hoey: I hope that that will be taken into account. It would not be possible for areas such as the one that I represent to meet their pension commitments in the same length of time as it would take the richer dioceses.

I hope that the right hon. Member for Selby will take seriously not only the views of the Select Committee, but those which have been expressed tonight. It is clear that the majority of hon. Members present feel that there needs to be further debate and more accountability. If the Church is to win back confidence after this debacle, it is important that the recommendations of the Select Committee report are considered.

Indeed, I hope that the Church returns to looking sincerely at what it said in the report "Faith in the Cities". That report gave people a lot of hope for the future of the Church. It is crucial that that is not lost and that we learn from our mistakes. The Select Committee report has a wide remit. Indeed, it would be a real eye-opener to the average member of a congregation, and it is very important that we learn its lessons.

8.6 pm

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): I rise rather at the fag end of the debate; nevertheless, I hope that my speech will be worth while. I declare my interest as an adviser to Legal and General Group plc. It is of tangential interest to this debate, but I declare it as a formality, as it is a major provider of pensions.

The hon. Member for Vauxhall (Ms Hoey) referred to a letter that she had received from the Oxford diocese. I recently received a letter from my own diocese of Chelmsford, which was similar in tone. It described the report of the Select Committee on Social Security as "not news to those with responsibility for ministry in the Church of England", and it explained how the consequences of the Church's decision were all in hand and that everything would be all right. There is no reference in that letter, for example, to the possible necessity of providing additional contributions to pension funds. I do not think that the full impact of what has happened has been absorbed and I thoroughly endorse the comments of the hon. Lady.

This debate has been very much characterised by one tribute after another to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). One is reminded of the second line of the hymn, if it is not idolatrous to quote from it, that says:

"To his feet thy tribute bring".

I share those sentiments. Being involved with the report as a Member of the Committee was an interesting exercise and very worth while.

I want to cover three points, one of which has already been discussed quite extensively—avoiding complacency. Behind the tabloid headlines, of which one can understand Church Commissioners becoming a little tired, there is a genuinely horrific story. Perhaps we have understated some of it and, on re-reading the report, I wonder whether we have. I should like to put those features on the record, talk briefly about the apportionment of blame and, finally, about the role of Parliament.

I intervened on my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) about the problem of the property portfolio in the context of what he referred to as the "loss" of the Church Commissioners. He quietly admonished the Committee for putting the word "loss" in inverted commas in paragraph 17. We often hear that £800 million has not really been lost. It is worth studying that paragraph and the pension funds with which the Church Commissioners' fund has been compared. Between 1989 and 1992, the Church Commissioners' funds peaked at £3 billion, but at the end of that period stood at just over £2.1 million. That loss is the source of the £800 million figure.

During that period, however, comparable pension funds increased by between 10 and 15 per cent. One could argue that the loss is far greater than £800 million, especially in terms of the on-going loss of income to the Church of England as a result of that lost money. Once losses have been sustained, one cannot get the money back. One starts with the number of talents in one's hand, that is the lesson. That income has been irrevocably lost to the Church, with the consequences that flow from it.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said that the secrecy surrounding the loss might be acceptable in a private business, but not in a business handling public funds. He has got it wrong, because a publicly quoted company, or indeed, any company is required to file a consolidated report and accounts at Companies House on a regular basis. That was not done by the Church Commissioners; moreover, even the information that was provided was thoroughly misleading and did not reveal the proper state of the Ashford project.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: On the financial management, does my hon. Friend agree that as the capital value of the fund decreased, it was inevitable that the income decreased? The commissioners moved to make up the shortfall by buying high-interest coupons, therefore exacerbating the future capital growth of the capital fund.

Mr. Jenkin: There is a great deal in what my hon. Friend says.

By any standards, the Metro centre would be a prime asset in any property portfolio. No one would dispute that. When the Select Committee took evidence, it was pointed out that the approved budget for the project was originally £130 million. Coopers and Lybrand gave the final cost at £272 million, yet we were constantly rained upon with words to the effect that it was an extremely successful investment. The Chairman of the Select Committee finally pointed out:

"You keep maintaining this is the most brilliant development, and I am now beginning to appreciate Sir John's skills."

Sir John was the original partner, who managed to sell his half of the development to the Church of England at the absolute top of the market. The Committee thought that, somehow, he had managed to dump the project on the Church of England, but, no, the Church had bought it voluntarily.

I used to work for 3i, which is based in the constituency of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey, and I was trained in the arts and technicalities of venture capital. We would not touch property projects, because that is a specialised market, and the development of retail property is an even more specialised market. The Church of England found itself in those specialised markets and went into partnership with the real sharp-toothed experts. It is no surprise that when deals were offered, the Church, given its inexpert experience and inexpert advice, offered a higher price for them than any other group. That is why the Church Commissioners were dumped with the Metro centre.

The commissioners have not denied that the returns to the Church of England's investors on the Metro centre was negative, but we were constantly told that it had been a fantastically successful investment. That demonstrates the scale of the amateurism with which such projects were approached by the Church Commissioners.

Special measures were taken to increase the income of the Church Commissioners. Capital was spent and capitalised in their accounts, but was then taken as revenue through subsidiary companies and distributed to the Church of England. Sir Michael Colman specifically said that that practice would be illegal in any ordinary company. That again demonstrates the lack of judgment that was used in making such decisions.

Should we allocate blame? I do not think that we should allocate it to specific individuals, because the commissioners arrived at the beginning of the 1980s without having engaged in any serious reform of their procedures for perhaps 100 years. Some minor reforms had been introduced, but their culture of behaviour was deeply rooted in the past. The way in which they arrived at decisions had not caught up with modern practice.

As I said earlier in an intervention, the decision to increase the pensions simply emerged. It is impossible to find anyone who took responsibility, because no one was responsible. The structure does not identify individuals who are responsible. That explains to a great extent why the bishops have been so apologetic. His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Chelmsford have acted swiftly to ensure an adequate response to the crisis, but they have quite rightly not sought to find scapegoats because they feel that everyone is responsible. This House is also responsible because, ultimately, the affairs in question have been conducted through an institution that is responsible to the House and Parliament. We share in that responsibility. I say that even though I have only recently been elected to the House.

That brings me to my final point about the role of Parliament. We could continue to leave the Church Commissioners to sort out their own problems. We could spend about one sixth of the time spent on today's debate nodding things through when they present us with a Measure. That would be profoundly wrong.

Mr. Michael: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jenkin: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman, the Opposition spokesman, agrees. I asked him earlier, in all sincerity, whether he would be willing to make a commitment on behalf of his party that time would be found for debates of this nature. I was a little disappointed when he failed to offer that commitment.

Mr. Michael: Since the hon. Gentleman has provoked me, let me respond in a friendly way. If he asked the same question of the Leader of the House about next week's business, he would not get a clear assurance. It is not for a Front-Bench spokesman to commit either the Government or the Opposition to find time for such a debate; that matter is dealt with through the usual channels. My reply, which was constructive, was that I am sure that the Opposition would be willing to respond constructively to the comments of the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) about reaching the right balance to ensure not only the swift passage of a Measure but time for debate and amendment.

Mr. Jenkin: I believe that we all share that worry. I expect that the anxiety of my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby is that, being a private Bill, unable to take a guillotine, it would be subject to all the delays, as the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) said, like the Cardiff Bay Barrage Bill. It might take years to pass through the House, and obviously we want a swifter process than that if possible. However, we must have a measure that we can properly scrutinise and amend. That requires the Government, of whatever party, to provide time and to ensure that there is a Bill that we can amend.

I sent a summary of the conclusions of the Select Committee's report to every one of the serving clergy in my constituency. Some of them wrote back and asked for a full copy of the report. Many of them wrote back with their comments. That has opened the door on the scale of the problem, of which I do not think many of them had previously been aware.

I quote one letter—in fact, from the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale). The writer actually says:

"I thoroughly approve of your plans, particularly legislation through proposing a Bill."

The House must respond to the many churchgoers and clergy in our constituencies, and shoulder its responsibilities, otherwise we simply go down the track advertised by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey. People will ask, "Why have an established Church at all? Why are the Prime Minister and other Ministers Church Commissioners if we simply put through Measures on the nod?"

I shall perhaps embarrass my hon. Friend the Minister. No doubt the Measure would be nodded through with an element of approval from the Government. The payroll vote might even be whipped to ensure a speedy process. That is not the way that the matter should be dealt with, and I very much hope that Front Benchers on both sides of the House will consider it important enough for the House to consider it properly.

8.21 pm

Mr. Frank Field: With permission of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I conclude by thanking hon. Members who have given up a Thursday evening when they need not have been here. It shows again the interest that the House takes in these matters.

I wish also to emphasise the three aspects that emerged most strongly for me from the debate. I hope that the Government will seriously consider the policy implications of the behaviour of one exempt charity. No one has asked for the whole elaborate structure to be brought down, but we all believed, when we passed the Charities Act 1985, that exempted charities were working rather well. My experience, having been in the House for 16 years, is that, whenever the House agrees on a measure and nods it through, whether it is the Charities Act or the Child Support Act 1991, one can almost guarantee that there will be trouble shortly afterwards. One of the reasons for having a ding-dong in this place is to try to probe matters carefully.

The other two issues are directed at the Second Church Estates Commissioner. I am sure that everyone will be pleased with the statement that he made today about the inquiry that the Church will undertake into the developments in Kent. None of us wants the Church to spend more money than necessary in considering those issues; enough has already been spent. We are not in the business of giving additional fees to solicitors, to other lawyers, or to specialists in that subject.

I hope that the most important message that the Second Church Estates Commissioner will take away is the feeling on both sides of the House about the way in which future legislation—in that respect only—should be approached. None of us wants to overturn the 1919 enabling Measure. Those of us who have spoken cannot, as a group, be classified as fanatics who have some hidden or other agenda that they wish to inflict on the Church.

It is obvious, from our debate, that there is genuine anxiety about the way in which one of the great institutions of the country will approach the next stage of its existence. When two Bills, or two Measures, do come to the House on the pension front and on restructuring the Church Commissioners, we should like to help the Church, in a humble manner, to get those measures as right as humans can get them right—not to put our sticky fingers into affairs that are not our affairs but merely to emphasise, as so many people have emphasised, that that is not just an ecclesiastical matter.

The Church of England is an institution that belongs to the nation and is, in some ways, inseparable from it, and the Church cannot maintain that position and claim a sect-like status when it comes to legislation.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bingo

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Burns.]

8.24 pm

Mr. John Whittingdale (Colchester, South and Maldon): I am grateful to have the opportunity to mention a matter that affects millions of people throughout the country.

I admit that a year ago I would not have guessed that I would be speaking in a debate about bingo, let alone initiating one. My interest in that subject arose only after I was invited, earlier this year, to visit the Gala bingo club in Colchester. The club is in fact in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin), whom I am pleased to see in his place tonight.

I had never been to a bingo club before, but I thought that it would be slightly fading and a bit dingy and that it might be attended by perhaps 50 of my more elderly female constituents. It had also been suggested to me that I might enjoy calling a game, so I had been practising beforehand with such phrases as "66—clickety-click" and, indulging in a fit of nostalgia, "Maggie's den—No. 10".

My first surprise was that bingo clubs of the 1990s have changed a great deal since the smoke-filled halls that were associated with the industry in the 1960s. The Gala club in Colchester is modern, spacious and comfortable, and in addition to bingo it offers a range of other entertainment, such as cabaret acts, a restaurant and bars. It is typical of the new breed of bingo clubs, costing as much as £4 million each, which employ more than 35,000 people throughout the country.

My second surprise of the night was the number of people who were present. Instead of 50, I found close on 1,000 people in that club, both male and female, of all different ages and of many different social backgrounds. A bingo club now is not only a gambling hall; it is a leisure centre where people can meet, talk, enjoy a drink, have a meal and generally have a fun and sociable afternoon or evening of activity.

In addition, clubs often fulfil a more general social role as places where elderly people can go during the day to enjoy a cheap meal, have a bit of fun and chat with friends in a warm, safe environment. It is for those reasons, perhaps, that more than 3 million people regularly play bingo in this country.

The stakes are comparatively small; they often work out at less than 30p a go, and as much as 90 per cent. of that sum can be returned in the form of prizes. It is gambling in its softest form. Unlike casinos, horse racing and the dogs, one cannot lose one's life savings, however hard one tries, by playing bingo, the main reason being that it is literally impossible to chase losses. On a really bad night, if one played every game with the maximum number of cards and one did not win a penny, one might be down by about £30 at the end of the evening. Participation in the game is also limited by the physical limits on how many cards can be played at one time.

On Tuesday night, I took advantage of the generosity of the Government Whips Office to visit the Gala club in Clapham, of which I am now a member.

It was my first attempt at playing the game, and I was told that seasoned players of bingo usually play with six cards in a single game. I soon discovered that I was unable to keep up with the numbers being called, and I found myself trying to remember more and more numbers as I fell further and further behind. Happily, I was next to a lady who was managed to mark her own card and keep an eye on mine at the same time, and to tell me when I had missed a number.

I must pay tribute to the mental agility and skill of experienced players of bingo. I do not believe that Einstein could play more than perhaps two sets of six cards at a time, even if he were permitted to do so by the present law.

Despite those safeguards and the physical limitations, the bingo industry is governed by draconian rules and regulations ostensibly to protect the consumer. The Gaming Act 1968 introduced strict controls on hard gambling and was designed to prevent organised crime and the Mafia gaining control of casinos. However, by some curious accident of history, the Act was passed by Parliament in a form that restricted the bingo industry within the same framework. As a result, the bingo industry, which was described by the Royal Commission on gambling as through the introduction of the 1968 Act, became a threat to the nation's moral and financial well-being which had to be contained within stringent and bureaucratic controls.

"a pastime where people, mostly women and often the lonely or the elderly, can meet in a neighbourly way to enjoy an agreeable flutter"

Having studied the restrictions, I am amazed that we still have a bingo industry in the United Kingdom. I shall give a few examples of the rules. If one decides that one would like to participate in a game of bingo—a decision which, under the terms of the 1968 Act, must be entirely unstimulated—one's first port of call may be the local or national newspapers. A bingo club can advertise in a local paper—but not a national one—and it can say that people may play bingo at that club. The advertisement can say how much it will cost to play bingo and the times at which people can play. However, the Gaming Act specifically prohibits any advertisement from telling people what they may win at the bingo club—a far cry from the national lottery.

If, as with a national game, an advertisement is placed in a national paper which says how much people can win, the Gaming Act states that the advertisement must not contain any information about where people can play the game. The Government's recent action to raise the limit on the maximum prize in the national game from £75,000 to £250,000 is extremely welcome. However, my hon. Friend the Minister will understand that its effect is blunted somewhat if the clubs cannot tell anyone where that prize may be won.

Perhaps the most ludicrous example of the restrictions on advertising that I have encountered so far involved a ruling that the Gaming Board told me about, whereby a club circulated information to its members telling them about prizes that were available in the club. That is permissible if the information is restricted only to the members of the club and it is not circulated more widely to non-members.

However, the club made the mistake of sending out the circular in a transparent wrapping. As a result, the name and location of the club and the amount of money that could be won there was visible through the wrapping. The Gaming Board ruled that that was a clear breach of the rules and that the circular should be withdrawn because there was a real danger that the postman might be corrupted by reading it.

The strong competition for the population's limited amount of disposable income is ever increasing. The national lottery has had a severe impact. I support the national lottery, but we must recognise that it is having an effect on other forms of gambling. Attendance figures at bingo clubs on Saturday nights, especially during the rollover week, are noticeably lower. The pools and premium bond companies—both of which, like the national lottery but not bingo, are open to 16-year-olds—also compete for people's leisure time and money. However, the national lottery, the pools and premium bonds—the chief competitors of the bingo industry—have been permitted to break away from the policy of satisfying unstimulated demand.

During the passage of the legislation which provided for the national lottery, it was recognised that its success would depend upon access to advertising. That has, in turn, led to the lifting of the pools advertising ban—a move that I support strongly. However, it is indefensible that bingo—the last remaining form of soft gambling that is governed by the restrictions—should not be able to benefit also from free access to advertising in all the available media.

Should one overcome the advertising problems and manage to find a suitable bingo club—perhaps on the recommendation of one's friends or by simply stumbling across it on the street—one will encounter a second problem. When I first visited the Colchester Gala club, I expressed a wish to play a game. I was told that it was illegal for me to do so; it was quite all right for me to call out the numbers from the stage, but I would need to become a member if I wanted to play. That did not seem an insuperable obstacle; I said that I would be happy to become a member—particularly when I was told that it was free. However, I was then informed that, by law, my membership could not be granted for at least 24 hours. Apparently that is a cooling-off period during which people have time to reconsider their momentous decision to play a game of bingo.

That restriction has a severe impact in tourist resorts, as many people who visit bingo clubs may be staying in the area for only one or two days. As a result, large numbers of potential customers may be turned away. Some of the larger bingo clubs are able to reduce the impact of the rule, at least partially, by running a system whereby membership of one club within the group entitles a member to play at any of the other clubs within that group. However, that is a benefit which the smaller operator is unable to offer.

I find it difficult to understand why that period of reflection was thought necessary in 1968; in 1995 there can be no justification for it. With the exception of casinos, any member of the public has open access—subject to an age requirement—to all other forms of gaming, most of which have unlimited stakes. I invite the House to consider the impact on national lottery ticket sales if one had to give 24 hours notice of the intention to play.

Even if one manages to overcome all of the obstacles which Parliament has put in the way of people who wish to play bingo, one will still not be free of Government interference and regulation. Having found a bingo club, become a member and waited the all-important 24 hours to reflect upon the morality of one's intentions, under the Gaming Act a person may still spend only £6.80 in any one session, including the entry fee. By law, the club must ensure that it does not take more than that permitted maximum from any one player.

Despite the fact that, in every other form of gaming in the United Kingdom, players can determine how much they wish to invest, if one is playing bingo the decision is not the individual's but that of the Gaming Board and of the Home Office. The clubs are even limited as to the amount to which they can boost the jackpot over and above the stake which the players have invested.

At any time those regulations would be regarded by all sensible people as archaic, unnecessary and anachronistic. With the advent of the national lottery, they pose a real danger to the survival of the bingo industry. I bring these matters to the attention of the House tonight in the interests of competition and justice. I have no interest to declare in the bingo industry, other than wishing to see an industry that now has to compete with the national lottery and the enhanced advertising capabilities of the pools given a fair chance.

The time for lengthy consultation has passed. The industry is falling into decline, which can be halted only by deregulation that will allow it to compete on a basis equal to that of its main competitors while it is still in good enough shape to take advantage of a level playing field. The Government have rightly championed competition and deregulation. No industry is more deserving of the chance to enjoy the benefits of those policies than the bingo industry. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to give it that chance tonight by announcing his intention to deregulate the bingo industry.

8.38 pm

Sir Mark Lennox-Boyd (Morecambe and Lunesdale): I rise to speak briefly in support of my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale), who is to be commended for drawing a problem to the attention of the House and for clearly explaining in detail and with care the restrictions placed on a successful and so far profitable industry, which provides a public service to many people in different communities.

I imagine that all seaside towns have some form of bingo facility and that Plymouth is no exception, although I do not know of any bingo clubs there. I speak on behalf of the Gala bingo club in my constituency, which is an admirable organisation. I have visited it several times—most recently last year, when I was deeply impressed by the range and extent of its facilities. That bingo club comprises a large hall with capacity for up to 1,000 people. It is extremely well furnished, well lit and well decorated in the modern idiom. It has a pleasant bar and good food and dining refreshment facilities, and a dance floor. It offers all that one would expect for an evening's entertainment, including a cabaret and dancing.

That establishment is not a gambling den or primarily for gambling. It is primarily for social activities which include a flutter, as my hon. Friend so aptly put it. From information supplied by Bass, which owns the Gala chain, I understand that 65 per cent. of all bingo players, who number 3 million, play for pleasure rather to gamble. How Bass defines that might be examined, but it makes the legitimate point that bingo is a social and not a gambling activity.

The Government last legislated to change the bingo industry regime in 1992, with the Bingo Bill. That introduced measures of a liberalising kind, to remove some of the regulatory burden on the industry, but by no means enough. As my hon. Friend said, much of that burden remains on the industry's shoulders. Remarkably, that modest lifting of the oppressive regime was considered sufficient when, only two years later, we were all talking about a national lottery—which we have now, with a vengeance. That shows how quickly social attitudes towards the morality of gambling change. As my hon. Friend said, it is absurd that bingo was left behind and not put on an equal footing with the industries with which it competes.

My hon. Friend used nearly every argument, but he omitted to mention that—as I was reliably informed—the odds in bingo of winning a modest prize are infinitely higher than the odds of winning a modest prize, let alone a jackpot prize, in the national lottery. I advocate bingo as a much more sensible form of flutter than the national lottery.

Bingo clubs are utterly respectable places of entertainment where one may find a coach party of middle-aged or elderly people, sometimes single lonely people and sometimes married couples who are there for social activity and human contact. Bingo provides a worthwhile social benefit as well as being a profitable industry for the 35,000 people whom it employs.

It is extraordinary that the Gala bingo club in my constituency cannot advertise saying, "Come to Gala on Saturday night for a dance, dinner and an evening out with a little bingo." But using the so-called inducement of an evening out, dancing, a cabaret and a meal to persuade the public to indulge in gambling is unlawful. That form of puritanism is absurd and bizarre in the current mores of our country. As my hon. Friend rightly said, it was probably absurd and bizarre even before the national lottery, but that has now exposed the folly of maintaining such restrictions.

I invite my hon. Friend the Minister and his Home Office colleagues urgently to examine that area of the law and to make changes as rapidly as possible. The national lottery, premium bonds, pools organisations and bingo should enjoy the same unrestricted ability to advertise. If I were in my hon. Friend's position, I would consider the bingo industry as part of the entertainment industry. It should be judged in that light: the gambling element—which of course is present—is incidental to bingo's major element of providing entertainment, and a legitimate and safe leisure activity for millions of people.

8.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Nicholas Baker): I welcome the initiative of my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale) in introducing this timely debate. His personal interest in deregulation is well known and he and my hon. Friend the Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Sir M. Lennox-Boyd) undertook personal researches that qualified them to speak authoritatively in the way that they did.

Commercial bingo, as played in bingo clubs throughout Britain, is a popular form of entertainment. There are more than 900 licensed bingo clubs in England, Wales and Scotland, and figures from the bingo industry suggest that every day, on average, about 500,000 people go to bingo clubs. Those players staked a total of £811 million in the year to August 1994. The industry's turnover is growing, and the money staked has increased by 31 per cent. since 1990.

Before the 1960s, commercial bingo—which used to be known as housey-housey in the Army and as lotto in homes throughout the country—and other forms of gaming were prohibited in law. The Betting and Gaming Act 1960 permitted gaming to be carried on as an activity of a club, and in so doing inadvertently allowed the introduction of commercial gaming. Large numbers of clubs sprang up offering bingo and casino gaming on a commercial basis. The new law was unclear and proved difficult to enforce; there was evidence that gamblers were being exploited, and there was criminal involvement in gaming.

The Gaming Act 1968 introduced the present system for the control and supervision of gaming. That legislation established the Gaming Board, which has wide powers to supervise commercial gaming and a general responsibility to keep the extent, character and location of gaming facilities under review. The 1968 Act applies a similar, although less rigorous, package of controls to bingo as to casino gaming. That regulatory system has been successful in ensuring that the bingo industry is stable and well run. The industry is generally free from criminal involvement and exploitation. Abuses are rare.

The system is also self-financing. The costs of regulation are offset by fees that the industry must pay for certificates from the Gaming Board and licences from the licensing justices.

That success, however, should not engender complacency. As my hon. Friends pointed out, the basic legislation governing bingo is now more than 25 years old. We must continue to ensure that the present controls are necessary, up to date and as effective as possible.

Hon. Members will be aware that we have been reviewing a number of restrictions on gambling as part of the Government's deregulation initiative. Some changes have already been made or are in hand. They include changes to the law on betting shops, lotteries, football pools and gaming machines. Bingo is not exempt from the review process. We have already made a number of changes to the law on bingo, and we have set out our plans for others. I should like briefly to outline some of them.

In 1992, we partially relaxed the ban on advertising bingo to allow some print advertising. Previously, the Gaming Act 1968 provided a general prohibition on the advertisement of any gaming premises or facilities. Earlier this year, we increased the maximum prize in the national bingo game from £75,000 to £250,000. The national game was introduced by the Gaming (Bingo) Act 1985 which the Government supported. It allows bingo clubs in Britain to join together to play multiple bingo.

In March this year, we published a consultation paper on gaming machines which has important implications for bingo clubs. At present, bingo clubs may offer either a number of £6 amusement-with-prizes machines, which pay out a maximum of £3 in cash or £6 in tokens, or two £200 jackpot machines. Under our proposals, bingo clubs would be allowed to offer a £10 all-cash amusement-with-prizes machine or up to four £200 jackpot machines.

We take the general view that traditional commercial bingo is towards the soft end of the gambling spectrum. It is a controlled form of gaming conducted in a social environment, and it was described aptly by my hon. Friend. Players' takes are low, the pace of proceedings is fairly contained and there are limited opportunities for participants to reinvest their winnings or chase their losses. The amount of money that operators may retain is strictly controlled. We believe that commercial bingo, as it is currently played, carries a low social risk. That is not to imply, however, that controls are unnecessary.

Like other forms of gambling, bingo is a cash-generating business. As such, it is particularly vulnerable to abuse by operators. Without effective regulation, there would be opportunities for unscrupulous operators to cream off money from participants which should be returned in winnings. We believe, therefore, that there will continue to be a need for controls to keep bingo free from criminal involvement and to protect participants from exploitation.

We are currently considering other aspects of the controls on bingo. They include the remaining restrictions on the advertising of bingo to which my hon. Friend referred. The partial relaxation of the ban on advertising bingo in 1992 did not allow the advertising of prize money or inducements to be linked to particular premises. There is a question of whether the remaining restrictions are necessary for the protection of the public. We hope to consult fairly soon on that and on broadcast advertising.

Another issue is the requirement that bingo halls must be run as clubs, with a 24-hour waiting period before new members are entitled to play. The 24-hour rule and club status are basic features of the system of regulation introduced by the Gaming Act 1968. We are considering whether commercial bingo requires that level of protection.

A further question is the duration of bingo gaming licences. At present, bingo operators must apply for a renewal of their bingo licences every year. We are considering whether such frequent renewal is necessary.

Those are just some of the issues that we are considering on bingo. The comments of my hon. Friends are particularly welcome and timely, and I can assure them that we shall take them most seriously in our considerations. Our thinking on those and other issues will emerge in due course.

I conclude by making it clear that important safeguards for players must be preserved. Nevertheless, there is a case for reviewing some of the present restrictions to ensure that the law does not place unnecessary restrictions on the many people who play bingo or on the industry which provides the facilities that so many people enjoy.

HEALTH

Tacrine

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will indicate her reasons for not licensing the drug Tacrine for the treatment of Alzheimer's disease; and if she will list the countries in Europe where it is licensed. [19901]

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made towards the processing of Cognex (Tacrine) by the United Kingdom. [20319]

Mr. Sackville: The Committee on Safety of Medicines (CSM), has provisionally concluded that, on grounds relating to safety and efficacy, they are unable to advise the licensing authority that Tacrine should be licensed at this stage. Under the United Kingdom licensing procedures, applicants for drug licences have extensive rights of appeal against the provisional conclusions of the CSM. The company promoting Tacrine is exercising these rights and the CSM will consider its appeal at the hearing.

The European Union's Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products has also concluded that Tacrine has not met the requirements for licensing under article 5 of directive 65/65/EEC. The majority of the European Union member states have decided to abide by this decision.

Tacrine is licensed in France and Sweden.

NHS Chairman

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total sum paid to chairmen of (a) NHS authorities and (b) NHS trusts as salaries and emoluments in each year since 1985. [20676]

Mr. Malone: The available information is shown in the tables.

Remuneration paid to NHS authorities chairmen (£000)

| 1988–89 | 1989–90 | 1990–91 |
|---|---|---|
| 3,183 | 3,281 | 5,878 |

Emoluments paid to NHS authorities chairmen (£000)

Source:
Annual accounts of regional, district and the London postgraduate teaching hospitals (SHAs) and family practitioner committees and family health services authorities.

Notes:
1. Figures for 1993–94 are provisional.
2. Figures are NOT comparable between the tables. Before 1991–92 the sum included gross salaries and pension contributions only. From 1991–92 it includes gross salaries, monetary value of benefits in kind, expenses allowances (where taxable), compensation for loss of office and chairman's fees.
3. Figures for 1985–86, 1986–87, 1987–88 and 1991–92 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Sums paid to NHS Trust Chairman

For 1991–92 to 1993–94 this information was published in the annual accounts of each trust, but for 1991–92 and 1992–93 this information was not collected centrally. For 1993–94 I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 16 February at column 808. From 1994–95 onwards this information will be collected centrally and also published in the annual accounts of each trust.

Medical (Professional Performance) Bill

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the basis of her calculations that the initial annual cost of retraining doctors consequent to her proposed Medical Act will be £530,000; and on what number of doctors, whose performance is likely to be judged seriously deficient it is based. [21062]

Mr. Malone: The explanatory and financial memorandum of the Medical (Professional Performance) Bill states that any increase in the General Medical Council retention fee—to cover the cost to the GMC of the new performance procedures—and the costs of remedial training undertaken by doctors to improve their standard of professional performance are expected to increase national health service expenditure by up to £530,000 a year. Of this, the estimated retraining costs are £280,000. The GMC estimates that 100 to 150 doctors a year might be subject to assessment under the new procedures, of whom 50 to 75 might be subject to remedial training or sanction.

The costs of retraining would vary widely, according to individual need, and would not necessarily be borne by the NHS. The figure of £280,000 was a central estimate after considering a range of possible scenarios; it is very small in proportion to the funds already available to hospital doctors and general practitioners who maintain their professional standards through continuing education.

Dental Services

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average waiting time for a person to become accepted as a patient of an NHS dentist in each health district in England. [21228]

Mr. Malone: Information about waiting times for patients to be accepted by dentists in the general dental service is not available centrally. Any unregistered patient who needs urgent treatment should seek the help of their family health services authority.

Hospitality

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the Department of Health's hospitality budget in each of the last five years. [21748]

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was spent on official hospitality by her Department in 1994–95. [21207]

Mr. Sackville: Expenditure on hospitality during 1994–95, including basic refreshments for meetings of expert advisory groups and working groups and for meetings with representatives of other Government Departments, voluntary organisations and public bodies is shown in the table. For details of previous years' expenditure I refer the right hon. Member and the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member of Truro (Mr. Taylor) on 1 November 1994 at columns 1073-74.

| | 1994–95 £ |
|---|---|
| (a) Department | 229,779 |
| (b) Agencies | 32,451 |
| Total | 262,230 |

Departmental Management

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what are the departmental administration costs in each year since and including 1989–90; what is the planned expenditure on departmental administration increase in 1995–96 and 1996–97; and if she will make a statement on the planned increase in spending in 1996–97 over 1995–96; [21751]

(2) if she will make a statement on the planned change in Department of Health staff in 1996–97. [21742]

Mr. Sackville: Departmental administration costs from 1989–90 to 1994–95, and the planned expenditure for 1995–96 and 1996–97 are shown in the table. The figures for 1994–95 are an estimate. In the three years to 31 March 1997, the staff costs and numbers of the Department as it stood on 1 April 1994 are planned to decrease by 21 per cent. Separately, in 1996–97, staff numbers will increase as a result of the replacement, subject to legislation, of regional health authorities with regional offices of the National Health Service Executive, in respect of which there will be a transfer of £63 million from hospital, community health and related services current expenditure to departmental administration.

| 1993–94 | 250,775 |
| 1994–95 | 260,264 |
| 1995–96 | 238,145 |
| 1996–97 | 291,222 |

Doctors

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate she has made of the proportion of doctors in the United Kingdom who speak (a) Urdu and (b) Punjabi; and if she will make a statement. [20923]

Mr. Malone: No such estimate has been made as this information is not available centrally.

Nurses

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate she has made of the proportion of nurses working in the United Kingdom who speak (a) Urdu and (b) Punjabi; and if she will make a statement. [20924]

Mr. Sackville: No such estimate has been made as this information is not available centrally.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in her Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21386]

Mr. Sackville: For the Department and agencies of which we are responsible any conflict of interest involving a civil servant would have been dealt with in accordance with the established guidance. Records of the number of cases are not held centrally. In the last five years, no special advisers have declared a conflict of interest.

NHS Authorities

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish an up-to-date list by region of all the chairs and non-executive members of each health authority, indicating the gender and occupation of each individual. [21358]

Mr. Malone: The appointment of non-executive members to district health authorities and family health services authorities is a matter for the regional health authority. Information on chairmen and non-executive members of regional health authorities and chairmen of district health authorities and family health services authorities will be placed in the Library.

Long-term Care

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action her Department is taking to ensure that health authorities abide by the requirements of HSG(95)8, NHS responsibilities for long-term care. [21273]

Mr. Bowis: As part of the implementation of HSG(95)8 all health authorities are required to draw up and publish local policies and eligibility criteria. The National Health Service Executive will monitor these closely to ensure that they meet the national framework of requirements set out in HSG(95)8.

NHS Provider Units

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the total annual cost improvement programme in the national health service provider units in each of the last four years. [21330]

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Private Patients

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much income has been received from treating private patients in each national health service hospital in the last year (a) as a cost figure and (b) as a proportion of that hospital's income. [21334]

Mr. Sackville: Details of the private income of national health service trusts for 1993–94 and the percentage of total income that private patient income represents will be placed in the Library.

Consultancy

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market-testing programmes in which her Department has been engaged since their inception. [21369]

Mr. Sackville: Since publication of the White Paper, "Competing for Quality", in November 1991, until 31 March 1995, the latest date for which figures are held, the total cost of consultants employed in connection with the market testing programmes of the Department and its agencies is £1,488,000.

Continuing Care

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary for Health what action she proposes to take to ensure that New River health authority complies with the requirements of HSG(95)8 in relation to its decision to reduce its 1995–96 continuing care contract with Hornsey Central hospital in respect of the number of occupied bed days. [21272]

Mr. Bowis: HSG(95)8 states that until policies and eligibility criteria for continuing care have been agreed health authorities should not proceed with any plans to reduce continuing care services unless those plans are covered by existing agreements with local authorities. New River health authority has reduced its contract for continuing care beds at Hornsey Central hospital in line with bed usage in 1994–95. They are discussing with the local social services department how the savings can be re-invested in other continuing care services. I have asked the chairman of New River health authority to let me have details of their reinvestment plans once they have been agreed with the local authority.

Appointments

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in her Department and the agencies for which she is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21767]

Mr. Sackville: The following civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in my Department and its agencies.

| Quarter | Administrative Officer | Administrative Assistant |
|---|---|---|
| September–December 1993 | 2 | 1 |
| January–March 1994 | 2 | — |
| April–June 1994 | — | — |
| July–September 1994 | 1 | 2 |
| October–December 1994 | 2 | — |
| January–March 1995 | 2 | 2 |

All appointments were on fixed term contracts except for 1 AO and 2AAs.

Mr. Rushton

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what details her Department has received about the severance payment made to Mr. Rushton, the former chief executive of the Avon ambulance trust. [21674]

Mr. Malone: None. National health service trusts can authorise severance payments without reference to the Department of Health. They are required to report termination settlements to the NHS Executive quarterly. The payment to Mr. Rushton was made in April 1995 and will be reported in the return for the quarter to 30 June 1995.

Infertility Treatment

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to encourage the extension of infertility treatment on the NHS; and if she will institute an assessment of the effectiveness of the various forms of infertility treatment present funded by the NHS. [21841]

Mr. Sackville: Decisions about the resources to be made available for infertility services must be left to individual health authorities as they are in the best position to determine priorities in the light of local needs and circumstances.

An assessment of the effectiveness of infertility treatments is already available in:

> The Effective Health Care Bulletin on "The Management of Subfertility" (August 1992), published for the NHS Management Executive by a consortium of Leeds and York universities and the research unit of the Royal College of Physicians.

Copies of the publication are available in the Library.

Special Hospitals

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list special hospitals currently operating in shadow trust form which are applying internal market principles; and if she will make a statement. [22041]

Mr. Bowis: No.

Efficiency Ratings

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the efficiency rating of the English hospital and community service and those of each EEC country in each available year between 1978–79 and 1992–93. [19797]

Mr. Malone [holding answer 21 April 1995]: Improvements in hospital and community health services efficiency are estimated by comparing the rate of increase in activity with the increase in expenditure. Between 1978–79 and 1992–93, HCHS cost weighted activity in England increased by 39.8 per cent. and HCHC expenditure, adjusted for movements in HCHS pay and prices, by 15.3 per cent. This implies an increase in efficiency of some 21 per cent. over the period. Data on the annual changes in activity and expenditure are in the table. Estimates from these data of efficiency gains for individual years over this period are not regarded as reliable.

Directly comparable data are not available for health services in other European Union countries. However such evidence as is available indicates that unit costs have generally risen over the last decade. Information on these health services is available in "OECD Health Systems", Organisation of Economic Co-operation and Development 1993.

HCHS cost weighted activity index

| | HCHS cost weighted activity index percentage increase over previous year 1978–79 = 100 | | Expenditure adjusted for changes in input unit cost percentage increase over previous year 1978–79 = 100 | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1978–79 | 100.0 | — | 100.0 | — |
| 1979–80 | 100.2 | 0.2 | 100.0 | 0.0 |
| 1980–81 | 105.9 | 5.8 | 100.8 | 0.8 |
| 1981—82 | 107.8 | 1.8 | 103.1 | 2.3 |
| 1982–83 | 107.2 | –0.5 | 103.2 | 0.1 |
| 1983–84 | 113.2 | 5.5 | 104.0 | 0.8 |
| 1984–85 | 116.5 | 3.0 | 104.1 | 0.1 |
| 1985–86 | 119.7 | 2.7 | 104.3 | 0.2 |
| 1986–87 | 121.4 | 1.5 | 104.6 | 0.3 |
| 1987–88 | 123.4 | 1.6 | 105.4 | 0.8 |
| 1988–89 | 124.5 | 0.9 | 106.2 | 0.7 |
| 1989–90 | 127.2 | 2.2 | 108.0 | 1.7 |
| 1990–91 | 128.9 | 1.3 | 109.0 | 1.0 |
| 1991–92 | 135.6 | 5.2 | 111.9 | 2.6 |
| 1992–93 | 139.8 | 3.1 | 115.3 | 3.1 |

Notes:

1. The cost weighted activity index provides a broad measure of the overall growth in HCHS activity, in which the contribution of the individual components are weighted by their costs.

2. Estimates of efficiency derived from these figures do not take account of the changing cost of a unit of output over time—for example due to demographic changes in case mix and the costs and benefits of medical advance. It is not possible to measure the effect of the last two components. However, demographic change has meant that the average cost per person treated has increased, particularly because of the growing number of very elderly people, who tend to require more expensive care.

ATTORNEY GENERAL

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Attorney-General on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interests; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21388]

The Attorney-General: Comprehensive records are not held centrally for civil servants in the departments and agency for which I am responsible. The requirement to declare conflicts of interest is contained in the "Staff Handbook" of each department and agency. There have been no special advisers in those departments or agency during the last five years.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Attorney-General if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market-testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21371]

The Attorney-General: The cost of employing such consultants in the departments for which I am responsible is £104,815.

Appointments

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Attorney-General how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in his Department and the agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21765]

The Attorney-General: The information for the departments for which I am responsible—the legal secretariat to the Law Offices, the Crown Prosecution Service, the Treasury Solicitor's Department, the Serious Fraud Office and the Government Property Lawyers' agency—is given in the table. The figures cover permanent and casual staff but not inter-departmental transfers.

[1] Administrative grade staff in LSLO are on loan from other departments.

[2] SFO do not employ administrative assistants.

SCOTLAND

Executive Agencies

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the number and location of Historic Scotland, Registers of Scotland, the Scottish Agricultural Science Agency, the Scottish Fisheries Protection Agency, the Scottish Office Pensions Agency, the Scottish Prisons Service, the Scottish Record Office and the Student Awards Agency for Scotland offices closed and the numbers of jobs lost or transferred as a result of agency work transferring from Scotland to the rest of the United Kingdom over the past five years; and if he will list the number and location of offices opened and jobs gained in Scotland as the result of agency work transferring to Scotland from the rest of the United Kingdom over the same period. [20167]

Mr. Lang: I have asked the chief executives of the agencies for which my Department is responsible, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Graeme N. Munro to Mr. Calum Macdonald, dated 1 May 1995:

The Secretary of State for Scotland has asked me to reply to your recent question about changes in jobs and offices resulting from cross-border transfers of agency work over the past five years.

As you will appreciate Historic Scotland has always been concerned only with the built heritage in Scotland since its establishment as an executive agency in 1991. It maintains no offices or posts outwith Scotland.

The only addition to our functions since 1991 was the transfer of responsibility for marine archaeology in Scotland from the Department of Transport in 1992. This did not involve transfer of posts or offices and the extra responsibility has been absorbed as enhanced productivity by existing staff in Historic Scotland.

I hope this information is helpful to you.

Letter from Andrew MacLeod to Mr. Calum Macdonald, dated 1 May 1995:

I have been asked to respond for the Scottish Fisheries Protection Agency to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Scotland on agency work transferred between Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom.

The Agency has not closed any offices or made any reduction in the number of jobs as a result of transfers of work over the past 5 years. No offices or jobs have been transferred from the rest of the United Kingdom to Scotland in this period.

Letter from Norman MacLeod to Mr. Calum Macdonald, dated 1 May 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your Question about offices closed or opened and jobs lost or gained as a result of transfers of work from or to Scotland, so far as the Scottish Office Pensions Agency is concerned.

All of the Agency's operations are carried out from the above address and no work has transferred from it to other locations in the UK over the past 5 years. Equally, no work has transferred to it from locations elsewhere in the UK.

No offices or jobs have therefore been lost or gained.

Letter from Alan W. Ramase to Mr. Calum Macdonald, dated 1 May 1995:

I have been asked to reply, in relation to Registers of Scotland Executive Agency, to your question to the Secretary of State for Scotland about jobs lost/gained and offices closed/opened through transfers of Agency work between Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom.

No Agency work has been transferred to or transferred from the rest of the United Kingdom. The Agency has therefore not gained or lost any jobs nor opened or closed any offices for this reason.

Letter from Patrick Cadell to Ms. Calum Macdonald, dated 1 May 1995:

I am writing in response to your question to the Secretary of State for Scotland about the number and location of offices closed and the number of jobs lost or transferred as a result of agency work transferring from Scotland to the rest of the United Kingdom over the past 5 years.

The Scottish Record Office (SRO), which became an executive agency from 1 April 1993, maintains the national archives of Scotland and it would be entirely inappropriate for Scotland's written heritage to be housed anywhere other than Scotland. None of our repositories has been closed nor have any jobs been lost or transferred as a result of any of the SRO's work being transferred outwith Scotland.

Although a few jobs have had to be created as a result of a general increase in workload, none of that increase can be attributed to work being transferred to Scotland from other parts of the United Kingdom.

I hope that this information is of use to you.

Letter from E. W. Frizzell to Mr. Calum Macdonald, dated 1 May 1995:

I refer to your Question to the Secretary of State for Scotland about changes in Agencies caused by transfers of work to or from Scotland. I am replying so far as the Scottish Prison Service is concerned.

No offices have been opened or closed or jobs lost or gained in the Scottish Prison Service as a result of transfer of work within the United Kingdom.

Letter from K. MacRea to Mr. Calum Macdonald, dated 1 May 1995:

I refer to the Parliamentary Question which you tabled to the Secretary of State for Scotland seeking information on transfers of work between Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom in relation to various Executive Agencies.

I have been asked to reply in respect of the Student Awards Agency for Scotland. There have been no transfers of work, or related changes in staff or offices, since the Agency was established in April 1994.

I trust this is the information you were seeking.

Letter from Dr. R. K. M. Hay to Mr. Calum Macdonald, dated 1 May 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply on behalf of the Scottish Agricultural Science Agency (SASA) to your recent questions regarding the number of jobs lost or transferred as a result of agency work transferring from Scotland to the rest of the United Kingdom over the past five years and the number of jobs gained in Scotland as a result of agency work transferring to Scotland from the rest of the United Kingdom over the same period.

These questions are not applicable to SASA.

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 15 December, Official Report, column 757, if he will list those projects in privatised companies which have received European regional development funding since privatisation indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [20576]

Mr. Kynoch: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given today by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the executive non-departmental public bodies sponsored by his Department which are subject (a) to investigation by the Parliamentary Commissioner, (b) scrutiny by the Audit Commission, (c) scrutiny by the National Audit Office, (d) statutory provisions for open government, *(e)*performance indicators and (f) provisions under the citizens charter. [20663]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 25 April 1995]: The information requested is as follows: (a) Crofters Commission, new town development corporations, Red Deer Commission, Scottish Arts Council, Scottish Homes, Scottish Legal Aid board, Scottish Medical Practices committee, Scottish Natural Heritage, Scottish Sports Council, Scottish tourist board:

(b) None, as the Audit Commission does not operate in Scotland. Its Scottish equivalent is the Accounts Commission for Scotland, which scrutinises the accounts of the seven Scottish river purification boards;

(c) this information is listed in the Cabinet Office publication "Public Bodies 1994"; a copy of which is available in the Library of the House;

(d) none, although following publication last year of the "Code of Best Practice for Board Members of Public Bodies", the Scottish version of which was published in September 1994 and a copy of which is in the Library of the House, all executive NDPBs have been asked to comply with all reasonable requests for information from Parliament, users of services and individual citizens.

(e) Performance indicators are part of the management statement or corporate plan for each NDPB;

(f) the citizens charter applies to all public services, including NDPBs. NDPBs serving the public, including those sponsored by my Department, are therefore expected to meet the charter standards.

Dr Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which of the executive non-departmental public bodies sponsored by his Department have (a) a statutory requirement to admit members of the public to all board or committee meetings and (b) a statutory requirement to hold open meetings for the public. [20881]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 26 April 1995]: The information requested is as follows: (a) none; (b) none.

Falconry

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many permits have been issued to falconers to take protected species of birds as quarry in each year since 1988; what were the species in respect of which such permits were issued; and what were the number of each species taken. [21247]

Sir Hector Monro: Details of licences issued to take protected species in the course of falconry in Scotland for the period 1988–1993 are listed in the table. Figures are not yet available for 1994.

| Species | Number of Licences[1] | Birds killed | Year |

| Anthus pratensis | | 0 | |
| Turdus merula | | 2 | |
| Turdus philomelos | | 0 | |

[1] Licences covered all or some of the named species.

Birds of Prey

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many licences have been issued in each year since 1988 to possess birds of prey; and what were the numbers of birds of each species held under such licences. [21251]

Sir Hector Monro: None.

Education Research

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money has been devoted to funding education research projects by his Department in each of the last five years; and what percentage of education spending this represents. [21558]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The expenditure on educational research projects by the Scottish Office education department for the last five years is as set out in the table together with the percentage of overall education expenditure. The education expenditure represents direct funding by central Government which from 1 April 1993 included the funding of all higher education in Scotland, and from the same date the funding of further education colleges. The arts and local authority funding are not included.

|---|---|---|---|
| 1990–91 | 1,301 | 364,067 | 0.36 |

| 1992–93 | 1,406 | 570,517 | 0.25 |
| 1993–94 | 1,417 | 1,113.835 | 0.13 |
| 1994–95 | 1,334 | 1,236,635 | 0.11 |

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Post Office

Mr. Hain: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what account the Governments' review of the Post Office will take of the proposed efficiency audit. [21184]

Mr. Heseltine: The Post Office performance review will inform Government thinking on matters of operational effectiveness.

Road Fuels

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate for the price elasticity of demand for road fuels in the United Kingdom in (a) 1996, (b) 2000 and (c) 2005; and if he will make a statement. [20925]

Mr. Page: Annex H of Energy Paper No. 65 contains estimates of the price elasticities in the DTI energy model. The long run price elasticity of demand used in the road transport sector is –0.41.

British Coal Enterprise

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) how many individuals were head hunted by British Coal Enterprise for jobs as retraining consultants; how many retraining consultants employed in 1993 had been thus recruited; what proportion of the total number of retraining consultants employed this represents; and if he will make a statement; [20926]

(2) in what capacity Mr. Richard Lewis was employed by British Coal Enterprise during 1993; and if he will make a statement; [20927]

(3) what criteria were used when assessing the suitability of candidates for jobs as retraining consultants with British Coal Enterprise in 1993; and if he will make a statement. [20928]

Mr. Page: These are operational matters for British Coal Enterprise.

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. Milburn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 7 December, Official Report, columns 257-59, if he will list those projects in privatised companies which have received European regional development funding since privatisation indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [20579]

Mr. Page: The available information for England, Scotland and Wales up to 21 April 1995 has been placed in the Library of the House. Figures for Northern Ireland were included in the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Northern Ireland on 14 December 1994, Official Report, columns 692-94. All the grants concerned have been approved, for the general economic benefit of the areas concerned, in conformity with criteria on grants to privatised utilities drawn up by the European Commission.

Civil Servants

Mr. Ainger: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in his Department and the agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21774]

Mr. Heseltine: The number of administrative assistants and administrative officers appointed in the Department and its agencies from September 1993 to April 1995 is shown in the tables.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much was spent on official hospitality by his Department in 1994–95. [21200]

Mr. Heseltine: The provisional unaudited outturn figures for 1994–95 are as follows:

| Area of department | £ |
|---|---|
| 1. Centre DTI (excluding net controlled agencies and trading funds) | 508,519 |
| 2. Net controlled agencies and trading funds | |

| Total | 703,249 |

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunities matters. [21532]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Cabinet Office regularly publishes information on progress on equal opportunities matters in the civil service, including in the DTI. I refer the hon. Member to the following reports, copies of which are available in the Library of the House:

"Equal Opportunities in the Civil Service for people of Ethnic Minority Origin: Third Progress Report 1992–93"

"Equal Opportunities for Women in the Civil Service: 10 Year Progress Report 1984–1994"

"Civil Service Data Summary 1994: Women, Race, Disability".

In 1993 the DTI published a summary of progress on equal opportunities for female staff in the Department since 1984. I am placing a copy of this report in the Library of the House.

Ms Eagle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress he hopes to achieve in his Department over the next three months to push forward the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the 4th UN conference on women; and if he will incorporate a section on equal opportunities in his Department's annual report. [21534]

Mr. Page: The Government is committed to the principles set out in the Regional Platform for Action agreed at the preparatory conference in Vienna for the Fourth UN world conference on women. We have taken these forward through a wide range of programmes and initiatives and will continue to do so. We have also committed ourselves to publishing actions and progress on equal opportunities in annual reports from 1995–96 onwards.

Ms Eagle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department. [21533]

Mr. Page: This Department's policy, in line with guidance issued in 1992 by the ministerial group on women's issues, is that policy proposals should ensure that unlawful or unjustifiable sex or race discrimination does not occur and that similar principles apply to people with disabilities, older people or ex-offenders. This scrutiny is part of a continuous and routine process, as part of policy advice to Ministers.

Ms Eagle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade which Minister in his Department has responsibility for equal opportunities issues. [21531]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I am responsible for personnel issues within DTI including equal opportunities. My hon. Friend, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Energy sits on the ministerial sub-committee on women's issues.

Nuclear Levy

Mr. McFall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals he has for compensating Scottish consumers following the Government's intentions to end the nuclear levy in England and Wales by 1996. [22028]

Mr. Eggar: The future of the market support arrangements in respect of nuclear power in the United Kingdom are under active consideration in the nuclear review. An announcement about the review's conclusions will be made shortly.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market–testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21377]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The estimated costs are £3 million for employing consultants in connection with market testing and contracting out, for programmes completed in my Department during the period 1 April 1992 to 31 March 1995.

Exports

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the effect of the takeover of British manufacturers by their foreign competitors on the number of sales outlets for British goods overseas; and if he will make a statement about the number of those outlets that are now selling foreign in preference to British goods. [21416]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: None. United Kingdom export performance does not appear to be hampered by foreign takeovers, nor by a shortage of sales outlets: the value of UK exports grew by 46 per cent. between 1989 and 1994, to reach record levels.

Trading Practices

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what study he has made of the means by which other nations give preference to their own products and discriminate against those of the United Kingdom; and what lessons he considers can be learnt from other nations' trading practices. [21424]

Mr. Needham: Following the successful conclusion of the GATT round, my Department has carried out consultations with the trade associations representing our leading export sectors to establish which remaining barriers to trade most frustrated their members' efforts. This was the first step in a continuing dialogue with industry. The results of the consultations, and the Government's strategy to deal with priority barriers will be announced shortly.

Trade Missions

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the occasions on which he and his Ministerial colleagues have been on overseas trade missions in (a) 1992–93, (b) 1993–94 and (c) 1994–95; how many such visits are programmed for 1995–96; and if he will give the out-turn, estimated or anticipated cost for each year. [19217]

Mr. Heseltine: Details of overseas trade missions undertaken by me and my Department of Trade and Industry ministerial colleagues for the years requested, are as follows. The programme for 1995–96 is still subject to review and final details are not yet available.

| Year | Dates |

Local Enterprise Initiatives

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he will next meet the Institute of Directors to discuss new ways of encouraging its members to participate more closely with local enterprise initiatives. [21823]

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, regularly meets representatives of the Institute of Directors to discuss a wide range of competitiveness issues.

Car Boot Sales

Mr. Spellar: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimates his Department has made of loss of revenue arising from car boot sales. [19960]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Traders at car boot sales are liable for income tax and VAT in the same way as everybody else. The tax authorities have powers to investigate tax evasion, and use them, but it is not possible to produce a reliable estimate of any revenue lost.

Fiches d'impact

Mr. Steen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many fiches d'impact have been issued in each year since 1986 by Directorate-General 23 of the European Commission; and what this figure is as a percentage of the total number of directives issued each year. [18680]

Mr. Jonathan Evans [holding answer 18 April 1995]: Commission archives indicate that between 1986 and 1990, all proposed legislation had a fiche d'impact. In 1991 a new system came into operation whereby fiches were targeted at those proposals for legislation which were likely to have substantial effect on enterprises, particularly small and medium sized firms.

The Commission does not hold central records which would enable the other statistics requested to be compiled without incurring disproportionate cost.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the executive non-departmental public bodies sponsored by his Department which are subject to (a) investigation by the Parliamentary Commissioner, (b) scrutiny by the Audit Commission, (c) scrutiny by the National Audit Office, (d) statutory provisions for open government, (e) performance indicators and (f) provisions under the citizens charter. [20665]

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 25 April 1995]: The information requested is as follows:

(a) Design Council
(b) None
(c) Design Council
Monopolies and Mergers Commission
Simpler Trade Procedures Board
United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority
National Consumer Council
Post Office Users' National Council
Post Office Users' Council for Northern Ireland
Post Office Users' Council for Wales
Post Office Users' Council for Scotland
Northern Ireland Advisory Committee on Telecommunications
Scottish Advisory Committee on Telecommunications
Welsh Advisory Committee on Telecommunications
Gas Consumer's Council
(d) None
(e) Design Council
Simpler Trade Procedures Board
United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority
National Consumer Council
(f) Design Council
Simpler Trade Procedures Board
United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority
Post Office Users' National Council
Post Office Users' Council for Northern Ireland
Post Office Users' Council for Wales
Post Office Users' Council for Scotland
Gas Consumers' Council

Dr. Wright: To ask the President of the Board of Trade which of the executive non-departmental public bodies sponsored by his Department have (a) a statutory requirement to admit members of the public to all board or committee meetings and (b) a statutory requirement to hold open meetings for the public. [20879]

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 26 April 1995]: None.

Imports

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what share of the market for manufactures he expects imports to take (a) in the current year and (b) next year. [21417]

Mr. Nelson: I have been asked to reply.

Forecasts for total imports of goods and services can be found in the November "Financial Statement and Budget Report", a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library. Neither the Treasury nor the Department of Trade and Industry publishes forecasts for manufactured imports.

ENVIRONMENT

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 5 December, Official Report, column 11, if he will list those projects in privatised companies which have received European regional development funding since privatisation indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [20563]

Sir Paul Beresford: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Energy earlier today.

Manual Workers

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the average increase in real terms in the wages of local authority manual workers since 1979. [21060]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Information from the "New Earnings Survey", adjusted by the retail prices index, indicates that the average increase in real terms from April 1979 to April 1994, the latest date for which information is available, in the wages of local authority manual workers in England and Wales was 24.5 per cent.

Housing Associations

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the percentage grant available to English housing associations for new and existing properties in each year since 1979. [21082]

Mr. Robert B. Jones [holding answer 26 April 1995]: Prior to 1 April 1989, there were no published grant rates and the available grant was determined on a scheme-by-scheme basis. Since 1 April 1989, the average grant rates available to English housing associations for the development and rehabilitation of property have been:

1989–90: 75 per cent.
1990–91: 80 per cent.
1991–92: 77 per cent.
1992–93: 72 per cent.
1993–94: 67 per cent.
1994–95: 62 per cent.
1995–96: 58 per cent.

Approved Development Programme

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a breakdown of the ADP programme as between social housing and owner occupation. [21308]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The Housing Corporation approved development programme is split into housing for rent programmes—mixed and public funded, short-life housing and miscellaneous works including major repair—and home ownership incentives and housing for sale programmes—tenants incentive scheme do-it-yourself shared ownership and construction and rehabilitation of property for shared ownership. TIS and DIYSO encourage home ownership and release existing lettings for others in housing need.

The ADP for 1995–96 is as follows:

| | Expenditure (£ million) | Forecast lettings produced |
|---|---|---|
| Housing for rent | | |
| Mixed and public funded | 784.7 | 32,700 |
| Short life housing | 23.0 | 3,300 |
| Miscellaneous works | 65.0 | — |
| Total rent | 872.7 | 36,000 |
| Incentives and housing for sale | | |
| Tenants Incentive Scheme | 85.8 | 7,200 |
| DIYSO | 121.9 | 4,700 |
| Shared ownership | 74.7 | 4,600 |
| Total incentive sale | 282.4 | 16,500 |
| Other expenditure | 26.0 | — |
| Total gross expenditure | 1,181.1 | — |

Local Authority Staff

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many staff are employed by each local authority in the north-east region of England, including police forces, by broad service area. [21306]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Numbers employed in June 1994 by each local authority in England, including police forces, were published in the joint staffing watch press release. A copy of the press release and the available service area information for metropolitan districts and non-metropolitan districts in the north-east have been placed in the Library of the House.

Bridlepath, Ribble Valley

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what representations he has received about his decision to delete from the definitive maps the path and bridleway from Sawley lodge towards Gisburn in Ribble valley; [21232]

(2) what was the nature of the representations made to his Department by Mrs. Patricia Lord concerning the footpath and bridleway running through her land at Sawley lodge, Ribble valley; [21233]

(3) why he has directed Lancashire county council to delete from the definitive map the path and bridleway from Sawley lodge towards Gisburn in Ribble valley. [21231]

Mr. Atkins: The nature of representations made by Mrs. Lord and the reasons for the Secretary of State's decision were set out in the letter issued by the Government office for the north west on 21 December. I am sending the hon. Member for Pendle a copy of that letter and placing a copy in the House Library.

The Secretary of State has received one representation about his decision from Lancaster Association of Parish and Town Councils.

Avian Pest Species

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the control of avian pest species. [21181]

Sir Paul Beresford: Annual general licences issued by my Department and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food permit the year-round control by authorised persons of 13 species of pest birds. Populations of the 13 species concerned are monitored to assess their conservation status. There is no evidence to suggest that current levels of pest control are threatening the status of any of these species.

Cemfuel

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution has granted full authorisation to Castle Cement to allow the burning of cemfuel at Ribblesdale. [21234]

Mr. Atkins: I refer the hon. Member to my written reply of 24 February, Official Report, column 350. HMIP is now considering carefully all comments received as a result of the public consultation exercise, together with the results from the monitoring and the environmental impact assessment undertaken by Castle Cement. A decision on whether to allow the burning of cemfuel as currently authorised will be made by HMIP following this review.

Construction Industry

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish his Department's consultation paper on possible legislation for construction industry contracts in accordance with the recommendations of the Latham report; and if he will make a statement. [21196]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: I refer to the answer given to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Cunningham) on 21 April, Official Report, column 286.

River Tees

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions have taken place between the National Rivers Authority and the Teesside development corporation about the level of the River Tees above the Tees barrage; and what conclusions have been reached. [21305]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Teesside development corporation has discussed with the National Rivers Authority whether or not the Tees Barrage has any material impact on the flood levels of the River Tees, during heavy winter flows in January and February 1995.

The TDC and NRA are now awaiting the results of studies by consultants relating to these issues.

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunities matters. [21597]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Department is committed to equality of opportunity for all employees. There are departmental action plans to achieve equality of opportunities for ethnic minorities and women based on the programmes for action in the civil service. Consultation within the Department is currently taking place on a draft departmental action plan in response to the programme for action for disabled people. Progress is reported to staff by means of an annual report which is published by the equal opportunities unit.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which Minister in his Department has responsibility for equal opportunities issues. [21496]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Secretary of State has overall responsibility for all issues within the Department although the Viscount Ullswater has particular responsibility for women's issues.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department. [21498]

Sir Paul Beresford: This Department's policy, in line with guidance issued in 1992 by the ministerial group on womens' issues, is that policy proposals should ensure that unlawful or unjustifiable sex or race discrimination does not occur and that similar principles apply to people with disabilities, older people or ex-offenders. This scrutiny is part of a continuous and routine process, as part of policy advice to Ministers.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress he hopes to make in the next three months to push forwards the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the 4th UN conference on women; and if he will incorporate a section on equal opportunities in his Department's annual report. [21499]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Government are committed to the principles set out in the regional platform for action agreed at the preparatory conference in Vienna for the 4th UN world conference on women. We have taken these forward through a wide range of programmes and initiatives and will continue to do so.

The following paragraph on equal opportunities was published in the Department's annual report for 1995:

> "The Department of the Environment is an equal opportunities employer. This means that all staff (whether full—or part-time), applicants for posts, and members of the public are treated on the same fair basis irrespective of sex, sexual orientation or marital status, race, colour, nationality, ethnic or national origin, or disability."

European Social Fund

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list those projects in privatised companies which have received European social fund support since privatisation indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received; [21289]

(2) if he will list those public projects which received European social fund support and were subsequently privatised over the last 10 years, indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [21288]

Sir Paul Beresford: None of the privatised companies for which my Department has responsibility has applied directly and received European social fund support since 1990. Information for the years before 1990 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21384]

Sir Paul Beresford: For the Department and agencies for which I am responsible any conflict of interest involving a civil servant would have been dealt with in accordance with established guidance. Records on the number of cases are not held centrally. In the last five years, five special advisors have declared 11 possible conflicts of interest.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21367]

Sir Paul Beresford: From the inception of the market testing programme in April 1992 to 31 March 1995, departmental and agency expenditure on consultancies to support the "Competing and Quality" initiative has been almost £1.6 million. As reported in the "Market Testing Bulletin Special Report," dated January 1995, total results to the end of September 1994 have achieved annual savings of £14.6 million. In addition to the cash savings, there have been a number of improvements in the quality of services delivered.

Barn Owls

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide estimates to show the change in the numbers of barn owls in England and Wales over the last 20 years. [21115]

Sir Paul Beresford: My Department's statutory scientific advisers, the Joint Nature Conservation Committee, advise that the estimated population of barn owls in Great Britain and Ireland, when surveyed during 1968–72, was between 4,600 and 9,000 pairs. A survey carried out during 1982–85 estimated the population to be between 5,000 and 5,300 pairs. It is impossible to compare directly the results of different surveys, as different survey techniques may have been used.

Falconry

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many permits have been issued to falconers to take protected species of birds as quarry in each year since 1988; what were the species in respect of which such permits were issued; and what were the numbers of each species taken. [21245]

Sir Paul Beresford: Details of licences issued to take protected species in the course of falconry in England for the period 1988–1993 are as listed. Figures are not yet available for 1994.

| Species | Number of licences[1] | Birds killed | Year |
|---|---|---|---|
| Aluda arvensis | 46 | 1773 (Total number of all species killed) | 1988 |
| Turdus merula | | | |
| Turdus philomelos | | | |
| Turdus pilaris | | | |
| Turdus iliacus | | | |
| Turdus viscivorous | | | |
| Anthus pratensis | | | |
| Larus ridibundas | | | |
| Aluda arvensis | 60 | No figures on the numbers of birds killed available | 1989 |
| Turdus merula | | | |
| Turdus philomelos | | | |
| Turdus pilaris | | | |
| Anthus pratensis | | | |
| Turdus iliacus | | | |
| Larus ridibundas | | | |
| Lagopus lagopus | | | |
| Perdix perdix | | | |
| Gallinula chlorpus | | | |
| Anas crecca | | | |
| Anas platyrhynchos | | | |
| Aluda arvensis | 61 | 236 | 1990 |
| Turdus merula | | 132 | |
| Turdus philomelos | | 20 | |
| Anthus pratensis | | 27 | |
| Larus ridibundas | | 2 | |
| Aluda arvensis | 59 | 259 | 1991 |

| Aluda arvensis | 59 | 137 | 1992 |
| Turdus merula | | 158 | |
| Turdus philomelos | | 25 | |
| Anthus pratensis | | 42 | |
| Larus ridibundas | | 0 | |
| Aluda arvensis | 72 | 171 | 1993 |
| Turdus merula | | 51 | |
| Turdus philomelos | | 9 | |
| Anthus pratensis | | 18 | |
| Larus ridibundas | | 10 | |

[1] Licences covered all or some of the named species.

Birds of Prey

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many licences have been issued in each year since 1988 to possess birds of prey, and what were the numbers of birds in each species held under such licences. [21249]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 permits a series of licences to be issued to take wild birds for a variety of purposes. Since 1988 my Department has not issued any licenses to take birds of prey from the wild.

Wild Birds

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is taking to ensure the adequate protection of migrating birds of protected species. [21116]

Sir Paul Beresford: Wild birds in the United Kingdom are protected by the 1981 Wildlife and Countryside Act which enacts our obligations under the EC directive on the conservation of wild birds. The Act does not permit migratory species to be hunted during their breeding or migration seasons.

The birds directive requires member states to take special conservation measures for certain vulnerable species, including the establishment of a network of special protection areas. To date 104 SPAs have been designated and more are planned.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has made to his counterpart Ministers in the EEC concerning the shooting and trapping of protected species during migration and if he will seek to persuade them to enforce in full the provisions of the appropriate European legislation. [21117]

Sir Paul Beresford: The European Commission has proposed an amendment to the birds directive to give guidance on the hunting of migratory birds. The proposal has been considered by the Council of Ministers and has been referred to the European Parliament for an opinion. When that opinion is received, the Council of Ministers will consider its implications for the hunting of migratory birds.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the number of sites which meet the criteria for designation and protection under the European Community directive on the conservation of wild birds, the number of sites so designated, the name of the site next to be designated and the date he expects to designate it; [21118]

(2) when he last designated an area under the Ramsar convention on the conservation of wetlands of international importance, which area is next to be designated and when he expects to designate it; [21119]

(3) if he will list those special protection areas, under the EC birds directive, as well as those Ramsar sites and areas with dual designation for the protection of birds. [21120/95]

Sir Paul Beresford: The list of those areas identified on the basis of scientific evidence as potentially qualifying for classification as special protection areas is currently under review. The list will be published in due course and a copy will be placed in the Library. The next English site to be designated is expected to be placed in the Blackwater estuary in Essex. It is a SPA and Ramsar site. An announcement will be made shortly.

We announced the listing of two Ramsar sites at the end of March 1995: River Crouch marshes, Essex, was listed on 24 March and Coll, Strathclyde, was listed on 31 March.

The United Kingdom has designated 104 special protection areas and listed 88 Ramsar sites. The following 62 sites have dual SPA/Ramsar designation:

UK sites classified as special protection areas under EC birds directive and wetlands of International importance under the Ramsar Convention

| Name | County/region | Date designated | Area (ha) |

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much was spent on official hospitality by his Department in 1994–95. [21212]

Sir Paul Beresford: Expenditure on official hospitality by my Department, including Property Holdings and the Department's agencies, was approximately £121,000 in 1994–95.

Civil Service Appointments

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in his Department and the agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21769]

Sir Paul Beresford: The following information covers permanent administrative staff in my Department, excluding Ordnance Survey and PSA Services.

Q4–1993: 6
Q1–1994: 1
Q2–1994: 5
Q3–1994: 2
Q4–1994: 8
Q1–1995: 4

EMPLOYMENT

Female Work Force

Mrs. Peacock: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of women in the United Kingdom have jobs; and what are the figures for other major European countries. [16521]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 27 March 1995]: The most recent comparable estimates between the United Kingdom and other major European countries are for 1992 and are given in the following table.

The most recent information for the United Kingdom is for spring 1994, when the rate was 65 per cent.

Redundancies

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list those companies reporting redundancies where the number of redundancies was fewer than 20; and what was the total number of redundancies reported by those firms where the number of redundancies was fewer than 20, in each case breaking the data down by industrial sector, gender and region. [21047]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 26 April 1995]: Information supplied by individual employers under the statutory redundancy notification arrangements is given in confidence. No analysis is kept by gender. The remaining information requested is in the following table, which relates to 1994.

Redundancies of <20 employees notified under s193 trade union and labour relations (consolidation) act 1992: 1994

Note:
Under s193 of the TULR(C) Act 1992, an employer is required to notify the Secretary of State for Employment of 10 or more proposed redundancies occurring at one establishment within a period of 30 days or less.

Stockport Training and Enterprise Council

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many of the directors of Stockport TEC have received payments from TEC funds for services provided to the TEC; what these were and when; and if such payments will continue in 1995–96. [21176]

Mr. Paice: I understand from Stockport and High Peak training and enterprise council that none of the TEC's directors has ever received payment from TEC funds for services provided to the TEC. TEC directors receive no payment from the TEC for their services.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennet: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment on how many occasions the hotel owned by a Stockport TEC director has been used by the Stockport TEC for training or other purposes, for which that director's hotel has received payment; how much was paid; and when and how many of these hotel bookings were the subject of competitive tenders. [21175]

Mr. Paice: I understand from Stockport and High Peak training and enterprise council that one of their directors owns a hotel which has been used by the TEC. The occasions on which the hotel has been used by the TEC since its inception in 1991 are shown in the following table:

| Year | Occasions | £ |
|---|---|---|
| 1991 | Three | 3,537.14 |
| 1992 | Three | 2,098.47 |
| 1993 | Four | 1,764.27 |
| 1994 | One | 63.83 |
| 1995 | One | 126.74 |

The TEC uses a wide range of venues throughout its area and does not normally use competitive tendering for these bookings. However, in cases of significant expenditure the TEC will seek out comparative prices. TECs are required to comply with published guidelines on the business interest of directors.

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how he intends to consult on the Vienna declaration prior to the UN conference on women in Beijing; to which interested groups the Vienna declaration has been circulated for comment; and what steps he has taken to progress the implementation of the Vienna declaration signed in October 1994. [21309]

Miss Widdecombe: Throughout the preparatory phase for the fourth world conference on women, the Government have been in continuous dialogue with women's non-governmental organisations and other interested groups. More than 500 copies of the regional platform for action agreed at the preparatory conference in Vienna have been circulated to NGOs, local authorities, academic institutions, trade unions, businesses and all members and associate members of the Women's National Commission. The Government are committed to the principles set out in the regional platform for action and are taking these forward through a wide range of programmes and initiatives.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what progress he hopes to achieve in his Department over the next three months to push forward the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna Conference in preparation for the fourth UN conference on women; and if he will agree to incorporate a section on equal opportunities in his Department's annual report. [21463]

Miss Widdecombe: The Government are committed to the principles set out in the regional platform for action agreed at the preparatory conference in Vienna for the fourth UN conference on women. We have taken these forward through a wide range of programmes and initiatives and will continue to do so.

In line with the Government White Paper, "Taking Forward Continuity and Change", the Department will publish actions and progress on equal opportunities in its annual report from 1995–96.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunities matters. [21461]

Miss Widdecombe: Good progress is being made towards the numerical benchmarks for the employment of women, ethnic minorities and disabled people in the Employment Department Group for the year 2000, and towards implementing the agreed recommendations of a report which investigated the causes of the under-representation of women at senior levels in the group. A number of initiatives to help staff combine work and domestic responsibilities have been introduced, including part-time and alternative working arrangements; homeworking; career breaks and special leave arrangements. There is support for child care through six workplace nurseries and 35 holiday play schemes. A programme has recently been introduced for staff from ethnic minorities to enable them to compete more effectively for jobs in areas where they are under-represented. An advisory group on women has been set up to advise on how policies and practices in the ED group impact on women.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department. [21460]

Miss Widdecombe: This Department's policy, in line with guidance issued in 1992 by the ministerial group on women's issues, is that policy proposals should ensure that unlawful or unjustifiable sex or race discrimination does not occur and that similar principles apply to people with disabilities, older people or ex-offenders. This scrutiny is part of a continuous and routine process, as part of policy advice to Ministers.

Training Expenditure

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the total amount of spending on training for the last available year, indicating the proportion of spending accounted for by finance from the European Union for the United Kingdom as a whole and for each standard region. [20375]

Mr. Paice: It is estimated that British employers currently spend over £20,000 million a year on training and developing their employees. The total amount of European social fund spent on training in Great Britain in the 1993 calendar year was £580 million. Responsibility for training matters in Northern Ireland lies with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Apprenticeships

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list in constant prices the average annual earnings of apprentices, and average length of apprenticeships, for the United Kingdom and for each standard employment region for (a) 1975, (b) 1979, (c) 1985, (d) 1990 and (e) the last three available years. [20378]

Mr. Paice: The information is not available.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21366]

Miss Widdecombe: The cost of employing consultants to give support to the Employment Department Group's "Competing for Quality" programme for the period 1 April 1992 to 31 March 1995 was around £3.1 million.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21383]

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested in the first part of the question is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Instructions on declaring conflicts of interest are contained in the Department's group personnel handbook. All members of staff must comply with these instructions and any subsequent instructions about the retention, disposal or management of such interests.

Civil Servants

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in his Department and the agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21770]

Training, Teesside

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment which travel-to-work areas are served by (a) the East Cleveland training and employment group and (b) the Teesside TEC. [21432]

Mr. Paice: Teesside training and enterprise council serves three travel-to-work areas: Middlesbrough, Stockton and Hartlepool. East Cleveland training and employment group operates in the Middlesbrough travel-to-work area.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the expenditure of the Teesside training and enterprise council in each of the last 10 years. [21434]

Mr. Paice: Teesside training and enterprise council was established in 1990. The TEC's expenditure is shown in the following table:

| Year | Expenditure (£ millions) |
|---|---|
| 1989–90 | 0.133 (Development funding) |
| 1990–91 | 27.5 |

| 1993–94 | 30.9 |
| 1994–95[1] | |

[1] Audited accounts not available yet.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his estimate of the number of people for whose training the Teesside TEC has been responsible in each of the last 10 years (a) in each skill area and (b) in total. [21435]

Mr. Paice: The following table provides an occupational breakdown of the numbers of people trained by Teesside training and enterprise council since it was established in 1990.

Low Pay

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement about the trend in real take-home pay among those men in the lowest decile of earnings since 1979. [21571]

Sir George Young: I have been asked to reply.

Real take-home pay for a single man at the lowest decile of male earnings has risen by nearly a quarter since 1978–79. It fell slightly between 1973–74 and 1978–79.

TREASURY

Income Tax

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will provide, on the same basis as in table, 2.7, "Inland Revenue Statistics 1994", estimates for income tax liabilities for 1995–96 in an income range form £3,525 to £100,000, supplying data at intervals of not more than £10,000. [21005]

Sir George Young [holding answer 25 April 1995]: Available estimates based on a projection of the 1992–93 survey of personal incomes are given in the following table.

The main reason for higher numbers of taxpayers is increasing prosperity—real incomes have increased by 40 per cent. since 1979—and the number of people in employment increased by 174,000 during 1994.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update table 2.9, "Inland Revenue Statistics 1994", providing estimates for 1995–96. [21006]

Sir George Young [holding answer 25 April 1995]: Provisional estimates projected from the 1992–93 survey of personal incomes are given in the table:

Income tax liabilities of lower, basic and higher rate taxpayers by range of total income by source, 1995–96[1]

| Range of total income (lower limit) | Main source Schedule E pay or occupational pension | | Main source Schedule D case I or II profits | | Other main sources | |

[1] Provisional.
[2] Numbers = thousands.
[3] Amounts = £ million.

The main reason for higher numbers of taxpayers is increasing prosperity—real incomes have increased by 40 per cent. since 1979—and the number of people in employment increased by 174,000 during 1994.

Mr. Stephen Crouch

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the relationship between his Department and Mr. Stephen Crouch. [21689]

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 28 April 1995]: There is no such relationship.

Mr. Edmund Sykes

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the relationship between his Department and Mr. Edmund Sykes. [21690]

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 28 April 1995]: There is no such relationship.

Leeds-Halifax Building Society

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the effect on (a) consumer expenditure and (b) the growth of gross domestic product, of the planned share distribution by the planned Leeds-Halifax building society merger and conversion, on the basis of current plans and current market capitalisation. [21431]

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 28 April 1995]: The societies have not published details of the share distribution which will form part of their proposed conversion. So it has not been possible to make an estimate of any wider economic effects of the conversion. Any estimate would, in any case, be subject to a great deal of uncertainty, because of the assumptions which would have to be made about the behaviour of those investors receiving a share distribution.

Inward Investment

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the quantitative impact on inward investment into the United Kingdom of an increase of (a) 1p, (b) 2p and (c) 5p on corporation tax; and if he will make a statement. [20919]

Sir George Young: Taxation is one of a number of factors which businesses take into account when deciding the location for investment. The United Kingdom has the lowest main rate of corporation tax among the major industrial countries. The UK's low corporation tax rates have contributed, along with the openness of the UK economy, low labour costs, a well educated and flexible workforce and good communications, to the UK becoming the second largest recipient of foreign direct investment worldwide.

Public Sector Pay

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what guidelines govern public sector salary increases in areas where the state enjoys monopoly power; and if he will make a statement. [20931]

Mr. Aitken: The Government expect pay in the public sector to be considered in accordance with the approach that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor announced on 14 September 1994. The running costs of central Government Departments and provision for the rest of the public sector have been set on the basis that pay and price increases should be offset, or more than offset, by efficiencies and other economies. Generally, pay in all parts of the public sector should be set at levels necessary to recruit, retain and motivate staff within the available cash levels.

Chief Secretary

Mr. Byers: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what contribution has been made or is planned to be made to the legal costs incurred by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury in his action for libel against the Guardian newspaper. [21842]

Mr. Aitken: None.

Mr. Byers: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many press notices or statements have been made by his Department concerning the private business activities and associated allegations relating to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury since his appointment; and what is the estimated cost involved. [21843]

Mr. Aitken: None. Treasury officials have passed on a number of inquiries from the press to me and on a number of occasions have passed my replies back. Very little of their time has been involved.

Regulators

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the annual total cost of each of the regulators of the privatised utilities. [21838]

Sir George Young: The provision for 1994–95 and 1995–96 for the offices of the privatised utilities are as follows:

| | £ thousands | |
|---|---|---|
| | 1994–95 | 1995–96 |
| Office of Telecommunications | 9,358 | 9,464 |
| Office of Gas Supply | 4,524 | 5,352 |
| Office of Electricity Regulation | 10,871 | 10,567 |
| Office of Water Services | 9,544 | 8,146 |

Supply Estimates 1995–96, HM Treasury, March 1995.

The cost of funding the offices of the regulators is fully recovered by licence fees paid by the regulated companies. Income from fees is surrendered to the consolidated fund. There is no net cost to the taxpayer.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people he estimates will pay tax on incapacity benefit in each of the next three financial years; and what will be the average increase in tax payable as a result of the extension of tax to invalidity in each of these years and the total yield to the Treasury. [17348]

Sir George Young: Estimates for new claimants of incapacity benefit and the total tax yield are given in the table. No-one already receiving invalidity benefit will pay tax on their incapacity benefit so long as they remain incapable of work.

New claimants of incapacity benefit

| | 1995–96 | 1996–97 | 1997–98 |
|---|---|---|---|
| Number of new claimants | 300,000 | 550,000 | 700,000 |
| of which taxpayers | 200,000 | 300,000 | 350,000 |
| Yield (£ million) | 35 | 70 | 95 |

Estimates are based on survey data and are subject to some uncertainty. Claimant figures have been rounded to the nearest 50,000.

Washington Visit

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the extent of the briefing by Her Majesty's Government's Treasury officials and Ministers to the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) for his trip to Washington in 1986. [20608]

Sir George Young: No briefing was asked for and none was given. The views of the Government on unitary tax were well known, and were stated by the then Financial Secretary in the House on 9 July, Official Report, column 1031.

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what financial contribution Her Majesty's Treasury made towards the flight of the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) on Concorde to Washington in 1986. [20607]

Sir George Young: None.

Unitary Tax

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what advice the Government gave to the unitary tax campaign on what class of aircraft travel hon. Members travelling in support of the campaign should use. [20580]

Sir George Young: None.

Mr. David Shaw: To ask The Chancellor of the Exchequer if Her Majesty's Government financially supported the unitary tax campaign. [20609]

Sir George Young: No.

Unpaid Taxation

Mr. John Spellar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 18 April to the hon. Member for Gordon, (Mr. Bruce) Official Report, column 37, which part of the contract comprised the £3 million that was let to overseas contractors. [21034]

Sir George Young: Some £3.5 million worth of work, excluding VAT, was let to two overseas contractors as part of the construction cost of the new Inland Revenue centre in Nottingham. Grill and Grossman of Austria undertook cladding and glazing work on the centre's amenity building. Koit High Tex of Germany provided the fabric roof and support steel for this building.

The previous figure of £3 million did not include the cost of an outstanding claim by one of the firms, which has now been settled. The £3.5 million is the final outturn figure in respect of these two firms.

Self Assessment

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the implementation of tax self assessment by the Inland Revenue. [21135]

Sir George Young: Self assessment will apply to those people who receive tax returns. The main legislative changes required have now been enacted, partly in the Finance Act 1994 and partly in this year's Finance Act. Self assessment is a more modern and straightforward system that will give taxpayers greater clarity about their tax affairs.

The Inland Revenue has been consulting with interested parties on the introduction of self assessment since 1990, and that consultation is continuing. The intention is to explore ways to make the new system as practical and simple as possible to operate, and particularly to keep any compliance costs to a minimum.

Self assessment will first apply to the tax year 1996–97 and the first new tax returns will be issued in April 1997. The Inland Revenue recognises the importance of ensuring taxpayers, employers, tax practitioners and its own staff are well prepared for the new system. It has developed a comprehensive programme to achieve this. It includes:

- extensive training of its staff on the new system and procedures, and to help them provide guidance to taxpayers about self assessment;
- a comprehensive customer service programme to inform and assist taxpayers so that they can understand the new system and comply with their obligations;
- extensive and continuing testing of the new tax return form, and consulting on its design, to make it as simple as possible for taxpayers to complete;
- a full trial of self assessment, involving some 5,000 taxpayers, which recently started in Leicester; and a major public information campaign, using television and press advertising, directed mainly at the 9 million or so taxpayers who receive tax returns each year. This will start in June. An education programme for employers and accountants will also start in the summer.

I am also arranging for presentations to hon. Members.

Inflation

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what level of capacity working in manufacturing industry he and the Governor of the Bank of England assess as likely to be inflationary. [21312]

Mr. Nelson: The level of spare capacity in the economy is one of the many factors that are taken into account in setting monetary policy.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is Government policy to hold down the rate of inflation by raising interest rates and the exchange rate to prevent United Kingdom manufacturers from passing on increases in the cost of imported materials and components. [21590]

Mr. Nelson: The Government are committed to delivering permanently low inflation and has an explicit inflation objective. The aim is to keep underlying inflation as measured by the retail prices index excluding mortgage interest payments, in the range 1 to 4 per cent. and to bring it down into the lower half of this range by the end of the present Parliament. Interest rates have been, and will continue to be, set to deliver this objective.

Manufacturing

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to raise the profitability of United Kingdom manufacturing. [21586]

Mr. Nelson: The Government are committed to helping British manufacturing compete, at home and in the world markets. The Government's role is to set a framework in which business can flourish, from low inflation and sound finances to supply-side reform. Latest figures available show profitability for United Kingdom manufacturing companies, net rate of return, was up from 4.5 per cent. in 1992 to 5.8 per cent. in 1993.

Exports

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is the Government's objective to promote export-led growth by raising the rate of return for manufacturing above the rate of other non-North sea industrial and commercial companies. [21589]

Mr. Nelson: The key to maintaining good export performance is for the Government to deliver permanently low inflation and companies to keep costs under control, thereby ensuring that British industry remains competitive.

Living Standards

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on the standard of living of manual workers in manufacturing relative to the white collar workers in the private sector. [21588]

Mr. Aitken: The Government's policy is to create the economic conditions that will permit improvements in living standards for all groups in society.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunities matters. [21522]

Mr. Goodlad: The FCO, including ODA, is committed to equal opportunities. We have a number of programmes for action on women and race and are finalising programmes for the disabled. We are active members of Opportunity 2000.

A number of initiatives to increase the recruitment of women and to help them fulfil their potential are set out in the 1995 departmental report, copies of which have been placed in the House Libraries. The number of female ambassadors has risen to six since the report was issued.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress he hopes to achieve in his Department over the next three months to push forward the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the fourth UN conference on women; and if he will incorporate a section on equal opportunities in his Department's annual report. [21524]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are committed to the principles set out in the regional platform for action agreed at the preparatory conference in Vienna for the fourth world conference on women. We have taken these forward through a wide range of programmes and initiatives and will continue to do so.

Equal Opportunities issues are included in the 1995 departmental report.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department. [21523]

Mr. Goodlad: FCO policy, in line with guidance issued in 1992 by the ministerial group on women's issues, is that policy proposals should ensure that unlawful or unjustifiable sex or race discrimination does not occur and that similar principles apply to people with disabilities, older people or ex-offenders. This scrutiny is part of a continuous and routine process, as part of policy advice to Ministers.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which Minister in his Department has responsibility for equal opportunities issues. [21521]

Mr. Goodlad: My right hon. and noble Friend Baroness Chalker of Wallasey and I have responsibility for equal opportunities issues in the Overseas Development Administration and the diplomatic wing of the FCO respectively.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will name the leader and members of the United Kingdom delegation to the UN international conference on women in Beijing. [21602]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Aylesbury by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Employment, on 16 March 1995, Official Report, column 648.

Immigration

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the United Kingdom post in Delhi has been informed by appellate authorities in London if the appeal by Mrs. Kuldip Kaur against refusal to allow her to enter the United Kingdom to join her husband may proceed; if the post has prepared an explanatory statement concerning Mrs. Kaur's application (REF: IMM/ECR/0152/94); and if he will make a statement. [21731]

Mr. Baldry: The entry clearance officer has asked the immigration appellate authority for directions as to whether or not the appeal should proceed. As at 27 April these had not been received. As and when they are, an explanatory statement will be drawn up and sent to the IAA.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of Sate for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy in respect of the proposal of the President of the Russian Federation for the international community to agree by the year 2000 on a target date for the elimination of all nuclear weapons. [21349]

Mr. David Davis: We believe that progress in nuclear disarmament is best achieved through international negotiations. We do not think that it is useful or sensible to impose deadlines on these efforts.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions Her Majesty's Government has had with the Government of the Russian Federation concerning the proposal of the Government of the Russian Federation for the five nuclear weapon states to negotiate a treaty on nuclear stability and security; and if he will make a statement on the Government's understanding and assessment of this proposal. [21348]

Mr. David Davis: We have not had substantive discussions with the Government of the Russian Federation on this subject. So far as we know, the Russian ideas are still at an early stage of development.

Mr. Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government regarding the entitlement of non-governmental organisations to act as observers to the non-proliferation treaty review and extension conference (a) during its plenary sessions and (b) during the deliberations of its main committee. [21346]

Mr. David Davis: We welcome the decision taken by the non-proliferation treaty review and extension conference that non-governmental organisations should be given access to the plenary sessions of the conference and to debates in the main committees of the conference.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the United Kingdom ceased production of fissile materials for nuclear explosive purposes. [21354]

Mr. David Davis: During his address to the non-proliferation review and extension conference on 18 April, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs announced that the United Kingdom had ceased the production of fissile materials for explosive purposes. It is not our practice to disclose details of past production.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the response to Her Majesty's Government to the proposal made by the Government of South Africa at the non-proliferation treaty review and extension conference on 19 April for the adoption by states parties of a set of principles for nuclear non-proliferation and disarmament. [21342]

Mr. David Davis: We have told the South African Government that we wish to give careful consideration to their proposal for a set of principles for nuclear non-proliferation and disarmament.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on the adoption by states parties to the non-proliferation treaty, during the treaty's review and extension conference, of a time-bound framework for achieving all the objectives of the non-proliferation treaty. [21350]

Mr. David Davis: The many and diverse objectives of the treaty cannot be achieved simply by imposing a time limit on them.

Mr. Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals Her Majesty's Government have put forward at the non-proliferation treaty review and extension conference for strengthening the treaty's review procedure. [21338]

Mr. David Davis: Discussion of possible improvements to the treaty's review procedures are only now beginning in New York. We will participate fully in these. We believe that regular review conferences should continue to be held at five yearly intervals in accordance with the relevant article of the treaty.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government supports the creation of a grievance procedure for the non-proliferation treaty; if the Government have responded to such proposals at the non-proliferation treaty review and extension conference; and if he will make a statement. [21344]

Mr. David Davis: We believe that the treaty's review procedures provide ample opportunity for states parties to voice their concerns about the implementation of the treaty.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on an adoption of states parties to the non-proliferation treaty, during the treaty's review and extension conference, of a time-bound framework for achieving complete nuclear disarmament. [21352]

Mr. David Davis: We believe that progress in nuclear disarmament is best achieved through international negotiations. We do not think that it is useful or sensible to impose deadlines on these efforts.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals Her Majesty's Government have put forward at the non-proliferation treaty review and extension conference (a) for furthering the objectives of article VI of the treaty and (b) for monitoring and reviewing progress made under article VI of the treaty. [21340]

Mr. David Davis: We have, either before the non-proliferation treaty conference or at the conference itself:

—issued revised positive and negative security assurances to non-nuclear-weapon states parties to the treaty;

—announced that the UK has ceased production of fissile material for explosive purposes; we have also contributed to efforts to achieve early negotiations on a multilateral treaty ending the production of such material;

—announced further reductions in British nuclear weapon systems;

—indicated the circumstances in which the UK would be willing to enter multilateral negotiations on the global reduction of nuclear weapons.

We believe that five-yearly review conferences, held in accordance with the relevant article of the treaty, provide the appropriate means for monitoring progress under article VI of the treaty.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the response of her Majesty's Government to proposals made at the non-proliferation treaty review and extension conference for the decision on extending the treaty to be made by secret ballot. [21347]

Mr. David Davis: We have opposed such proposals. The NPT is a major international security treaty. Its extension is of great importance. We believe it is appropriate, therefore, that the position taken by individual states parties on that decision should be known to all. Accordingly, we believe the decision should be taken by an open rather than a secret ballot.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government support the creation of a standing consultative committee for the non-proliferation treaty; if the Government have responded to such proposals at the non-proliferation treaty review and extension conference; and if he will make a statement. [21343]

Mr. David Davis: We see no need for a standing consultative committee. We believe that the existing review procedures provide ample opportunity for states parties to voice their concerns about the implementation of the treaty.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on the adoption by states parties to the non-proliferation treaty, during the treaty's review and extension conference, of a programme of action for achieving all the objectives of the non-proliferation treaty. [21351]

Mr. David Davis: We believe that at the non-proliferation treaty review and extension conference the states parties to the treaty should reaffirm their commitment to the achievement of the objectives of the treaty.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals Her Majesty's Government have put forward at the non-proliferation treaty review and extension conference (a) for furthering the objectives of article IV of the treaty and (b) for monitoring and reviewing progress made under article IV of the treaty. [21339]

Mr. David Davis: The UK supports article IV of the non-proliferation treaty. The British delegation to the NPT review and extension conference is currently taking an active part in the review of article IV in the main committee dealing with peaceful uses.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the response of Her Majesty's Government to the proposal made by the Government of Germany at the non-proliferation treaty review and extension conference on 18 April for a ban on re-using nuclear weapons materials in the production of other nuclear weapons. [21345]

Mr. David Davis: We believe that re-cycling fissile material allows us to keep our stockpile of fissile material at the minimum level necessary to meet our operational requirements.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the response of Her Majesty's Government to proposals made by the Government of South Africa at the non-proliferation treaty review and extension conference on 19 April for strengthening the treaty's review procedure. [21341]

Mr. David Davis: We believe that the treaty's review procedures provide ample opportunity for states parties to voice their concerns about the implementation of the treaty. But we are prepared to give consideration to the South African proposals.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21368]

Mr. Goodlad: Between 1 January 1992 and 31 March 1995, the cost to the FCO, including the Overseas Development Administration, of consultancy related to market testing was £742,700.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much was spent on official hospitality by his Department in 1994–95. [21214]

Mr. Goodlad: A total of £7,680,934 was spent on official hospitality by the FCO and ODA in the financial year 1994–95. The Natural Resources Institute, an agency of the ODA, spent £3,386 and Wilton Park, an agency of the FCO, spent £455.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans his Department has for establishment of a regional peacekeeping training centre in Zimbabwe; and if he will make a statement. [21335]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We understand that the Government of Zimbabwe may make facilities at its staff college available to the UN as a regional centre for the development of peacekeeping skills. This proposal fits into the framework of the British initiative on conflict resolution and peacekeeping in Africa, launched at the UN General Assembly in September 1994, and was developed at a workshop co-hosted by ourselves and Zimbabwe in Harare in January this year. We would welcome such an offer being made to the UN and would be happy to consider a possible training contribution.

Civil Servants

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in his Department and the agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21768]

Mr. Goodlad: My Department and its agencies have made the following number of permanent and pensionable administrative assistant and administrative officer appointments during the period September 1993 to April 1995:

| | Department | Agencies |
|---|---|---|
| Administrative Assistant | | |
| September—December 1993 | 0 | 0 |
| January—March 1994 | 0 | 0 |
| April—June 1994 | 6 | 0 |
| July—September 1994 | 8 | 0 |
| October—December 1994 | 4 | 0 |
| January—April 1995 | 15 | 0 |
| Administrative Officer | | |
| September—December 1993 | 7 | 0 |
| January—March 1994 | 3 | 1 |
| April—June 1994 | 43 | 0 |
| July—September 1994 | 28 | 0 |
| October—December 1994 | 10 | 1 |
| January—April 1995 | 28 | 0 |

Anzac Day

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs by whom he was represented at the Anzac day commemoration at the Cenotaph, London, on 25 April. [21799]

Mr. Baldry: In keeping with tradition, wreaths were laid at the Cenotaph on 25 April to commemorate Anzac day on behalf of the British Government and people by representatives of the British armed forces.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Inward Investment

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many new companies from outside Northern Ireland have invested in Northern Ireland since 1989; and if he will list them. [19862]

Mr. Ancram: The Industrial Development Board is aware of 35 new manufacturing and tradeable services companies from outside Northern Ireland which, between 1 January 1989 and 31 December 1994, confirmed their intention to make first-time investments there. These are listed as follows:

Housing Policy

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the present stage of the housing policy review process; when the consultation White Paper will be published; and what will be the duration of the consultation process. [20648]

Mr. Moss: The housing policy review is in its final stages and a consultation paper is expected to be published by the end of June. Following publication, a consultation period of some three months is envisaged.

Child Prostitution

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases of child prostitution have been reported during the last year; and what were the comparable figures for each of the previous four years. [20707]

Sir John Wheeler: The figures requested are not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Prisons

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current prison population; and what were the figures for each of the previous four years. [20711]

Sir John Wheeler: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Northern Ireland Prison Service under its chief executive, Mr. Alan Shannon. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. D. Shannon to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 27 April 1995:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question about the current prison population in Northern Ireland and the figures for each of the previous four years.

Current Population

There are currently 1761 people in prison in Northern Ireland.

Population over previous four years.

1992: 1810

1993: 1934

1994: 1921 [subject to validation]

The figures for previous years are the Average Daily Population as published in the Northern Ireland Prison Service Annual Report.

I hope this information is helpful.

Illiteracy

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current reported rate of illiteracy and what were the figures for each of the previous four years. [20709]

Mr. Ancram: Information is not routinely collected on illiteracy rates in Northern Ireland. However, the position is considered to be similar to England and Wales where the Basic Skills Agency estimates that one in six adults is unable to read, write and/or speak in English at a level necessary to function and progress at work and in society in general. There is no evidence that this proportion has changed significantly in recent years.

Animal Diseases

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases of Teschen disease occurred in each year since 1975. [21096]

Mr. Ancram: None.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases of African Swine Fever there have been each year since 1985. [21065]

Mr. Ancram: None

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21374]

Sir John Wheeler: The information sought was published in table 4 of the market testing bulletin special report published on 9 January 1995. This covered the competing for quality programme for the period April 1992 to September 1994. The figures for the Northern Ireland Civil Service (including the Northern Ireland Office) are:

| | £000 |
|---|---|
| External consultancy support to in-house bids | 137.2 |
| External consultancy support to Departments | 554.8 |

An up-date of the costs incurred in the period 1 October 1994 to 31 March 1995 is currently being compiled and this will be included in the overall figures in the citizens charter 1995 report.

Mink Farms

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the number of licensed mink farms in each year since 1989. [21191]

Mr. Ancram: There has only ever been one licensed mink farm in Northern Ireland which operated from 1976 to 1991. There are no licensed mink farms in Northern Ireland at present.

NHS Trust Boards

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish an up-to-date list of all the chairs and non-executive directors of each NHS trust board, indicating the gender and occupation of each individual. [21355]

Mr. Moss: The information requested in respect of the 14 health and social services trusts in operation in Northern Ireland is available in the Library.

Health Authorities

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish an up-to-date list by region of all the chairs and non-executive member of each health authority, indicating the gender and occupation of each individual. [21361]

Mr. Moss: The information requested is given in the table.

| | Gender | Occupation |
|---|---|---|
| Eastern health and social services board | | |
| Chairman: | Mr. J. Daniel Thompson | Solicitor |
| Non-executive members: | Mr. Daniel J. McGuinness | Solicitor |
| | Mr. James C. Morton | Accountant |
| | Mrs. Gwen Savage | Managing Director |
| | Professor Robert J. Stout | Medical Consultant |
| Northern health and social services board | | |
| Chairman: | Mr. Robert J. Hanna | Farmer |
| Non-executive members: | Mr. Michael A. O'Connor | Director |
| | Mrs. Nuala P. O'Logan | Lecturer |
| | Mrs. Ailna V. Smyth | Housewife |
| Southern health and social services board | | |
| Chairman: | Mr. William F. Gillespie | Managing Director |
| Non-executive members: | Mrs. Geraldine Donaghy | Director |
| | Mrs. M. K. Philomena Hagan | Manager |
| | Mrs. Jennifer Power | Voluntary Worker |
| | Mr. C. A. J. Quinn | Accountant |
| | Mr. D. J. Ryan | Small business proprietor |
| Western health and social services board | | |
| Chairman: | Mr. Robert G. Toland | Director |
| Non-executive members: | Mrs. Margaret R. Cooper | Solicitor |
| | Mr. Anthony Jackson | Accountant |
| | Mr. Patrick J. Kelly | Farmer |
| | Mrs. Anne F. Mark | Housewife |

Protected Birds

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many permits have been issued to falconers to take protected species of birds as quarry in each year since 1988; what were the species in respect of which such permits were issued; and what were the number of each species taken. [21248]

Mr. Moss: No permits have been either applied for or issued to falconers to take protected species of birds as quarry in any year since 1988.

Birds of Prey

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many licences have been issued in each year since 1988 to possess birds of prey; and what were the numbers of birds of each species held under such licences. [21250]

Mr. Moss: The number of licences issued in each year since 1988 to possess birds of prey and the number and species held under such licences are set out in the table.

| | | Numbers and species held | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Year | Number of Licences issued | Peregrine | Sparrowhawk | Kestrel | Buzzard | Others |
| 1988 | 9 | 2 | 4 | 1 | 2 | — |
| 1989 | 2 | — | — | — | 1 | 1 Goshawk |
| 1990 | 6 | 5 | — | — | 3 | — |
| 1991 | 7 | 5 | — | 2 | 3 | 1 Merlin |
| 1992 | 12 | 5 | — | — | 4 | 3 Barn Owls |
| 1993 | 13 | 5 | — | 8 | — | — |
| 1994 | 22 | 4 | 3 | 7 | 3 | 5 Goshawk |

NHS Cost Improvement Programme

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the total annual cost improvement programme in the national health service provider units in each of the last four years. [21333]

Mr. Moss: The total annual cash releasing cost improvement programme for the health and personal social services for each of the last four years is as follows:

| | Outturn £ million |
|---|---|
| 1991–92 | 10.8 |
| 1992–93 | 15.8 |
| 1993–94 | 16.7 |
| 1994–95 | 18.0 |

Education Research Projects

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money has been devoted to funding education research projects by his Department in each of the last five years; and what percentage of education spending this represents. [21557]

Mr. Ancram: The information is as follows:

| Year | Amount | Percentage of total Deni expenditure |
|---|---|---|
| 1990–91 | 214,000 | 0.023 |
| 1991–92 | 158,000 | 0.014 |
| 1992–93 | 185,000 | 0.015 |
| 1993–94 | 250,000 | 0.020 |
| 1994–95 | 283,000 | 0.022 |

Crime Statistics

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) republican and (b) loyalists in Northern Ireland have been (i) arrested, (ii) questioned, (iii) charged and (iv) convicted in each of the past eight months. [21560]

Sir John Wheeler: The number of persons arrested and charged in connection with terrorist-related offences from 1 August 1994 to 31 March 1995 is as follows:

| Month | Republican | Loyalist |
|---|---|---|
| Arrested | | |
| August | 82 | 71 |
| September | 23 | 38 |
| October | 22 | 43 |
| November | 20 | 52 |
| December | 20 | 27 |
| January | 9 | 26 |
| February | 36 | 16 |
| March | 12 | 38 |
| Totals | 224 | 311 |
| Charged | | |
| August | 15 | 15 |
| September | 1 | 15 |
| October | 4 | 14 |
| November | 6 | 8 |
| December | 4 | 6 |
| January | 0 | 8 |
| February | 16 | 4 |
| March | 1 | 3 |
| Totals | 47 | 73 |

There are no figures available regarding the number of people questioned during this period.

The number of persons convicted of scheduled offences from 1 August 1994 to 31 March 1995 was:

| Month | No of persons convicted |
|---|---|
| August | 13 |
| September | 10 |
| October | 29 |
| November | 18 |

| Month | No of persons convicted[1] |
|---|---|
| December | 64 |
| January | 49 |
| February | 66 |
| March | 51 |

[1] A republican/loyalist breakdown is not available for persons convicted.

Civil Servants

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in his Department and the agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21762]

Sir John Wheeler: The number of civil service appointments made to permanent administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in the Northern Ireland Department and the Northern Ireland Office in each quarter from September 1993 to April 1995 were as follows:

| | Administrative assistant | Administrative officer |
|---|---|---|
| September to December 1993 (4 months) | 25 | 46 |
| January to March 1994 | 18 | 30 |
| April to June 1994 | 34 | 35 |
| July to September 1994 | 34 | 54 |
| October to December 1994 | 27 | 27 |
| January to March 1995 | 27 | 39 |

Divorce Cases

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases of divorce have been reported during the last year; and what were the figures for each of the previous four years. [20710]

Mr. John M. Taylor: I have been asked to reply.

The number of decrees nisi granted in respect of divorces in Northern Ireland were as follows:

1990: 2,015
1991: 2,367
1992: 2,411
1993: 2,392
1994: 2,538

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Namibia University

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Overseas Development Administration will provide sponsorship to the University of Namibia Foundation. [21125]

Mr. Baldry: We have no plans to provide sponsorship to the University of Namibia Foundation. We are currently providing assistance direct to the university through the provision of books, and support for the post of pro-vice chancellor.

TRANSPORT

Livestock Hauliers

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what support the Government are giving to livestock hauliers to ensure that they can continue their trade. [20917]

Mr. Norris: Generally my Department's support for livestock hauliers in the United Kingdom and abroad is the same as it is for other hauliers, and covers a wide range of matters. My Department has been in touch with ports involved in recent action on the export of live animals, and will remain so, but intervention is for the police and the courts.

Road Fuels

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the volume of road fuels consumed in the year 2000; what he expects this figure to be if the duties on road fuels were adjusted solely in line with the retail prices index; and if he will make a statement. [20918]

Mr. Norris: The Government's latest projections of future energy demand for the whole economy to the year 2020 were recently published in energy paper 65 "Energy Projections for the UK", as announced by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and Energy on 8 March 1995. From this, the demand for road fuels is expected to be in the range of 39 to 41 million tonnes in 2000, which takes account of the effect of the Government's strategy of increases in the duties on road fuels of at least 5 per cent. a year on average above the rate of inflation. If fuel duty increases were kept in line with the rate of inflation, demand in 2000 would be between 42 and 44 million tonnes.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21378]

Mr. Norris: Payments to consultants for work on the Department's "Competing for Quality" programme since its inception total £2.197 million.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much was spent on official hospitality by his Department in 1994–95. [21201]

Mr. Norris: The Department of Transport's expenditure on official hospitality during 1994–95 was as follows:

| | £ |
|---|---|
| Central Transport Group (CTG) | 127,062 |
| Agencies | 90,788 |

European Social Fund

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list those public projects which received European social fund support and were subsequently privatised over the last 10 years, indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [21290]

(2) if he will list those projects in privatised companies which have received European social fund support since privatisation indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [21291]

Mr. Norris: None of the privatised transport companies has applied directly and received European social fund support since 1990. Information for the years before 1990 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those British Rail projects which received European social fund support over the last 10 years, indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [21300]

Mr. Watts: Since 1990 no British Rail projects have received European social fund support. Data for the years before 1990 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Civil Service Appointments

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in his Department and the agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21775]

Mr. Norris: The Department's personal information system records the permanent appointments to administrative assistant and administrative officer as shown in the following table:

| Starting period | Administrative assistant | Administrative officer |
|---|---|---|
| September 1993—November 1993 | 19 | 29 |
| December 1994—February 1994 | 29 | 21 |
| March 1994—May 1994 | 18 | 19 |
| June 1994—August 1994 | 30 | 10 |
| September 1994—November 1994 | 19 | 10 |
| December 1994—February 1994 | 7 | 9 |
| March 1995—April 1995 | 9 | 9 |
| Totals for September 1993—April 1995 | 131 | 107 |

Bull Bars

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what motor vehicle companies have changed their advertising and promotion of bull bars following his advice that bull bars should not be illustrated in promotions. [22046]

Mr. Norris: The information requested is not available.

Railways

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the closing date for companies wishing to pre-qualify for bidding to buy British Railway's ROSCOs; how many companies have sought to pre-qualify for each of the three ROSCOs; and which companies these are. [21935]

Mr. Watts: Midnight on 21 April 1995, by which time strong interest had been shown by financial institutions, leasing companies and manufacturers in the United Kingdom and in eight other countries. Prospective purchasers will not be asked to identify their preferences for each of the three ROSCOs until later in the sale process. The identity of bidders is commercially sensitive.

Port of Liverpool

Sir Mark Lennox-Boyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what financial support the Port of Liverpool and the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company has received from (a) the European Community and (b) his Department in each financial year since 1990; and what he estimates the company will receive from the European Community and his Department in the next financial year. [21199]

Mr. Norris: The Port of Liverpool and the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company have received no direct financial support from my Department since 1990 and there are no plans for any such support in the next financial year.

Support from the European Community in the form of European regional development fund has been as follows:

£(000)

| | 1990–91 | 1991—92 | 1992–93 | 1993–94 | 1994–95 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Port of Liverpool | nil | 143 | 12 | 18 | 1 |
| Mersey Docks and Harbour Company | nil | 240 | 1,229 | 736 | 960 |

Pollution

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what powers he has to control the level or speed of road traffic on occasions when pollution levels exceed proposed air quality standards; [21227]

(2) what studies he has carried out of the potential for reducing traffic levels in the event that (a) $NO_2$ levels in London exceed the World Health Organisation's 24 hour $NO_2$ health guideline and (b) $O_3$ levels in southern England exceed the World Health Organisation's 8 hour $O_3$ health guideline; [21236]

(3) what contingency plans he has drawn up to reduce traffic levels in the event that (a) $NO_2$ levels in London exceed the World Health Organisation's 24 hour $NO_2$ health guideline and (b) $O_3$ levels in Southern England exceed the World Health Organisation's 8 hour $O_3$ health guidelines; [21237]

(4) what consideration he has given to using his powers under section 14 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 to reduced speed limits on trunk roads to reduce emissions in the event that pollution levels exceed proposed air quality standards; and if he will make a statement. [21235]

Mr. Norris: A reduction in vehicle speed has differing effects on emissions of different pollutants. Any decision to impose speed limits would have to take into account levels of the pollutants of most concern.

Studies have indicated that traffic reduction may have the positive effect of reducing nitrogen dioxide concentrations during winter smog episodes. However, this may have to be balanced against possible negative effects on emissions caused by congestion if traffic reduction measures involve road closures.

The Secretary of State has powers to regulate traffic only on trunk roads and motorways; traffic regulation on local roads, which comprise the vast majority of all roads, is the responsibility of local traffic authorities.

Any traffic restrictions to reduce air pollution must be developed at a local level so that all the implications can be considered—centralised contingency plans are impracticable. However, the complexity of the issue does merit further research and the Department is currently carrying out a review of existing research on how traffic management can influence air quality, with a view to undertaking a research project of our own later this year.

Expenditure

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the total expenditure on transport as a percentage of GNP for (a) each EU country, (b) the United States of America, (c) Japan and (d) each Scandinavian country.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available.

Pedestrian Casualty Report

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will make available to hon. Members the report of the Transport research laboratory on pedestrian casualty rates. [21663]

Mr Norris: Pedestrian casualty rates are published annually in "Road Accidents Great Britain" and updated quarterly in each current year. In addition TRL reports have been published on studies of particular aspects of risk including risk at pedestrian crossings. Copies are in the Library.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21399]

Mr. Norris: (a) In accordance with standard service wide rules the Department's "Staff Handbook" requires staff to declare any business or financial interests which they or immediate members of their families hold, which they would be able to further as a result of their official position. In the majority of cases conflicts of interest are reported to and resolved immediately by line management as the Department does not maintain a central record of all cases.

(b) One case of conflict of interests has been declared by a special adviser during the last five years.

Trunk Roads

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to undertake the next general review of the trunk road network. [21828]

Mr. Watts: There are no current plans for a review.

EDUCATION

Academic Labour Market

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what assessment she has made of the effects of United Kingdom academics moving abroad to attain higher salary levels on United Kingdom higher education salary levels. [20930]

Mr. Boswell: None. Data from the universities' statistical record show that the overall flows of academics to and from abroad are very small. In Great Britain in 1993, there was a net inflow of 220 full-time non-clinical university staff in former Universities Funding Council-funded institutions, the equivalent of 0.8 per cent. of staff in post. Such relatively small movements in the academic labour market would be unlikely to have an appreciable effect on higher education salary levels in the United Kingdom.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market testing programmes in which her Department has been engaged since their inception. [21365]

Mr. Forth: The estimated cost of employing consultants in connection with market-testing programmes since their inception, September 1992, is £375,000.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in her Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21395]

Mr. Forth: The Department's terms and conditions handbook requires staff to declare any potential conflicts of interest to their senior management so that appropriate action can be considered. The handbook is made available to all staff. Records of declarations of potential conflicts are not held centrally on civil servants. No cases involving special advisers have arisen in the last five years.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how much was spent on official hospitality by her Department in 1994–95. [21206]

Mr. Forth: Provisional outturn expenditure for 1994–95 on official hospitality is £75,000 for the Department and £1,000 for the Teachers' Pension Agency, giving a total of £76,000.

The cost of official hospitality is included in the running cost expenditure for the Department which is published every year in the departmental report. Official hospitality includes the costs of teas and coffees, buffet lunches and dinners.

Civil Servants

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in her Department and the agencies for which she is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21771]

Mr. Boswell: The Department for Education and the Teachers Pensions Agency have made the following appointments to the administrative assistant—AA—and administrative officer—AO—grades since September 1993:

| | AA | AO |
|---|---|---|
| September 1993—November 1993 | 13 | 3 |
| December 1993—February 1994 | 5 | 5 |
| March 1994—May 1994 | 15 | 5 |
| June 1994—August 1994 | 11 | 7 |
| September 1994—November 1994 | 4 | 1 |
| December 1994—February 1995 | 22 | 1 |
| March 1995—April 1995 | 13 | 1 |

Research Projects

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how much has been spent on funding educational research projects by her Department in each of the last five years; and what percentage of education spending this represents. [21559]

Mr. Forth: The Department's expenditure from the research budget over the last five years is given in the table, and is also shown as a percentage of total departmental expenditure.

| | Expenditure from research budget (£ million) | As percentage of the department's total expenditure |
|---|---|---|
| 1990–91 | 2.38 | 0.04 |
| 1991–92 | 1.80 | 0.03 |
| 1992–93 | 1.74 | 0.02 |
| 1993–94 | 0.96 | 0.01 |
| 1994–95 | [1]0.67 | 0.01 |

[1] this includes the Department's contribution of £0.10 million to the Learning Credits consultancy and a grant of £0.04 million paid to the University of London Institute of Education.

Total departmental expenditure covers central Government expenditure and grants to local authorities within the Department of Education's programme.

Sponsor Governors

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education which schools have appointed sponsor governors; and if she will state for each school which companies they represent and how much each company has donated to each school. [22066]

Mr. Robin Squire: All grant-maintained and voluntary aided schools which have been designated as technology colleges are required to amend their instrument of government so as to appoint between one and four sponsor governors to represent their sponsors. Some 67 technology colleges have been designated, 52 of which have so far requested the necessary amendments to their instrument. The table names the schools and the sponsors whom their sponsor governors represent. While all technology colleges are required to raise around £100,000 of sponsorship as a condition of designation, it would not be appropriate to publish the value of the sponsorship donated by each individual sponsor, since some sponsors may consider that to be confidential.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State which grant-maintained schools have applied to amend their admissions policy so as to introduce selection on the ground of ability; in each case what proportion are to be selected and in which schools; and when permission to amend the admissions policy was granted. [22067]

Mr. Robin Squire: The table gives details of section 89/96 proposals and other applications which have been approved or are under consideration to introduce an element of selection.

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what are the reasons behind grant-maintained schools being classified as private sector bodies. [22068]

Mr. Robin Squire: Like universities and colleges, grant-maintained schools are classified as private sector institutions by the Central Statistical Office for the purpose of national income accounting. For further details, I refer the hon. Member to the reply that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary gave to the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) on 27 February 1995, Official Report, column 397.

Grant-maintained schools are classified in this way mainly because their governors—representing parents, teachers and the local community—are not appointed by central or local government.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the current number of grant-maintained schools. [21661]

Mr. Robin Squire: There are currently 1,053 grant-maintained schools in England.

Funding Agency for Schools

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many people are currently employed by the Funding Agency for Schools on (a) a part-time basis, (b) a full-time basis and (c) a consultancy capacity. [21662]

Mr. Robin Squire: This is a matter for the Funding Agency for Schools. I have asked the chairman of the Funding Agency to write to the hon. Member with this information.

Local Education Authority Staff

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the ratio of local education authority administrators to teachers in schools. [21569]

Mr. Robin Squire: Information on staff employed by local authorities is collected by the local government management board.

Figures show that in June 1994, local authorities in England employed 376,665 full-time equivalent teachers and lecturers and 316,244 full-time equivalent other manual and non-manual staff involved in education, making a ratio of around 2.5 non-teaching staff to every three teachers.

The survey does not enable staff employed in schools to be separated from those employed elsewhere or administrative staff to be separated from other non-teaching staff.

Computer Pornography

Mr. Timms: To ask the Secretary of State for Education when the departmental guidelines for schools and parents on computer pornography will be published; and how many leaflets will be available. [21189]

Mr. Forth: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) on 28 March 1995 Official Report, column 570.

Class Sizes

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education (1) what was the number and percentage of pupils in primary schools in (a) January 1980, (b) January 1991, (c) January 1992, (d) January 1993, (e) January 1994 and (f) January 1995 being taught in classes of 40 or more in maintained schools in each local education authority and in total; [21197]

(2) what was the number and percentage of pupils in secondary schools in (a) January 1980, (b) January 1991, (c) January 1992, (d) January 1993, (e) January 1994 and (f) January 1995 being taught in classes of 40 or more in maintained schools in each local education authority and in total. [21198]

Mr. Robin Squire: Information on pupils in classes of size 40 and over in maintained primary and secondary schools for years 1980, 1991, 1992, 1993 and 1994 has been placed in the Library. Information for January 1995 will not be available until the autumn.

Ms Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will now commission research to assess the effect of class size on pupil performance. [21313]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department will continue to monitor research in this area, but has at present no plans to commission such research. There is no conclusive evidence from a large volume of accumulated research that marginal reductions in class size affect pupil performance. What matters most is the quality of teaching.

City of Liverpool Community College

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what representation she has received about the City of Liverpool community college; and if she will establish an independent inquiry into the governance and management of the City of Liverpool community college. [21142]

Mr. Boswell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) on 3 March 1995 Official Report, column 774. Since then, the Department has received one letter about the college, from a member of its staff.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Mr. Mohd Ashfaq

Mr. Madden: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if leave to appeal to the Immigration Appeal Tribunal has been granted to the Home Office in the case of Mr. Mohd Ashfaq: ref: TH/1740/94; IMM/C2021. [20669]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Leave to appeal to the tribunal was refused on 6 April 1995.

Divorce Cases

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many cases of divorce have been reported during the last year; and what were the comparable figures in each of the previous four years. [20694]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The question concerns a specific operational matter on which the chief executive of the Court Service is best placed to provide an answer and I have accordingly asked the chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from M. D. Huebner to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 27 April 1995:

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, has asked me to reply to your question about the number of divorces reported during the past five years.

The following statistics refer to the number of divorce cases in which a final decree has been made, to end the marriage:

1990: 147080
1991: 147385
1992: 148046
1993: 154062
1994: 146932[1]

The statistics cover England only. I understand that you have asked separately for information from the Welsh Office. You may like to know that all judicial statistics for England and Wales are provided by the Lord Chancellor's Department. The figures for Wales are as follows:

1990: 8159
1991: 8542
1992: 8633
1993: 8517
1994: 7941[1]

The Welsh Office have been provided with this information and will reply separately to your Question.

[1]These figures are provisional and therefore liable to revision to take account of late amendments.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21372]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The estimated cost of employing consultants in connection with market testing programmes from April 1992 to date is £510,800.

Queen's Counsel (Applications)

Sir John Gorst: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many applications for Queen's Counsel his office has received in each year from 1992 to 1995; what proportion of these applications were from (a) women and (b) members of ethnic minorities, and what proportion of applicants from each category were successful. [21840]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The information is set out in the table. Applications for appointment as Queen's Counsel are invited in September each year and no applications have therefore yet been received in 1995. The figures exclude those cases where the applicant subsequently withdrew his application.

| | Year applications received | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| | 1992 | 1993 | 1994 |
| Total applicants | 472 | 539 | 492 |
| Total successful | 70 | 77 | 71 |
| Women | | | |
| Applicants | 37 | 43 | 42 |
| Percentage of total applications | 8 | 8 | 9 |
| Successful | 6 | 9 | 8 |
| Percentage of women's applications | 16 | 21 | 19 |
| Applicants who have declared a non-white ethnic background | | | |
| Applicants | 14 | 11 | 12 |
| Percentage of total applications | 3 | 2 | 2 |
| Successful | 1 | 1 | 1 |
| Percentage of applications from those declaring a non-white ethnic background | 7 | 9 | 8 |

Civil Servants

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistants and administrative officer posts in his Department and the agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21764]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lord Chancellor's Department has recruited administrative assistants and administrative officers as shown in the table.

The Lord Chancellor had responsibility for three agencies in the period covered by the question: Her Majesty's Land Registry, the Public Record Office, and the Public Trust Office. Figures for the Public Trust Office, which became an agency in July 1994, are included in the table. I have asked the chief executives of Her Majesty's Land Registry and the Public Record Office to reply direct.

Quarterly recruitment of administrative assistants and administrative officers in the lord chancellors department

| Quarter | Administrative assistants | Administrative officers | Total |
|---|---|---|---|
| 01 October 1993 to 31 December 1994 | 54 | 222 | 276 |
| 01 January 1994 to 31 March 1994 | 52 | 217 | 269 |
| 01 April 1994 to 30 June 1994 | 70 | 250 | 320 |
| 01 July 1994 to 30 September 1994 | 85 | 269 | 354 |
| 01 October 1994 to 30 December 1994 | 84 | 265 | 349 |
| 01 January 1995 to 31 March 1995 | 52 | 216 | 268 |

Note:
The figures shown include the recruitment of administrative assistants and administrative officers to the Public Trust Office. The Public Trust Office became an agency in July 1994.

Letter from John Manthorpe to Mr. Nick Ainger, dated 1 May 1995:

I have been asked by the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, to reply to your recent question concerning Civil Service appointments to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in each quarter from September 1993 to April 1995. During that period, the Land Registry made no such appointments.

Letter from Sarah Tyacke to Mr. Nick Ainger, dated 1 May 1995:

I have been asked by the Lord Chancellor's Parliamentary Secretary to reply to your question relating to appointments made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in the Public Record Office in each quarter from September 1993 to April 1995.

The following appointments were made:

| | Administrative Assistant | Administrative Officer |
|---|---|---|
| September 1993–December 1993 | 0 | 0 |
| January 1994–March 1994 | 0 | 0 |
| April 1994–June 1994 | 0 | 0 |
| July 1994–September 1994 | 0 | 1 |
| October 1994–December 1994 | 0 | 0 |
| January 1995–April 1995 | 0 | 1 |

Legal Aid

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the 10 solicitors firms who have received the largest sums of money from the legal aid scheme, and name the 10 barristers who have received the largest sum of money from the legal aid scheme for the most recent year for which information is available. [21884]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21389]

Mr. John M. Taylor: For the Department and agencies for which the Lord Chancellor is responsible any conflicts of interest involving civil servants would have been dealt with in accordance with the established guidance. Records of the number of cases are not held centrally. Neither the Department nor its agencies have employed special advisers during the last five years.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Open Government

35. Mr. Fisher: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what has been the cost to the Government of applications for information under the code of practice in open government in the last financial year for which figures are available. [20155]

Mr. Horam: Code requests have been dealt with as part of larger information flows, and costs have not been recorded separately.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what new proposals he has to increase open government. [20149]

Mr. David Hunt: The Government remain committed to the proposals contained in the 1993 White Paper.

Citizens Charter

36. Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what inquiries he has received from overseas with regard to the citizens charter in the last year. [20156]

Mr. David Hunt: Many, from countries throughout the world. We are an acknowledged world leader in this area of public sector reform.

Government Agencies

37. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many people are employed in relation to press and public relations works in Government agencies. [20157]

Mr. David Hunt: Of the 885 staff with an information officer discipline, 317 are employed in next steps agencies.

Magistrates

38. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received about the work of the magistrates in the Duchy; and if he will make a statement. [20158]

Mr. David Hunt: I am responsible for the appointment of magistrates in Lancashire, Greater Manchester and Merseyside. The Lord Chancellor's Department is responsible for training and administering magistrates. I have discussions with magistrates during my visits to courthouses in the Duchy area.

I pay tribute to the Duchy's magistrates, as I do to those in the remainder of England and Wales. As hon. Members know, they are drawn from all walks of life, give their time freely, often at some sacrifice, to do this important work.

The office of magistrate calls for wisdom, maturity and experience of life. Persons over the age of 60 are appointed only in exceptional circumstances.

We try to achieve a balanced age structure and aim to find candidates under the age of 55, especially those in their 30s and 40s. Where the age structure of the bench allows or a candidate is particularly well qualified, I will consider older candidates. It is rare for someone below the age of 27 to be appointed.

In accordance with the Justices of the Peace Act 1979, justices' names are placed on the supplement list when they reach the age of 70 and no longer undertake active bench duties.

Reorganisation of magistrates courts committees in Greater Manchester is a matter for local consultation and discussion with the Lord Chancellor's Department. Any question on this subject should therefore be referred to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department.

Penalties available to the courts are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. However, the Government keep under review the scope for decriminalising offences currently dealt with under the criminal law.

National Science Week

39. Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what support his Department is giving to National Science Week in schools for future years. [20159]

Mr. Horam: Preparations for next year's week are at a very early stage and include consideration of ways to encourage greater participation by schools. The Office of Science and Technology will be making £200,000 available for the Week. This will come from the budget for promoting the public understanding of science, engineering and technology which the Government have increased by 25 per cent. to £1.25 million in 1995–96.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21363]

Mr. Horam: The cost to the Cabinet Office, including OPSS and its agencies, HMSO and COI of employing consultants in connection with market-testing programmes from their inception to 31 March 1995 is some £1,088,000.

Civil Servants

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in his Department and agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995.

Mr. Horam: I am also answering on behalf of the Prime Minister.

The number of permanent appointments to the administrative assistant and administrative officer grades are detailed in the following table. The figures include new recruits, reinstatements and transfers from other Government Departments.

| | October–December 1993 | January–March 1994 | April–June1994 | July–September 1994 | October–December 1994 | January–March 1995 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|

| AO | — | 1 | 1 | 1 | — | — |

Administrative appointments to HMSO are at paybands 1 to 5. The number of appointments were as follows:

| | October–December 1993 | January–March 1994 | April–June 1994 | July–September 1994 | October–December 1994 | January–March 1995 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| HMSO | 6 | 80 | 113 | 16 | 9 | 30 |

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how much was spent on official hospitality by his Department in 1994–95.

Mr. Horam: Expenditure in 1994–95 on official hospitality by the Cabinet Office, including the Office of Public Service and Science, and executive agencies was as follows:

| | 1994–95 |
|---|---|
| Cabinet Office (including OPSS)[1] | 17,550 |
| OPSS agencies | 650 |
| COI | 9,200 |
| HMSO[2] | 31,600 |

Notes

[1] The figure for the Cabinet Office excludes expenditure by the Office of the Prime Minister, which was the subject of a separate Answer by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

[2] HMSO's figure is based on their accounting year 1 January–31 December.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention; disposal or management. [21393]

Mr. David Hunt: For the Departments and agencies for which I am responsible, and other areas which fall to the Cabinet Office votes, any conflicts of interest involving civil servants and special advisers would have been dealt with in accordance with the established guidance. Records of the number of cases are not held centrally.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Relocation Costs

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each agency and the central Department for which he is responsible (a) the total amount of removal costs and associated expenses reimbursed to officials who were required to relocate as part of their employment, (b) the amount of each of the highest three claims that were concluded and settled and (c) the average amount of each claim in each of the last three years. [19667]

Mr. Waldegrave: Because relocation expenses in my Department are met from a centrally administered budget, it is not possible to provide information separately for the core Department and agencies except at disproportionate cost. However, total relocation costs paid in the last three financial years, including payment made to a relocation company which acts on behalf of the Department, amounted to £10,907,201. A significant part of this expenditure was incurred in order to relocate staff working in the London area to a new headquarters building in York and to achieve other organisational and structural changes in the Department and agencies. These projects will realise offsetting savings elsewhere in the Departmental running costs.

The three most expensive individual home moves, again including relocation company payments, cost £62,982, £66,204 and £71,873 respectively.

During the same period, the average cost of a home move is estimated as follows:-

1992–93: £20,500

1993–94: £22,500

1994–95: £22,500 (provisional)

Fishing

Sir Michael Marshall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his oral statement of 18 April, if he will give further details of the satellite surveillance system which will be used to monitor fishing in international waters off Newfoundland under the terms of the negotiated settlement between the European Community and the Government of Canada. [20505]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 21 April 1995]: Under the control and enforcement provisions of the negotiated settlement between the European Union and Canada, it is envisaged that the North-west Atlantic Fisheries Organisation contracting parties will install satellite-tracking devices on 35 per cent. of their vessels fishing in the NAFO regulatory area where the combined fishing effort of their vessels is 300 days or more. The installation is intended to take place, as rapidly as is realistically possible, when the vessels make a port call or depart for the NRA. The system installed must be able to transmit satellite signals automatically to a land-based system, to allow the continuous tracking by the contracting party of its fishing vessel. The contracting party must then transmit, on a real-time basis, entry and exit messages from satellite-equipped vessels to the NAFO secretariat, which in turn will transmit the information to contracting parties with an inspection vessel in the NAFO convention area.

Contracting parties will also be required to co-operate with those contracting parties which have a NAFO inspection vessel or aircraft in the convention area, in order to exchange information on the location of fishing vessels equipped with satellite devices and, if requested, to provide information relating to the identification of a vessel.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which of the executive non-departmental public bodies sponsored by his Department have (a) a statutory requirement to admit members of the public to all board or committee meetings and (b) a statutory requirement to hold open meetings for the public. [20870]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 26 April 1995]: None of the executive non-departmental public bodies for which my right hon. Friend is responsible has a statutory requirement to admit members of the public to board or committee meetings, or to hold open meetings for the public.

Livestock Hauliers

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what support the Government are giving to livestock hauliers to ensure that they can continue their trade. [20916]

Mrs. Browning: The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food sets statutory requirements to protect the welfare of animals in transit, which provide a framework within which livestock hauliers may lawfully carry on their trade; provides advice on best practice and on legal requirements; and, in relation to exports, promptly carries out its responsibilities with regard to the issue of documentation and the checking of proposed new routes for compliance with welfare requirements.

Fish Conservation

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his oral answer of 18 April, Official Report, column 22, what proposals he has for more international work on the breeding and oceanic habits of turbot, bream and halibut; and what study he is making of the effects on conservation of deeper sea fishing technology and of happenings under the ocean's surface in relation to the establishment of fishing quota for turbot, bream and halibut. [21317]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 24 April 1995]: Scientific studies on the breeding and behaviour of Greenland halibut and other species in the north-west Atlantic is carried out by the Scientific Council of the North-west Atlantic Fisheries Organisation, which also carries out work on the impact of fishing technology and of the marine environment. I look forward to receiving further advice at the next annual meeting of the organisation in September.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the cost of employing consultations in connection with market-testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21362]

Mr. Jack: For the period November 1991 to date the total cost to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, together with its executive agencies, of employing consultants in connection with market testing programmes is estimated to be £1,394,456.

Brewing Industry

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussion he (a) has held in the last year and (b) proposes to hold on the effect of the European single market on the British brewing industry. [21865]

Mr. Jack: My right hon. Friend has frequent meetings with representatives of the brewing industry at which issues relating to the single market are discussed.

PRIME MINISTER

Business Consultants

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if he will make a statement on the relationship between the Department and Mr. Edmund Sykes; [21706]

(2) if he will make a statement on the relationship between the Department and Mr. Stephen Crouch. [21705]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 28 April 1995]: I am unaware of any such relationships.

Civil Servants

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Prime Minster how many civil service appointments were made to the administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in his Department and the agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21761]

The Prime Minister: For these purposes, my office is part of the Cabinet Office. I refer the hon. Member to the reply given today by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service and Science.

Local Education Authorities

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Prime Minister (1) pursuant to his oral answer of 25 April, Official Report, column 675, concerning the ratio of administrators to teachers, if he will give the relevant reference in Social Trends; [21711]

(2), pursuant to his oral answer of 21 March, Official Report, column 140, if he will publish evidence showing that there are two administrators for every three teachers across the country. [21710]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) on 27 April, Official Report, column 613.

Mr. Fouad Makhzoumi

Mr. Byers : To ask the Prime Minister if the right hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) when Minister for Defence Procurement under the "Question of Procedure for Ministers" referred to the Prime Minister for his advice on the approach he had received for Mr. Fouad Makhzoumi concerning the sale of arms to Lebanon. [21562]

The Prime Minister: Discussions between myself and Ministers are private.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will discuss with Chancellor Kohl the reasons for which the Rhein-Main routine airport film of the loading of luggage on to the Boeing 727 feeder aircraft for Pan Am flight 103 on 21 December 1988 was confiscated; and whether this information was conveyed to the Dumfries and Galloway police investigating the Lockerbie crime. [21798]

The Prime Minister: I have no plans to discuss the Lockerbie case with Chancellor Kohl. It would not be appropriate to disclose what communications have passed between foreign authorities and the investigating authorities in this country while criminal proceedings are pending.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minster, pursuant to his reply of 10 January, Official Report, column 20, if he will list all the investigations carried out in relation to Lockerbie, referred to in Government document JRE 10119.045 attached to the letter of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) of 21 April to the hon. Member for Linlithgow; and what evidence he has for the belief adduced in that document that no further inquiry is warranted. [21429]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 28 April 1995]: I understand that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland did not write to the hon. Member on 21 April referring to investigations carried out in relation to Lockerbie or in respect of the document referred to. The document to which the hon. Member appears to be referring was produced for internal use and I am not therefore prepared to comment further on it.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 28 March, Official Report, columns 545–46, and to his letter to the hon. Member for Linlithgow of 10 April, what response he has had from the United States authorities as to the authenticity of a signal, a copy of which was sent to him and to the US embassy in London, by the hon. Member for Linlithgow, purporting to be a threat to the life of Major Charles McKee, who died over Lockerbie, by the agencies of the US Government. [21407]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 28 April 1995]: As the hon. Member has been advised by my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, and by the US authorities, the investigation has concluded that the document is a fabrication.

Security Services

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister what arrangements exist for hon. Members to visit the headquarters of the security services. [21889]

The Prime Minister: It is not normal practice for the security and intelligence agencies to host visits to their headquarters by hon. Members.

Acceptance of Gifts

Mr. Alton: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 24 April, Official Report, column 344, if he will give the reasons for his policy of regarding the number of occasions on which the Government has been approached for advice on the suitability of accepting a financial gift, payment or commission by a Government Minister or an hon. Member or their relatives as confidential. [21428]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 28 April 1995]: As I said in my previous answer, advice on specific cases is private. No central record is kept of the occasions on which such advice is sought.

Nursery Education

Ms Hodge: To ask the Prime Minister (1) how many hours per child per week of nursery education he intends in his commitment to nursery education for all four-year-olds; [22032]

(2) whether his commitment to nursery education for all four-year-olds is a commitment to education with qualified teachers for all children from the day of their fourth birthday. [22033]

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education is looking at a range of options for implementing my commitment to provide, over time, a pre-school place for every four-year-old whose parents wish them to take it up. How many hours per week each place should provide, when the provision should start for each child, and appropriate staff qualifications and adult to child ratios are among the issues under consideration.

Ministers (Car Hire)

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to the answer of 5 April, Official Report, column 1131, if he will place in the Library a list of the Ministers' hired cars, giving the purpose of the hire, on how many occasions cars have been hired, the cost of private care hire facilities through the Government car service and the purposes for which cars were supplied (a) to members of the Government, (b) to civil servants and (c) to others for each year since 1987; [21666]

(2) if he will publish information on (a) the cost and (b) the numbers of cars hired from the private sector for the transport of members of the Government for each year since 1987 where it is available. [21665]

The Prime Minister: The information as requested is not available.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 5 April, Official Report, column 1131, in what circumstances private hire facilities for members of the Government may be provided for non-government business; and if he will publish the relevant guidance issued. [21664]

The Prime Minister: I have nothing further to add to the replies given to the hon. Member of 5 April, Official Report, column 1131 and 24 April, Official Report, column 344.

DEFENCE

Entertainment

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has yet received Sir Peter Cazalet's report on representational entertainment in the armed forces; and if he will make a statement. [22342]

Mr. Soames: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence received Sir Peter Cazalet's report on 25 April. I have today placed a copy in the Library of the House, and the report is available on request from my Department.

In accordance with his terms of reference Sir Peter studies the official entertainment conducted by commanders at all levels including the occupants of official service residences—properties furnished and equipped to a superior standard reflecting the entertainment responsibilities of the occupant. He has concluded that there is a legitimate requirement for the armed forces to entertain and has endorsed the concept of entertainment in officers' own homes. He draws attention to the high professional standards of house staff, chefs and stewards employed in support of official entertainment. He has made a number of recommendations about the way that entertainment is funded and the support that senior officers receive for this purpose. Additionally he has recommended that the concept of official service residences should be retained, but that the criteria for entitlement to such properties should be reviewed which should lead to a reduction in their number.

My right hon. and learned Friend and I endorse Sir Peter's conclusions, including that service personnel have a need to entertain to an appropriate standard in support of their responsibilities. We accept his recommendations and shall now be undertaking further work in order to take them forward.

I would like to express our thanks to Sir Peter for undertaking this study.

Ordnance

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what quantity of (a) chemical and (b) conventional weapons, originally dumped in the waters surrounding Britain, was identified as having leaked onto British shores by the Royal Navy (Plymouth Command) bomb and mine disposal unit in each of the last 30 years. [21938]

Mr. Soames: It is not possible to determine the precise origin of all ordnance washed up onto British shores. There is no evidence, however, to suggest that any of the ordnance recovered in United Kingdom waters and disposed of by the Royal Navy's Plymouth clearance diving unit had originally been dumped.

David Hart

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with Mr. David Hart concerning plans to privatise his Department's housing stock; what role Mr. Hart had in the preparation of these plans; and if he will make a statement. [21885]

Mr. Soames: I have nothing to add to my answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 218.

Procurement

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's policy concerning industrial participation in procurement purchases from abroad; when industrial participation is to be sought; what assessment he has made of his Department's industrial participation policy; and if he will make a statement. [21886]

Mr. Freeman: Until international defence procurement can occur on a fully open reciprocal basis, the Government pursue a policy of asking foreign companies bidding for United Kingdom orders generally to offset the cost of such orders with work placed in the UK. Consequently my Department takes care to ensure that industrial participation proposals by foreign companies are carried through and involve high quality work being placed with UK companies. Our policy is currently to seek industrial participation proposals on procurement purchases from abroad on purchases over £10 million—£50 million in the case of France—while seeking to negotiate bilateral mutual waivers of IP requirements with members of the western European armaments group.

Franco-German Bilateral Armament Agency

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's policy concerning the Franco-German bilateral armaments agency; what consideration he has given to British membership of this body; what discussions he has had with his German and French counterparts to discuss British participation; and if he will make a statement. [21888]

Mr. Freeman: The United Kingdom has expressed the wish to be involved from the outset in discussions on the structure and operating principles for the planned armaments co-operation structure. I have discussed with my French and German counterparts the UK's interest in participation and consideration is presently being given to the practicalities involved. We will be discussing the issues further with French and German colleagues at official level.

Intergovernmental Conference

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's policy concerning article 223 of the treaty of Rome; and if he will be seeking the abolition of the article at the intergovernmental conference. [21887]

Mr. Freeman: The Government are currently reviewing article 223 in preparation for the intergovernmental conference in 1996.

Special Advisers

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what have been the dates of employment of his special advisers since his appointment. [21934]

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is as follows:

| Name | Joined the Department | Left the Department |
|---|---|---|
| Perry Miller | April 1992 | February 1993 |
| Crispin Blunt | February 1993 | Employment continuing. |

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what instructions his special adviser has given to his Department's civil servants to make inquiries of a political nature concerning the policies of the Labour party; and on what authority. [21933]

Mr. Rifkind: The special adviser has not given any instructions to my Department to make inquiries about the policies of the Labour party. Following the hon. Member for South Shield's lecture to the Royal United Services Institute, on 1 March, the special adviser asked a member of the parliamentary office to ask the hon. Member's office the exact date of his resignation from the Opposition Front Bench.

Portland Naval Base

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out the cost of employing (a) external surveyors and (b) consultants in relation to the sale of Portland naval base. [21302]

Mr. Soames: It is not my Department's practice to disclose information relating to the cost of employing external surveyors and consultants as the information is commercial in confidence.

NATO Rapid Reaction Corps

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the organisation of the NATO rapid reaction corps; what forces have been assigned to its command; which NATO nations have contributed such forces; and what is its relationship to the corps formed by Germany, France, Belgium, Luxembourg and Spain. [21080]

Mr. Soames: The ACE rapid reaction corps consists of a multinational corps headquarters, 10 divisions and corps troops. Of the 10 divisions under its command the HQ plans to deploy with up to four for any one operation. The United Kingdom has contributed two divisions—one includes an attached Italian brigade and the other an attached Danish brigade. Further divisions are contributed by Italy, Germany, Portugal, Turkey, Greece, the US and Spain. The remaining two divisions are multinational and include brigade contributions from Belgium and the Netherlands. In addition to the nations listed above, Canada, France, and Norway are represented by staff in HQ ARRC.

HQ ARRC and HQ Eurocorps are separate organisations which maintain a liaison and co-operation link.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the NATO rapid reaction corps is now fully operational. [21079]

Mr. Soames: The headquarters of the Allied Command Europe rapid reaction corps was declared fully operational on 25 April 1995.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21364]

Mr. Freeman: The total cost of employing commercial consultants in support of the MOD's "Competing for Quality" programme during the period from April 1992 to March 1995 was just over £6 million.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21394]

Mr. Freeman: Although all staff, including special advisers, are required to declare conflicts of interest to line management, no records of this information is maintained centrally.

Civil Service

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in his Department and the agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21772]

Mr. Freeman: The information requested, which includes full and part time staff up to the end of February 1995, is as follows:

| | Administrative Officer | Administrative Assistant |
|---|---|---|
| 1993 | | |
| October to December | 121 | 246 |
| 1994 | | |
| January to March | 145 | 260 |
| April to June | 70 | 206 |
| July to September | 83 | 190 |
| October to December | 82 | 151 |
| 1995 | | |
| January to February | 92 | 109 |

Defence Export Services Organisation

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) of 20 April, Official Report, column 228, what grade civil servant is Mr. Miles Faulkner; and what is his annual salary. [21171]

Mr. Freeman: Mr. Faulkner is serving on a fixed term appointment in a grade 6 post. It is not the practice to comment on the pay of individual officers.

In my answer to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) of 20 April 1995, Official Report, column 228, I said that the duration of Mr. Faulkner's contract was

"Two years extended by one year to March 1996".

This should have been

"Two years extended by one year to March 1995 and then further extended to March 1996".

I apologise for this error.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much was spent on official hospitality by his Department in 1994–95. [21213]

Mr. Soames: My Department spent £5,103,000 on official hospitality in the financial year 1994–95. This figure includes expenditure incurred by the Ministry of Defence itself, by formations and establishments of the armed forces at home and abroad, and by individual officers occupying command and international appointments for which entertainment allowances are payable.

Nagorno-Karabakh

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if British forces will form part of the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe's peacekeeping mission to Nagorno-Karabakh. [21336]

Mr. Soames: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North East (Mr. Campbell) on 22 February 1995, Official Report, column 256.

Riot Control

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what restrictions the chemical weapons convention will impose on the use of riot control agents or other law enforcement chemicals in operations by United Kingdom armed forces, including those involved in peacekeeping operations. [21337]

Mr. Soames: The chemical weapons convention, when it enters into force, will ban the use of riot control agents as a method of warfare, but allow their use for law enforcement. My Department's policy on the use of riot control agents is in accordance with the provisions of the convention.

Arms Sales

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what legal advice the former Minister for Defence Procurement received before meeting Mr. Fouad Makhzoumi to discuss arms sales to Lebanon. [21561]

Mr. Freeman: No legal advice was necessary.

Defence Equipment (Lebanon)

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions since April 1992 second hand arms have been given free of charge to other Governments for their use; on what date the decision was taken to provide 1,000 second hand self-loading rifles free of charge to the Government of Lebanon; which Minister was responsible for the decision; and what was the estimated value of the rifles. [21563]

Mr. Freeman: Since April 1992 my Department has approved gifts of defence equipment to eight overseas Governments. On 8 October 1993 formal financial approval was given at official level in accordance with internal departmental instructions for a gift to the Lebanese Government of surplus defence equipment to the value of £40,000. After discussion with the Lebanese authorities, it was agreed to make a gift of 500 surplus self-loading rifles to this value.

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 24 April, Official Report, column 395, on what date the former Minister for Defence Procurement, the hon. Member for Thanet, South, was first approached by Mr. Fouad Makhzoumi about the prospects for the sale of defence equipment to Lebanon; which of the meetings held with Mr. Makhzoumi were attended by officials from the Defence Export Services Organisation; and on what date the decision was taken to sell former British vessels and arms to the Lebanon. [21609]

Mr. Freeman: The right hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) advised officials in the Defence Export Services Organisation that he had been approached, on 6 July 1992, by Mr. Fouad Makhzoumi about the prospects for the sale of defence equipment to Lebanon. DESO officials were present at the meeting with Mr. Makhzoumi on 20 October 1993 and at the dinner in honour of the Lebanese chief of the naval staff on 17 November 1993 referred to in my answer to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North, (Mr. Wilson) on 24 April 1995, Official Report, column 395. FCO officials were present at the dinner for the Lebanese Information Minister on 25 February 1993.

Details of decisions by commercial companies to sell arms and defence equipment are a matter for the commercial suppliers and the customer. In the case of Government-to-Government sales, the decision to supply the former RN patrol craft to Lebanon was taken in March 1992.

Sapper Jason Whitton

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to be able to reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Clydesdale of 8 December 1994, concerning Sapper Jason Whitton. [21892]

Mr. Soames: I am grateful to the hon. Member for sending a further copy of his letter. My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Weapons Theft

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information his Department holds in respect of the quantity of missiles and other weapons stolen from a NATO base near Cologne in 1973; what security they are currently held under; and if he will make a statement. [20724]

Mr. Soames: Extensive inquiries by my Department have failed to trace any such incident.

Anzac Day

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence by whom his Department was represented at the Anzac Day commemoration at the Cenotaph, London, on 25 April. [21800]

Mr. Soames: My Department was represented by Rear Admiral R. O. Irwin, Air Vice Marshal J. D. K. Feesley AFC and Major General S.W. St. John Lytle.

HMS Daedalus

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of HMS Daedalus. [21837]

Mr. Soames: As announced by my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Defence on 16 July 1991, Official Report, columns 148-49. HMS Daedalus will close in April 1996. Should no further defence use be identified for the establishment, we expect the site to be offered for sale following the formal decommissioning of the air station.

Psychological Coercion

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what experiments his Department has carried out on psychological coercion in the last 30 years; if he will list the names of the experiments carried out; if he will give the dates when these experiments occurred; how many people were tested; and if he will make a statement. [20851]

Mr. Soames [holding answer 25 April 1995]: An examination of papers held centrally has found no reference to experiments carried out on psychological coercion.

Radiological Experiments

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what radiological, biological or chemical experiments his Department has carried out in the last 30 years, (a) on volunteers without their knowledge and (b) in public areas; and if he will make a statement. [20847]

Mr. Soames [holding answer 25 April 1995]: We know of no radiological experiments which have been carried out on volunteers by MOD without their knowledge. The same position applies with respect to volunteers at the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment, where no studies involving volunteers are carried out unless there is a clear military need and a detailed protocol has been reviewed, and approved, by an independent ethics committee in accordance with guidelines laid down by the Royal College of Physicians. Prior to participating in a study, the volunteers have the procedures, potential effects and possible risks explained to them in lay terms by an officer. They can withdraw from the study at any time without having to give a reason.

No experiments involving the use of radioactive substances or chemical or biological warfare agents have been carried out in public areas in the last 30 years. However, stimulants of such agents were used in some 100 experiments in the period of 1964 to 1977. The possible effect on the health and safety of personnel in public areas was fully considered prior to conducting the studies. Accordingly, the stimulants used were judged to present no risk to public health. The majority of these experiments involved releasing the stimulants at sea. There have been no experiments in public areas in the last 16 years.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police (Foot Patrols)

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average number of officers on foot patrol in Sussex in each month since January 1994. [20603]

Mr. Maclean: I understand from the chief constable that this information is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Livestock Hauliers

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what support the Government are giving to livestock hauliers to ensure that they can continue their trade. [20915]

Mr. Maclean: The enforcement of the law in relation to demonstrations against live animal exports is an operational matter for chief officers of police.

Schengen Agreement

Mr. Robert N. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether under (a) the Schengen agreement or (b) other agreements in respect of movements within the European Union, non-EU passport holders carrying valid visas for the United Kingdom may travel from the United Kingdom to other EU states without separate visas being required; and if he will make a statement. [21240]

Mr. Nicholas Baker [holding answer 27 April 1995]: As the United Kingdom is not a party to the Schengen agreement, a visa issued by the United Kingdom would not be valid for travel to a Schengen country. The draft external frontiers convention would, if implemented provide for, among other things, a form of mutual recognition of visas for a short stay, which would exempt the holder from the requirement to obtain a separate national visa for entry to any of the member states of the European Union. The text of the draft convention, agreement to which is subject to unanimity in the Council, remains under discussion.

Police Cells

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officer hours were used to police the imprisonment of prisoners in police cells in (a) 1979, (b) 1985, (c) 1990 and (d) the last year for which figures are available. [21269]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 1 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about police officer hours used to police the imprisonment of prisoners in police cells in (a) 1979, (b) 1985, (c) 1990 and (d) the last year for which figures are available.

The information is not recorded centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total cost to the public purse of keeping prisoners in police cells (a) in London and (b) elsewhere in England and Wales for each of the last 15 years. [21606]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 1 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the cost of keeping prisoners in police cells in London and elsewhere in England and Wales for each of the last 15 years.

No expenditure on the use of police cells was incurred before 1981–82. Separate figures for costs incurred in holding prisoners in police cells in the Metropolitan Police District are not available. The information for England and Wales, including London, is contained in the attached table.

Total annual expenditure on use of police cells (England and Wales) from 1981–82 to 1994–95

|---|---|
| 1981–82 | 0.002 |
| 1982–83 | 3.4 |
| 1983–84 | 10.08 |

[1] provisional

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which police stations in London have accommodated prisoners in their cells in the last year; how many prisoners each has accommodated; and what proportion of officers' time in each police station was devoted to prisoners. [21603]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 1 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about which police stations in London have accommodated prisoners in their cells in the last year; how many prisoners each has accommodated and what proportion of officers' time in each police station was devoted to prisoners.

No Prison Service prisoners have been accommodated in police cells in the Metropolitan Police District in the last year.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the maximum length of days spent by a prisoner in police cells during the last year for which figures are available (a) in London and (b) elsewhere. [21604]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 1 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the maximum length of days spent by a prisoner in police cells during the last year for which figures are available (a) in London and (b) elsewhere.

This information is not collected centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. No Prison Service prisoners were held in police cells in the Metropolitan Police District in 1994.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of prisoner nights have been spent in police cells (a) in London and (b) elsewhere in England and Wales for each of the last 15 years. [21605]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 1 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General, from the office, to reply to your recent Question about what proportion of prisoner nights have been spent in police cells in London and elsewhere In England and Wales for each of the last 15 years.

Figures for the average number of prisoners held in police cells, including London, for each year since 1989 to date are given in the attached table. Separate figures for the Metropolitan Police District are not available.

Average Number of Prisoners Held in Police Cells in England and Wales: 1980–1995 (26 April 1995)

| 1995[1] | 227 |

[1] To 26 April 1995

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average number of consecutive nights spent by a prisoner in a police cell in (a) 1979, (b) 1985, (c) 1990 and (d) the last year for which figures are available. [21708]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 1 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General, from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the average number of consecutive nights spent by a prisoner in a police cell in (a) 1979, (b) 1985, (c) 1990 and (d) the last year for which figures are available.

This information is not collected centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Tariff Scheme

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in re-assessing compensation for criminal injuries how long he expects average delays to be for people who were made awards under the tariff scheme. [21271]

Mr. Maclean: Victims who received an award under the tariff scheme will keep that award. Where any reassessed award is higher than the tariff award they will be paid the balance. If the reassessed award is lower, they will not be required to refund the difference.

I understand the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board is giving urgent attention to the reassessment of awards made under the tariff scheme. Since, in many cases, additional inquiries will need to be made into such matters as loss of earnings and receipt of social security benefits, it is likely to take several months for this process to be completed.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department, or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21387]

Mr. Howard: No central comprehensive record is kept of interests or holdings which are declared by civil servants in accordance with the rules on conduct and no special adviser has declared a conflict of interest in the past five years. There is a requirement on all staff, including special advisers, to report any holdings of shares or securities, or any other business interests, where a conflict of interest might arise. General advice about this is given in standing staff instructions and is updated from time to time. This is supplemented by local advice as necessary.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much was spent on official hospitality by his Department in 1994–95. [21204]

Mr. Howard: The provisional figure for expenditure on official hospitality by my Department, including its executive agencies, in 1994–95 is £48,293.

Criminal Injuries Compensation

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to publish his Bill to cut criminal injuries compensation. [21270]

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to her on 26 April, Official Report, column 561.

Civil Service Appointments

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in his Department and the agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until 1995. [21766]

Mr. Howard: The information is as follows:

Details of appointments made at administrative assistant and administrative officer level between 1 September 1993 and 30 April 1995

| | 1/9/93–30/11/93 | | 1/12/93–28/2/94 | | 1/3/94–31/5/94 | | 1/6/94–31/8/94 | | 1/9/94–30/11/94 | | 1/12/94–28/2/95 | | 1/3/95–30/4/95 | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | AA | AO | AA | AO | AA | AO | AA | AO | AA | AO | AA | AO | AA | AO | Total number |
| Home Office excluding Prison Service | 63 | 13 | 67 | 14 | 28 | 12 | 52 | 11 | 51 | 6 | [1]373 | 5 | [1]103 | 8 | 806 |
| Prison Service | 52 | 31 | 31 | 16 | 25 | 15 | 29 | 8 | 25 | 23 | 19 | 17 | 23 | 10 | 324 |
| Total | 115 | 44 | 98 | 30 | 53 | 27 | 81 | 19 | 76 | 29 | 392 | 22 | 126 | 18 | 1,130 |

[1]The significant increase in staff recruited at AA level during these periods is due to a large number of part-year appointments made by the UK Passport Agency to cover seasonal demands for passports. The majority of these appointments have been made at regional passport offices.

Police (Languages)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the proportion of police men and police women currently serving in Wales who speak (a) Welsh, (b) Urdu and (c) Punjabi; and if he will make a statement. [20922]

Mr. Maclean: No such estimate has been made.

Mr. Raghbir Singh Johal

Mr. David Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received over the case of Mr. Raghbir Singh Johal; how many replies have been sent to those writing to him; and how many officials in his Department are involved in writing or drafting replies (a) to members of the general public and (b) to hon. Members. [21890]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Eighteen letters have been received from hon. Members and over 1,000 from members of the public. A proportion of the time of four officials of the Immigration and Nationality Department is devoted to the preparation of replies.

Temazepam

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer of 21 April, Official Report, column 309, what assessment he has made of the reasons why the quantity of the drug temazepam exported in the 1994 calendar year exceeds the amount produced domestically in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [22042]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Total figures for the amount of temazepam manufactured and exported during 1994 are not yet available. During 1993, however, exports did exceed the amount produced domestically. Temazepam is not only manufactured in the United Kingdom but is also imported in significant quantities to meet with legitimate demands, including export orders.

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer of 21 April, Official Report, column 309, what is his latest estimate of the amount of temazepam retained each year for the last five years as manufacturers' stocks, in kilograms and prescription units, ending at the close of the 1994 calendar year; and if he will make a statement. [22043]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Total figures for the amount of temazepam held as manufacturers' stocks in 1994 are not yet available. The amounts for the previous five years were as follows:

| Year | Amount (kg) |
|---|---|
| 1989 | 2,284 |
| 1990 | 2,226 |
| 1991 | 3,006 |
| 1992 | 3,978 |
| 1993 | 923 |

As the drug is prescribed in varying quantities and formulations it is not possible to convert the amount of base material available in a meaningful number of prescription units.

Racial Discrimination

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Government submitted to the United Nations its latest periodic report under the convention on the elimination of all forms of racial discrimination. [22374]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: The United Kingdom's thirteenth report under the convention on the elimination of all forms of racial discrimination was submitted to the United Nations on 21 April 1995. Copies of the report have been placed in the Library.

Boundary Commission

Mr. Channon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to announce his conclusions regarding the Boundary Commission for England in respect of changes to English parliamentary constituencies. [21811]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: My right hon. and learned Friend received the fourth periodical report of the Parliamentary Boundary Commission for England on 12 April. He is required by the Parliamentary Constituencies Act 1983 to lay the report before Parliament as soon as may be, together with a draft Order in Council for giving effect to the Commission's recommendations, with or without modification. He will do so as soon as he has completed his consideration of the report and its recommendations.

National Lottery

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what responsibility the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action, the Northern Ireland Voluntary Trust or the Northern Ireland Rural Community Network will have for the assessment of applications for grants from the National Lottery Charities Board. [21734]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Decisions on grant applications are matters for the National Lottery Charities Board. It is for the board to decide what advice to seek on the assessment of applications.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total number of (a) burglaries, (b) drug-related offences and (c) drug addicts for each year from 1965 to 1980. [21144]

Mr. Maclean: Information on the number of burglaries, the number of persons convicted of drugs offences and the number of drug addicts being treated for their addiction is given in the table.

| Year | Burglaries | Drug offenders (under Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 or earlier legislation) | [1]Drug addicts notified to the Home Office |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1965 | 251,306 | —[3] | 927 |
| 1966 | 274,278 | —[3] | 1,349 |

| 1973[4] | 384,035 | 14,977[4] | 1,816[4] |
| 1974 | 473,407 | 12,532 | 1,967 |
| 1975 | 515,429 | 11,846 | 1,949 |
| 1976 | 510,048 | 12,754 | 1,876 |
| 1977 | 598,421 | 12,907 | 2,016 |
| 1978 | 560,109 | 13,604 | 2,402 |
| 1979 | 544,037 | 14,339 | 2,666 |
| 1980 | 618,390 | 17,158 | 2,846 |

[1] Number of addicts receiving notifiable drugs as part of treatment.
[2] Theft Act 1968 came into force.
[3] Not separately identified.
[4] Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 came into force.

Stolen Vehicles

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 17 January, Official Report column 382 what was the recovery rate for stolen vehicles in 1994 (a) in total and (b) by constabulary. [21143]

Mr. Maclean: Provisional figures for 1994 are given in the table. Finalised data will be published in the command paper "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1994" later this year.

Notifiable offences of theft of a vehicle recorded by the Police, 1994 percentage of vehicles recovered by police forces area[1]

[1] Provisional.[2] Vehicles recovered in 1994 may have been recorded as stolen in earlier years.
[3] Excluding the Metropolitan Police and Dyfed-Powys.

Local Byelaws

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people in his Department are employed on proposals for new local byelaws: and what is the average length of time taken to deal with applications in each year since 1990. [21230]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: The equivalent of 4.25 full-time staff work on applications for the approval of local byelaws.

The Home Office receives about 20 new applications per month for the approval of byelaws. The statistics which are currently maintained on outstanding applications are not in a form which would permit the average length of time taken to deal with them to be calculated without disproportionate effort. However, the backlog of outstanding cases as at the end of March for the last five years is as follows:

March 1991: 196
March 1992: 186
March 1993: 143
March 1994: 179
March 1995: 158

Efforts are being made to tackle the backlog, which has been reduced by 25 per cent. over the last six months from a peak of 211 in October 1994. These efforts will continue.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people sought asylum in the United Kingdom in the last year for which figures are available; and, of these, how many (a) already had an immigration status within the United Kingdom, (b) applied for asylum within three months of their arrival in the United Kingdom, (c) applied for asylum within three months of the expiry of their leave to remain in the United Kingdom, (d) were refused asylum and (e) were given exceptional leave to remain. [21311]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Information on asylum applications and decisions made during 1994 is given in the table.

Information on the length of time that elapses before an application for asylum is made, according to the date a person either arrives in the United Kingdom or their leave to remain in the United Kingdom expires, is not available.

Decisions on applications for asylum[1] received in the United Kingdom, excluding dependants, by location of application, 1994

| | Number of principal applicants | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| | Port applications | In-Country[2] Applications | Total |
| Asylum applications[3] | 10,230 | 22,600 | 32,830 |
| Total Decisions[3,4] | 6,340 | 10,805 | 20,990 |
| Recognised as a refugee and granted asylum | 300 | 530 | 825 |
| Not recognised as a refugee, but granted exceptional leave to remain[5] | 1,785 | 1,875 | 3,660 |

| Refused asylum and ELR after full consideration | 4,255 | 8,400 | 12,655 |
| Refused on safe third country grounds[6] | — | — | 865 |
| Refused under para. 340 of the Immigration Rules[6,7] | — | — | 2,985 |

[1] Provisional figures rounded to the nearest 5.[2] The majority of in-country applicants have previously been granted leave to enter the UK in some non-asylum category.
[3] Figures exclude information on applications made overseas.
[4] Decisions do not necessarily relate to applications made in the same year.
[5] Usually granted for a year in the first instance, subject then to further review.
[6] Refusals on safe third country grounds, and refusals under para. 340 are not available split between port and in-country applications.
[7] Para. 180F prior to 1 October 1994, for failure to provide evidence to support the asylum claim within a reasonable period.

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what amount of legal aid was granted to rejected asylum seekers to pursue their appeals in each year since 1990 and in the first three months of 1995. [20763]

Mr. John M. Taylor: I have been asked to reply.

The Legal Aid Board does not record separately the cost of providing advice and assistance to asylum seekers in pursuit of their appeals to the Immigration appeals tribunal. It is therefore not possible to distinguish the cost of those cases from other cases involving immigration and nationality matters.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many rejected asylum seekers pursued their appeals (a) with and (b) without the benefit of legal representation in 1994 and in the first three months of 1995. [20762]

Mr. John M. Taylor: I have been asked to reply.

Detailed information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. In the cases heard since the beginning of 1994, the large majority of appellants have been represented.

Computer Pornography

Mr. Timms: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what steps are being taken to monitor the use of Internet and other electronic networks for obscene material relating to children; [21188]

(2) what consultations have taken place between his Department and the Association of Chief Police Officers for drawing up a national police strategy to deal with computer pornography on the Internet. [21185]

Mr. Maclean: Monitoring by the police of the Internet and other electronic networks for child pornography is an operational matter for chief officers.

The recently established inter-departmental working group on obscenity, which includes a police representative, is currently examining the problem of child and computer pornography, including the adequacy and effectiveness of the relevant law and its enforcement. This work will be complemented by that of the Association of Chief Police Officers working group on computer pornography which has been established to offer guidance on training and investigation techniques.

Mr. Timms: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have been brought under section 43 of the Telecommunications Act 1984 for the distribution of obscene material between computers using telephone lines within the United Kingdom. [21186]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: It is not possible from the information held centrally to identify offences under section 43(1) (a) of the Telecommunications Act 1984—the sending, by means of public telecommunications system, a message or other matter that is grossly offensive or of an indecent, obscene or menacing character—from other summary offences under the same Act. However, our statistics show that in 1993, the latest available, there were 1,147 prosecutions and 725 convictions for summary offences as a whole under the aforesaid Act.

Mr. Nick Leeson

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what moves he is making to secure the extradition of Mr. Nick Leeson to the United Kingdom. [21178]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: The Director of the Serious Fraud Office has commenced an inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the failure of Barings bank. The question of extradition does not arise until the Serious Fraud Office has decided whether it is appropriate to prosecute the person concerned.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which of the executive non-departmental public bodies sponsored by his Department publish (a) annual reports, (b) annual accounts, (c) the minutes of meetings, (d) the agendas of meetings and (e) registers of members' interests; and whether in each case this is (i) under a statutory requirement or (ii) voluntary. [20499]

Mr. Howard: The following is the information:

(a) Publication of annual reports

Alcohol Education and Research Council (statutory)
Commission for Racial Equality (statutory)
Community Development Foundation (voluntary)
Gaming Board for Great Britain (statutory)
Horserace Betting Levy Board (statutory)
Horserace Totalisator Board (statutory)
National Lottery Charities Board (statutory)
Office of the Data Protection Registrar (statutory)
Police Complaints Authority (statutory)

(b) Publication of annual accounts

Alcohol Education and Research Council (statutory)
Commission for Racial Equality (statutory)
Community Development Foundation (voluntary)
Gaming Board for Great Britain (voluntary)
Horserace Betting Levy Board (statutory)
Horserace Totalisator Board (statutory)
National Lottery Charities Board (statutory)
Office of the Data Protection Registrar (statutory)
Police Complaints Authority (statutory)

(c) Publication of the minutes of meetings

Community Development Foundation (voluntary)
Fire Services Examinations Board (voluntary)
In addition, the Commission for Racial Equality keeps copies of the Commissioners' monthly meetings, which are available to the public.

(d) Publication of the agendas of meetings

Community Development Foundation (voluntary)
Fire Services Examination Board (voluntary)
In addition, the Commission for Racial Equality keeps copies of the Commissioners' monthly meetings, which are available to the public.

None, although details of members interests are sometimes given in NDPB annual reports.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the executive non-departmental public bodies sponsored by his Department which are subject to (a) investigation by the Parliamentary Commissioner, (b) scrutiny by the Audit Commission, (c) scrutiny by the National Audit Office, (d) statutory provisions for open government, (e) performance indicators and (f) provisions under the citizens charter. [20659]

Mr. Howard: The executive non-departmental public bodies sponsored by the Home Office are as follows:

Alcohol Education and Research Council
Commission for Racial Equality
Community Development Foundation
Fire Services Examination Board
Gaming Board for Great Britain
Horserace Betting Levy Board
Horserace Totalisator Board
National Lottery Charities Board
Office of the Data Protection Registrar
Police Complaints Authority
Police Promotion Examinations Board

The readily available information on these bodies is as follows:

(a) Investigation by the Parliamentary Commissioner

The Commission for Racial Equality, the Horserace Betting Levy Board and the Office of the Data Protection Registrar are listed in Schedule 2 to the Parliamentary Commissioner Act 1967 (as amended) as among those bodies subject to investigation by the PCA.

(b) Scrutiny by the Audit Commission

The Audit Commission only has responsibility for local government.

(c) Scrutiny by the National Audit Office

The following bodies are subject to NAO scrutiny either by statute or by agreement:

Community Development Foundation
Commission for Racial Equality
Gaming Board
National Lottery Charities Board
Office of the Data Protection Registrar
Police Complaints Authority

(d) Statutory provisions for Open Government

There are no statutory provisions at present on Open Government which apply to my Department's NDPBs but those which are subject to scrutiny by the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration are also subject to the Code of Practice on Open Government.

(e) Performance Indicators

NDPBs are encouraged, wherever appropriate, to develop performance indicators and associated targets and to publish these.

(f) Provisions under the Citizens Charter

Not all the Home Office's executive NDPBs offer a service to the public but those that do are encouraged to adopt the principles set out in the citizens charter and to publicise how these are being reflected in their working arrangements. This has led to a statement of charter standards by the Commission for Racial Equality and the publication of customer service targets by the Gaming Board in its annual report.

Prison Population

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current prison population; and what were the figures for each of the previous four years. [20744]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 1 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the current prison population; and for the figures for each of the previous four years.

On 24 April the prison population of England and Wales was 50,659, of whom 365 were held in police cells. The average prison populations for the previous four years are shown in the table below.

| Year | Number held in prison service establishments | Number held in police cells | Total |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1994 | 48,622 | 173 | 48,795 |
| 1993 | 44,552 | 14 | 44,566 |
| 1992 | 44,720 | 1,098 | 45,818 |
| 1991 | 44,809 | 1,088 | 45,897 |

Immigration

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many applications for leave to remain in the United Kingdom made by non-United Kingdom citizens on the basis of a same-sex relationship with a citizen of the United Kingdom have been (a) accepted and (b) rejected since 1990; [20771]

(2) how many applications for leave to remain in the United Kingdom made by non-United Kingdom citizens on the basis of marriage to a citizen of the United Kingdom have been (a) accepted and (b) rejected since 1990; [20773]

(3) how many applications for leave to remain in the United Kingdom made by non-United Kingdom citizens on the basis of a heterosexual common law relationship with a citizen of the United Kingdom have been (a) accepted and (b) rejected since 1990. [20772]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: The available information is given in the table and relates to persons accepted for settlement, after completing a probationary year, on the basis of marriage to a British citizen or other person already settled here. It excludes those persons accepted for settlement at the same time as their non-British citizen spouse is accepted.

Also given are those accepted for settlement on the basis of a heterosexual common-law relationship and those refused settlement following marriage but the nationality of the settled partner of such persons is not recorded centrally.

No information is available on the outcome of applications to remain on the basis of a same-sex relationship.

Acceptances for settlement, and refusals, on the basis of marriage or a heterosexual common-law relationship, 1990 to 1994

| | Accepted for settlement[1] married to a: | | | Refused settlement after marriage[1,2] |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | British citizen | Other national | Common-law spouse | |
| 1990 | 19,620 | 4,190 | 190 | 270 |
| 1991 | 23,270 | 3,840 | 340 | 350 |
| 1992 | 22,550 | 3,530 | 300 | 520 |
| 1993 | 24,120 | 3,060 | 430 | 630 |
| 1994[3] | 23,280 | 2,790 | 510 | 780 |

[1]At the end of a 12-month period following the marriage or the admission as a spouse.

[2]Includes some common-law applications.

[3]Provisional figures.

Prisoners

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average time taken for a prison area manager to reply to an appeal that has been made by a prison inmate against a decision that has been made by a prison governor; and if he will make a statement. [20743]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from B. Landers to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 1 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to your recent Question about the average time taken for a prison area manager to reply to an appeal that has been made by a prisoner against a decision made by a prison governor.

The information requested is not readily available and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Area offices are set a target date of six weeks, from date of receipt, to answer requests and complaints from prisoners. Between 1 April 1994 and 31 March 1995, 85% of requests and complaints were answered within this set target. This figure represents an improvement on the figure for 1993–94, when 82% of requests/complaints were answered within the set target and for 1992–93, when the figure was 61%.

Prisoners, Wales

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current prison population in Wales; and what were the figures for each of the previous four years. [20774]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 1 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the current prison population in Wales; and for the figures for each of the previous four years.

On 24 April the number of prisoners being held in Prison Service establishments in Wales was 853. The average populations of establishments in Wales for the previous four years are shown in the table below. The prisoners will not necessarily have been sentenced or committed by Welsh courts nor have committed their offences in Wales.

| Year | Number held in Prison Service establishments | Number held in police cells | [1]Total |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1994 | 862 | — | 862 |
| 1993 | 859 | — | 859 |
| 1992 | 879 | 75 | 954 |
| 1991 | 873 | 91 | 964 |

Prisoners (Drugs)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the existing resources in prisons in England and Wales to encourage prisoners (a) to come off and (b) to remain off drugs. [19952]

Mr. Maclean: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Tox Cox, dated 1 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question on the existing resources available in prisons in England and Wales to encourage prisoners to come off and remain off drugs.

The Prison Service has identified the reduction of drug misuse in prisons as a strategic priority. All Prison Service establishments provide access to detoxification, education and counselling facilities to prisoners with drug misuse problems through the health care centre, probation department or community drug agencies.

The new Prison Service drug strategy will greatly increase the provision of drug treatment programmes by grouping the supply of rehabilitation programmes across several adjacent prisons. Work is already proceeding on developing the most effective treatment programmes by providing additional funding to 13 establishments in the next six months to be followed by a rolling implementation over the next three years.

The only data currently available are aggregated from a survey of 130 prisons conducted during December 1994 which showed that 119 prisons provide some form of drug treatment programme. The programmes fall into three main types: individual counselling, group therapy and intensive treatment programmes. At the time of the survey a total of 9 prisons were offering intensive rehabilitation, while 94 offered group treatment programmes and 102 offered individual counselling. A further survey into the details of detoxification treatments in prisons is planned for May.

Burglary, Hastings

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what have been the results to date of the inquiries made by the East Sussex police force in respect of the burglary in January at the headquarters of the Hastings archaeological research group; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: I understand from Sussex police that extensive inquiries have been made into the burglary that took place in January. However, the property stolen has not been recovered and no arrests have yet been made.

SOCIAL SECURITY

War Pensioners

11. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to improve the financial position of war pensioners and those widowed as a result of wartime action to coincide with the 50th anniversary of VE day. [20129]

Mr. Lilley: I recently announced that war widows pension would be restored to war widows who remarried but were subsequently widowed, divorced or legally separated.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many war widows are currently in receipt of a war widow's pension; and how many he estimates would be in receipt of such a pension if they had not remarried. [20127]

Mr. Arbuthnot: At 31 March 1995, 48,405 widows were in receipt of a war widows's pension.

We estimate that a further 45,000 widows would still be in receipt of a war widow's pension had they not remarried.

Social Security Reforms

14. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what will be the long-term effect on public spending of the social security reforms he has announced so far. [20133]

Mr. Lilley: The major reforms announced so far, particularly incapacity benefit and job seeker's allowance, will reduce projected expenditure by £4 billion a year by the end of the century.

In the next century, once the reforms contained in the Pensions Bill currently before this House have worked through, total savings will be £14 billion a year.

Pensioners (Benefits Claims)

15. Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his latest estimate of the number of pensioners who are entitled to but are not claiming (a) income support and (b) housing benefit; and if he will estimate the total amount that is not claimed. [20134]

Mr. Roger Evans: The latest estimates indicate that in 1992, between 480,000 and 860,000 pensioners may not take up entitlement to income support, worth up to a maximum of £610 million or 30 per cent. of available benefit. The comparable figures for housing benefit are between 260,000 and 340,000 and unclaimed benefit worth up to £300 million or 10 per cent. of available benefit.

Bronchitis and Emphysema

16. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the current success rate of applicants for special assistance for those suffering from chronic bronchitis and emphysema. [20135]

Mr. Hague: Of the 42,770 claims for industrial injuries disablement benefit in respect of chronic bronchitis and emphysema processed by 28 February, 4,792 have resulted in awards of benefit, representing a success rate of 11.2 per cent. This is a similar success rate to claims for other prescribed diseases.

Child Support Agency

17. Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what evidence there is that the Child Support Agency is now coping efficiently with its work load. [20136]

Mr. Burt: The agency is showing an improvement in a number of areas. This year it has completed 528,400 cases compared with 336,200 last year, and has completed almost twice as many second tier reviews. As a result, the agency expects to collect more than £70 million compared with £13.1 million last year.

19. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average length of time the Child Support Agency takes to make an assessment; and thereafter in what period those assessed have to make a payment. [20138]

Mr. Burt: The length of time taken to complete an assessment is variable as it depends on the receipt of information from various sources. Once the Agency has all the information it needs, it is currently taking 123 days to complete an assessment. Where no payment is received within 14 days from notification of the maintenance assessment, the agency can consider enforcement action.

Benefits Expenditure

18. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total expenditure of social security benefits in (a) the current financial year, (b) five years ago and (c) 10 years ago. [20137]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The figures[1] are in the table:

| Financial year | Benefit expenditure (£ million cash) |
|---|---|
| 1994–95 | [2]85,221 |
| 1989–90 | 50,174 |
| 1984–85 | 38,250 |

[1] Figures have been taken from the 1995 Social Security departmental report and an earlier equivalent.
[2] Estimated outturn.

Disabled People

20. Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures the Government are taking to help disabled people. [20139]

Mr. Hague: The Government's plans for ending discrimination against disabled people were set out fully in the White Paper published on 12 January. These include new initiatives in education and transport, in addition to the measures in the Disability Discrimination Bill for new rights in employment and access to goods and services and the establishment of a National Disability Council. These proposals, which are clear, flexible and fair, have received widespread support.

Benefit Payment Cards

21. Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to bring in an identity card system for benefit claimants. [20140]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Starting next year, we are planning to introduce benefit payment cards to replace order books and giros for people who choose to collect their benefits at the post office. These cards will allow access to payment information which will be held electronically on a database; they are not designed as identity cards. People who choose to receive their benefits directly into their bank or building society by automated credit transfer will not hold a benefit payment card.

Jobseeker's Allowance

22. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received expressing fears that the restrictions to 16 hours per week for study in the proposed jobseeker's allowance will affect people's ability to acquire new skills for the labour market. [20141]

Mr. Roger Evans: I have received a number of representations from hon. Members on behalf of their constituents and from some colleges. In each case, I have been able to assure them that the changes that we are proposing to introduce are designed to eliminate anomalies in the current rules and to allow the same number of people to study part time and claim jobseeker's allowance as do so under the current arrangements.

Habitual Residence Test

23. Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many British citizens, appealing against the habitual residence test, have been awarded social fund loans. [20142]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is not available.

Child Benefits

24. Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will propose that child benefits should be renamed child cash allowances, that the cost should be deducted in national accounts from taxes received by the Exchequer and that the levels should be decided by the Chancellor in common with personal tax allowances. [20143]

Mr. Burt: No. Child benefit is proper to this Department's vote and will continue to be treated in national accounts in the same way as all other social security benefits.

Unemployed People (Benefit Costs)

25. Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his latest estimate of the total cost in benefits to those registered as unemployed in Britain at the latest available date. [20144]

Mr. Roger Evans: The latest estimate of benefit expenditure on unemployed people for the year April 1994 to March 1995 is £9,100 million. The amount includes unemployment benefit, income support, housing benefit, council tax and social fund payments but not child benefit or family credit. This information is shown in table 5 of the Social Security Departmental Report, Cm. 2813, which is in the Library.

Benefit Income Levels

26. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security by what percentage the income of people living on benefits has changed in real terms since 1979. [20145]

Mr. Burt: Most family types receiving income support have seen a real terms rise in their benefit rates since 1979, the level of change depending on family size and composition. For example, the benefit rates for a typical unemployed couple with two children are now 24 per cent. higher in real terms than in 1979. During the same period, the income support rates of typical pensioner couple both aged between 65 and 70 have risen by 18 per cent. in real terms.

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 13 December 1994, Official Report, column 630, on the cost of reintroducing the earnings link for uprating retirement pensions and linked benefits on the basis of the assumptions used in that answer, if he will estimate the effect on national insurance contributions rates in the years form 1997–98 to 2006–7. [20974]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The table shows the estimated combined increase in the main class 1 contribution rates paid by employers and employees which would be needed to raise the additional revenue to cover the extra cost of retirement pensions and other linked benefits.

| Year | Increase in combined rate of employer and employee contributions (per cent.) |
|---|---|
| 1997–98 | 0.2 |
| 1998–99 | 0.4 |
| 1999–00 | 0.6 |
| 2000–01 | 0.8 |
| 2001–02 | 1.0 |
| 2002–03 | 1.2 |
| 2003–04 | 1.4 |
| 2004–05 | 1.6 |
| 2005–06 | 1.8 |
| 2006–07 | 2.1 |

Government Actuary's Department.

Retirement Pensions

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the savings made by paying pensions from the Monday following claimants' relevant birthdays or date of retirement. [20815]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The estimated cost of paying retirement pension for the part-week preceding the first pension pay day is £7 million at 1995–96 price levels. An equivalent amount would be saved if payment were to cease at the date of death instead of, as now, the end of the pension pay week.

To amend current payment procedures to provide for the changes outlined above would involve an additional clerical cost in the region of £2.5 million per year.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to monitor the introduction of incapacity benefit and to report his findings to the House. [20118]

Mr. Hague: All aspects of incapacity benefit will be closely monitored.

Mortgage Interest

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what discussions he has had with the Council of Mortgage Lenders regarding changes to income support payments for mortgage interest. [20131]

Mr. Roger Evans: We have had discussions with the Council of Mortgage Lenders throughout the consultation period and will continue to do so.

Residential Care

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people receive full or part payment of their care in nursing homes out of public funds; at what cost; and if he will make a statement. [20374]

Mr. Roger Evans: The latest figures, for November 1994, show that 84,000 people in nursing homes have preserved rights to the old system of income support limits. In addition, a total of 80,000 people have income support which includes residential allowance, meaning that they have been placed in nursing homes or residential care homes under the community care scheme. For these cases, it is not possible to distinguish nursing home residents from those in residential care homes.

Costings are not available for November 1994. The cost of income support for residents in nursing homes in the financial year 1993–94 was £1,280 million under the old system and the total cost for residential allowance cases was £67 million.

Currently around 280,000 people receive help through income support with residential care and nursing home fees at a cost of over £2 billion compared to 12,000 in 1979 at a cost of £10 million.

Source: Income Support Statistics May 1993–February 1994 and November 1994.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21376]

Mr. Hague: The cost of external consultancy support for the Department's market testing programmes in the period of April 1992 to 31 March 1995 is estimated as £5,551,000.

Income Support Deductions

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many recipients of income support in each region and as a percentage of the total had deductions made from their benefit for (a) poll tax arrears, (b) fuel bills and (c) social fund loan repayments in each year since 1990; and what was the total annual cash value in each category. [21287]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is set out in the table.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much was spent on official hospitality by his Department in 1994–95. [21202]

Mr. Hague: Expenditure information for the 1994–95 financial year has not yet been finalised, but on present information the total amount spent on hospitality in that year by the Department of Social Security was £127,839.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn : To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21397]

Mr. Hague: In the Department and agencies for which I am responsible, any conflict of interest involving a civil servant would have been dealt in accordance with established guidance. Comprehensive records are not held centrally.

There have been no reports of special advisers declaring conflicts of interest in the last five years.

Civil Servants

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in his Department and the agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21773]

Mr. Hague: The information is in the table:

| Quarter | Administrative assistant | Administrative officer |
|---|---|---|
| 1 October 1993–31 December 1993 | 2,182 | 1,243 |
| 1 January 1994–31 March 1994 | 2,462 | 900 |
| 1 April 1994–30 June 1994 | 3,053 | 1,346 |
| 1 July 1994–30 September 1994 | 3,423 | 1,662 |
| 1 October 1994–31 December 1994 | 2,936 | 1,068 |
| 1 January 1995–31 March 1995 | 3,421 | 963 |

Note:
The figures include staff recruited on a permanent, casual or fixed-term contract basis plus those reinstated or transferred from other government departments.

Personal Pensions

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the number of people paying contributions to a personal pension scheme in each year since 1988 under the categories (a) self-employed contributors, (b) employed contributors not contracted-out of the state earnings-related pension scheme; (c) employed contributors contracted-out of SERPS, receiving DSS rebate only contributions to the scheme and (d) employed contributors, contracted-out of SERPS making personal payments in addition to DSS rebates. [21839]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The information on employees' personal pensions is in the table. I shall let the hon. Member have a reply on the number of self-employed contributors to personal pensions as soon as possible.

| Type of scheme | 1988–89 | 1989–90 | 1990–91 | 1991–92 | 1992–93 | [1]1993–94 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| PP with employee contributions[2] | 350 | 1,050 | 1,600 | 2,150 | 2,500 | 2,500 |

| Type of scheme | 1988–89 | 1989–90 | 1990–91 | 1991–92 | 1992–93 | [1]1993–94 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| APP based on minimum contributions[3] only | 850 | 2,450 | 2,750 | 3,050 | 3,050 | 2,900 |
| APP with employee contributions | 500 | 1,500 | 1,900 | 2,100 | 2,550 | 2,650 |

[2] The figures for PP's with employee contributions show the number of PP arrangements—this will include a number of people who also have an APP or have more than one PP. It will also include a small number of APP's and PP's where the employee pays no additional contributions but the employer does.

[3] Minimum contributions include the National Insurance rebate and any incentives or additions. Tax relief on the employee's share of the minimum contributions is also payable.

Note:

PP means a personal pension not contracted out of SERPS.

APP means an appropriate personal pension contracted out of SERPS.

WALES

Animal Diseases

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many cases of tuberculosis in cattle were reported in each county in each year since 1985. [20551]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Complete information in the form requested is not available and information which is available for the years 1985 to 1987 could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The numbers of confirmed cattle tuberculosis breakdowns in each county of Wales in each of the years from 1988 to 1991 were as follows:

| County | Year(s) in which cases occurred | Number of herds | Number of confirmed reactors |
|---|---|---|---|
| Clwyd | 1989 | 1 | 1 |
| Dyfed | 1988 | 12 | 16 |
| | 1989 | 5 | 9 |
| | 1990 | 8 | 21 |
| | 1991 | 3 | 4 |
| West Glamorgan | 1988 | 1 | 1 |
| Gwent | 1989 | 1 | 4 |
| Powys | 1989 | 1 | 1 |

In the period 1992–1994 the numbers of confirmed cattle tuberculosis breakdowns in each of the animal health offices' administrative areas were as follows:

| Animal health office area | Year(s) in which cases occurred | Number of herds | Number of confirmed reactors |
|---|---|---|---|
| Dyfed | 1992 | 12 | 34 |
| | 1993 | 15 | 62 |
| | 1994 | 38 | 188 |
| Gwent/South, West and Mid Glamorgan | 1992 | 3 | 3 |
| | 1993 | 10 | 28 |
| | 1994 | 18 | 46 |
| Gwynedd and Clwyd | 1993 | 1 | 1 |
| Powys | 1994 | 6 | 25 |

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many cases of Teschen disease occurred in each year since 1975. [21098]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: No cases of Teschen disease have occurred in Wales since 1975.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many cases of African swine fever there have been in each year since 1985. [21064]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: No cases of African swine fever have occurred in Wales since 1985.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many cases of vesicular stomatitis occurred in each year since 1985. [21139]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: No cases of vesicular stomatitis have occurred in Wales since 1 June 1991. This disease only became notifiable on that date and official records prior to that were not collected, although I am not aware that there has ever been a case of this disease in Great Britain.

Lougher Estuary

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what land has been purchased on behalf of the Countryside Council for Wales in the Lougher estuary; by whom this land was purchased; for how much; and for what specific purpose this purchase has been made. [21254]

Mr. Redwood: A total of 29.9 hectares of land, mainly salt marsh, in the Lougher estuary near Lougher, West Glamorgan was bought from the Land Authority for Wales by the Countryside Council for Wales for a nominal sum because it was on offer and is part of the Lougher estuary site of special scientific interest.

Cardiff Bay

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress has been made to date on the provision of compensation areas in respect of conservation interests lost by the Cardiff Bay Barrage proposal; and if he will make a statement. [21252]

Mr. Redwood: A working group comprising the Countryside Council for Wales, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and the Land Authority for Wales are currently considering a report on the outcome of studies into suitable sites along the South Wales coastline between the Burry inlet and the Gwent levels.

Following advice from the working group, I expect to make an announcement about site acquisition shortly.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list (a) the estimated actual spending for 1994–95, (b) the standard spending assessment for 1995–96, (c) the amounts by which (b) exceeds or falls short of (a), and (d) the percentage by which (b) exceeds or falls short of

(a) for (i) each district council, (ii) each county council and (iii) Wales; and if he will make a statement. [20376]

Mr. Redwood: Information on 1994–95 revenue expenditure budgets and 1995–96 SSAs is given in the following table. Outturn expenditure for 1994–95 is not yet available. Budgeted expenditure includes spending financed through the use of reserves and spending about SSAs within capping limits and is not directly comparable with SSAs.

[1] Net revenue expenditure for 1994–95. The figures have been adjusted for the transfer of police services and changes to recoupment to provide comparability with SSAs but have not been adjusted for the transfer of the careers service. 1995–96 count SSAs include the additional resources for care in the community. 1994–95 expenditure includes £46.3 million funded through the use of reserves and £66.8 million spending above SSA within capping limits. Includes community councils.

School and University Teachers' Pay

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the relative real term salary increases of teachers and university lecturers. [20929]

Mr. Richards: Comparisons between school teacher and lecturer salary increases are not meaningful. Teachers' salaries flow from recommendations of the School Teachers' Review Body. The salaries of lecturers result from negotiations between employers and employee representatives. In recent years the salary movement of both groups has had to take account of Government policy for pay in the public sector. Between April 1979 and April 1994 the average salary of a teacher rose by 60 per cent. in real terms as measured by the new earnings survey. In the same period the average salary of a university academic rose by 27 per cent. in real terms as measured by the new earnings survey.

Health Service Appointments

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will publish an up-to-date list of all the chairs and non-executive directors of each NHS trust board, indicating the gender and occupation of each individual and; [21357]

(2) if he will publish an up-to-date list by region of all the chairs and non-executive members of each health authority, indicating the gender and occupation of each individual. [21360]

Mr. Richards: The information requested is given in "Appointments by the Secretary of State for Wales 1 March 1995", which is available in the Library of the House.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21380]

Mr. Redwood: Market testing has been undertaken as part of the "Competing for Quality" programme.

The estimated cost of consultants engaged in this respect from April 1992 to date is £287,600.

Mink Farms

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the number of licenced mink farms in each year since 1989.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: There have been no licensed mink farms in Wales at any time since 1989.

European Funding

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will list those projects in privatised companies which have received European social fund support since privatisation indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received; [21295]

(2) if he will list those public projects which received European social fund support and were subsequently privatised over the last 10 years, indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [21294]

Mr. Redwoood: No such privatised companies in Wales have applied for European social fund support since 1990. Information for the years before 1990 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 10 January, Official Report, column 51, if he will list those projects in privatised companies which have received European regional development funding since privatisation indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [20578]

Mr. Redwood: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him today by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade.

Illiteracy

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the current reported rate of illiteracy; and what were the figures in each of the previous four years. [20695]

Mr. Richards: The adult basic skills unit annual report for 1994 looked at those people who lack "basic skills", which are defined as "the ability to read, write, speak, and use mathematics at a level necessary to function and progress at work and in society in general".

The report does not contain a figure for Wales on its own.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much was spent on official hospitality by his Department in 1994–95. [21210]

Mr. Redwood: A total of £28,784.

Civil Servants

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in his Department and the agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21778]

Mr. Redwood: During the period in question my Department, including its executive agency Cadw, appointed seven substantive administrative staff as follows:

four administrative officers and two administrative assistants in the September quarter 1993;

one administrative assistant in the December quarter 1994.

Welsh Health Common Services Authority

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 5 April, Official Report, column 1130, if he will place in the Library a copy of his letter of 28 March 1994 to the Welsh Health Common Services Authority. [21937]

Mr. Redwood: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 21 February 1995, Official Report, column 124.

University Hospital of Wales

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he has received the business case for the highway infrastructure related to the expansion of the University hospital of Wales; if the Eastern avenue east on-slip is expected to be part of that highway infrastructure; and which elements of the University hospital of Wales highway infrastructure package require Treasury approval. [21936]

Mr. Redwood: An outline business case for the westbound slip road proposal is being prepared by the University hospital of Wales Healthcare NHS trust but has not yet been received. The eastbound slip road proposal is included within the outline business case for a multi-storey carpark at the UHW which has received approval to move to the next stage of testing private sector interest in the proposal. Treasury approval would be required for either slip road if, in the event, public funds were needed to progress these developments.

Apprenticeships

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the total amount of public support given to the modern apprentice scheme for Wales and for each county or training area; what proportion was spent by employers, training and enterprise councils and other identifiable groups for the last three available years; and if he will make a statement. [20377]

Mr. Richards: A total of £1.285 million was made available in 1994–95 to the seven Welsh TECs to support the introduction of modern apprenticeships. This sum was supplemented by a further £10.262 million for the purchase of capital equipment of which the Welsh TECs and other organisations in both the public and private sectors contributed £1.074 million.

Alongside this, colleges used some of the funding made available to them by the Further Education Funding Council for Wales—£144.985 million in 1994–95—to support modern apprenticeships.

The development of modern apprenticeships is fundamental to sustaining the competitive edge that Welsh industry needs to compete in world markets. In 1994–95, the first year of modern apprenticeships, I made manufacturing engineering a priority. In 1995–96, while continuing to give a high priority to manufacturing, I am extending support for modern and accelerated modern apprenticeships to other key occupational areas needed by Welsh businesses. These initiatives will allow for up to 3,400 young people to start apprenticeship training.

Figures in the following table set out the funding I made available in each of the TEC areas in 1994–95. No figures are available on the amounts spent by employers or other identifiable groups.

Welsh Office funding

| TEC areas | Programme costs £ millions | Capital costs £ millions | Additional contributions to capital costs by TECs and other organisations £ millions |
|---|---|---|---|
| Gwent | 0.189 | 1.556 | 0.275 |
| Mid Glamorgan | 0.214 | 1.640 | 0.228 |
| North East Wales | 0.140 | 0.705 | 0.107 |

| TEC areas | Welsh Office funding: Programme costs £ millions | Welsh Office funding: Capital costs £ millions | Additional contributions to capital costs by TECs and other organisations £ millions |
|---|---|---|---|
| North West Wales | 0.171 | 1.023 | 0.098 |
| Powys | 0.057 | 0.459 | 0.029 |
| South Glamorgan | 0.130 | 1.375 | 0.157 |
| West Wales | 0.384 | 2.420 | 0.180 |
| Total | 1.285 | 9.188 | 1.074 |

Doctors and Nurses (Languages Spoken)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, (1) what estimate he has made of the proportion of doctors practising in Wales who speak (a) Welsh, (b) Punjabi and (c) Urdu; and if he will make a statement; [20920]

(2) what estimate he has made of the proportion of nurses working in Wales who speak (a) Welsh, (b) Punjabi and (c) Urdu; and if he will make a statement. [20921]

Mr. Richards: None. This information is not held centrally.

NHS Cost Improvement Programme

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the total annual cost improvement programme in the National Health Service provider units in each of the last four years. [21332]

Mr. Richards: In the latest available four years, the minimum efficiency savings targets, including cash-releasing cost improvement programmes, set for the NHS in Wales were as follows:

| Year | Per cent. |
|---|---|
| 1990–91 | 1.1 |
| 1991–92 | 1.1 |
| 1992–93 | 1.1 |

of authorities' recurrent revenue cash allocations. This resulted in cumulative cash releasing savings over the four years of £53 million at 1993–94 prices.

The minimum efficiency target for 1994–95 was 2.7 per cent., which included a target of 1.3 per cent. for further cash-releasing cost improvement savings—forecast cash savings of £17 million—and 0.45 per cent. or £6 million in respect of savings to be achieved through reductions in management costs. For 1995–96 the minimum efficiency target is 3 per cent., which includes a further £3.25 million cash savings for reductions in management, administrative and clerical costs.

It is for the health authority to determine in its contracts with service providers how the remaining efficiency target should be split between cash-releasing savings and activity increases generated by increased production.

Conflicts Of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interests; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21401]

Mr. Redwood: The Department and agencies for which I am responsible deal with any conflicts of interest involving civil servants in accordance with the established guidance. The information requested is not held centrally.

In the last five years, one special adviser has declared a conflict of interest.

Falconry

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many licences have been issued in each year since 1988 to possess birds of prey; and what were the numbers of birds of each species held under such licences. [21244]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him today by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many permits have been issued to falconers to take protected species of birds as quarry in each year since 1988; what were the species in respect of which such permits were issued; and what were the numbers of each species taken. [21246]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The responsibility for the issue of licences did not devolve to the Welsh Office until 1991. Details of licences issued to take protected species in Wales in the course of falconry for the period 1992–93 are listed in the following table.

| Species | Number of licenses[1] | Birds killed |
|---|---|---|
| 1992 | | |
| Alauda arvensis | 4 | 16 |
| Anthus pratensis | — | 1 |
| 1993 | | |
| Turdus merula | 3 | 16 |
| 1994 | | |
| Turdus merula | 5 | 8 |
| Alauda arvensis | — | 20 |
| Anthus pratensis | — | 1 |
| 1995 | | |
| Alauda arvensis | 1 | 19 |
| Anthus pratensis | — | 3 |

[1] Licenses covered all or some of the named species.
Turdus merula—Blackbird
Alauda arvensis—Skylark
Anthus pratensis—Meadow pipit.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Dog Breeders

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what plans he has to introduce legislation to require dog breeding establishments to incorporate RSPCA guidelines and to be registered with the Kennel Club. [22057]

(2) what representations he has received about the conditions and welfare of dogs at breeding establishments, and if he will make a statement. [22056]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans for extending the current legal controls over dog breeding establishments.

All domestic and captive animals are protected against ill treatment by the Protection of Animals Act 1911. Additionally, establishments where dogs are bred for sale are subject to the controls of the Breeding of Dogs Act 1973, which requires dog breeders to be licensed by the local authority. It is for local authorities, which have extensive powers to check on the standards of health, welfare and accommodation of the dogs, to enforce the legislation. These powers were strengthened by the Breeding of Dogs Act 1991, which allows local authorities to enter under warrant any premises other than domestic dwellings, where it is believed that a dog breeding business is carried out.

The Department has received 11 letters from Members of Parliament following an article on dog breeding establishments published by the News of the World on 16 April 1995.

Civil Servants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22084]

Mr. Howard: This information is not readily available.

Anti-Semitic Material

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has made to the Irish Government about anti-Semitic material being distributed within or from the Republic; and if he will make a statement. [22303]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: None. The distribution of any such material within the Irish Republic is a matter for the Irish Government. I am not aware of any specific concerns regarding its possible distribution to the United Kingdom.

Prison Service Plans

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the Prison Service's plans for the period 1995 to 1998. [22402]

Mr. Howard: The Prison Service's corporate plan for 1995 to 1998, together with its business plan setting out its detailed programme of work for 1995–96, are being published today. Copies are being placed in the Library.

The business plan sets as the service's top priority for 1995–96 improvement in performance on security. The other priorities are implementing incentives for good behaviour by prisoners; implementing the controls on temporary release I announced on 18 November 1994, and ensuring that every prison has an effective strategy for detecting and dealing with drug abuse.

The business plan also sets out the service's key targets for 1995–96, which are:

1. To ensure that no category A prisoners escape.
2. To ensure that the total numbers of escapes from prison establishments and from escorts, expressed as a percentage of the average prison population, is at least 25 per cent. lower than in 1994–95.
3. To ensure that the rate of assaults on staff, prisoners and others, expressed as a percentage of the average prison population, is lower than in 1994–95.
4. To ensure that no prisoners are held three to a cell in accommodation intended for one prisoner, subject to ensuring that no prisoners are held in police cells unless this is absolutely unavoidable.
5. To ensure that all prisoners have access to sanitation at all times by the end of February 1996, provided that the prison population does not increase significantly above current projections and there is no major unplanned loss of accommodation.
6. To ensure that prisoners spend, on average, at least 25.5 hours per week in purposeful activity.
7. To ensure that by 31 March 1996 at least 38 per cent. of prisoners are held in establishments where prisoners are unlocked on weekdays for at least 12 hours, provided this can be supported by an active and constructive regime.
8. To ensure that all prisoners have the opportunity to exceed minimum visiting entitlements, subject to qualifying under earned incentive schemes.
9. To ensure that the average cost per prisoner place does not exceed £24,600.

Drugs Control

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when was the last time that he met Dr. Lee Brown, director of the United States Office of National Drug Control Policy; and what was the purpose of the meeting. [22403]

Mr. Howard: I last met Dr. Brown on 24 April to sign a memorandum of understanding on counter-drug technologies. The memorandum of understanding will promote co-operation between my Department and his on the development of technologies to assist the fight against drugs. Four key areas will initially be covered by the programme of cooperation. These are information technology, treatment and prevention of drug misuse, police communications and surveillance technologies, and systems for detecting illicit goods. The signing of the memorandum of understanding is another example of this country's determination to work with others to tackle the international menace of drugs misuse.

Deportees

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many pregnant women given refusal notices or deported have (a) given birth or (b) had medical difficulties on the aircraft in each of the last five years; [21983]

(2) how many women, pregnant over 30 weeks, were given refusal notices in each of the last five years and returned to the country from which they departed for the United Kingdom. [21984]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people lawfully resident in the United Kingdom and without any charges or criminal convictions against them have been deported on grounds of national security in the past five years; and what was their average length of lawful residence in the United Kingdom. [21891]

Mr. Nicholas Baker [holding answer 1 May 1995]: One person without a charge or criminal conviction against him has been removed from the United Kingdom under the deportation process on grounds of national security in the last five years. He had been resident in the United Kingdom for nearly three years at the time of removal. This excludes persons who departed voluntarily after being issued with a notice of intention to deport.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many residents, lawfully in the United Kingdom and without any charges or criminal convictions against them, have been the subject of deportation orders in the last five years; [21591]

(2) how many people, lawfully resident in the United Kingdom for more than 10 years and without any charges or criminal convictions, have been subject to deportation orders in the last 10 years. [21592]

Mr. Nicholas Baker [holding answer 28 April 1995]: The available information relates to all persons issued with a notice of intention to deport on national security grounds. Identifying and excluding those with a charge or criminal conviction against them would involve disproportionate cost. Some 202 such notices have been issued since 1990, including 176 at the time of the Gulf war. Six persons who have lived in the United Kingdom for more than 10 years have been issued with such a notice since 1985.

TREASURY

Investment Companies

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made with the Treasury's plans for legislation to enable the formation of open-ended investment companies in the United Kingdom. [22401]

Mr. Nelson: The Treasury has today published a consultation document containing draft regulations to be made, subject to the approval of both Houses, under the European Communities Act 1972. I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library.

The regulations will permit a new investment vehicle which will be a type of collective investment scheme, like the familiar authorised unit trust, but constituted as a corporate body. Its shareholders will pool their investment funds and thus gain the advantage of access to expert investment management with the ability to spread their investment risks. The open-ended investment company has been formulated deliberately to offer the same standard of investor protection as the unit trust but using a more modern and flexible approach.

The draft ECA regulations will establish a special purpose corporate code which delineates the basic structure of the open ended investment company. Each company will have a board, including a designated corporate director charged with day-to-day responsibility for managing the invested assets of the company, which will be held in trust by a depositary. The company will have annual general meetings at which the directors will account to the company's shareholders for their stewardship of the company and its assets.

To complete the regulatory framework for the open ended investment company, the Securities and Investments Board will issue product regulations, about which it will also consult shortly. These regulations will specify that shares in open-ended investment companies are to be bought and sold at a single price on each trading day, in contrast to the spread between the prices at which units in unit trusts are bought and sold now. SIB will also regulate the different classes of shares which open-ended investment companies may have. These regulations will allow umbrella companies with a number of subfunds each allotted to a different category of investments.

In due course there will also be regulations made under the Finance Act 1995 to define the tax treatment of open ended investment companies. The new regime will be equivalent to the taxation arrangements for authorised unit trusts.

Because the proposed regulations are to be made under the ECA, they will permit only open ended investment companies which satisfy the UCITS—undertakings for collective investment in transferable securities—directive. Subject to further consultation, the Treasury is also exploring the scope for widening the investment and borrowing powers available to open ended investment companies by means of an order made under the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Civil Servants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years.

Mr. John M. Taylor: This information is not held by my Department in a readily accessible form. The information which the hon. Member has requested is being collated and I will provide him with a substantive answer shortly.

ENVIRONMENT

Endangered Species

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many import permits for the convention on international trade in endangered species appendix I species of cranes his Department has issued in 1994 and 1995. [21831]

Sir Paul Beresford: In 1994 my Department issued nine permits allowing the import of specimens of crane listed in appendix I of CITES. So far, in 1995, one permit has been issued.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the population of (a) pine martens (b) peregrine falcons, (c) hen harriers and (d) sparrowhawks in each year since 1980; and what is his estimate of the amount of damage each species does to game birds. [21850]

Sir Paul Beresford: My Department's statutory advisors, the Joint Nature Conservation Committee, advise that annual population estimates are not available for these species. Specific surveys have been undertaken for each species since 1980 and the most up-to-date figures for England are as follows:

| Year | Species | Population |
|---|---|---|
| 1987–88 | Pine marten | 100 individuals |
| 1991 | Peregrine falcons | 308 pairs |
| 1993 | Hen harriers | 16 pairs |
| 1986 | Sparrowhawks | There is no separate figure for England, but the population in Great Britain was last estimated at 32,000 pairs. |

There is no reliable information available on whether pine marten, peregrine falcons, hen harriers and sparrowhawks affect game bird populations.

Leeds Development Corporation

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much was spent on public relations and publicity by the Leeds development corporation in each financial year of its existence. [21610]

Sir Paul Beresford: Leeds development corporation's expenditure on public relations and publicity, which includes the corporation's promotional and marketing activity was £223,000 in 1988–89, £324,000 in 1989–90, £480,000 in 1990–91, £499,000 in 1991–92, £300,000 in 1992–93, £250,000 in 1993–94 and £228,000 in 1994–95. These payments constitute about 3 per cent. of the corporation's expenditure, which has attracted a total of £357 millions of private sector investment—a public to private leverage ratio of 1 to 6.4.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the assets transferred from the Leeds development corporation to Leeds city council, together with their value. [21612]

Sir Paul Beresford: Amenity and highway land with a nil market value were transferred from Leeds development corporation's ownership to Leeds city council prior to the winding up of the corporation. In addition, an endowment of £200,001 has been paid to the city council to cover maintenance in perpetuity of landscaping works undertaken by the corporation.

Civil Servants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22087]

Sir Paul Beresford: Compensation payments for early retirement on grounds of limited efficiency are age, salary and service related. Details of limited efficiency early retirements for each of the last five financial years are as follows:

| | Annual compensation payment to age 60 (rate pa) £ | Superannuation lump sum £ | Lump sum compensation payment £ | Compensation in lieu of notice (if any) £ |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1990–91 Compulsory | None | None | None | Not available in the time given |
| Flexible | 8,212 | 24,935 | Nil | |
| 1991–92 Compulsory | None | None | None | Not available in the time given |

Local Government Boundaries

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will announce a timetable for the review of metropolitan authority boundaries with particular reference to Southport, Merseyside and Lancashire. [22001]

Mr. Curry: We are considering whether to direct the Local Government Commission to conduct boundary reviews of certain metropolitan areas, and will make an announcement in due course. We expect that any reviews of metropolitan areas will be conducted after the commission has completed the shire district structural reviews, which we hope will be by early 1996.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will make an announcement in response to the final recommendation of the Local Government Commission concerning the move of Billericay from Basildon district council to form Brentwood and Billericay district council. [22002]

Mr. Curry: Basildon district is to be referred to the Local Government Commission for a further review which will examine the structure of local government in the area. No decision on boundaries can sensibly be taken until the commission has made its recommendations on the wider question of structure.

Cammell Laird Site, Birkenhead

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will report the progress which has been made since last summer with his attempts to use the offices of English Partnership to set up a venture with English Partnerships and VSEL on the Lairds site in Birkenhead. [22213]

Sir Paul Beresford: English Partnerships and VSEL have been working closely together on proposals for the redevelopment of the Cammell Laird site. One important objective, the continued use of the northern part of the site for ship repair activity, has been secured following the announcement today of the sale of that part of the site to the newly named Cammell Laird Industries. This follows closely on the decision of Mackie Automotive Systems to establish themselves in one of the existing buildings on the southern part of the site.

VSEL and English Partnerships intend to continue to work together within a broad framework to achieve development of the rest of the site and build on the increased industrial interest that is being shown; they are discussing the form that arrangement might take.

Housing Benefit (Reversionary Interest)

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will change the housing benefit regulations to adopt the definition of reversionary interest in use in Northern Ireland. [20346]

Mr. Roger Evans: I have been asked to reply.

A recent Court of Appeal judgment has held that property in England or Wales which the claimant owns but which is let to tenants is a reversionary interest. This means that in all cases the value of such property has to be disregarded as a capital resource when entitlement to housing benefit is assessed. We propose to bring forward amending regulations to rectify this situation. We are currently considering the form that this amendment should take.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 2 May. [20380]

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 2 May 1995. [20379]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Barings Bank

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Prime Minister what meetings he has had with directors or executives of Barings bank since 1990. [21130]

The Prime Minister: None. However, directors and executives of Barings bank have been present at a number of functions that I have attended since 1990.

Crown Copyright

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the ownership of (a) top copies of his speeches, (b) treaty agreements signed by him in his capacity as Prime Minister, (c) original copies of letters received by him from her Majesty, (d) original copies of correspondence or other communications received by him from the heads of Government and (e) original copies of correspondence, minutes, records of meetings or other documents and communications with or in relation to or from ministers or public bodies. [22216]

The Prime Minister: Papers in all the categories listed belong to the Crown, with the exception of top copies of speeches made in a personal capacity or as a constituency Member of Parliament, and correspondence of a purely personal nature.

Churchill Documents

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer of 27 April to the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), Official Report, column 97, if he will place in the Library details of those papers of Sir Winston Churchill being purchased by the national heritage memorial fund. [22215]

The Prime Minister: This is a matter for the national heritage memorial fund. I have asked the chairman to write to the hon. Member, placing a copy of his letter in the Library of the House.

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Prime Minister (1) what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunities matters; [21512]

(2) what progress he hopes to achieve in his Department over the next three months to push forward the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the fourth UN conference on women; and if he will agree to incorporate a section on equal opportunities in his Department's annual report; [21514]

(3) if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department; [21513]

(4) which Minister in his Department has responsibility for equal opportunities issues. [21511]

The Prime Minister: For these purposes, my office is part of the Cabinet Office. I refer the hon. Member to the replies given today by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service and Science.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Prime Minister on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21392]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 1 May 1995]: For this purpose, my office is part of the Cabinet Office and I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 1 May Official Report, column 77.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Prime Minister, if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market-testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21381]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 1 May 1995]: For this purpose my office is part of the Cabinet Office and I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 1 May Official Report, column 76.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Auditors Supervisory Bodies

Mr. Lidington: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he has received the third annual reports of the recognised supervisory bodies for company auditors under part II of the Companies Act 1989; and if he will make a statement. [22600]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I have received the third annual reports of all the recognised supervisory bodies for company auditors, and have placed copies in the Library of the House. My Department will be discussing the contents of the reports with the bodies.

Film Distribution Industry

Mr. Cran: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make it his policy to promote competition in the film distribution industry in the United Kingdom. [21989]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Following the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the supply of films for exhibition in cinemas in the UK, published on 6 October 1994, the Director General of Fair Trading is currently, at my request, seeking undertakings from nine distributors and six exhibitors named as monopolists in the report to cease the practice of alignment and to restrict minimum exhibition periods. The DGFT will report to me on the outcome of his negotiations by 10 July 1995.

Ship Building

Mr. Loyden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the gross tonnage of merchant ships built in UK yards in each year since 1965; and if he will make a statement. [21868]

Mr. Page: The information is in the table:

Merchant ships built in UK yards

CSO—Annual Abstract of Statistics

Insolvency Service

Mr. McAllion: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he intends to lay before Parliament a draft enabling order for contracting out work of the Insolvency Service agency. [21809]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: A draft order to enable the contracting out of certain of the Official Receivers' functions was laid before Parliament for the approval of both Houses on Friday 28 April 1995.

Nuclear Installations Inspectorate

Mr. McFall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what discussions he has had with the nuclear installations inspectorate over the possible awarding of licences for operators; [22062]

(2) what discussions he has had recently with Her Majesty's chief inspector of nuclear installations. [22064]

Mr. Page: I have had no recent discussions with the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate although my officials have frequent discussions with it on issues relating to its nuclear regulatory activities.

Telephone Services, Northern Ireland

Mr. McGrady: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when competition will be introduced to the supply of telephone services in Northern Ireland. [21124]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Competition has existed in the supply of telecommunications services in Northern Ireland for some years, in the form of Mercury and mobile cellular services. Further competition will be introduced by the issue of a local delivery operator licence for cable. Applications for the Northern Ireland LDO franchise are currently under consideration and a franchise will be awarded in due course.

Civil Servants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the President to the Board of Trade if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22077]

Mr. Heseltine: Compensation payments for early retirement on grounds of limited efficiency are age, salary and service related. The Department has had only one such retirement in the last five years. The details are as follows:

| | Annual compensation payment to age 60 (rate pa) | Superannuation lump sum | Lump sum compensation payment | Compensation in lieu of notice (if any) |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1990–91 | | | | |
| Flexible | 0 | 43,455 | 0 | 0 |

Public Records

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list by grade and post those who have responsibility for deciding which internal documents held by his Department should be considered for archiving by the Public Record Office. [21991]

Mr. Heseltine: The Department follows the Public Record Office's recommended practice of reviewing papers when they are 10 years old and, if retained at that stage, again at 25 years old in order to reach a decision as to whether they are worthy of permanent preservation at the Public Record Office.

This two-stage review is carried out by a team of two higher executive officers and 10 executive officers.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the DTI inspectors' report into the share dealing activities of Lord Archer of Weston-super-Mare will be passed to the Public Record Office. [21992]

Mr. Heseltine: The Department follows the Public Record Office's recommended practice of reviewing papers when they are 10 years old and, if retained at that stage, again at 25 years old in order to reach a decision as to whether they are worthy of permanent preservation at the Public Record Office.

The report by inspectors appointed under section 177 of the Financial Services Act 1986 to investigate dealings in the shares of Anglia Television Group plc will be treated in accordance with the above policy.

The disclosure of information obtained by inspectors under section 177 of the Financial Services Act is prohibited by virtue of section 179 of that Act. Section 5(3) of the Public Records Act 1958 provides for public access to records except when the disclosure of those records is subject to a statutory bar on disclosure such as section 179 of the Financial Services Act.

Small Businesses (Financial Advice)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals he has for developing the range and diversity of financial advice for small and medium enterprises. [21824]

Mr. Page: The emerging network of business links across England has a vital role to play in advising businesses on the range of financing options open to them, and in advising the providers of finance and finance services of the needs of growing businesses. A task force of senior members of the financial community has made recommendations to me on the specific services which business links should be offering to their customers in this important area. The implementation of those recommendations is currently being discussed with the business link network with the aim of these services being available across the network from early next year.

Plutonium

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, what quantities of plutonium fuel rods have been manufactured at AWE Aldermaston for the prototype fast reactor at Dounreay; when these rods were manufactured; and what safeguards arrangements applied to their production and storage. [22031]

Mr. Page: A total of 29 clusters of experimental PFR fuel were made in a special facility at Aldermaston between 1962 and 1972. The PFR production fuel elements were later manufactured at Windscale. At the time of this campaign Aldermaston was run by UKAEA. The campaign took place before Euratom safeguards or the UK-Euratrom-IAEA agreement came into effect. The UKAEA exercised stringent nuclear material accountancy controls on all materials, including those in question. The plutonium used was part of a stock assigned to the fast reactor programme. The programme had no links to weapons work at Aldermaston.

Iraq

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what investigations he has carried out into the activities of Mr. Riad Al Taher; [21693]

(2) what representations he has received from Mr. Riad Al Taher about sanctions against Iraq; and if he will make a statement. [21694]

Mr. Needham [holding answers 28 April 1995]: We have not had any representations from Mr. Riad Al Taher and have not carried out any investigations into his activities.

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what assistance his Department will give to the Iraqi-British Interests Group on its forthcoming visit to Iraq; [21701]

(2) if he will make a statement on the relationship between his Department and Mr. Edmund Sykes; [21692]

(3) if he will make a statement on the forthcoming visit by the Iraqi-British Interests Group to Iraq; [21700]

(4) what requests for assistance his Department has received from the Iraqi-British Interests Group for its forthcoming visit to Iraq; [21702]

(5) if he will make a statement on the relationship between his Department and Mr. Stephen Crouch. [21691]

Mr. Needham [holding answers 28 April 1995]: The Iraqi-British Interests Group is an independent lobby group which has no official standing. My Department has no details of any specific visit to Iraq to be made by it. It has not made any requests for assistance in connection with such a visit; nor would we be prepared to provide organisational support for it to visit Iraq. Acts calculated to promote the supply of goods to or from Iraq would require a licence from my Department. Applications are dealt with on a case-by-case basis but licences are normally issued only for exports or discussions relating to goods permitted under sanctions—that is, humanitarian goods. Any contacts with Mr. Edmund Sykes and Mr. Stephen Crouch have been those necessary for the exercise of my Department's responsibilities.

Lloyd's

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are his departmental estimates for the liability for payment by Lloyd's names during the years (a) 1995 and (b) 1996; and what are his estimates of how much can be met without recourse to Lloyd's central funds. [22071]

Mr. Jonathan Evans [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The Department neither needs nor is required to make such estimates in the exercise of its responsibilities under sections 83 to 86 of the Insurance Companies Act 1982. Any estimate of the amounts to be called from Lloyd's names would be speculative as the cash calls on names have yet to be declared during 1995, and the results to be declared during 1996 cannot be predicted with any precision.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what supervision his Department will make of those Lloyd's names who have become insolvent and whose calls cannot be supported by Lloyd's funds supervised by his Department. [22072]

Mr. Jonathan Evans [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Any Lloyd's name who failed to meet the solvency requirement prescribed in section 83 (4) and (5) of the Insurance Companies Act 1982 would become subject to the Secretary of State's supervisory powers contained in part II of the Act. The particular use of those powers would depend on the circumstances of the case, but would include imposition of such requirements as may be desirable to protect policyholders against the risk that the name's underwriting liabilities would not be met.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimates have been made by his Department for Lloyd's losses (a) for 1992 and (b) for 1993 which are (i) called but unpaid, (ii) declared losses but uncalled and (iii) potential losses expected but as yet undeclared; and what impact these estimates would have on determining the solvency of Lloyd's. [22099]

Mr. Jonathan Evans [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The Department neither needs nor is required to make estimates of the specific figures cited in the question in the exercise of its responsibilities under sections 83 to 86 of the Insurance Companies Act 1982. But in the compilation of the solvency returns all losses, whether or not called and/or paid, will have been brought properly into account in determining the liabilities for solvency purposes, and prudent provision will have been made for losses which have been incurred but not reported.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate of the number of Lloyd's names who could potentially be unable to meet calls on their assets if Lloyd's were unable to stand behind a call. [22073]

Mr. Jonathan Evans [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The Department neither needs nor is required to make such an estimate in the exercise of its responsibilities under sections 83 to 86 of the Insurance Companies Act 1982. Since all the auditors' certificates required under section 83 of the Insurance Companies Act 1982 were furnished in the most recent solvency test, the question did not arise.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21398]

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Each senior official and special adviser is required to make declaration of their financial interests. This enables the Department to prevent potential conflicts of interest arising. In the case of other officials, conflicts of interest are dealt with by their line management. Records are not kept centrally.

Privatisation (EC Funding)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will list those projects in privatised companies which have received European social fund support since privatisation indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [21299]

(2) if he will list those public projects which received European social fund support and were subsequently privatised over the last 10 years, indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [21298]

Mr. Page [holding answer 1 May 1995]: European social fund grant applications from the following privatised companies within my Department's area of responsibility have been approved. The grants were for vocational training, guidance and counselling, and employment support projects. The information relate to projects approved from 1990. Data for the years before 1990 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

| | Grant approved £ | Year |
|---|---|---|
| Jaguar cars | 217,708 | 1990 |
| British Aerospace Dynamics Ltd. | 175,341 | 1990 |
| British Aerospace (Military Aircraft) Ltd. | 23,353 | 1990 |
| Rolls Royce plc | 241,725 | 1990 |

WALES

Consultants

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what work he has commissioned from consultants Mason, Pittendrigh; what fees he has agreed in respect of this work; and if he will make a statement on the progress of work to date and the fees paid to date to these consultants. [21253]

Mr. Redwood: My Department has not commissioned any work from Mason Pittendrigh.

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which Minister in his Department has responsibility for equal opportunities matters. [21470]

Mr. Redwood: I have overall responsibility for the whole Department which includes equal opportunities issues which are integral to many policies. The Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones), has responsibility for equality issues and the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Mr. Richards), has special responsibility for women's issues and issues relating to disability.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress he hopes to achieve in his Department over the next three months to push forward the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the fourth UN conference on women; and if he will agree to incorporate a section on equal opportunities in his Department's annual report. [21473]

Mr. Redwood: My Department, in line with other Departments, is committed to the principles set out in the regional platform for action agreed at the preparatory conference in Vienna for the fourth UN world conference on women. We have taken these forward through a wide range of programmes and initiatives and will continue to do so.

The progress of women, ethnic minority and disabled employees through the management grades towards senior posts, along with overall representation and examples of particular initiatives being taken, will be covered in the Welsh Office departmental report for 1996 onwards.

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many local authorities in Wales have put the work of their direct labour organisations out to external competitive tenders; how many and which have not done so; and if he will make a statement. [21573]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: All 45 principal authorities in Wales have put out to competitive tender work carried out by their direct labour/service organisations.

Asthma

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for (a) each health authority in Wales and (b) Wales as a whole the total number of asthma cases treated in the last three years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [20547]

Mr. Richards: Information on the number of individuals treated for asthma in Wales is not available centrally. However, for those treated as in-patients or day cases, the number of completed consultant episodes where asthma was recorded as the principal diagnosis in each of the last three years is given in the following table:

| | Completed consultant episodes—asthma ICD 9 (493) | | |
|---|---|---|---|

Housing Subsidy

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the amount of housing revenue account subsidy for (a) 1992–93, (b) 1993–94 and (c) 1994–95 for each district council in Wales and for Wales as a whole, in each case showing the percentage change. [21049]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Information on the amount of housing revenue account subsidy paid is as follows:

Housing revenue account subsidy

| Local Authority | 1992–93 £ | 1993–94 £ | Percentage change 1993–94 over 1992–93 | 1994–95[1] £ | Percentage change 1994–95 over 1993–94 (provisional) |

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the level of notional rent set by his Department for the purpose of calculating housing subsidy for each district council in Wales and for Wales as a whole for (a) 1994–95 and (b) 1995–96. [21050]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Authorities calculate notional rents for subsidy according to a formula in the main housing revenue account subsidy determination for the relevant year, copies of which are available in the Library of the House. The notional rents calculated by each authority for 1994–95 and 1995–96 are given in the following table. The figures shown for Wales have been derived from these figures.

Notional Weekly Rent per Dwelling

Civil Servants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22074]

Mr. Redwood: There were no early retirements on grounds of limited efficiency for the financial years 1990–91, 1991–92, 1992–93 and 1993–94.

There were two early retirements on grounds of limited efficiency in 1994–95, both on flexible terms. Compensation payments are age, salary and service related. Details are as follows:

| Annual compensation payments to age 60 (rate pa) £ | Enhancement of superannuation lump sum £ |
|---|---|
| 14,396 | 7,334 |
| 7,450 | 3,725 |

Endangered Species

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the population of (a) pine martens, (b) peregrine falcon, (c) hen harrier and (d) sparrowhawk in each year since 1980; and what is his estimate of the amount of damage each species does to game birds. [21849]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Annual population estimates are not available for pine martens, hen harriers, peregrine falcons and sparrowhawks. However, specific surveys have been undertaken for these species since 1980 and the most up to date figures for Wales are as follows:

(a) Pine martens—less than 50 individuals (1987–88).

(b) Peregrines—263 (1991).

(c) Hen Harriers—16 (1993).

(d) Sparrowhawks—no estimate.

There is no reliable information currently available relating to the effect of these species on game birds.

Health Service Research Director

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what further progress he has to report on the appointment of a director for research and development for the NHS in Wales; and if the post will be established as a civil service or as an academic post. [22333]

Mr. Redwood: I understand that the University of Wales college of medicine will shortly be advertising the post of director of research and development for health and social care in Wales. This is a university post and not a civil service appointment.

NHS Waiting Lists

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to have available the full set of data on waiting list figures for those waiting more than six months for their first out-patient appointment and 18 months or more for in-patient treatment for each health authority. [22332]

Mr. Redwood: The latest available information relates to waiting lists at 31 December 1994 and is shown in the following table. Similar information will be available in June for waiting lists at 30 March 1995.

| Health authority area[1] | Number waiting more than six months for out-patient appointment | Number waiting more than 18 months for in-patient or day case treatment |

Dredging

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what were the scientific considerations behind his approval of the extraction of an extra 0.36 million tonnes of sand and other materials from the Nash bank before commencement of the Bristol channel study on the impact of dredging on the coastal environment. [22186]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The favourable Government view to extract an additional 360,000 tonnes from the Nash bank was based on an independent scientific analysis of the environmental monitoring data available as a condition of the current licence. This comprises regular bathymetric surveys of the bank and inspections of 12 local beaches to ensure that there are no adverse effects on beach sediment regimes. The assessment indicated that there was no significant risk to the coastline from the extraction proposed. A study which is expected to commence this year will examine the availability of marine aggregate resources in the Bristol channel, and the environmental consequences of and constraints on their utilisation.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he will pay the first instalment of the special grants to new principal councils in Wales. [22519]

Mr. Redwood: My Department will make these payments on or as soon as reasonably practicable after 4 May 1995, in accordance with the provisions of the Special Grant Report (Wales) 1995, approved by the House on 8 February 1995.

Parliamentary approval of this new expenditure is being sought in the 1995–96 main supply estimate for the local government, Wales vote, class XV vote 6. Pending that approval, urgent expenditure of £5.85 million on the first instalments of grant to the new principal councils will be met by a repayable advance form the Contingencies Fund.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Afghan Refugees

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government are taking (a) directly, (b) through the EU and (c) through other organisations, to supply wheat to be sown by Afghan refugees of displaced persons wishing to return to Afghanistan; and how much wheat is to be supplied to such persons over each of the next three years. [22305]

Mr. Baldry: A joint World Food Programme UNHCR/donors food assessment mission to Pakistan and Afghanistan is reviewing food aid needs. Donors, including the EU, will be briefed on their findings in Islamabad on 8 May. On 27 April 1995 the EU approved provision through the WFP of 20,000 tonnes of cereals, 1,000 tonnes of vegetable oil, 1,900 tonnes of sugar and 2,000 tonnes of pulses for resettling Afghan refugees and displaced persons.

We have recently provided wheat supplies at a cost of £1.25 million through CARE for relief programmes inside Afghanistan and will consider further contributions of food aid when needs arise, in consultation with other aid agencies, including the EU.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 24 April, Official Report, column 330, what are the minimum and maximum ages of Afghan refugee children in Pakistan who will receive primary education in future; what is the maximum age of Afghan refugee children who have received secondary education hitherto; and if he will make a statement. [22331]

Mr. Baldry: The minimum age for primary education is five years and children tend to leave at the age of 11 or 12. There is no strict leaving age as some children start school older than five. Secondary school education is divided into two levels. Children leave lower secondary or middle school at 14 or 15—that is, after three years—and most leave higher secondary around 16 or 17, although at both levels some graduate at an older age. The UN High Commissioner for Refugees and the Government of Pakistan encourage all children to remain at school as long as possible.

Pakistan's Cotton Crop

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received about the causes of the reduction of Pakistan's cotton crop with particular reference to viral infection; what assistance Her Majesty's Government will give in (a) research and (b) direct assistance to combat them; and if he will make a statement. [22326]

Mr. Baldry: We have received reports from both our high commission and scientific staff at the Natural Resources Institute, who are currently working in Pakistan, on all factors affecting the cotton crop in Pakistan. This includes the current problem of leaf curl virus.

Through the NRI, ODA has supported a research project on cotton pest management in Pakistan since 1985. The latest phase of this project started in 1992 and is due to end in March 1996. ODA is also funding a study to determine the scope for further assistance in tackling this problem.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Civil Servants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22083]

The Attorney-General: Compensation payments for early retirement on grounds of limited efficiency are age, salary and service related. In the last five financial years, there have been no compulsory early retirements in the departments for which I am responsible. The only case of flexible early retirement was in January 1991 when the officer concerned received a lump sum payment of £15,339.39 and an annual compensation payment of £6,343.87.

EMPLOYMENT

Building Societies

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many jobs in the United Kingdom are in building societies. [21910]

Miss Widdecombe: Information on the number of jobs held in building societies is not separately available. However, there were 171,000 employees in Great Britain in financial institutions other then banking and bill discounting in December 1994.

Age Discrimination

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will investigate the extent to which ageism and age discrimination is acting as a barrier to the 40-plus age group in accessing (a) retraining schemes and (b) United Kingdom and European funding to set up 40-plus employment initiatives; [22054]

(2) what further steps he is taking to counter ageism and age discrimination in the workplace; and if he will make a statement; [22048]

(3) if he will investigate the extent to which ageism and age discrimination are contributing towards long-term unemployment among the 40-plus age group; and if he will make a statement; [22050]

(4) what steps his Department is taking to discourage employers from placing employment advertisements in the national press which specifically request applicants for supervisory, managerial, technical and professional employment from the specific age group 25 to 35 years; and if he will make a statement; [22052]

(5) which laws in the United Kingdom protect people from ageism in the workplace; and what assessment has he made as to the scope for those persons who feel they have been victims of age discrimination to seek legal redress at appropriate levels; [22053]

(6) what assessment he has made of the extent to which long term unemployment among the 40-plus age group is directly attributable to the prevalence of age discrimination; and if he will make a statement; [22049]

(7) what is the total annual cost to his Department of initiatives designed to investigate or tackle the incidence of age discrimination in the workplace; and if he will make a statement. [22051]

Miss Widdecombe: The Government are conducting a vigorous campaign, which I lead, urging employers to recruit, train and retain workers on merit, regardless of age. The "Getting On" booklet, published in March 1994, is aimed specifically at employers. We published a further booklet, "Too Old . . . who says?", in January this year, which offers help and advice to older people seeking work or training. The campaign is supported by an advisory group, which I chair, consisting of people with a wide experience of industry and with the problems of age discrimination in employment.

Surveys suggest that ageist practices in recruitment and retention are contributing to the difficulties of older workers. However, there are no barriers preventing the 40-plus age group accessing retraining schemes. The proportion of people aged 51 and over on adult training programmes has steadily increased over the last four years. Training for work, the main training programme, is open to unemployed people up to the age of 63, making it possible for older workers to enhance their skills and make best use of their potential. Access to funding in the UK and through the European social fund for employment initiatives is open to people of all ages with selection on merit. There are several instances where funding has been granted to older workers to set up their own initiatives.

My campaign specifically encourages employers to drop the use of age limits in all advertisements and recruitment. Indeed, it is the first step outlined in the "Getting On" booklet. Staff in Employment Service jobcentres have been given clear guidance to challenge the need for age limits on any vacancies they receive and to try to persuade employers to consider jobseekers only on their merits.

As for the legal position, employees who believe their dismissal or selection for redundancy was solely on grounds of age can already bring a complaint of unfair dismissal to an industrial tribunal, subject to the normal two-year qualifying period. However, the Government do not believe that more general legislation is the solution. Indeed, this would be as ineffective as it has been shown to be in other countries and would also increase burdens on business, possibly hampering the creation of new jobs. The way forward is through persuasion and voluntary means.

Finally, in 1994–95 the cost to the Employment Department of activities related to the campaign, including the booklets and research undertaken but excluding internal staff costs, was just over £300,000.

Unemployment

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many (a) men and (b) women have been unemployed for (i) less than six months, (ii) more than six months, (iii) more than one year, (iv) more than 18 months and (v) more than two years: and if he will provide a breakdown by the age categories (A) 35 to 40, (B) 40 to 50, (C) 50 to 60 and (D) 60 to 65 years. [22055]

Miss Widdecombe: The latest information available from the labour force survey for Great Britain is given in the following table. Information on levels of claimant unemployment by age and duration of unemployment can be obtained from the NOMIS database in the Library for the following age bands: 35 to 39, 40 to 49, 50 to 59, 60 and over.

Civil Servants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on the grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22088]

Miss Widdecombe: The Department has no record of any such payments having been made.

South Thames Training and Enterprise Council

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if the Central London training and enterprise council will pay the debts of South Thames TEC. [22220]

Mr. Paice: The debts incurred by South Thames training and enterprise council are a matter for the receiver. It is my understanding that there is no obligation whatsoever upon CENTEC to pay the debts.

Stapro Insecticide

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to his answer of 18 April, Official Report, column 57, if he will set out the manufacturer's instructions for the application of Stapro insecticide. [21170]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Andrew Mackinlay, dated 2 May 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question regarding the manufacturer's instructions for the application of Stapro Insecticide.

The contractor employed to undertake the spraying at Grays Unemployment Benefit Office on 8 October 1991 has now advised us orally that the chemical used was not a Stapro Insecticide, as he originally told us. He has further advised that any enquiries relation to this operation should be directed to his solicitor, Mr. Michael Wright of Thompson, Smith and Poxon, 4/5 North Hill, Colchester, Essex, CO1 1EB.

You will understand that, given these circumstances, the information relating to Stapro would be inappropriate.

Asbestos

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number of convictions in each region under the Control of Asbestos at Work Regulations 1987 and the Asbestos (Licensing Regulations) 1983 in each year since their inception, indicating the penalty in each case. [21286]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 1 May 1995]: I have arranged for the information on the number of convictions in each region under the Control of Asbestos at Work Regulations 1987 and the Asbestos (Licensing) Regulations 1983 and the penalties for each conviction to be placed in the Library. The information relates to prosecutions by the Health and Safety Executive. It does not include prosecutions by local authority inspectors who have powers under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 to enforce the regulations. Statistics on the number of convictions under the Asbestos (Licensing) Regulations 1983 are available only from 1986 onwards.

Cleveland Rural Development Area

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his estimate of (a) the number of unemployed and (b) the rate of unemployment in the Cleveland rural development area in each of the last 10 years and at the latest available date. [21433]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Information is available only on the numbers of claimant unemployed people in rural development areas and this can be obtained from the NOMIS database in the Library.

Manufacturing Employees

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the number and percentage of employees who are employed in manufacturing, in each region of the United Kingdom in (a) 1979 and (b) the most recent year for which figures are available. [21796]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The information requested is shown in the following table:

Employees in employment in manufacturing industry and as a percentage of all employees in employment

| (Thousands) | December 1979 | | December 1994 | |
|---|---|---|---|---|

n/a = Not available.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the cost of answering the questions to his Department tabled by the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) since the beginning of the current Session. [18572]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 5 April 1995]: According to our records, the hon. Member for Makerfield has tabled 180 parliamentary questions to this Department since the beginning of the current parliamentary Session until 4 April 1995. We estimate the total cost of preparing these answers was £17,460.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Visas

Mr. Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the reasons for the refusal of temporary visas to Mrs. Rasoul Bibi, Ref. V94/20662, and Miss Riffat Sultana, Ref. V94/20668. [21862]

Mr. Baldry: The reasons for refusal were given in the migration and visa correspondence unit's letters of 28 July 1994 and 18 October 1994 to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received concerning the request for temporary visas by Mrs. Rasoul Bibi, Ref. V94/20662, and Miss Riffat Sultana, Ref. V94/20668; and if he will make a statement. [21863]

Mr. Baldry: Representations have been received from a number of people, including my hon. Friend.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library a copy of the United Kingdom presentation to main committee II of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty conference in New York. [22022]

Mr. David Davis: Yes.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many members of the European Union have indicated at the non-proliferation treaty review and extension conference in New York that they seek both an indefinite and unconditional extension to the treaty. [22018]

Mr. David Davis: All of them.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response has been made by the United Kingdom delegation to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty conference in New York, to the proposal advanced by Germany that fissionable material from dismantled weaponry should not be used to build new warheads. [22019]

Mr. David Davis: The UK maintains only a minimum deterrent and has no surplus fissile material for explosive purposes. Recycling fissile materials allows us to keep our stockpile of fissile material at the minimum level necessary to meet our operational requirements.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has received on decisions taken at the meeting of the non-aligned movement member states held in Bandung, Indonesia, on 25 to 27 April in regard to the non-proliferation treaty. [22058]

Mr. David Davis: At the end of their meeting in Bandung, the Ministers of the non-aligned states issued a statement. They expressed a number of concerns about the non-proliferation treaty, but accepted that it had played a part in promoting international peace and security. The statement made clear that the NPT will be extended in accordance with article X.2.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on the adoption by states parties to the non-proliferation treaty, during the treaty's review and extension conference, of a programme of action for achieving complete nuclear disarmament. [21352]

Mr. David Davis [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Nuclear disarmament is already under way, in particular through agreements between the United States and Russia. It will not be advanced by attempting to impose artificial deadlines or linkages on the negotiating process.

Caroline Beale

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the latest position in the case of Caroline Beale, detained in New York; and what continuing action representatives of his Department are taking in her case. [21836]

Mr. Baldry: A further hearing of Miss Beale's case is set for 15 May. Our consular staff visit her regularly and are in frequent contact with her lawyer, the prison authorities and her family.

Hong Kong

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 24 April, Official Report, column 375, concerning civil servants in Hong Kong, if the figures given include judges and police officers. [21912]

Mr. Goodlad: The figures of £40 million includes compensation payments for judges and police officers who are members of Her Majesty's overseas civil service in Hong Kong.

Council of Ministers

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on forthcoming business in the Council of the European Union.

Mr. David Davis: The following meetings are planned:

May 17: Health
May 22: ECOFIN
May 29: FAC
Agriculture
May 30: FAC
Agriculture

The following subjects are likely to be discussed:

May 17: Health

No formal agenda is available.

The following subjects may be discussed.

—Reform of the fruit and vegetable regime (possible)
—Animal welfare (possible)

Diplomats (Offences)

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish figures recording the number of unpaid parking fines incurred by diplomatic missions in London during 1994.

Mr. Baldry: During 1994, the London diplomatic missions incurred a total of 3,613 unpaid parking fines, which is almost double the 1993 figure of 1,941. This increase, the first since 1986, occurred mainly in the second half of the year when parking in London was decriminalised and responsibility—with the exception of main thoroughfares—was transferred from the Metropolitan police to the 33 London boroughs. This change also coincided with a campaign to reduce the amount of illegal parking in London, which resulted in an increase in the numbers of parking tickets issued to the public, including the diplomatic corps. The table shows only missions which have 11 or more fines outstanding.

Mr. Sykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many serious offences were allegedly committed in 1994 by persons entitled to diplomatic immunity; and how many foreign diplomats or members of their families were withdrawn from their posts in Britain in the past year as a result of alleged offences.

Mr. Baldry: Twenty-five alleged serious offences by persons entitled to diplomatic immunity were drawn to the attention of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in 1994. "Serious offences" are defined in accordance with the report to the Foreign Affairs Committee, "The Abuse of Diplomatic Immunities and Privileges (1985)", as offences which fall into the category which in certain circumstances attract a maximum penalty of six months' imprisonment or more: the majority involved drinking and driving or shoplifting.

Six diplomats or members of their families were withdrawn from post in Britain as a result of alleged offences, compared with one the previous year.

Civil Servants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22086]

Mr. Goodlad: Compensation payments for early retirement on grounds of limited efficiency are age, salary and service related. In the Overseas Development Association no early retirements on grounds of limited efficiency have been made during the last five years. The relevant information for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Brazil (Killing of Indians)

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will raise with President

Carposa of Brazil when he visits the United Kingdom the killing of Ticuna Indians on 28 March 1990 in Boca de Capacete and urge that those responsible be brought to trial. [22185]

Mr. David Davis: The Brazilian authorities are well aware of concern in Britain that the rights and interests of the indigenous peoples of Brazil should be observed. Fourteen Ticuna Indians were killed on 28 March 1988 in the town of Benjamin Constant. The trial has been transferred from the state to the federal courts. It is expected to take place within a year.

Drugs

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government are taking (a) directly, (b) through the EU and (c) through other organisations to assist the Government of Pakistan in combating drug trafficking; what assistance is being given to the supply of equipment to combat drug trafficking with particular reference to helicopters; and if he will make a statement. [22306]

Mr. Baldry: We have given considerable narcotics-related assistance to Pakistan, both bilaterally and through multilateral channels. Last financial year, bilateral assistance included the provision of law enforcement training by Her Majesty Customs and Excise. Multilaterally we have pledged over £8 million since 1985 to projects administered by the United Nations drug control programme to strengthen law enforcement control of the Pakistan/Iran/Afghanistan border area and to reduce the supply of opium through rural development.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what studies his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated in respect of financial inducements to people in Afghanistan to persuade them to cease growing poppies used in the production of drugs. [22304]

Mr. Baldry: Afghanistan is now believed by the United Nations drug control programme and others to be the largest producer of illicit opium in the world. Much of the production is trafficked in the form of heroin to western Europe, including the UK.

In present circumstances, action by UNDCP is likely to be more effective in combating illicit drug production in Afghanistan than that by individual countries. The Government have therefore recently contributed £100,000 to preparation by UNCP of a strategy to reduce illicit opium poppy cultivation in Afghanistan, and will consider further financial support in the light of the result.

TRANSPORT

Civil Servants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22076]

Mr. Norris: Compensation payments for early retirement on ground of limited efficiency are age, salary and service related. Details of limited efficiency early retirements for the last five financial years are as follows:

| | Annual compensation payment to age 60 rate pa | Superannuation lump sum | Lump sum compensation payment | Total in £ |

Ministerial Visits Overseas

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the visits he has made abroad in the last 12 months; how long he spent in each location; and what was the purpose of each visit. [21422]

Dr. Mawhinney: In addition to those listed in the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Byers) on 20 February, Official Report, column 4, I have also undertaken the following visits:

| Country | Duration | Purpose |
|---|---|---|
| Switzerland | 24 hours | Visit to the Swiss Transport Minister |
| Brussels | 2 days | European Transport Council |
| Japan | 4 days | Visits to the Japanese Transport Minister, various railway companies in Tokyo and Nagoya and to banks and leasing companies interested in the sale of British Rail ROSCOs. |
| Korea | 4 days | Wreath laying ceremony Gloster Valley. Visits to the Korean Minister of Transport and Construction, the mayor of Seoul and various Korean companies with potential investments in the UK. Addressed regional British chambers of commerce; Korean Institute of Transport joint UK/Korean seminar; and Korean Ministry of Political Affairs seminar on local government. |

Veterinary Medicines Report

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the 1993 report from the appraisal panel for human suspected adverse reactions to veterinary medicines has now been published. [22403]

Mrs. Browning: The report is being published this week and is available free of charge from the Veterinary Medicines Directorate. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

EDUCATION

Civil Servants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving her Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22089]

Mr. Boswell: There have been no instances of compulsory early retirement on grounds of limited efficiency in the Department.

There has been one instance of flexible early retirement on limited efficiency grounds during the last five financial years, as follows:

| | Annual compensation payment to age 60 (rate pa) | Superannuation lump sum |
|---|---|---|
| 1994–95 | £4996.67 | £14,255.07 |

Local Education Authorities

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what were the numbers of staff and the administrative costs incurred by each education authority in England for the year ended 31 March; and what are the projected costs for 1995–96. [21791]

Mr. Robin Squire: The table shows, for each LEA in England, staffing expenditure and total expenditure on service strategy and regulation, management and administration and the inspection and advisory service in 1993–94, the latest year for which outturn figures are available. Figures for 25 LEAs are not included as they have yet to be finalised. These figures have not been adjusted for any changes of function. Statistics on LEA administrative staff numbers, broken down by individual authorities, are not available centrally. Cost projections for 1995–96 are unavailable in these areas.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will publish a list of education authorities in England and Northern Ireland with the total number of pupils for which each education authority was responsible in the year ended 31 March. [21805]

Mr. Robin Squire: Information on the number of pupils in schools maintained by local education authorities in England in January 1994 is shown in the table. Pupil numbers in Northern Ireland are a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

University and Private Sector Co-operation

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what new initiatives she is discussing with the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principles to encourage senior private sector managers to spend time in university departments. [21826]

Mr. Boswell: No such discussions are taking place. These are matters for the CVCP and its member institutions to arrange in collaboration with companies. The Government welcome opportunities that enable industrial and university personnel to share their experiences for the benefit of the economy.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what programmes she supports to encourage the release of university staff to spend time in manufacturing industry. [21825]

Mr. Boswell: We support all initiatives that provide academic and industrial staff with opportunities to collaborate. Responsibility for developing links with business, of all kinds, rests with individual institutions. Many are conscious of the need to do so, and participate in the range of programmes promoted by the Departments of Employment and of Trade and Industry and the Office for Science and Technology.

Nursery Places

Ms Hodge: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many places she will need to find to meet the Prime Minister's commitment to nursery places for all four-year-olds. [22014]

Mr. Forth: In January 1994, the size of the four-year-old cohort in England was estimated at 645,000. Latest available data suggest that at that time an estimated 498,000 four-year-olds were attending maintained schools. We estimate that approximately 120,000 more were in some form of private or voluntary provision.

Distance Learning

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education when she will next meet the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals to discuss the use of new technologies for distance learning. [21822]

Mr. Boswell: My right hon. Friend has no current plans to meet the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals in order to discuss the use of new technologies for distance learning. She has, however, recently issued a consultation document on the future of broadband communications in education, and would welcome the committee's comments on it.

Pupils and Teachers, Ealing

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many pupils are currently in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary/high schools in Ealing in (i) local education authority and (ii) grant-maintained schools; how many teachers are currently employed to teach them in whatever capacity; and if she will make a statement. [22011]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested for 1994, the latest date for which information is available, is shown in the table.

Full-time equivalent of pupils and qualified teachers in maintained schools in Ealing Local Education Authority area January 1994

| | LEA maintained schools | | Grant-maintained schools | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | Primary | Secondary | Primary | Secondary |
| Pupils[1] | 22,836 | 7,369 | 1,201 | 6,111 |
| Teachers[2] | 1,076 | 456 | 55 | 374 |

[1] Each part-time pupil counts as 0.5 full-time equivalents.[2] Includes the FTE of part-time qualified teachers.

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what progress has been made within her Department on equal opportunities matters. [21456]

Mr. Boswell: The Department is committed to achieving equality of opportunity for all staff. To that end, programmes for action for staff with disabilities, women and staff from ethnic minorities are in place, and progress has been made in all areas.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education which Minister in her Department has responsibility for equal opportunities issues. [21455]

Mr. Boswell: I have responsibility for equal opportunities issues in the Department.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will publish the gender assessment being prepared by her Department. [21457]

Mr. Boswell: Equal opportunities issues are under continuous scrutiny within the Department. My right hon. Friend has drawn attention in recent speeches to the remarkable progress which has been made by girls and women in education over the last 15 years. No additional gender assessment is being prepared.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Electricity

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when competition will be introduced to the supply of electricity services in Northern Ireland. [21123]

Mr. Ancram: The Director General of Electricity Supply for Northern Ireland has responsibility for the development of competition in the supply of electricity. Following the publication of his plans for this on 16 December 1993 the director general intends to publish formal consultation documents in June 1995. A copy of his 1993 report can be obtained from Offer (Northern Ireland).

Animal Diseases

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases of vesicular stomatitis occurred in each year since 1985. [21138]

Mr. Ancram: None.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment has been made of the effectiveness of a cattle blood test for TB; and if a fully substantiated case can be made to the European Union to obtain agreement to its use. [21715]

Mr. Ancram: The Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland recently undertook a major field trial on the development of a blood test for TB and the results of the trial are currently being evaluated. If these show that the development of a blood test is viable, a case will be made to the European Union to have the test approved for use in Northern Ireland.

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunities matters. [21476]

Sir John Wheeler: Progress on equal opportunities matters in relation to staff in the Northern Ireland civil service is detailed in regularly published reports of the service's equal opportunities unit. The home civil service cadre of the Northern Ireland Office is included in regular reports on equal opportunities published by the Cabinet Office. Copies of the reports are placed in the Library.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which Minister in his Department has responsibility for equal opportunities issues. [21475]

Mr. Ancram: My noble Friend Baroness Denton has the lead role for equal opportunities issues in Northern Ireland and represents Northern Ireland Departments and the Northern Ireland Office at the Cabinet Sub-Committee on Women's Issues. The Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Minister for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler), has lead responsibility for equal opportunity matters within the Northern Ireland civil service.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department. [21477]

Mr. Ancram: Revised Government guidelines on policy appraisal fair treatment, which came into effect on 1 January 1994, aim to ensure that in the development or review of policies and programmes Departments and agencies do not unfairly or unnecessarily discriminate against specified sections of the community, including people of different gender. Annual reports on the implementation of the policy appraisal and fair treatment initiative will be published. The first of these is being prepared.

Stevens Report

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to receive the report from Mr. John Stevens into the shoot to kill inquiry; and if he plans to make an oral statement thereon to the House. [21737]

Sir John Wheeler: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave on 11 January 1995 to the hon. Member for Islington, North Official Report, columns 147–48. In addition, a further report was submitted on 24 January 1995. A direction of no prosecutions was issued on 17 February 1995. I do not propose to make a statement.

Invalidity Benefit

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what is his latest estimate of the number of suspensions of increased invalidity benefit awarded as a result of Commissioner Skinner's decision, case C 527/91; and of those women who have experienced suspension, how many have applied to have the suspension of payment lifted on the basis of hardship; how many of these appeals were successful; what has been the cost of the lifting of such suspensions; and if he will make a statement; [21042]

(2) what estimate he has made of the number of women who will be entitled (a) to enhanced invalidity benefit payments and (b) to back payment if the Department of Social Security's appeal against Commissioner Skinner's decision in the case of Mrs. Rose Graham fails; what estimate he has made of the additional cost to be met by the Northern Ireland Office in (i) 1995–96, (ii) 1996–97, and (iii) 1997–98; and if he will make a statement. [21043]

Mr. Moss: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Social Security Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Alec Wylie. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Alec Wylie to Dr. Norman Godman, dated 28 April 1995:

I have been asked to reply to both your recent Parliamentary Questions on the position relating to the payment of increased Invalidity Benefit as a result of the Commissioner's decision in the Rose Graham case.

The latest estimate of the number of suspensions of increased Invalidity Benefit awarded as a result of the Commissioner's decision is 600. No records are kept on the number of women who asked to have their suspension lifted on the grounds of hardship but I can confirm that a total of 8 such requests were successful, the cost of which to date is £27,936.

It is estimated that 4,000 women will be entitled to enhanced Invalidity Benefit and back payment if the Department of Social Security's appeal against the Commissioner's decision fails. The additional cost of these cases is estimated at £2.1 million for 1995/96 and £2.2 million for each of the years 1996/97 and 1997/98.

I hope you will find this information helpful.

Civil Servants

Mr. Alan Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22080]

Sir John Wheeler: Compensation payments for early retirement on grounds of limited efficiency are based on age, salary and service length of the civil servant concerned.

No civil servant who left the Northern Ireland Office or any other Northern Ireland Department in the period 1 April 1990 to 31 March 1995 qualified for flexible early retirement benefits on grounds of limited efficiency.

Unfortunately, due to the large number of officers who left under compulsory early retirement terms in the same period, the number and details of those who left on grounds of limited efficiency could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Endangered Species

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the population of (a) pine martens, (b) peregrine falcons, (c) hen harriers and (d) sparrowhawks in each year since 1980; and what is his estimate of the amount of damage each species does to game birds. [21847]

Mr. Moss: Figures are not available for the population of pine martens.

A census of peregrine falcons took place in 1981 and again in 1991, when there were 53 and 99 pairs respectively. Precise information is not available for hen harriers or sparrowhawks, but it is estimated that currently there are fewer than 20 pairs of hen harriers and between 9,000 and 10,000 pairs of sparrowhawks. No information is available on the amount of damage each species does to game birds.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21391]

Sir John Wheeler [holding answer 1 May 1995]: For the Department and agencies for which my right hon. and learned Friend is responsible, any conflict of interest involving a civil servant would have been dealt with in accordance with the established guidance. Records of the number of cases are not held centrally.

In the last five years, no special advisers have declared a conflict of interest.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which of the advisory non-departmental public bodies sponsored by his Department are under a statutory requirement to (a) publish their advice to the Government, (b) publish an annual report and (c) lay an annual report before Parliament; and if he will list those bodies with a statutory base. [21158]

Sir John Wheeler [holding answer 27 April 1995]: The information requested is as follows:

| | Statutory requirement to | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Advisory non-departmental public bodies | publish their advice to the Government | publish an annual report before Parliament | Lay an annual report before Parliament | Statutory base |

| Statistics Advisory Committee | No | No | No | Yes |
| Committees for the Employment of Disabled People | No | No | No | Yes |
| Industrial Research and Technology Board | No | No | No | Yes |

In respect of all other advisory non-departmental public bodies in Northern Ireland, the answer is nil.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the individuals who are members of more than one Northern Ireland quango and the names of those quangos. [20649]

Sir John Wheeler [holding answer 24 April 1995]: The information in respect of non-departmental public bodies has been placed in the Library. This does not include details of membership of the Police Authority for Northern Ireland, other than for the chairman.

Extradition (Irish Republic)

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps have been or are being taken to secure the extradition from the Irish Republic of Eamon Collins, Len Hardy, Kiernan McBride, Mickey Collins and David Ewins for the IRA terrorist murders and attempted murders described in the Central TV programme "Network First: Confession." [20331]

Sir John Wheeler [holding answer 25 April 1995]: Following the broadcast of the programme "Network First: Confession" on 18 April 1995, the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary has directed that the programme be examined in detail by the serious crime squad. When investigations are complete, a file will be sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland, who will consider the matter. The question of extradition does not arise until the DPP(NI) has decided whether or not to prosecute the person concerned.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Refugees

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what studies he has made to examine the effect of reductions in benefits on refugees; [19459]

(2) what recent representations he has received regarding reduced benefits for refugees while their status is being investigated by the Home Office; [19457]

(3) what proposals he has to take remedial action in respect of the reductions of benefits for genuine refugees. [19458]

Mr. Roger Evans: None. There is no reduction in the amount of benefits paid to genuine refugees who have been granted asylum by the Secretary of State.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how much housing benefit he estimates is paid to claimants who own property which is let but in which they do not live; [20345]

(2) if he will bring forward amendments to the housing benefit regulations to prevent people who own dwellings for which they receive a rent from receiving housing benefit in respect of a dwelling they occupy and which is rented from a housing association. [20347]

Mr. Roger Evans: Information regarding the amount of housing benefit paid to claimants who own property which is let but in which they do not live is not available. Housing benefit is payable in such cases provided there is a liability to pay rent on the dwelling which is occupied as the home and that liability has not been contrived to take advantage of the housing benefit scheme.

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to exclude sheltered accommodation for the elderly and special accommodation for other special needs groups provided by housing associations from the proposed changes to housing benefit based on a calculation of an average area rent. [22218]

Mr. Roger Evans: We await the report from the Social Security Advisory Committee following its public consultation exercise on our proposals for housing benefit changes from October. We shall consider the report, together with representations received, including those from our own consultation with the local authority associations, carefully before reaching final decisions.

Pensions Bill

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 5 April, Official Report, column 1224, on what basis he estimates that the amendment to the Pensions Bill [Lords] which would base the calculation of entitlement to benefits under the state earnings-related pension scheme on the best 44 years of earnings would cost £2.5 billion per year by the middle of the 21st century. [21719]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The estimate assumed that a best 44 years rule would apply in a manner similar to the original best 20 years rule. In particular, it was assumed that the selection of the best 44 years would include earnings factors derived from contracted-out as well as not contracted-out earnings, so that the proposal would cover all class 1 contributors.

The estimate took account of the extent to which the average surplus earnings factor increases as a result of removing the lowest earnings factors from the calculation for new awards for 2023–24 and later years once contributors can have more than 44 years of contributions from 1978–79 onwards.

Civil Servants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22078]

Mr. Hague: The information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

War Widows Pensions

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in what circumstances a war widow living abroad will not be eligible for the war widows pension under the provisions announced in his oral statement on 24 April, Official Report, column 532. [21852]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The legal provisions for war widows and war disablement pensions apply equally wherever the pensioner happens to live.

Young People

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the annual savings to the Exchequer from removing the entitlement to income support for young people between the ages of 16 and 18 years. [22273]

Mr. Roger Evans: Young people aged 18 years are entitled to income support under the normal rules; 16 and 17-year-olds not required to be available for work are similarly entitled.

Since 1988, unemployed 16 and 17-year-olds have had the more positive option of youth training in place of dependence on benefit. Reliable estimates of the number of claims that would have been made by this group under the previous arrangements are not practicable. They would be dependent on a variety of economic and other assumptions.

Child Benefit

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the cost of raising the level of child benefit by £5 per week for the first child only. [22296]

Mr. Burt: It is estimated that the net cost would be £1.4 billion at 1995–96 prices.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunities matters. [21502]

Mr. Horam: Substantial progress both within the Department and in promoting equal opportunities throughout the civil service.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress he hopes to achieve in his Department over the next three months to push forwards the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the fourth UN conference on women; and if he will agree to incorporate a section on equal opportunities in his Department's annual report. [21504]

Mr. Horam: The Government are committed to the principles set out in the regional platform for action agreed at the preparatory conference in Vienna for the fourth UN world conference on women. They have taken these forward through a wide range of programmes and initiatives and will continue to do so.

The Government White Paper "Taking Forward Continuity and Change", published in response to a report from the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, recommended that Departments and agencies publish their individual actions and progress on equal opportunities in their annual reports. The Departments and agencies for which my right hon. Friend is responsible will be taking this forward.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department. [21503]

Mr. Horam: The Cabinet Office—Office of Public Service and Science—has a policy, in line with guidance issued in 1992 by the ministerial group on women's issues, that policy proposals should ensure that unlawful or unjustifiable sex or race discrimination does not occur and that similar principles apply to people with disabilities, older people or ex-offenders. Policy advice to Ministers is continuously and routinely scrutinised in these respects.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster which Minister in his Department has responsibility for equal opportunities issues. [21501]

Mr. Horam: I do.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage which Minister in his Department has responsibility for equal opportunities issues. [21485]

Mr. Dorrell: The Minister with responsibility for equal opportunities issues in my Department is the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Mr. Sproat).

Allowances

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will list the total amount paid by his central Department and each agency for which he is responsible in subsistence allowances for travel (a) within the United Kingdom and (b) outside the United Kingdom in each of the last three years. [19558]

Mr. Dorrell: The Department of National Heritage was created in April 1992. It has two agencies—the Royal Parks agency created in April 1993 and the Historic Royal Palaces agency created in October 1989. The information requested for travel and subsistence—it is not possible to disaggregate the two—is shown in the following table:

| | Travel and subsistence within the UK £ | Travel and subsistence outside the UK £ |
|---|---|---|
| DNH central department | | |

Notes:

[1] DNH did not have its own financial and management accounting arrangements in place until August 1992; for the year 1992–93, the information is therefore not available in the format requested.

[2] The 1994–95 figures, for year ending 31 March 1995, may change slightly as year-end accounts are finalised.

[3] For HRPA expenditure, separate totals for UK and overseas travel and subsistence are not available.

Aerial Archaeology

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will list for (a) each of the last four years and (b) this year to date the grant issued in respect of aerial archaeology, indicating the name and locations of the recipients; and if he will make a statement. [20715]

Mr. Dorrell: Annual figures for grants for aerial archaeology in England made available through the Royal Commission on the historical monuments of England are set out in the table. Details of all grants are published in the commission's annual report. The national library of air photographs is held by the commission at its headquarters in Swindon, and copies of all photographs funded by grants are readily available for consultation.

Aerial archaeology plays an important part in identifying archaeological remains. However, the grants made for flying costs depend partly on the availability of funds from other sources to meet associated costs; and there will be yearly fluctuations in view of its dependence on weather conditions. Post reconnaissance mapping to a high standard is important if the evidence derived from aerial photography is to be fully utilised, and the increased funding for mapping during 1992–93 and 1993–94 reflected the aim of establishing a national programme of mapping the information obtained from this source.

Summary of grants for aerial archaeology

Civil Servants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22081]

Mr. Dorrell: No early retirements on the ground of limited efficiency have been made since the Department was created in April 1992.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in his Department and the agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21763]

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The Department of National Heritage and its two agencies, the Historic Royal Palaces agency and Royal Parks agency have made the following appointments at the administrative assistant and administrative officer grades since September 1993. The figures exclude short-term casual appointments.

| | September 1993 | October-December | January-March | April-June | July-September | October-December | January-March |

Blue Plaques

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) what are the current planning instructions issued to local authorities in respect of blue plaque schemes denoting historical places of interest; and if he will make a statement; [20708]

(2) what representations he has received in respect of the blue plaque placed by Calderdale district council on the Old Bridge inn at Ripponden, West Yorkshire; and if he will make a statement. [20713]

Mr. Dorrell: I have not received any representations about the plaque on the Old Bridge inn. No instructions have been issued to local authorities by my Department in respect of plaques which they or others choose to affix to buildings to mark their historical interest. Apart from the blue plaque scheme for London, which is administered by English Heritage, it is the responsibility of those who wish to place commemorative plaques on buildings to ensure their historical accuracy and to obtain any necessary listed building consents.

Churchill Papers

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will list the name of foreign organisations or individuals who are (a) bidding for and (b) negotiating with the trustees for the purchase of the Churchill Trust papers. [22302]

Mr. Dorrell: There are no foreign bidders negotiating with the Churchill trustees; the papers have already been secured for the nation.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if the Churchill Trust owned the copyright in the Churchill archives; and if Her Majesty's Government have purchased all copyright in these documents. [22301]

Mr. Dorrell: Copyright in the non-state papers remains with whoever owned it prior to the sale of the documents to Churchill college. The Crown has retained its copyright in the state papers which it has given to the college.

Inheritance Tax

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will specify the amounts of inheritance tax or its equivalent satisfied in connection with the acceptance of objects and property which have been covered in the public accounts by means of resort to the reserve in respect of each of the last 10 financial years; and what was the average annual figure of resort to the reserve for that purpose over the 10-year period in question. [20246]

Mr. Dorrell: The amount of tax satisfied in accepting works of art or land and buildings in lieu of tax through the public expenditure reserve over the last 10 years is as follows:

| | £ |
|---|---|
| 1985–86 | 1,367,600 |
| 1986–87 | 1,745,500 |
| 1987–88 | 7,338,444 |
| 1988–89 | 5,584,674 |
| 1989–90 | 9,977,898 |
| 1990–91 | — |
| 1991–92 | 2,144,172 |
| 1992–93 | 4,324,875 |
| 1993–94 | 1,114,660 |
| 1994–95 | 3,759,616 |

The average annual resort to the reserve over this 10-year period was £3,735,744.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market-testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21373]

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Since it was established in April 1992, my Department and its two agencies have to date spent approximately £66,000 on consultancy relating to market testing. Most of this sum was in connection with a scoping study on the strategic contracting out of central services.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how much was spent on official hospitality by his Department in 1994–95. [21205]

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The information requested is as follows:

| | Department of National Heritage £ | Historic Royal Palaces Agency £ | Royal Parks Agency £ |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1994–95 | 14,967 | 16,313 | 23,862 |

Advisory Council on Libraries

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if all the councillor members of the Advisory Council on Libraries are elected members of local authorities with responsibilities for library provision. [21564]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Five members of the advisory council are elected members of local authorities and were appointed after consultation with the relevant local authority associations. Four are members of local authorities with current responsibilities for public library provision. The fifth is a member of Bath district council and was appointed in recognition of the fact that certain districts, including Bath, will from 1 April 1996 form all or part of new unitary authorities which will take on responsibility for public libraries.

Mar Lodge Estate

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) if he will make it his policy that any grant to the National Trust for Scotland for the purchase of the Mar Lodge estate carries as a condition that public access is not restricted because of hunting and shooting; [21995]

(2) if he will ensure that any grant to the National Trust for Scotland for the purchase of the Mar Lodge estate carries as a condition the protection of nesting birds from hunting and shooting parties. [21996]

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Directions have been issued under section 26(3) of the National Lottery etc. Act 1993 concerning the conditions to be applied to grants made from lottery funds by the national heritage memorial fund in order to secure their proper management and control. The application of other conditions is a matter for the NHMF.

National Lottery

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will publish titles of projects rejected by the millennium fund. [21932]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 1 May 1995]: This is a matter for the Millennium Commission. I understand that information on proposals and applications received by the Millennium Commission will be made available by the end of May, and a copy will be placed in the Library of the House.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage which of the advisory non-departmental public bodies sponsored by his Department are under a statutory requirement to (a) publish their advice to the Government, (b) publish an annual report and (c) lay an annual report before Parliament; and if he will list those bodies with a statutory base. [21159]

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 27 April 1995]: The Reviewing Committee on the Export of Works of Art publishes an annual report which includes any advice given by the committee to Government on matters connected with the export of cultural goods. Reports from the Advisory Council on Libraries may also include details of its advice to Government.

The Reviewing Committee on the Export of Works of Art and the Advisory Council on Libraries are the only advisory bodies for which my Department is responsible which are required to report annually and whose reports are laid in Parliament. The committee's report is presented as a Command Paper and the council's report forms part of the Secretary of State's annual report on the public library service, published as a House of Commons Paper. Reports from the Royal Fine Art Commission are also presented to Parliament as Command Papers, although there is no requirement for it to report annually.

On 4 April 1995, the Advisory Council on Libraries took over from the Library and Information Services Council (England) the statutory responsibilities established under the Public Libraries and Museums Act 1964. The Theatres Trust was established under the Theatres Trust Act 1976.

HEALTH

Departmental Annual Report

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what measures her Department takes to assess the cost and staff implications of compiling material for the departmental annual report; [20191]

(2) how much staff time, and at what estimated cost, was put into compiling the departmental annual report; and what were the figures for each year for which figures are available since 1990. [20190]

Mr. Sackville: The departmental report for the Department of Health has been produced by existing staff as part of their normal duties each year since its first publication in 1991. Production of the report is coordinated by approximately 0.6 whole-time equivalent staff, at a total cost of £14,100 at 1994–95 prices. It is not possible to quantify the total input of those other staff across the Department who contribute material for the report.

Appointments

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if undischarged bankrupts are eligible for appointment as chairmen, chief executives or directors of NHS authorities or trusts. [20688]

Mr. Malone: A person is disqualified for appointment as a chairman or member of a national health service authority or as a chairman or non-executive director of an NHS trust if he or she has within the preceding five years been adjudged bankrupt. The disqualification ceases on the date of discharge. Executive directors of NHS trusts and chief officers of health authorities are not subject to the same disqualification, but NHS boards are accountable for the proper appointment, appraisal and remuneration of senior executives. As in all their functions, the board must have regard to the public service values of accountability, probity and openness.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if persons with criminal records are eligible for appointment as chief executives or directors to NHS trusts. [20699]

Mr. Malone: National health service trust boards are accountable for the proper appointment, appraisal and remuneration of their senior executives and, as in all their functions, boards must have regard to the public service values of accountability, probity and openness. Executive directors of NHS trusts are not subject to the conditions of disqualification set out in the NHS Trusts (Membership and Procedure) Regulations 1990, which preclude the appointment as chairmen and non-executive directors of anyone who has within the preceding five years been convicted in the United Kingdom of any offence resulting in a sentence of imprisonment of not less than three months.

Local Pay Support Programme

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the cost of the NHS executive support programme for the introduction of local pay. [21776]

Mr. Malone: The programme referred to in my reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) on 20 February, Official Report, column 27, was undertaken at an estimated cost of £500,000 in the financial year 1994–95.

Market Testing

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many private companies have contacted the NHS executive information desk about market testing of NHS services; and how many such companies are entered on the database in total and by (i) clinical and (ii) non-clinical category. [21757]

Mr. Sackville: The national health service executive's market-testing information desk was established in its present form on 7 April 1995. Since that time, three private companies have contacted the information desk. The market-testing database contains data on approximately 1,100 private companies which have successfully competed for one or more NHS service contracts. While the vast majority would have non-clinical contracts, information grouped into a clinical or non-clinical category could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the impact of market testing in the NHS on staff numbers; and what strategies she proposes to meet any changes. [21758]

Mr. Sackville: The market testing of national health service services has proved to be valuable in improving efficiency and value for money so that more can be made available for patient care. It can affect staffing numbers for any specified service in a wide variety of ways, but, whatever the outcome, the employment rights of staff are protected by both European Community and United Kingdom employment regulations and legislation. Handling the staffing issues that arise from market testing is a matter for local NHS management in accordance with their legal obligations and their assessment of local circumstances and needs.

Single Antigen Acellular Pertussis

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many doses of the single antigen acellular pertussis vaccine have been given to children in this country since 1 May 1994; and what reports on the vaccine have been submitted to the Committee on Safety of Medicines. [21443]

Mr. Sackville: Information on how many children have received single antigen acellular pertussis vaccine during the period in question is not available. However, the number of doses of this vaccine issued to the national health service during the period was 9,827. The Committee on Safety of Medicines has since 1 May 1994 received a single suspected adverse reaction report in relation to the vaccine, a severe screaming attack.

Weighted Capitation Formula

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the new weighted capitation formula and in what respects it differs from that proposed by the York report; and if she will make a statement on how much the formula is determined by the factor of deprivation. [21753]

Mr. Sackville: The modified weighted capitation formula adjusts populations for age, need—over and above age—and relative costs. This formula has been developed in the light of new information sources and advances in statistical techniques.

There is no index of deprivation in the formula. Instead, it uses two needs indices—one for acute services and the other for psychiatric services—which take account of health and socio-economic factors.

The York report did not propose a weighted capitation formula.

Dental Services

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists in each health district in Lancashire are employed by family health services authorities to carry out urgent dental treatment. [21668]

Mr. Malone: Information about the number of dentists working in the emergency dental service is not available centrally.

General dental practitioners, who are independent contractors, have an obligation under their terms of service to provide emergency cover for their registered patients. They may also offer emergency treatment to unregistered patients. Any unregistered patient who needs urgent treatment should seek the help of his or her family health services authority which can make arrangements for emergency treatment for them.

Two salaried dentists are employed by Lancashire family health services authority.

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) which Minister in her Department has responsibility for equal opportunities issues; [21450]

(2) what progress has been made within her Department on equal opportunities matters. [21451]

Mr. Sackville: I have responsibility for equal opportunities issues in the Department.

The information requested is contained in the Department's 1993–94 equal opportunities progress report, copies of which will be placed in the Library.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish the gender assessment being prepared by the Department. [21452]

Mr. Sackville: Such assessment is part of a continuous and routine process of ensuring that the Department's policy proposals are not unlawful or unjustifiable on sex or race discrimination grounds and that similar principles apply to other groups.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress she hopes to achieve in her Department over the next three months to push forward the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the fourth UN conference on women; and if she will incorporate a section on equal opportunities in her Department's annual report. [21453]

Mr. Sackville: The Government are committed to the principles set out in the regional platform for action agreed at the preparatory conference in Vienna for the fourth United Nations world conference on women. We have taken these forward through a wide range of programmes and initiatives and will continue to do so.

A statement about equal opportunities is already included in the Department's annual report, copies of which are available in the Library.

Private Finance Initiative

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what has been the expenditure on (a) establishment and running of the private finance unit, (b) private finance specialists in the regional offices, including the total number so far employed, (c) publishing and distributing the booklets "Public Service, Private Finance" and "Private Finance Guide" in the "Capital Investment Manual", and (d) engaging Newchurch and Company to set up a database and inquiry point in each of the last five years; what is the expenditure in the current year; and what is planned to be spent in each of the next two financial years; [21744]

(2) how many people are employed by each NHS executive office and health authority who are involved in the management and promotion of the private finance initiative; [21999]

(3) what is the total cost of promoting the private finance initiative for the NHS; [21998]

(4) what are the total man hours involved in the management and promotion of the private finance initiative by each NHS executive office and health authority. [22000]

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what initiatives have been undertaken to secure private finance for her Department's projects. [22325]

Mr. Sackville: The private finance initiative will develop further the national health service's excellent record of co-operation with the private sector and ensure new hospitals are provided promptly and run efficiently for the benefit of all national health service patients. An increasing number of support services such as catering, cleaning and maintenance have been contracted out to private firms. This has cut waste and allowed large savings to be used for treating patients—as well as improving the services provided. The PFI increases the scope for savings on capital projects.

Expenditure on the establishment and running of the NHS executive private finance unit was about £55,000 in 1993–94 and about £260,000 in 1994–95—however, detailed expenditure figures are not available at this level. Expenditure in 1995–96 is expected to be about £146,000 plus about £300,000 for consultants who will provide added support for regional offices and the NHS. Expenditure in 1996–97 is likely to be around £150,000.

The number of staff employed by regional offices has not been increased because of the PFI. In 1994–95 private finance specialists in regional offices amounted to about one quarter of a whole-time equivalent post per region with expenditure of approximately £10,000 per region. In 1995–96 this is expected to increase to about one whole-time equivalent with expenditure of approximately £40,000 per region. This will be reviewed for 1996–97.

Expenditure on publishing the information pack "Public Service, Private Finance" was £7,896 plus £1,381.80 VAT. Expenditure by HMSO on publishing the "Private Finance Guide" as part of the "Capital Investment Manual" was £1,865. Itemised costs of distribution are not held centrally.

For information on expenditure on the PFI database run by Newchurch and Company, I refer the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) on 27 March, Official Report, column 421. Expenditure agreed for the period April 1995 to September 1995 will be £9,000 plus £1,575 VAT. After this, the contract may be renegotiated and it is not possible to give further expenditure figures.

The NHS executive headquarters will employ five staff—four whole-time equivalent staff—in 1995–96 in the private finance unit. Each regional office has one contact point for the PFI, but there are no additional staff employed to manage and promote the PFI. In each regional office several staff are involved with ensuring that NHS capital projects are as cost-effective as possible and exploration of private finance is essential in seeking the most cost-effective solutions to NHS needs.

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of her Department's budget is allocated to initiatives which have been undertaken to secure private finance for her Department's projects. [22324]

Mr. Sackville: The answer is 0.16 per cent.

Private Patients

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assumptions about the number of private patients being seen in NHS trust hospitals informed her estimate of charges and receipts in table 5 of the departmental report for 1994–95 and 1995–96. [21752]

Mr. Sackville: None.

Hormone Replacement Therapy

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what studies her Department (a) has conducted and (b) intends to conduct into possible adverse side effects of hormone replacement therapy; and if she will make a statement. [21669]

Mr. Sackville: The Department does not conduct research itself, but has funded projects on hormone replacement therapy, most recently a project entitled HRT in the menopause: a cost-effective analysis, which ended in December 1994. The Health Departments are currently discussing further work with the Medical Research Council which receives its grant in aid from the Office of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Ethnic Minority Staff

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many jobs are on offer under the eight-point plan to increase the number of managers in the NHS from the ethnic minorities; and what has been the take-up and distribution of the opportunities under the programme. [21495]

Mr. Malone: The programme referred to, "Ethnic minority staff in the NHS: a programme of action", aims to ensure that the national health service makes full use of the abilities of all its staff. It provides a framework within which trusts and health authorities set employment equality objectives as part of their mainstream business planning. Selection remains on merit alone: there are no quotas or jobs "on offer". A copy of the programme is available in the Library.

General Practitioners

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many GPs were available per 1,000 population in London, Newcastle, Manchester, Birmingham and Liverpool in each year since 1991. [21915]

Mr. Malone: The numbers of general practitioners—unrestricted principles—per 1,000 of the population for the areas in question at 1 October 1991, 1992, 1993 and 1 April 1994 are as shown in the table.

| | October 1991 | October 1992 | October 1993 | April 1994 |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Inner London | 0.57 | 0.58 | 0.58 | 0.58 |
| Outer London | 0.54 | 0.54 | 0.54 | 0.54 |
| Newcastle | 0.58 | 0.61 | 0.59 | 0.61 |
| Manchester | 0.58 | 0.60 | 0.62 | 0.62 |
| Birmingham | 0.56 | 0.56 | 0.55 | 0.56 |
| Liverpool | 0.51 | 0.50 | 0.52 | 0.55 |

Notes:

1. Family health services authorities included in inner London are:
   i. Brent and Harrow,
   ii. Kensington, Chelsea and Westminster,
   iii. Camden and Islington,
   iv. City and East London,
   v. Enfield and Haringey,
   vi. Lambeth, Southwark and Lewisham, and
   vii. Merton, Sutton and Wandsworth.
2. Family health services authorities included in outer London are:
   i. Barnet,
   ii. Ealing, Hammersmith and Hounslow,
   iii. Hillingdon,
   iv. Redbridge and Waltham Forest,
   v. Greenwich and Bexley,
   vi. Bromley, and
   vii. Kingston and Richmond.
3. Newcastle, Manchester, Birmingham and Liverpool each have their own FHSAs.
4. Calculations based on Office of Population Censuses and Surveys resident population estimates from 1991 population census and projections for subsequent years.

Guy's Accident and Emergency Department

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received from the City of London police about the closure of Guy's accident and emergency department; and if she will make a statement. [21923]

Mr. Malone: None.

Mental Health Staff

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much has been spent on training mental health staff to deal with supervision registers for the mentally ill. [21922]

Mr. Bowis: Training on supervision registers is primarily a matter for national health service provider units and information on spending is not available centrally. Staff who receive training in the care programme approach will now be informed about supervision registers. We have provided financial support for a number of national conferences designed to improve training in the care programme approach and have made a grant of £50,000 to the Open university for the production of a training pack for social services staff.

Nurses

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what tests are applied to nursing staff from EU countries working in the United Kingdom; and what tests are applied to British trained nurses working in other EU countries. [22008]

Mr. Sackville: Council directive 77/452/EEC requires countries of the European Economic Area to recognise, on the terms it specifies, which may include proof of good character, the qualifications of nurses responsible for general care awarded by other EEA countries to EEA nationals. European Council directive 77/453/EEC requires EEA countries to guarantee that such qualifications meet the minimum training requirements that it specifies. The operation of the directives is a matter for the competent authorities of the EEA countries. The competent authority in the United Kingdom is the United Kingdom Central Council for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting.

Residential Care

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which local authorities are using their discretion to allow a spouse to receive part of the occupational pension of a married person in local authority provided residential and nursing home care. [22277]

Mr. Bowis: This information is not collected. We have not received reports of any individual local authorities which are refusing to make sensible use of the discretion they have to help the spouses of occupational pensioners who enter residential accommodation.

Civil Servants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving her Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22085]

Mr. Sackville: The information on reasons for awarding different types of early retirement is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Patients Charter

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) on how many occasions each family health services authority failed to provide a list of doctors within two working days to patients wishing to change general practitioners in each of the last eight quarters; [22095]

(2) on how many occasions each family health services authority failed to send a patient's medical records to his or her new general practitioner (a) within two working days for urgent cases and (b) within six weeks for all other cases in each of the last eight quarters. [22094]

Mr. Malone: Nationally, there has been a considerable improvement in meeting the patients charter standard for transfer of urgent and routine medical records. The percentage of patient records not transferred within two working days has fallen from 52 per cent. at 30 June 1993 to 16 per cent. at 31 December 1994. Those not transferred within six weeks has fallen from 34 per cent. to 19 per cent. for the same period.

At 30 June 1993, 2 per cent. of patients were not allocated to a general practitioner within two days and at 31 December 1994 the patients charter was fully met for the third successive quarter.

The information will be placed in the Library showing the performance of individual family health services authorities in meeting each of the patients charter standards for the period 1 April 1993 to 31 December 1994. Data to 31 March 1995 are not yet available.

"Environments for Quality Care"

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total cost for the production and distribution of the NHS executive booklet "Environments for Quality Care: Health Buildings in the Community" first published in 1994. [22003]

Mr. Sackville: The cost for production of the national health service executive booklet "Environments for Quality Care: Health Buildings in the Community" was £60,000. The cost of distribution cannot be quantified. Copies were mainly sent in bulk to family health services authorities which in turn forwarded the booklet to all general practitioner practices in England.

Young Alzheimer's Disease

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people were suffering from (a) young Alzheimer's disease and (b) severe brain injury (i) nationally and (ii) in Merseyside, broken down by health authority area for each of the last five years. [22334]

Mr. Bowis: It is estimated that 17,000 younger people below the age of 65 suffer from dementia in the United Kingdom. No figures are available for severe brain injury as it is not a recognised medical term.

Medical (Professional Performance) Bill

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she has received the draft regulations that the General Medical Council expects to implement consequent to the coming into force of the Medical (Professional Performance) Bill; and if she will place them in the Library. [22212]

Mr. Malone: No. The rules cannot be made until the Bill has been enacted. The rules will be made in the form of statutory instruments, subject to the negative resolution procedure.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the oral statements of the Minister for Health in the Special Standing Committee on 25 April, Official Report, columns 748-49; if she will list the names of professional and patient organisations consulted in relation to the Medical (Professional Performance) Bill and place copies of their responses in the Library. [22214]

Mr. Malone: The names of the professional and patient organisations which were consulted by the General Medical Council are already in the public domain. They were listed in appendix A of the General Medical Council's consultation paper "Proposals for new Performance Procedures", published in May 1992. Copies of the document are available in the Library.

Availability of the responses are a matter for the General Medical Council or the individual organisations to decide on.

Fostering Regulations

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will place in the Library copies of the responses to her consultations with organisations on the proposed changes to fostering regulations; and when she expects these consultations to be complete. [22219]

Mr. Bowis: Responses are due by 19 May and I shall consider placing a summary of them in the Library after this date.

NHS External Expenditure

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the amount of money in real terms spent by each health authority, outside the NHS in (a) 1991–92, (b) 1992–93, (c) 1993–94 and the same figures for each trust. [19809]

Mr. Malone [holding answer 21 April 1995]: Spending outside the national health service has been defined for the purpose of this parliamentary question as non-pay revenue expenditure plus agency staff costs. Non-pay expenditure includes such items as clinical and general supplies and services, establishment expenses, transport and moveable plant, premises and fixed plant, capital, purchase of health care from the non-NHS bodies, external contract staffing and consultancy services and miscellaneous expenses, for example, net bank charges.

This information will be placed in the Library.

SCOTLAND

Tourist Board (Membership)

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the nominees for the Argyll and the Islands, Loch Lomond, Stirling and Trossachs tourist board; and if he will make a statement on when elections will take place for this body, whether an individual has to reside in the area covered by the board and if an individual can be a member of more than one board simultaneously. [20520]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend will appoint the first members of the controlling body of the board on the basis of nominations from the existing area tourist boards and from local authorities. Nominations will be sought shortly. Thereafter the controlling body will be appointed by the new board itself from within its own membership.

We are at present consulting on the terms of the statutory scheme which will establish the new board. It is likely, however, that the requirements for membership will follow current practice whereby residence within the area covered by a board is not essential and whereby bodies or individuals may also be members of more than one board.

Geese, Islay

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number of (a) barnacle and (b) Greenland white-fronted geese killed under licence on Islay to prevent agricultural damage in each winter since 1985–86; and how many returns in respect of each of the licences issued were incomplete. [21180]

Sir Hector Monro: The information is as follows:

| Year | Barnacles reported shot | White-fronts reported shot |
|---|---|---|
| 1985–86 | 541 | 0 |
| 1986–87 | 791 | 0 |
| 1987–88 | 505 | 76 |
| 1988–89 | 752 | 6 |
| 1989–90 | 915 | 45 |
| 1990–91 | 1365 | 62 |
| 1991–92 | 914 | 37 |
| 1992–93 | 0 | 0 |
| 1993–94 | 13 | 8 |

Returns, including supplementary information provided at the request of the Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department, are generally satisfactory.

Out-patient Waiting Times

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average waiting time for an ear, nose and throat appointment in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland in each of the last five years. [21089]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The requested information for 1993 and 1994 is shown in the table below. Corresponding information for earlier years is not available centrally.

New Out-patient Referrals Average waiting times (days) for ENT clinics in Inverclyde, Strathclyde and Scotland

| | 1993 | | 1994 | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | Mean | Median | Mean | Median |

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average waiting time for a hearing aid clinic in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland in each of the last five years. [21090]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not available centrally.

Class Sizes

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the cost of adopting a policy which ensures that no class size in schools exceeds 30 pupils in number. [21091]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Current class size limits are incorporated in the scheme of salaries and conditions of service determined by the Scottish Joint Negotiating Committee for Teaching Staff in School Education. As these matters are therefore primarily for local authorities to determine, my right hon. Friend has made no estimate of the cost of variation in existing class size limits.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number and percentage of pupils in secondary schools in (a) January 1980, (b) January 1991, (c) January 1992, (d) January 1993, (e) January 1994 and (f) January 1995 being taught in classes of (i) under 30 and (ii) 40 or more in each local education authority. [21845]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The available information is given in the tables. This is derived from returns made by education authority secondary schools in the September 1979, September 1991 and September 1993 school censuses. From 1983, information on class size was collected biennially in the school census.

Cervical Smear Programme, Greenock

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if all of the recommendations contained in the report of the committee of inquiry into the maladministration of the cervical smear programme at the Inverclyde Royal hospital, Greenock, have been implemented; and if he will make a statement. [21615]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The report of the inquiry into Cytopathology at Inverclyde Royal hospital recommended action by Argyll and Clyde health board local management and the Scottish Office Home and Health Department.

I am advised that all of the recommendations which applied to local management have been implemented by Argyll and Clyde health board.

The Common Services Agency, which has responsibility for the national breast screening co-ordinating unit, was instructed to develop and maintain quality assurance, performance monitoring and evaluation of the cervical screening programme. The unit continues to develop appropriate standards. A key appointment in this new structure is a national co-ordinator for both breast and cervical screening programmes. On the first advertisement, no suitable candidate was found and an interim co-ordinator was appointed. The permanent post will be re-advertised shortly.

A working group to formulate the policy for implementation of internal quality control in all laboratories carrying out cervical cytopathology was set up in February 1994 under the chairmanship of one of the Department's medical officers, and comprises members from the Royal College of Pathologists, the British Society of Clinical Cytology, the Institute of Biomedical Science and representatives from each of the three other UK Departments of Health. The working group has now submitted its report to the four territorial chief medical officers.

Other recommendations which have been implemented or are in the course of implementation are as follows:

In March 1994, a promotional leaflet encouraging women to attend for screening was distributed to all GPs and clinics.

In August 1994, booklets and videos on the current best practice in taking cervical smears produced by the British Society for Clinical Cytology were distributed to all GPs, practice nurses and other health professionals.

In March 1995, guidelines on failsafe actions for the follow-up of women with abnormal cervical smear histories were distributed to health boards, NHS trusts, GPs, practice nurses and laboratories providing a cervical cytology service.

By June 1995, revised guidance should be issued to health boards on purchasing, management and organisation of the cervical cytology service including staffing and appropriate levels of training.

I am copying this answer to the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham) for information.

Residential Homes for Elderly Citizens

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the terms of reference given to his working party which is reviewing the ownership, management and monitoring of privately owned residential homes for elderly citizens; and if he will list the members of the aforesaid committee. [21844]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Following is the remit of the Scottish Office working group on residential care home registration procedures:

Purpose

(a) To review, in the light of recent incidents, current registration and inspection procedures and local authority powers under the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968, as amended by the Registered Establishments (Scotland) Act 1987.

(b) To review current Scottish Office guidance and practice guidance on these issues.

(c) To have regard to the financial and operational implications of regulatory control for independent sector providers.

(d) To have regard to the parallel exercise relating to the registration and inspection of nursing homes.

(e) To recommend to Ministers such changes as may be necessary concerning (a) to (c).

Objective

To provide local authorities with the necessary framework to achieve effective and equitable regulation of independent sector establishments in order to protect the welfare and interests of residents.

The members of the working group represent the main interest groups as follows:

The Scottish Office

Mr. G. Anderson (Chair)

Ms P. McCaw

Mr. H. MacKenzie

Mr. A. McNaughton

Mrs. J. McNeill

Convention of Scottish Local Authorities

Mr. A. Robb, Director, Grampian Regional Council Social Work Department

Association of Directors of Social Work

Miss M. Hartnoll, Director, Strathclyde Regional Council Social Work Department (alternative Mr. R. Winter, Deputy Director)

Social Work Department Registration and Inspection Units

Mr. I Middleton, Head of Unit, Lothian Regional Council Social Work Department

Local Authority Law and Administration

Mr. R. Marr, Assistant Chief Executive, Borders Regional Council

British Federation of Care Home Proprietors

Mr. H. Ross

Scottish Association of Care Home Owners

Mr. C. Cowie

Scottish Federation of Housing Associations

Mr. D. Bookbinder

Voluntary Sector

Mr. I. Baillie, Director of Social Work, Church of Scotland

Users Advocacy

Mr. J. Jackson, Executive Director, Alzheimer Scotland—Action on Dementia

Ravenscraig Hospital, Greenock

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has engaged in about the proposed closure of the Ravenscraig hospital, Greenock; and if he will make a statement. [21846]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Argyll and Clyde health board is considering the role of Ravenscraig hospital as part of the review of community care services for the area. It would not be appropriate to anticipate the board's final view, or the outcome of any future consultation exercise.

Endangered Species

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the population of (a) pine martens, (b) peregrine falcons, (c) hen-harriers and (d) sparrowhawks in each year since 1980; and what is his estimate of the amount of damage each species does to game birds. [21848]

Sir Hector Monro: There are no annual population estimates for any of these species in Scotland. The most recent population estimates are as follows:

| | Number |
|---|---|
| Pine Marten | 3,500 (1993) |
| Peregrine Falcon | 639 pairs (1991) |
| Hen Harrier | 570 pairs (1989) |
| Sparrowhawk | No estimate |

Estimates of the effect of these species on game bird populations are not available, but damage certainly takes place.

NHS Trust Boards

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish an up-to-date list of all the chairs and non-executive directors of each NHS trust board, indicating the gender and occupation of each individual. [21356]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 1 May 1995]: As the information requested is lengthy, I shall arrange for it to be placed in the House Library.

Health Boards

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish an up-to-date list by region of all the chairs and non-executive members of each health board, indicating the gender and occupation of each individual. [21359]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The information requested in respect of the 15 health boards in Scotland is as follows:

European Social Fund

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those projects in privatised companies which have received European social fund support since privatisation indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [21297]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 1 May 1995]: My right hon. Friend took over responsibility for ESF under objectives 1, 2 and 5b in Scotland from 1 January 1994. No European social fund support has been given to projects in privatised companies since then.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those public projects which received European social fund support and were subsequently privatised over the last 10 years, indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [21296]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Since my right hon. Friend took responsibility for ESF in Scotland from 1 January 1994, no European social fund support has been given to public projects which were subsequently privatised.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21396]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 1 may 1995]: In my Department and agencies for which I am responsible, any conflict of interest involving a civil servant would have been dealt with in accordance with established guidance. Records of the numbers of cases are not held centrally.

In the last five years, however, no special advisers have declared a conflict of interest.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market-testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21375]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Between 1 April 1992 and 31 March 1995, the cost of employing external consultants to give support to the "Competing for Quality" programme of the Scottish Office has been £1.4 million.

This total includes the cost of assisting clients in the development of outline specifications, developing general guidance, supporting the preparation of bids by some in-house teams and ensuring that skills were transferred to Scottish Office staff so that future programmes could largely be supported by in-house staff.

NHS Provider Units

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the total annual cost improvement programme in the national health service provider units in each of the last four years. [21331]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which of the executive non-departmental public bodies sponsored by his Department publish (a) annual reports, (b) annual accounts, (c) minutes of meetings, (d) the agendas of meetings and (e) registers of members' interests; and whether this in each case is (i) under statutory requirement or (ii) voluntary. [20503]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 25 April 1995]: The information which is requested is as follows:

(a) Those executive NDPBs which are covered by the Companies Acts are required to publish annual reports and some other bodies are also required by the statute creating them to publish annual reports. These bodies are:

Hannah Research Institute
Macaulay Land Use Research Institute
Moredun Research Institute
Rowett Research Institute
Scottish Crop Research Institute
River Purification Boards
Scottish Conveyancing and Executry Services Board
Scottish Council for Educational Technology
Scottish Hospital Endowments Research Trust
Scottish Seed Potato Development Council
Scottish Vocational Educational Council.

In a number of other cases, the body is required by statute to produce an annual report on the exercise and performance of its functions for the Secretary of State which he is obliged to lay before Parliament. These bodies are:

Crofters Commission
Highlands and Islands Enterprise
National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting for Scotland
National Museums of Scotland (required by statute at least every three years, but voluntarily produces an annual report)
National Galleries of Scotland (required by statute every 3 years, but voluntarily produces an annual report)
New Town Development Corporations
Red Deer Commission
Royal Botanic Garden
Scottish Agricultural Wages Board (as part of the Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department Annual Report which is a Command Paper)
Scottish Enterprise
Scottish Examination Board
Scottish Homes
Scottish Legal Aid Board
Scottish Natural Heritage
Scottish Tourist Board

Some bodies publish reports on a non-statutory basis. They are:

Accounts Commission for Scotland
Edinburgh New Town Conservation Committee
National Library of Scotland
Royal Commission on the Ancient and Historical Monuments of Scotland
Scottish Arts Council
Scottish Community Education Council
Scottish Film Council
Scottish Further Education Unit
Scottish Higher Education Funding Council
Scottish Medical Practices Committee
Scottish Sports Council

(b) Those bodies which are required to publish their annual accounts under the terms of the Companies Acts, the Friendly Societies Acts or other legislation are:

Hannah Research Institute
Macaulay Land Research Institute
Moredun Research Institute
Rowett Research Institute
Scottish Crop Research Institute
River Purification Boards
Scottish Council for Educational Technology
Scottish Hospital Endowments Research Trust
Scottish Seed Potato Development Council
Scottish Vocational Educational Council.

Some bodies are required by statute to submit annual accounts to the Secretary of State who is obliged to pass them to the Comptroller and Auditor General. He is then obliged to lay copies of them before Parliament. These bodies are:

Accounts Commission Scotland
Highlands and Islands Enterprise
National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting for Scotland
National Library of Scotland
National Galleries of Scotland
National Museums of Scotland
New Town Development Corporations
Royal Botanic Garden
Scottish Enterprise
Scottish Examination Board
Scottish Higher Education Funding Council
Scottish Homes
Scottish Legal Aid Board
Scottish Natural Heritage
Scottish Tourist Board.

The Scottish Sports Council makes its accounts available on a voluntary basis.

(c) No executive NDPB sponsored by my Department is required to publish the minutes of its meetings on a statutory basis. The minutes of the General Teaching Council for Scotland are published on a voluntary basis; Livingston development corporation voluntarily makes available for public inspection the minutes of those parts of its meetings which it opens to members of the public.

(d) No executive NDPB sponsored by my Department is required to publish the agenda of its meetings and none does so.

(e) Information about members' interests is available from Companies House in relation to executive NDPBs which are covered by the Companies Acts and the Friendly Societies Acts. These bodies are:

Hannah Research Institute
Macaulay Land Use Research Institute
Moredum Research Institute
Rowett Research Institute
Scottish Crop Research Institute
Scottish Council for Educational Technology
Scottish Vocational Education Council

Although registers of members' interests are held by a number of other executive NPDBs, none is required to publish them. Following the publication last year of the code of best practice for board members of public bodies, the Scottish version of which was published in September 1994 and a copy of which is available in the Library of the House, a number of executive NDPBs are considering publication of their register of members' interests on an annual basis, although none has yet done so.

DEFENCE

Bosnia

6. Sir Fergus Montgomery: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he next expects to visit Bosnia to inspect the work of the UN peacekeeping force. [20081]

Mr. Rifkind: I hope to be able to visit British forces in Bosnia before the summer recess.

23. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to increase the allocation of aircraft fuel to the RAF detachments enforcing the UN no-fly zone over Bosnia. [20098]

Mr. Freeman: The RAF detachments helping to enforce the UN no-fly zone over Bosnia draw fuel as required to meet their operational commitments. This arrangement works well and there are no plans to change it.

Royal Anglian Regiment

15. Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he next intends to pay an official visit to units of the Royal Anglian Regiment to discuss its future deployment. [20090]

Mr. Freeman: I look forward to paying an early visit to my local regiment, the Royal Anglians.

Defence Industries

16. Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the number of people employed in United Kingdom defence industries. [20091]

Mr. Freeman: I refer my hon. Friend to section 1.10 of "UK Defence Statistics", 1994 edition, which gives details of defence-related employment, published by the Government statistical service. The 1995 edition of this document will be published in July.

Royal Irish Regiment

17. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many soldiers in the Royal Irish Regiment have appealed against their discharge from the regiment in the last two years. [20092]

Mr. Freeman: Seven soldiers of the Royal Irish Regiment have appealed against discharge from the regiment in the last two years.

Service Personnel (Disablement)

19. Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people were disabled as a result of injury in the armed forces in the last three years for which he has records. [20094]

Mr. Freeman: Although statistics for the number of service personnel disabled as a result of injury in the armed services are not held, the numbers of personnel discharged on medical grounds are as follows:

1991–92: 842
1992–93: 772
1993–94: 809

Defence Attachés

20. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent consultations he has had to reform the system of appointment of defence attachés. [20095]

Mr. Freeman: The most recent review of attachés was the Goddard study, which considered the tasks of the corps, its long-term role and deployment, and its management and operation and reported in July 1993.

Departmental Land

21. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much land is currently owned or leased by his Department. [20096]

Mr. Freeman: My Department owns some 242,000 hectares of land including foreshore, of which 226,700 hectares are freehold and 15,300 hectares are leasehold. These figures are at 1 April last year, the latest date for which records are available, and relate to freehold and leasehold landholdings, including foreshore, for which deeds or lease agreements were held. Acquisitions or disposals which may have been completed but where deeds had not been transferred, or agreements not formally signed or determined by that date, are not included in these figures.

Helicopters

22. Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make an announcement on new helicopter orders for the armed forces. [20097]

Mr. Freeman: My Department is evaluating tenders to meet the Army's requirement for an attack helicopter. We hope to announce a decision on the purchase of that equipment before the summer recess. We do not expect to make any other announcements on new major helicopter orders in the near future.

28. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to visit the Eurocopter Helicopter Group in the near future to discuss procurement policy. [20103]

Mr. Freeman: I shall be visiting Bonn on 19 May and hope to see the Eurocopter Tiger during my visit. My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to visit Eurocopter in the near future to discuss procurement policy.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his answer of 26 April, Official Report, columns 586-87, if he will place in the Library a summary of the six reports on the cost and operational effectiveness investment appraisal of the EH101 helicopter. [22330]

Mr. Freeman: No summary exists, and one could be prepared only at disproportionate cost. Furthermore, the material on which it would be based is both classified and commercially confidential. It would not be appropriate to place such material in the Library.

Equal Opportunities

24. Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will take steps to increase the representations of women and of people from ethnic minorities in senior ranks in the armed forces. [20099]

Mr. Freeman: Promotion in the armed forces is on merit and positive discrimination would be unlawful. Opportunities for promotion to the most senior ranks exist for service personnel irrespective of their ethnic origin. Although some areas of employment remain closed to women on grounds of operational effectiveness, many new employment opportunities have been opened to them in recent years.

Polaris

25. Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how soon he expects to be able to withdraw the last Polaris submarine. [20100]

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) on 20 April, Official Report, column 224.

Northern Ireland (Troops)

26. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the number of troops in Northern Ireland. [20101]

Mr. Freeman: There are currently some 17,500 armed forces personnel in Northern Ireland. In addition, the units which have recently been relocated from Northern Ireland remain available to the general officer commanding and can return at short notice if required. Force levels are kept under review to ensure that they remain appropriate to the security situation.

Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty

27. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is Her Majesty's Government's position on the non-proliferation treaty negotiations. [20102]

Mr. Freeman: The nuclear non-proliferation treaty is the cornerstone of international efforts to prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons. We are committed to securing its unconditional and indefinite extension at the current NPT review and extension conference of states parties in New York.

Departmental Budget

29. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what portion of his budget in cash and as a percentage is spent on (a) service pay and (b) the pay of ancillary staff; what were the equivalent figures 20 years ago; and if he will make a statement. [20104]

Mr. Freeman: In 1995–96 my Department has budgeted for a service pay bill inclusive of associated allowances and expenses of £6,065 million which represents 26.9 per cent. of its budget. The pay bill inclusive of associated allowances and expenses for the civilian staff of the Department has been budgeted for at £2,485 million which equates to 11 per cent. of the Department's total budget.

Comparable figures for money actually spent in financial year 1975–76 are some £1,304 million for service pay which amounted to 24.6 per cent. of the total budget that year and £988 million for civilian staff which represented 18.6 per cent.

Royal Naval College, Greenwich

30. Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about future use of the historic buildings at Greenwich currently occupied by the Royal Naval college. [20105]

Mr. Freeman: As we have previously made clear, we do not intend to reach any firm conclusions on the future of the Royal Naval college, Greenwich at this stage, but will shortly be seeking expressions of interest in the site from organisations able to propose uses sympathetic to the character of the buildings.

A campaign will be launched in the next few weeks, about which we are consulting English Heritage and the local planning authorities, with a view to defining suitable alternative uses and maintenance arrangements. We shall consult further with these bodies later in the year when we come to evaluate the expressions of interest submitted as a result of the campaign.

We hope to be in a position to make an announcement on the future of Greenwich by the end of the year.

US Airlines (Contracts)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much will be spent by his Department in contracts with US airlines in the current financial year. [20093]

Mr. Freeman: My Department has spent an estimated £775,000 with US airlines in the financial year 1994–95 and I would expect this level of expenditure to continue within the current financial year. This expenditure was in respect of duty travel on internal schedules and not associated with any specific contracts.

My Department is in the process of completing an open competition to privatise the UK to north America route. This will replace the existing VC10 schedule which operates between RAF Brize Norton and Dulles airport and will commence 1 September 1995. The contracts will be for both international flights from the UK—USA and Canada and provide the facility to book intercontinental internal travel for the MOD traveller at substantial discounts to the normal fares. Responses from the airlines sector were not limited to UK-registered operators.

Until the contracts are awarded I cannot be precise about the cost to my Department for this financial year which will be offset in part by the savings arising from the reassignment of the RAF VC10 aircraft on more essential operational tasks, such as air-to-air refuelling.

Royal Fleet Auxiliary

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the implications for United Kingdom security of the failure to reach agreement in respect of the pay award to the Royal Fleet Auxiliary. [21057]

Mr. Soames: Royal Fleet Auxiliary officers have already reached agreement on last year's pay award, and we hope that ratings will also vote for acceptance in their present ballot. If agreement is not reached, however, the security implications would depend on the nature and extent of any industrial action taken.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals he has to privatise the Royal Fleet Auxiliary; and if he will make a statement. [21058]

Mr. Soames: None. The Royal Fleet Auxiliary service operates in direct support of our front-line forces.

Tornado

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total cost of keeping a Tornado airborne for one hour. [21827]

Mr. Soames: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on 24 October 1994, Official Report, columns 499–500.

Bank Disposal

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all locations which have required clearance by bomb disposal teams since 1965 for each county council area in Wales indicating the year of clearance; and if he will make a statement. [20670]

Mr. Soames: Information in the form requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now set up an independent medical assessment to examine the long-term health effects upon individual service men who participated in experiments at the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment at Porton Down. [21611]

Mr. Soames: There is no evidence to suggest that any of the service volunteers—approximately 6,900 in number—who have participated in studies at Porton Down over the past 40 years have suffered any harm to their health. I do not, therefore, consider it necessary to set up an independent medical assessment to examine any of the individuals concerned.

VE Day (Merchant Navy)

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out the activities designed to recognise the role of Merchant Navy personnel included in the national programme to commemorate VE day; and if he will make a statement. [21712]

Mr. Soames: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I have to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) on 28 April 1995, Official Report, column 772.

Empty Accommodation, Dorset

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the number of empty dwellings owned by his Department in the constituencies of Dorset, North; Dorset, South; and Dorset, West. [21713]

Mr. Soames: As at 31 March, my Department owned the following number of empty dwellings in the constituencies in question:

Dorset, North: 152
Dorset, South: 175
Dorset, West: 0

The vacant properties in Dorset, North are being held for a unit deployment from the north of England. Of the vacant properties in Dorset, South, 86 are in the process of being sold. The remainder are either undergoing or awaiting major maintenance work, already allotted to service families due to move in shortly or form part of the management margin needed to ensure that accommodation is available for entitled service families.

RNAS Portland

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the benefits to be achieved by moving the RAF Osprey Squad from Portland to Yeovilton before the Lynx is replaced by the Merlin in 2005. [21714]

Mr. Soames: As explained in my Department's consultative document on the proposed closure of the royal naval air station at Portland, a copy of which is in the Library of the House, it will be possible to collocate the remaining Royal Navy Lynx helicopters at Yeovilton from 1999. The closure of RNAS Portland would result in significant savings to the defence budget.

Railings, Devonport

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the materials being used recently to refurbish the railings around the royal naval base along Saltash road. [21718]

Mr. Soames: These railings form part of the east side of HM naval base, Devonport and were last partly refurbished in 1964. The materials used for the recent refurbishment were paint, including primer and undercoat, galvanised steel, lime stone, lime mortar and timber boarding.

Civil Servants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22090]

Mr. Freeman: My Department does not keep central records of early retirement awards made on grounds of limited efficiency and the information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The number of individuals released on such terms is as follows:

1990–91: 10
1991–92: 4
1992–93: 2
1993–94: 3
1994–95: 1

RAF Chicksands

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals his Department is considering with regard to the future of RAF Chicksands, Bedfordshire; and if he will make a statement. [22328]

Mr. Soames: With the US withdrawal from RAF Chicksands due to be completed by 30 September 1995, we are at present considering alternative defence uses for the site. Should no alternative defence uses be identified, we would consider the future of the site in consultation with the local authority.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received from the Bedford community retirement group with regard to the future of RAF Chicksands, Bedfordshire. [22329]

Mr. Soames: The Bedford community retirement group wrote to my Department in March enclosing a copy of its proposals for the future use of RAF Chicksands. The proposals are a matter for the local authority, however, and this was made clear in my Department's response of 11 April.

Conventional Forces in Europe Treaty

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with his Russian counterpart concerning the renegotiation of the conventional forces in Europe treaty; what consideration he has given to the renegotiation of the conventional forces in Europe treaty; and if he will make a statement. [22297]

Mr. Soames: We maintain a dialogue with the Russians at all levels about issues which might affect their compliance with the conventional forces in Europe treaty.

Renegotiation of the treaty is not a subject which has been discussed. The treaty is widely recognised as the cornerstone of European security and it is in everyone's interest to see it fully implemented. To that end, we continue to urge all states parties, including Russia, to meet their obligations under the treaty, as only by doing so will the basis be created for a constructive review of the treaty's operation at the May 1996 treaty review conference.

Information to Members

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence to which right hon. and hon. Members his special adviser, Mr. Crispin Blunt, has written to inform them of the placing of contracts by his Department in their constituency; what are the values of these contracts; which contracts were involved; what assistance the civil service provides in order to ensure the efficiency of this system of informing hon. Members; when this system was first introduced; and if he will make a statement. [22298]

Mr. Rifkind: In October 1993, my special adviser began writing to right hon. and hon. Members of all parties about MOD contracts awarded to firms in their constituencies which, while of local significance, were too small to merit individual announcements.

Since 1993, the practice has become more systematic, and standard letters are now sent about all contracts worth more than £1 million notified to the special adviser by the responsible contracts branch.

Since October 1993, more than 300 letters have been sent to right hon. and hon. Members.

Commercial Exploitation Levies

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will specify how much money his Department received in each of the last 10 years from commercial exploitation levies in cases where it has funded the development of the exported equipment in question. [22299]

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is as follows:

| | £ million |
|---|---|
| 1986–87: | 29.2 |
| 1987–88: | 27.9 |
| 1988–89: | 44.0 |
| 1989–90: | 24.8 |
| 1990–91: | 16.7 |
| 1991–92: | 35.0 |
| 1992–93: | 15.3 |
| 1993–94: | 39.8 |

Details for 1984–85 and 1985–86 are not available. Final figures for 1994–95 have not been calculated.

Land Mines

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 21 April, Official Report, column 306, what types of anti-personnel mines other than Ranger mines his Department possesses; when they were purchased; from whom they were purchased; what was the total cost of the order; when they will need to be replaced; and if he will make a statement. [22300]

Mr. Freeman: My Department possesses the following anti-personnel mines, other than Rangers:

(a) Mine anti-personnel C3 (Elsie)

(b) Mine anti-personnel M18A1 (Claymore)

(c) Projector Area Defence L1E1 (PJRAD)

These mines were purchased as follows:

(a) C3 Elsie between 1965 and 1968 from Canadian Arsenals Ltd.

(b) M18A1 Claymore between 1965 and 1968, and in 1989 from the US Department of Defence.

(c) L1E1 PJRAD in 1986 from Royal Ordnance.

We no longer retain a record of the costs of these procurements, and there are currently no plans for their replacement.

Mines

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those British companies which (i) have stockpiles of, (ii) are producing, (iii) have produced since 1965 and (iv) manufacture components for (a) anti-personnel mines, (b) area denial mines, (c) self-destruct mines and (d) other forms of mines; and in the case of (iii) if he will give the year in which production ceased.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 18 April 1995]: These matters are the responsibility of the companies concerned. However, I am advised that the following information can be provided from my Department's records.

My Department classifies land mines by their effect, for example, anti-tank or anti-personnel. Any type of land mine can be self-destructing. We therefore do not recognise area denial mines or self-destructing mines as separate categories.

My Department is not aware of any British company holding stockpiles of land mines.

The "Defence Manufacturers' Handbook" lists British Aerospace Defence, British Aerospace (Royal Ordnance), Hunting Engineering, and Plalite as having land mines among their products. My Department is not aware that any of these companies is currently producing land mines and I can confirm that there are no current MOD orders for land mines, nor are there any current export licence applications.

My Department believes that Thorn EMI Electronics, Royal Ordnance and Hunting Engineering are the only British companies to have produced land mines since 1965.

Production of conventional anti-personnel land mines for the MOD ceased in 1983, and of anti-tank land mines in 1991.

In 1986 the Royal Ordnance factories produced a small number of projector area defence weapons for my Department. Previously, these were classified not as anti-personnel land mines, but as command-detonated point defence weapons. However, further research has now established that these weapons fall within the standard NATO definition of a land mine. Consequently, previous statements that

"the UK has not produced anti-personnel mines for over a decade" are not accurate in relation to the PJRAD.

My Department is not aware of any British companies which currently manufacture components for land mines.

RAF Burtonwood

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the current weekly running costs of Burtonwood air base. [22183]

Mr. Soames: The running costs of RAF Burtonwood are estimated at some £8,000 per week, exclusive of any contribution in lieu of rates.

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current weekly income from the lorry and trailer park and associated activities on Burtonwood air base. [22184]

Mr. Soames: The income from the present commercial use of RAF Burtonwood is commercial-in-confidence between my Department and the occupiers.

Market Testing

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 25 April, Official Report, column 498, if he will list those activities in his Department which have been market-tested; and if he will specify in each case if in-house bids were permitted. [22338]

Mr. Freeman: In the three-year period since April 1992, a total of 101 defence support activities have been exposed to the "Competing for Quality" process as part of the drive to deliver, through the increased use of competition and private sector involvement, high-quality and more cost-effective support to the armed forces. Of these, 23 have been exposed to competition from external contractors, with an in-house bid in each case, ie market-tested, to ensure that the service is delivered in a way which gives best value for money. The market tests involved, and the results of each, are as follows:

Gardening at RM units Poole, CTCRM Lympstone and COMMACHIO group—all three won by in-house bid team.

Mechanical handling equipment, repair and maintenance, Devonport—won by in-house team.

18 base workshop, army base repair organisation, Bovington—won by in-house team.

RAOC print section, Northern Ireland—won by in-house team.

Air weapon range, RAF Cowden—won by in-house team.

Support services, Gateway house, RAF Brize Norton—won by in-house team.

Aircraft support services, Boscombe Down—won by in-house team.

Elements of experimental flying programme, Bedford/Boscombe Down—won by in-house team.

Second line engineering support, flag officer naval aviation, Yeovilton—activity contractorised following a market test with in-house bid.

Industrial mess (catering and stewardship function), defence postal and courier service, Mill Hill, London—activity contractorised following a market test with in-house bid.

Ration delivery service, Northern Ireland—activity contractorised following a market test with in-house bid.

Tailoring, Northern Ireland—activity contractorised following a market test with in-house bid.

Air weapon range, RAF Holbeach—activity contractorised following a market test with in-house bid.

Flight checking, 115 Squadron, RAF Benson—activity contractorised following a market test with in-house bid.

Inspectorate of recruitment exhibition production flight, RAF Henlow—activity contractorised following a market test with in-house bid.

Nimrod major servicing unit, RAF Kinloss—activity contractorised following a market test with in-house bid.

Airfield services, RAF Gibraltar—activity contractorised following a market test with in-house bid.

IT processing DIGITS operations west, Devizes—activity contractorised following a market test with in-house bid.

Property Management, Central London—activity contractorised following a market test with in-house bid.

Mess catering, Boscombe Down—activity contractorised following a market test with in-house bid.

Trident in-service support—activity contractorised following a market test with in-house bid.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Bernard Manning

Mr. Soley: To ask the Attorney-General whether he will consider instituting proceedings under section 18 of the Public Order Act 1986 against (a) Bernard Manning and (b) the organisers of the Haydock Park police social event on Friday 10 March. [21314]

The Attorney-General: The question of prosecution does not arise unless there has first been a criminal investigation. It is the function of the police to investigate alleged criminal offences and the hon. Member should place any evidence which he considers discloses an offence in the hands of the relevant chief officer of police.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Attorney-General if he will obtain from Granada Television a transcript of the recent address by the comedian Bernard Manning at a social event organised by members of the Greater Manchester police with a view to considering a prosecution for incitement to racial hatred; and if he will make a statement. [21304]

The Attorney-General: No. The investigation of any criminal offence which is alleged to have been committed is the function of the police.

If the hon. Member has reason to believe that an offence has been committed he should report the matter to the police.

Barings Bank

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Attorney-General what investigation are being undertaken in regard to those executives at Barings responsible for the criminal offence mentioned by the Governor of the Bank of England in his oral evidence to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee hearing of 5 April. [21133]

The Attorney-General: I understand that the hon. Member has in mind a possible contravention of section 38(9) of the Banking Act 1987. Such offences are normally investigated and prosecuted by the Bank of England.

The wider inquiries by the director of the Serious Fraud Office into the affairs of Barings bank continue. If information comes to light during those inquiries relevant to possible offences contrary to section 38 then that information will be made available to the Bank of England.

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Attorney-General when he expects the Director of Public Prosecutions to report on his investigation into Mr. Nick Leeson. [21134]

The Attorney-General: It is the director of the Serious Fraud Office rather than the Director of Public Prosecutions who is investigating matters relating to Barings bank. It is too soon to say when the inquiry will be complete.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department of those people who sought asylum in the United Kingdom in the last year for which figures are available, were refused asylum, and were subsequently refused an appeal, how many were given leave to appeal to the Immigration appeal tribunal; and, of these (a) how many were allowed by the Immigration appeal tribunal and (b) how many were remitted for a further hearing before a special adjudicator. [21283]

Mr. John M. Taylor: In 1994, 355 asylum appellants were granted leave to appeal to the immigration appeal tribunal. Of these, (a) eight appeals were allowed by the immigration appeal tribunal and (b) 192 were remitted for a fresh hearing before a special adjudicator.

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department of those people who sought asylum in the United Kingdom in the last year for which figures are available and were refused asylum, how many (a) gave notice of appeal, (b) were certified by the Secretary of State as being manifestly unfounded and (c) had their appeals determined; and, of these, how many applications which were certified by the Secretary of State as being without foundation were allowed by a special adjudicator. [21310]

Mr. John M. Taylor: (a) In 1994, the immigration appellate authorities received 6,045 asylum appeals; (b) of these, 872 were certified by the Secretary of State to be claims without foundation under the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993; (c) approximately 2,400 cases were determined in 1994. Figures are not available as to how many "without foundation" appeals were successful during that year but will be available for cases dealt with thereafter.

Immigration

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department in the last year for which figures are available, of all immigration—non-asylum—appeals which were refused, how many were given leave to appeal to the immigration appeal tribunal; and of these (a) how many were allowed by the immigration appeal tribunal and (b) how many were remitted for a further hearing before an adjudicator. [21281]

Mr. John M. Taylor: In 1994, 977 applications for leave to appeal were granted; of these 253 appeals were allowed and 418 were remitted for a fresh hearing before an adjudicator.

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many substantive immigration appeals were (a) heard and (b) allowed in each of the hearing centres in the United Kingdom in the last year for which figures are available in each of the following categories: (i) spouses, (ii) fiancé(s), (iii) children, (iv) dependant relatives other than children and (v) long-term students. [21282]

Mr. John M. Taylor: (a) The number of substantive appeals heard in each of the hearing centres in 1994 is set out in the following table. The immigration appellate authorities do not hold figures for the categories referred to.

| Hearing centre | Appeals heard at an oral hearing | Appeals determined on the papers |
|---|---|---|
| Thanet House, London | 5,700 | 3,283 |
| Hatton Cross, Middlesex, Cardiff and Belfast | 4,428 | 2,058 |
| Birmingham | 2,360 | 1,440 |
| Manchester | 1,782 | 619 |
| Leeds | 1,357 | 513 |
| Glasgow | 391 | 89 |

(b) In 1994, 3,657 appeals were allowed. The number of appeals allowed was as follows for each of the following categories:

|---|---|
| (i) Husbands | 568 |
| (ii) Wives/Children/Other Dependant Relatives | 479 |
| (iii) Fiancés | 86 |
| (iv) Fiancées | 31 |
| (v) Long-term students | Figures not available |

Figures are not available to provide a breakdown of appeals by individual hearing centre.

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department in the last year for which figures are available, how many listed immigration appeals were adjourned (a) once and (b) more than once; how many adjournments were granted at the request of the applicant; and how many on the notice of the court. [21280]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The immigration appellate authorities do not maintain a separate record of those cases which have been adjourned and the information sought could be obtained only at disproportionate cost, by going through the individual records for all cases heard during the year.

Court Delays, London

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the average delay in waiting for court cases in London (a) in Crown courts and (b) in magistrates courts calculated from the charging by police of an alleged offender. [21896]

Mr. John M. Taylor: In the magistrates courts the average time taken in London in 1994, for indictable-triable either-way offences from charge or summons to first listing was 25 days and the average time taken from first listing to completion was 54 days.

In relation to the Crown courts, the question concerns a specific operational matter on which the chief executive of the Court Service is best placed to provide an answer and I have accordingly asked the chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from M. D. Huebner to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 1 May 1995:

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, has asked me to reply to your Question about the waiting time for criminal court cases in London.

I should explain that I cannot provide information on Magistrates' Courts, which are not part of the Court Service; I understand that the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department will respond separately with the information you requested.

So far as the Crown Court is concerned, waiting times are measured from the date the defendant is first committed from the Magistrates Court to the date the defendant enters a guilty plea to all charges or the jury is sworn in at the trial. For the 3 months ending 31 March 1995, the average waiting time in the London Crown Courts was 15.37 weeks.

Statute of Westminster

Mr. Mackinley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make it his policy to consult other countries under section 2 of the Statute of Westminster 1931 before bringing forward proposals to amend the Regency Act 1937. [22004]

Mr. John M. Taylor: It is the Government's policy to consult as appropriate before introducing legislation.

Legislative Repeal Bills

Mr. Mackinley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the criteria by which the Law Commission and the Joint Committee on Consolidation, &c. Bills consider items for inclusion in Statute Law (Repeals) Bills. [22005]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The criteria are set out in section 3(1) of the Law Commissions Act 1965 and in the standing orders of both Houses of Parliament.

Mr. Mackinley: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will refer for consideration to the Law Commission His Majesty's Declaration of Abdication Act 1936 for possible repeal. [22096]

Mr. John M. Taylor: That is not my intention.

ENVIRONMENT

Air Pollution

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the effect slow moving heavy duty vehicles have on air pollution. [21671]

Mr. Atkins: The table illustrates that slow moving traffic emits more carbon monoxide—CO—and non methane volatile organic compound—NMVOC—than faster moving traffic. However, the latter emit more oxides of nitrogen—NOx.

Emission factors for road transport (g/km)

| Vehicle type | Small HGV (<16 litres) | Large HGV (>16 litres) |
|---|---|---|
| Urban (Average 15–20 mph) | | |
| CO | 6.00 | 7.30 |
| NOx | 12.60 | 16.95 |
| NMVOC | 6.412 | 6.78 |

Emission factors for road transport (g/km)

Wildlife Conservation

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many warning letters his Department has issued where offences in apparent contravention of wildlife law have been disclosed in the last five years. [21830]

Sir Paul Beresford: It would not be in the interests of bird conservation to publish the detailed information sought by the hon. Member about potential wildlife offences dealt with by my Department. Such information could be of use to those evading or intending to evade the controls. I will write to the hon. Member.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Channon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes to announce his proposals for local government tax before the end of July; and if he will make a statement. [21812]

Mr. Curry: As usual, proposals for the 1996–97 local government finance settlement will be announced soon after the Chancellor has made his Budget statement. Levels of council tax will depend upon Budget decisions taken by local authorities.

River Inspections

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how often the National Rivers Authority has taken action to enforce the provisions of abstraction licences granted under the Water Acts of 1963 and 1989; and if he will make a statement. [21987]

Mr. Atkins: The information conveniently available shows the following action:

| Year | Enforcement inspections | Formal cautions or prosecutions |
|---|---|---|
| 1993–94 | 18,470 | 19 |
| 1994–95 | 19,925 | 25 |

Inspections may also result in advice or informal warning.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how often the National Rivers Authority reviews current abstraction licences granted under the Water Acts of 1963 and 1989; and if he will make a statement. [21988]

Mr. Atkins: The information requested is shown on page 102 of the National Rivers Authority's annual report and accounts for 1993–94. A total of 18,470 abstraction licences out of a total 48,189 were inspected in 1993–94. A table showing actual and forecast inspections from 1989–90 to 1997–98 is also given on page 43 in the National Rivers Authority's corporate plan for 1994–95.

CITES

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made concerning enforcement issues following the ninth conference of the parties to the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species. [21829]

Sir Paul Beresford: For actions taken by the United Kingdom concerning CITES enforcement issues, I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 30 March 1995, Official Report, column 736.

Protected Birds

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) pursuant to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, columns 226-27, what means are employed for checking for previous convictions from applicants; [21877]

(2) how many potential offences his Department identified and pursued as a result of monitoring national trade journals prior to November 1994, relating to the sale of birds listed in appendix I of CITES and annexe CI of EC regulation 3626–82; [21870]

(3) what factors led to nine of the 26 potential sales offences being passed to the police; [21871]

(4) how many specimens of Livingstone's Turaco were advertised for sale during the period that his Department has been monitoring the trade journals; [21872]

(5) how many times information has been followed up by the Department's wildlife inspectorate, when doubt concerning an application has been raised; [21875]

(6) how many times premises have been inspected to ensure that any conditions attached to sales exemptions have been met; [21876]

(7) when the first police officer was designated as an authorised person under the Control of Trade in Endangered Species (Enforcement) Regulation 1985. [21883]

Sir Paul Beresford [holding answer 2 March 1995]: It would not be in the interests of bird conservation to publish the detailed information sought by the hon. Member about potential wildlife offences dealt with by my Department. Such information could be of use to those evading or intending to evade the controls. I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 226, when his Department intends to register the bird species listed in CITES appendix I and annexe CI of EC regulation 3626/82, that are not currently required to be registered and ringed if kept in captivity. [21873]

Sir Paul Beresford [holding answer 2 May 1995]: Following our review of the secondary controls on wildlife, we have invited our scientific advisers, the Joint Nature Conservation Committee, to advise on the criteria for listing the species which must be ringed and registered with the Department, by the middle of next year.

The agreed criteria will be used to carry out the first review of schedule 4 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. The results should be submitted to my Department by December 1997. We shall consider, in the light of this, whether any additions or deletions to the species listed in schedule 4 are necessary.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 226, what proposals he has to ensure that individual birds of significant conservation concern advertised for sale can be uniquely identified. [21874]

Sir Paul Beresford: [holding answer 2 May 1995]: We shall continue to ensure that sales exemptions are issued only when we are satisfied that there are no significant risks to the conservation of the species concerned. The enforcement working group, which I announced on 20 December in my reply to the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson), Official Report, columns 1115-16, will be looking at the current arrangements for the marking of specimens, and considering whether any changes are required.

British Gas (Sites Redevelopment)

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the sites owned by British Gas where (a) discussions regarding grant aid have occurred, (b) grant aid has been formally applied for and (c) grant aid has been approved in order to redevelop the sites giving, in each case, the amount of aid involved and including grant aid from his Department, urban development corporations and any other relevant publicly funded bodies. [20410]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Department and the regeneration bodies it supports have allocated grant for the redevelopment of sites owned by British Gas in the following instances:

| Project | Programme | Amount of grant £ million |
|---|---|---|
| Pleck Gasworks | Walsall City Challenge | 1.385 |
| Pride Park (with ABBT and British Rail Property Board) | Derby Pride Ltd (City Challenge) | 12.8 (paid to Derby City Council) |
| Windsor Street Reclamation | Birmingham Heartlands Development Corporation | 0.2 |
| Grand Islan | Central Manchester Development Corporation | 4.4 |
| Leeds City Office Park | Leeds Development Corporation | 0.5 |

In addition, there have been discussions on possible projects at Foleshill gasworks, Coventry; West Dyke road, Redcar; Redditch gasworks; Greenwich peninsula; Ladbroke grove, north Kensington; and Crawford street, Birmingham.

TRANSPORT

Road Casualties

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what new proposals he has further to reduce road casualties. [22222]

Mr. Norris: We are continuing to implement the measures which I described to the hon. Member in my reply of 19 December 1994, Official Report column 873.

Woolwich Rail Tunnel

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received regarding the proposed Woolwich rail tunnel; if he will hold a public consultation; and when he expects to make a decision. [22371]

Mr. Norris: I am aware of the hon. Member's support for the Woolwich rail tunnel project and have discussed it in the past both with him and local representatives.

Railtrack, British Rail, London Transport and the London Docklands development corporation are currently working to define and develop the outline scheme. I understand that they intend to consult publicly on this work at an appropriate stage, and I look forward to seeing the results. The scheme is also likely to be included in the Government office for London's forthcoming consultation on river crossings in east London.

Woolwich Metro

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the importance of the proposed Woolwich metro to the east Thames gateway strategy. [22372]

Mr. Norris: The proposals are at an early stage. But, as indicated in the draft Thames gateway planning framework, the metro concept could assist regeneration by extending potential labour markets.

East London River Crossing

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to issue a consultation document on the proposed east London river crossing; what will be the period for consultation; and when he expects to make a decision. [22373]

Mr. Norris: I hope to publish shortly a consultation document on a range of options for river crossings on the Thames east of Tower bridge. I envisage a consultation period of three months. The timing of any subsequent decisions will depend on the outcome of the consultation.

M25

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the full costs of the Rendel, Palmer and Tritton study into the M25, and further studies arising from that. [21580]

Mr. Watts: The cost of the Rendel, Palmer and Tritton study, published in 1989, was £321,000, excluding VAT. Following publication in 1990 of the M25 action plan, the Department of Transport's response to public comments on the RPT report, five studies were commissioned. These investigated possible improvements to junctions and options for additional capacity on the M25. The total cost of these studies was £4.682 million, excluding VAT.

As a result of the studies, the agency has carried forward the design for widening nearly 88 miles or 80 per cent. of the M25 to dual four lanes. Construction works have been completed or are in progress on 13 miles of the M25, with works on a further 12 miles due to start in June of this year. Comments from the public on proposals for widening are currently being considered on another 34 miles of the M25.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) on what basis he is assessing projected traffic growth on the M25 beyond 2010; [21582]

(2) what proposals he has to reassess national traffic forecasts in respect of the M25 in the light of the Standing Advisory Committee on Trunk Road Assessment; and if he will make a statement. [21576]

Mr. Watts: The assessment of traffic growth up to and beyond 2010 will be based on the Department of Transport's national road traffic forecasts, taking into account local traffic forecasts which reflect local growth in population and car ownership.

The proposals will be assessed to see if the changes in traffic looked at by the Standing Advisory Committee on Trunk Road Assessment in its recently published report are likely to be significant. An assessment summarising the technical and economic analysis of the scheme, including traffic projections, will be published at the same time as the environmental statement.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set out his timetable for new traffic management arrangements between junctions 12 and 16 on the M25. [21581]

Mr. Watts: A traffic management pilot project with the use of variable speed limits and camera enforcement will start on the motorway shortly. It uses automatic sensors to monitor traffic flows and activates signals to reduce speeds at congested times. This builds on to a longer term programme for introducing automatic incident detection systems on the motorway network.

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunities matters. [21466]

Mr. Norris: The Department of Transport has been actively pursuing the civil service programmes for action on race, women and disability, and was one of the first Departments to produce a joint action plan covering all three areas.

Particular emphasis has been given to developing training and complaints procedures and to making it easier for disabled people and for women with family commitments to work in the Department.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress he hopes to achieve in his Department over the next three months to push forward the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the fourth UN conference on women; and if he will agree to incorporate a section on equal opportunities in his Department's annual report. [21468]

Mr. Norris: The Government are committed to the principles set out in the regional platform for action agreed at the preparatory conference in Vienna for the fourth UN world conference on women. DOT has taken these forward through a wide range of programmes and initiatives and will continue to do so. In accordance with the terms of the Command Paper, "The Civil Service–Taking Forward Continuity and Change", the Department will publish information on equal opportunities in annual reports from 1995–96.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which Minister in his Department has responsibility for equal opportunities issues. [21465]

Mr. Norris: I have overall responsibility for equal opportunities issues within the Department of Transport.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department. [21467]

Mr. Norris: Department of Transport policy, in line with guidelines issued in 1992 by the ministerial group on women's issues, is that policy proposals should ensure that unlawful or unjustifiable sex or race discrimination does not occur and that similar principles apply to people with disabilities, older people or ex-offenders. This scrutiny is part of a continuous and routine process, as part of policy advice to Ministers.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Cable Television

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps are being taken to monitor the behaviour of cable television operators by central Government. [20718]

Mr. Ian Taylor: My officials monitor the behaviour of cable operators through a continuous assessment of statistical evidence, through discussions with operators, and by handling individual complaints. Broadcast entertainment is subject to normal Independent Television Commission licensing and content requirements.

Cable Communications

Ms Coffey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Milton Keynes North-East (Mr. Butler), of 5 April, Official Report, column 1722, and his answer of 27 April, Official Report, column 662, on what date he expects all schools in the area for which the Communications Association has franchises to be connected to the cable network; and if he will make a statement. [22217]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 2 May 1995]: Schools will be progressively linked to cable networks as cable operators install their systems.

The existing cable franchises networks, covering some two-thirds of the population, are likely to be virtually compete by the end of 2000. The new local delivery operator franchises now being awarded, which permit radio delivery of services, are expected to extend cable type coverage to around 80 to 85 per cent. of the United Kingdom population. The Radiocommunications Agency has announced plans for use of radio spectrum in more rural areas.

Smoking

Mr. Peter Griffiths: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what facilities are provided and arrangements made for the well-being and comfort of staff who (a) smoke and (b) do not wish to be affected by smoking at (i) the work-station and (ii) rest, recreation and refreshment facilities at Ashdown house, 123 Victoria street, London. [21913]

Mr. Ian Taylor: This Department's policy is to ban smoking in general office areas. Smoking is allowed only in designated smoking rooms and areas. Smoking is not permitted in the staff restaurant at Ashdown house during the luncheon period. Smoking is permitted in a separate area at other times.

A copy of my Department's current smoking policy is available in the House of Commons Library.

Nuclear Industry

Mr. McFall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to privatise the nuclear energy industry. [22036]

Mr. Page: The nuclear review is nearing completion. An announcement will be made shortly.

Mr. McFall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what funds are available for decommissioning and waste disposal in the nuclear industry. [22063]

Mr. Page: The Department of Trade and Industry provides to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority the funds required to undertake its programme of work on nuclear decommissioning and the management of radioactive waste arising from government nuclear programmes. The provision of funds in respect of the decommissioning and waste disposal liabilities of other parts of the nuclear industry is a matter for the companies concerned: their annual accounts report on the relevant provisions.

Mr. McFall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what measurements he has made of the security and safety implications of a privatised nuclear energy industry. [22030]

Mr. Page: Safety is of paramount importance and will continue to be so irrespective of ownership.

Mr. McFall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate of the asset value of the nuclear energy industry in England and Wales. [22029]

Mr. Page: I refer the hon. Member to the annual reports and accounts of the relevant companies, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Nuclear Plant, Taiwan

Mr. McFall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what negotiations he has had with the Taiwan Government regarding the joint bid by Nuclear Electric and Westinghouse for the building of a nuclear power plant in that country. [22035]

Mr. Page: The United Kingdom Government supported Nuclear Electric's bid for the Lungmen project but does not take part in commercial negotiations regarding any international bid.

Sizewell B

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what emergency storage facilities exist at the Sizewell B reactor for nuclear fuel rods withdrawn from the reactor core should an accident occur while the interim on site storage ponds are being completed. [22034]

Mr. Page: I understand that the fuel storage pond at Sizewell B was commissioned before nuclear fuel was accepted on site. There has therefore been no need for any interim storage facilities, nor is there a need for any additional emergency storage facility. If fuel failures should occur, the failed fuel can be withdrawn from the reactor core using the normal fuel handling equipment and can then be stored safely in the fuel storage pond.

Metrication

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate he has made of the additional costs involved, including the disposal of surplus materials for (a) the public service and (b) the United Kingdom economy which will stem from the implementation of the European Community directives which require all references to imperial measures to be stopped, with the exception of the area of exemption set out in the Health and Safety Executive document OM 1995/121 appendix 5. [21997]

Mr. Jonathan Evans [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The cost to business of compliance with legislation to implement Council directive 89/617/EEC on harmonisation of units of measurement was considered to be about £35 million spread over a period of six years. This does not take into account the benefits which will accrue from metrication. The costs to the public sector were not considered to be significant.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Identity Cards

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what calculations his Department has made in respect of the cost of issuing an ID card. [21894]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells) on 27 April 1995, column 674.

Daylight Saving

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce proposals on daylight saving; and if he will make a statement. [22221]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Our policy on future summer time arrangements, including whether to move to central European time, remains under consideration.

Electoral Registration

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration he has given to implementing the conclusion of his Department's working group report on electoral registration in respect of the provision to transfer electoral qualification from one address to another when an elector moves. [22381]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: I understand that the working group on electoral registration considered the issue only in the context of rolling registration where it came to no firm conclusion.

Bogus Marriages

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what percentage of those individuals involved in marriages between British citizens and non-British, non-EU citizens which were adjudged to be bogus by his Department were deported in each year since 1989; [21514]

(2) how many individuals involved in marriages between British citizens and non-British, non-EU citizens which were adjudged to be bogus by his Department were deported in each year since 1989. [21815]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: The information requested is not available. The deportation statistics do not identify separately cases involving a bogus marriage.

Citizenship Applications

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his practice to publish his reasons for refusing an applications for United Kingdom citizenship where an applicant wishes this to be done. [21952]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: No.

Mahogany

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many metres of mahogany or products containing it his Department has bought in the last five years; and if he will list the purposes and the costs. [19836]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Between September 1993 and March 1995, 132m$^3$ of African mahogany was purchased, costing £70,000 for use in prison workshops for the construction of furniture for sale and order. The supplier purchases hardwood from controlled areas in line with Government guidelines to the timber trade.

Information is not available for the period prior to September 1993.

Home Office policy on the purchase of wood is, as far as possible, to ensure that wood used in building works and furniture comes from sustainably-managed forests.

EMPLOYMENT

Earnings, North-West

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many full-time employees in the north-west earn less than £2 an hour. [21546]

Mr. Oppenheim: It is estimated from the autumn 1994 labour force survey that approximately 1.7 per cent. of full-time employees in the north-west earn less than £2 per hour. A total of 78.1 per cent. earn more than £4 per hour.

Building Society Takeover

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many jobs he estimates will be at risk in the United Kingdom if the proposed takeover of the National and Provincial building society takes place. [21931]

Miss Widdecombe: No such estimate is available.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many jobs he estimates will be at lost in Yorkshire if the proposed takeover by Abbey National of the National and Provincial building society took place. [21906]

Miss Widdecombe: No such estimate is available.

Pay Rates

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will make it his policy for job centres to establish with employers the minimum rate of pay for jobs they advertise when the rate is negotiable and to refuse to display advertisements for jobs paying £1 an hour or less; [22211]

(2) what discretion is allowed to jobcentre managers in deciding whether to accept a job advertisement where the wage rate offered is unreasonably low. [22281]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for the subject of the questions has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Gordon Prentice, dated 3 May 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your questions about the policy for servicing vacancies where the wages are negotiable or paying £1 an hour or less and what discretion is allowed to Jobcentre managers to refuse an unreasonably low paid job.

Wage levels are a matter for agreement between employers and employees and the Employment Service has no role in policing them. However, guidance to staff in Jobcentres is that where an employer notifies a vacancy offering low pay, or with wages below the prevailing rates for the district, they should advise the employer of the local rates of pay for the job. Where employers insist on offering low pay, they are advised that their vacancy may be difficult to fill.

My people in Jobcentres will also encourage employers to state a rate of pay where they indicate that wages are negotiable, so that potential applicants have as much information as possible before attending a job interview.

In some instances, jobs offering what appears to be a low basic rate of pay may have opportunities to enhance earnings through bonus and commission payments, or offer other benefits such as accommodation. Employers are also encouraged to make these clear in the specification of their vacancy.

Until 30 August 1993 in certain industries minimum rates of pay were laid down in Wages Council Orders. Since the abolition of Wages Councils, only agricultural wages are covered by Acts of Parliament and guidance has been issued to Jobcentres to refer any enquiries relating to rates of pay for agricultural workers to the Agricultural Wages Board, or the Scottish Agricultural Wages Board.

Whilst Jobcentres will advise an employer offering low pay the difficulties in filling such a vacancy, there is no legal reason why they could refuse to handle their vacancy. We have to accept that the ultimate decision on the wages offered is left to the employer.

I hope this is helpful.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the lowest hourly rate of pay for a job advertised at the jobcentres in Nelson and Colne for the latest 12 month period for which figures are available. [22203]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Gordon Prentice, dated 3 May 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about the lowest wage rate advertised for vacancies notified to Nelson and Colne Jobcentres over the last twelve months.

The information you have requested is not recorded. Supervacs, the computer system used to process notified vacancies, is designed to work as a vacancy recording and circulation system. It does not retain information other than basic data such as Standard Occupational Classification and Standard Industrial Classification. Details such as wage rates, hours of work and job description are not retained by the system once the vacancy is filled or closed.

I am sorry I cannot be more helpful.

South Thames TEC

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has replied to an inquiry from Commissioner Padraig Flynn regarding donations to the South Thames training and enterprise council from the European social fund.

Mr. Paice: The Department replied to the European Commission on this matter on 2 May 1995.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Livestock Hauliers

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many journey plans were submitted by hauliers of livestock through (a) Shoreham port, (b) Plymouth docks, (c) Dover port, (d) Brightlingsea docks and (e) Coventry airport in each month since such journey plans became compulsory; how many of these plans were not adhered to; and how many have been submitted for future journeys. [20604]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Journey plans were compulsory for certain journeys from 1 January 1993. The Welfare of Animals during Transport Order 1994 made journey plans compulsory in a specified format for any journey likely to take more than 15 hours, with effect from 23 January 1995. Between this latter date and 7 April, 1995 journey plans have been checked by the Ministry. This figure cannot readily be broken down in the way requested. Exporters are advised to give the Ministry 10 days' notice of an intention to export animals, and in practice not all intended journeys take place. Arrangements exist to carry out spot checks on the details declared in the journey plans with co-operation from certain member states, and inquiries are continuing in a number of cases.

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 4 April, Official Report, column 1058, how it is possible for calves to be fed a liquid feed while on a lorry. [21088]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 1 May 1995]: I am advised that calves could be fed aboard lorries in circumstances where the lorries were standing part-loaded and there was room for individual feeding. Facilities for the preparation of the liquid feed would also have to be available nearby.

Contaminated Beef

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will show his assessment of the percentage of beef samples with traces of clenbuterol or other artificial promoters in each of the EC member states; how much of this contaminated beef finds it way into the British market; what concerns he has as to whether existing EC legislation to prevent the use of artificial growth promoters is effective; and if he will make a statement. [21315]

Mrs. Browning: Surveillance for concentrations of clenbuterol and other artificial growth promoters in beef is carried out in all member states under the terms of directive 86/469/EEC. I regret, however, that information on residues surveillance, comparable with that made available by the veterinary medicines directorate, is not published by other member states, and I cannot therefore comment on the position in those countries.

So far as domestic production is concerned, I can confirm that no clenbuterol positives have been identified in any sample collected from slaughterhouses in Great Britain under the national surveillance scheme since testing began in August 1989, nor have any of the samples tested for the banned hormonal growth promoters been found to be positive since 1992. Samples of beef and other meat and meat products are also purchased from retail outlets in the United Kingdom, under a separate surveillance programme which covers both home produced and imported meat products. During the period July 1993 to March 1994 one sample of calf liver imported from a member state was found to contain traces of clenbuterol below the maximum residue limit of 0.5µg/kg and did not present a hazard to human health.

The use of hormonal growth promoters is banned throughout the European Community, although this ban does not extend to clenbuterol which is an authorised veterinary medicine and available, under prescription, in several member states, including the UK, to treat respiratory ailments in calves and horses and to assist cattle at the time of calving. When used illegally, at high dosages, clenbuterol has similar growth promoting effects to the banned hormones. I am satisfied from the assurances that have been received from member states where a problem with the abuse of these substances is reported to exist, that urgent steps are being taken to stamp out any illegal use, and that consumer safety is not at risk from imported beef.

Mink Farms

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the number of licensed mink farms in each year since 1989. [21190]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The number of licensed mink farms in England is as follows:

| Year | Number of licensed mink farms on 31 March of each year |
|---|---|
| 1989 | 52 |
| 1990 | 45 |
| 1991 | 26 |
| 1992 | 19 |
| 1993 | 20 |
| 1994 | 12 |
| 1995 | 13 |

Animal Health

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many farm animals were identified as being unfit to travel in each month since January 1992. [21168]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The information is given in the following table for the years 1992, 1994 and 1995—to February. No figures are available for 1993.

Farm animals inspected prior to export and rejected as unfit for transportation

| | 1992 | 1994 | 1995 |
|---|---|---|---|
| January | 1,608 | not available | 1,259 |
| February | 1,116 | not available | 698 |
| March | 662 | 1,534 | — |
| April | 425 | 1,545 | — |
| May | 792 | 1,881 | — |
| June | 1,262 | 618 | — |
| July | 2,206 | 1,227 | — |
| August | 3,694 | 4,032 | — |
| September | 4,710 | 4,534 | — |
| October | 5,330 | 1,424 | — |

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which Minister in his Department has responsibility for equal opportunity issues. [21445]

Mrs. Browning: My right hon. Friend the Minister, has overall responsibility for all departmental issues. I have particular responsibility for equal opportunity issues.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunity matters. [21446]

Mrs. Browning: The Department continues to implement its strategy for equality of opportunity for women staff. In the past 12 months this has included the introduction of a career break scheme, an assessment of the suitability of posts for flexible working and increased child-care facilities. The departmental strategy for equality of opportunity for staff of ethnic minority origin has been relaunched. A departmental strategy on the employment of staff with disabilities is being formulated using results from a staff survey in which 600 staff reported a disability.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department. [21447]

Mrs. Browning: The Department's policy, in line with guidance issued in 1992 by the ministerial group on women's issues, is that policy proposals should ensure that unlawful or unjustifiable discrimination against specific groups of people, including men and women, does not occur. This scrutiny is part of a continuous and routine process, as part of policy advice to Ministers.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress he hopes to achieve in his Department over the next three months to push forward the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the fourth UN conference on women; and if he will agree to incorporate a section on equal opportunities in his Department's annual report. [21448]

Mrs. Browning: The Department will continue to ensure that unlawful or unjustifiable discrimination against specific groups of people does not occur as a result of its policies.

The Department's annual report already includes details on equal opportunities with regard to its staff. The Department will continue to include such information in line with central commitments.

Badgers

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what support his Department has given since December 1993 (a) to the continued monitoring of infection in the wild badger population, (b) to research into ways of avoiding transmission of disease from badgers to cattle and (c) to co-operation with university departments on proposed studies about the effects of badger removal operations on the badger population and its impact on the subsequent spread of disease within the badger population. [21716]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 2 May 1995]: In the financial year 1994–95 the Ministry invested £370,000 in on-going work at the central veterinary laboratory and the central science laboratory on an ecological and epidemiological study of a badger population naturally infected with M. bovis in the Gloucestershire study area. A further £138,000 was invested in on-going work to understand the demography and epidemiology of badgers through the production of mathematical models of badger populations to assist in the development of M. bovis control strategies. The Ministry also continues to examine the carcases of wild badgers found by members of the public in the vicinity of farms where there have been cattle herd breakdowns for M. bovis in addition to those killed in Ministry badger removal operations.

In 1994 the Ministry agreed to fund a project over the next three years, now being carried out by Oxford university in collaboration with the Central Science Laboratory and the Central Veterinary Laboratory, to look at the effects of a badger removal operation by examining the behaviour of surviving badgers, their demography and dynamics, and effects on disease transmission. The Ministry has also just agreed to fund a project over the next three years, to be undertaken by the University of Bristol, to investigate the relationships between badger population density and size of social groups with different habitats, the distribution of M. bovis in badgers in south-west England, and the risks of transmitting disease from badgers to cattle.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made since December 1993 regarding (a) research into the development of effective vaccines for TB in badgers and (b) research to develop new or improved diagnostic tests for the presence of infection in cattle and badgers. [21717]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 2 May 1995]: In the financial year 1994–95 the Ministry invested £217,000 on the development of a suitable vaccine for the protection of badgers against infection with M. bovis. Work on this project started at the Central Veterinary Laboratory in April 1994. Initially, this work has concentrated on understanding the badger's responses to the infection, in order to determine possible mechanisms of protection, and investigating possible vaccine candidates. A feasibility study has been completed and is due to be published in the Veterinary Record on 6 May. This work is progressing well although it is anticipated that it will take approximately 15 years to complete.

The Ministry invested £543,000 in financial year 1994–95 in on-going research at the Central Veterinary Laboratory to develop methods for the improved diagnosis of M. bovis in cattle and badgers. This work involves the identification and purification of potential diagnostic antigens, the development of appropriate laboratory-based assays of antibody and cellular immunity in infected cattle and improvement of the current skin test reagent. The preliminary results of this work are encouraging.

Apples

Mr. Martin Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what is the estimated (a) loss of United Kingdom apple orchards, (b) cost of grants in the United Kingdom, (c) cost of grants across the European Union and (d) cost of grants in the Mediterranean European Union nations under the European Union's grubbing-up grant; [21866]

(2) what estimates he has made of the effect of the European Union grubbing-up grants on the United Kingdom's trade balance in (a) apples and (b) dessert apples. [21857]

Mr. Jack: Growers in the EU have applied to grub about 28,000 hectares of apple orchard. In the United Kingdom we have accepted 271 applications into the scheme covering 2,432 hectares. However, it will be some time before we have details of the final outcome of the 1994–95 apple orchard grubbing up grant scheme since acceptance of an application does not necessarily lead to grubbing.

On trade, "English Apples and Pears" says that the 90 per cent. of English apple growers staying in the industry are delighted that a significant reduction in the surplus of European apples is in prospect. They are confident that with the modern orchards planted in recent years they will, in future, be better placed to produce even higher quality apples in the range of varieties the UK consumer wants.

Chernobyl

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total compensation paid to farmers for loss of earnings and clean-up of radioactive contamination arising from the fall out from the Chernobyl nuclear accident in 1986. [22027]

Mr. Jack: The sheep compensation scheme was introduced in July 1986 to compensate farmers whose enterprises had been disrupted as a result of movement and slaughter restrictions associated with the Chernobyl accident. The total paid out under the scheme in the United Kingdom up to the end of March 1995 was £11,567,729. A table follows, showing the breakdown of payments by country.

Sheep Compensation Scheme 1986—compensation payments up to 31 March 1995

| | £ |
|---|---|
| England | 1,313,912 |
| Wales | 7,524,272 |
| Scotland | 2,491,842 |
| Northern Ireland | 237,703 |
| Total | 11,567,729 |

Agricultural Workers

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total number of (a) farmers and (b) farm workers for each year since 1988, giving the figures as a percentage of the population for England. [21861]

Mr. Jack: The information requested is given in the table.

Persons engaged in agricultural work on agricultural holdings in England

| | Farmers | | Farm workers | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | Number (000's) | As percentage of population | Number (000's) | As percentage of population |

Brucellosis

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cases of brucellosis have occurred in each year since 1985. [21818]

Mrs. Browning: The number of brucellosis cattle herd breakdowns in Great Britain in each year since 1985 from which the organism Brucella abortus was recovered were:

1985: 69
1986: 39
1987: 3
1988: 1

1989: 6

1990: 1

1991: None

1992: None

1993: 1

1994: None

Foot and Mouth Disease

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cases of foot and mouth disease occurred in each year since 1978. [22175]

Mrs. Browning: There was one outbreak of foot and mouth disease which occurred in 1981 on the Isle of Wight. There have been no outbreaks since then.

Pleuro-pneumonia

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cases of pleuro-pneumonia occurred in each year since 1985. [22170]

Mrs. Browning: There have been no confirmed cases of pleuro-pneumonia in England since 1898.

Hygiene Standards

Mr. Battle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many prosecutions of dairy farmers in Lancashire for failing to comply with necessary hygiene standards (a) have been successfully undertaken and (b) are outstanding since 1990. [22272]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 2 May 1995]: Responsibility for the enforcement of hygiene standards at dairy farms is split between Agricultural Development Advisory Service, an executive agency of the Ministry and the Welsh Office, and local authority environmental health departments. There have been no prosecutions by ADAS in Lancashire since 1990. Information on prosecutions by environmental health departments is not held centrally.

Civil Service (Early Retirement)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22093]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 2 May 1995]: Compensation payments for early retirement on grounds of limited efficiency are age, salary and service related. Details of limited efficiency early retirements for each of the last five financial years are as follows:

| | Annual compensation payment to age 60 (rate pa) | Superannuation lump sum | Lump sum compensation payment | Compensation in lieu of notice (if any) |

TREASURY

Fraud

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps are being taken to help to combat fraud in the European Union. [20412]

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking to combat fraud within the European Union with particular reference to the common agricultural policy and the cohesion budget. [20439]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I refer to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) on 30 March 1995, Official Report, columns 654–55.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much was spent on official hospitality by his Department in 1994–95. [21211]

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 1 May 1995]: In 1994–95, spending on official hospitality by Her Majesty's Treasury was £85,888.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21379]

Sir George Young [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The Treasury's estimated cost to date of employing consultants in connection with market testing programmes is as follows:

| | Support to | |
|---|---|---|
| | In House Team | Department |
| | £ | £ |
| 1 April 1992–30 September 1993 | 21,018 | 37,692 |
| 1 October 1993–30 September 1994 | 15,087 | 47,878 |
| 1 October 1994–31 March 1995 | nil | 64,625 |
| Sub totals | 36,105 | 150,195 |

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21400]

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The information requested is not held centrally.

Allowances

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each agency and the central Department for which he is responsible (a) the total amount of removal costs and associated expenses reimbursed to officials who were required to relocate as part of their employment, (b) the amount of each of the highest three claims that were concluded and settled and (c) the average amount of each claim in each of the last three years. [19648]

Mr. Nelson: The amounts shown below are in respect of cases which were completed during the past three years. The information is as follows:

HM Treasury

| Year | £ |
|---|---|
| (a) | |
| 1992–93 | No cases concluded and settled. |
| 1993–94 | 244,465.00 |

(c) These figures are based on individual claims rather than cases.

1992–93: £3,189.00

1993–94: £2,034.00

1994–95: £1,686.00

Equal Opportunities

Ms Corston: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he proposes to take to establish the policies, objectives and measurable targets relating to (a) women's economic opportunities and (b) women's access to productive resources contained in article 26e of the programme for action agreed at the world summit for social development in Copenhagen. [22269]

Miss Widdecombe: I have been asked to reply.

The United Kingdom's report for the United Nations fourth world conference on women, produced in October 1994, details key achievements and priorities for action in a range of areas of particular interest to women. A copy is available in the Library.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

RMS St. Helena

Sir David Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will extend the remit of the consultants reviewing the sailing schedule of RMS St. Helena to include all forms of passenger linkage to the island and their potential. [22012]

Mr. Baldry: No. The consultants were required to focus on the specific issue of a rescheduling of RMS St. Helena. This is a priority matter for the St. Helena Government because of the early improvement in access to the island which would result. The consultations draft report is currently under consideration.

Palestine

Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance the Government will provide to the Palestine National Authority during 1995. [20420]

Mr. Baldry: We are committed to providing £82 million over three years from 1994–95 to support the Palestinian Authority and the peace process. This includes contributions through the European Union and other multilateral organisations, notably the United Nations relief and works agency. Our bilateral aid includes a £1.25 million project in support of the Palestinian police and a £5 million know-how programme announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in March. Our aid priorities are good government, finance and private enterprise, water, health and education.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21390]

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 1 May 1995]: For the Department and agencies for which I am responsible, any conflict of interest involving civil servants will have been dealt with in accordance with established guidance.

My Department has existed for three years. It holds no central records on the number of occasions during that period that career civil servants have declared conflicts of interest.

In the same period, no special advisers in my Department have declared conflicts of interest.

PRIME MINISTER

Acts of Union

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list all the amendments which have been made to the Acts of Union between England and Scotland; and how many of these have affected Scottish law and how many English law; and in what way. [21411]

The Prime Minister: The information requested can be obtained by an examination of the official revised edition of the "Statutes in Force" published by HMSO. This shows the Union with Scotland Act 1706, which was passed by the English Parliament, and the Union with England Act 1707, which was passed by the Scottish Parliament, revised to 1 February 1978, together with a note of all the repeals and amendments which have been made to those Acts until then. Cumulative supplements to the "Statutes in Force" were published until February 1991 but no amendments are shown to have been made to those Acts. Since then, information as to any further repeals or amendments to those Acts can be obtained by looking at the "Table on the Effect of Legislation" in part IV of each annual volume of the "Public General Acts", published by HMSO. This has recently been published for 1993 and shows a repeal of article XXII of the Union with Scotland Act 1706.

EDUCATION

Attention Deficit and Hyperactivity Disorder

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what proposals she has to promote the education of children affected by attention deficit and hyperactivity disorder, and if she will make a statement. [20550]

Mr. Forth: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 24 January 1995, Official Report, column 166–67.

GNVQ Courses

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education (1) how many schools and colleges currently offer intermediate and advanced GNVQ courses in (a) health and social care, (b) leisure and tourism, (c) business, (d) art and design, (e) manufacturing, (f) science, (g) construction and the build environment, (h) hospitality and catering, (i) engineering, (j) information technology, (k) distribution, (l) media, communications and production and (m) management studies in each county in England and Wales; [21801]

(2) how many schools and colleges currently offer foundation GNVQ courses in (a) health and social care, (b) leisure and tourism, (c) business, (d) art and design, (e) manufacturing, (f) science, (g) construction and the built environment, (h) hospitality and catering, (i) engineering and (j) information technology in each county in England and Wales.

Mr. Boswell: It will take some time to gather this information. I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Initial Teacher Training Report

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education when she expects to publish the report on school centred initial teacher training and if she will place it in the Library immediately. [22190]

Mr. Robin Squire: This is a matter for Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools, who heads the Office for Standards in Education. I have asked Mr. Chris Woodhead to write to the hon. Member.

Teachers

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what mechanisms her Department now uses to forecast the numbers of teachers needed over the next decade. [22191]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department's targets for intakes to initial teacher training courses are based on supply and demand models which take account of a range of data, including the number and age of the existing teacher force, movements into and out of teaching, and demographic trends.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what are the current figures for unfilled teaching posts. [22192]

Mr. Robin Squire: The latest figures for unfilled teaching posts in England—January 1994—are given in the table. Figures for teacher vacancies are not yet available for 1995.

| | Number of vacancies[1] | Vacancies as a percentage of teachers in post |
|---|---|---|
| Primary/Nursery | 762 | 0.4 |
| Secondary | 624 | 0.4 |
| Total | 1,386 | 0.4 |

[1] Advertised vacancies for full-time permanent appointments (or appointments of at least one term's duration). Includes vacancies being filled on a temporary basis.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what over-capacity there currently is in teacher supply. [22193]

Mr. Robin Squire: There are currently some 365,000 qualified teachers under 55 in England who are not serving as full-time teachers in maintained nursery, primary or secondary schools.

In terms of future supply, the Teacher Training Agency was advised in November 1994 of the Secretary of State's targets for initial teacher training for 1995–96 to 1997–98. These envisage an 11 per cent. increase in secondary targets over this period, but with a similar reduction in primary targets.

Mature Students

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what measures she is taking to assist mature students on teacher education courses who have difficulties with teaching practice arrangements. [22194]

Mr. Robin Squire: It is up to higher education institutions to make suitable arrangements for all their students to attend teaching practice. The Department has, however, recently funded the cost of developing a distance-learning postgraduate certificate of education course, run by the Open university, which should help students who have difficulties. My right hon. Friend has also established the Teacher Training Agency with a remit which includes improving the quality and efficiency of all routes into the teaching profession and promoting teaching as a career. One of the TTA's own published aims is to devise a strategy for increasing the diversity of routes into teaching in order to meet the varying needs of prospective teachers, by spring 1996.

Teachers Pensions Agency

Mr. Trend: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what key performance targets she has set for the Teachers Pensions Agency in 1995–96. [22923]

Mr. Robin Squire: For 1995–96, the key performance targets for the Teachers Pensions Agency are:

a. To achieve an improvement in efficiency of 7.5 per cent. in the use of running cost resources within the agency's control;

b. To process 97 per cent. of the applications for retirement awards by the payable date, or if later, then within 30 days of receipt of the application;

c. To meet the agreed accuracy target for pensions-related calculations;

d. To provide a substantive answer to 95 per cent. of written inquiries within 15 working days of their receipt;

e. To manage the programme agreed with the agency's clients for the collection and processing of service and salary data relating to teachers and to seek timely submission of that data.

Private Finance

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what initiatives have been undertaken to secure private finance for her Department's projects. [22319]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department does not have direct responsibility for education sector projects. Its role is to encourage the funding bodies, local education authorities and education institutions to take advantage of the private finance opportunities available.

The Department published its booklet, "Education means business", copies of which were placed in the Library. This booklet was sent to all maintained schools, colleges and universities as well as banks, accountancy firms, construction companies and other private sector enterprises that had expressed an interest in PFI.

On 23 March the Department, together with the Higher Education Funding Council for England, hosted a conference at the Queen Elizabeth II conference centre about private finance in higher education. This very successful conference—at which my right hon. Friend gave the key note speech—was attended by representatives of higher education institutions and the private sector.

The Further Education Funding Council is now organising a similar conference for the further education sector in late September. For LEAs, the Department is organising a series of seminars to discuss barriers to private finance and ways by which they might be overcome, and visiting a number of individual authorities. One of the most significant steps that we are taking to secure private finance in the grant-maintained sector is to remove the barrier to commercial borrowing.

In addition to the action that the Department is undertaking, the HEFCE has published its own booklet entitled, "Private Investment in higher education". Copies will be placed in the Library. The FEFC is to publish a booklet about private finance in the further education sector.

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many staff at her Department are employed (a) full time and (b) part time on projects undertaken to secure private finance for her Department's projects. [22321]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department has a dedicated private finance unit employing six staff on a part-time basis. Staff in the individual higher education, further education and schools policy branches also work on a part-time basis to encourage private finance in their specialist areas and the information branch includes the private finance initiative within its portfolio.

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what percentage of her Department's budget is allocated to initiatives which have been undertaken to secure private finance for her Department's projects. [22320]

Mr. Robin Squire: None. The Department does not have direct responsibility for education sector projects. Its role in the private finance initiative is to encourage the funding bodies, LEAs and institutions to take advantage of the opportunities offered by the initiative. The resources required relate mainly to hospitality and travelling and are a tiny percentage of the Department's budget.

For the 1994–95 financial year, about £101,000 was spent on the preparation and printing of the booklet, "Education means business".

Medical Students

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Education when she next proposes to meet the British Medical Association to discuss the concerns of students in relation to grants for courses in medical training. [22108]

Mr. Boswell: My right hon. Friend has no plans to meet the British Medical Association. She is aware of the arguments currently being advanced by the BMA medical students committee, and has corresponded with it about them.

Information Products

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what has been the total cost of information products produced and distributed by her Department in (a) 1994–95, (b) 1993–94 and (c) 1992–93; and what is her proposed budget for 1995–96. [22322]

Mr. Forth: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) on 3 April, Official Report, column 924.

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what has been the total cost of information products about grant-maintained status for schools produced and distributed by her Department in (a) 1994–95 and (b) 1993–94; and what is the proposed budget for 1995–96. [22337]

Mr. Robin Squire: The total cost of publications, including videos, about grant-maintained status produced and distributed by the Department for Education was some £380,000 in 1994–95 and some £320,000 in 1993–94. Within the Department's publicity budget for 1995–96, some £200,000 has so far been earmarked for GM products and related expenditure. Additional GM information products may be produced during the course of the financial year, resulting in additional expenditure.

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what progress she hopes to achieve in her Department over the next three months to push forward the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the fourth UN Conference on women; and if she will incorporate a section on equal opportunities in her Department's annual report. [21458]

Mr. Boswell: The Government are committed to the principles set out in the regional platform for action agreed at the preparatory conference in Vienna for the fourth UN world conference on women. We have taken these forward through a wide range of programmes and initiatives and will continue to do so. My right hon. Friend will be considering how best to report the Department's action on equal opportunities.

DEFENCE

Market Testing

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 25 April, Official Report, column 499, what percentage by value of the total of defence support activities subject to the competing for quality process was (a) market tested and (b) won by in-house bid between (i) 1 October 1993 to 30 September 1994 and (ii) 10 October 1994 to date. [22382]

Mr. Freeman: In the period 1 October 1993 to 30 September 1994, the total value of activities exposed to competing for quality was £287 million. Of the £27 million or 9 per cent. that was market tested, £19 million, or 7 per cent., was won by the in-house bid. In the period since October 1994, the value of activities exposed to competing for quality has totalled £198 million. Of the £7 million, or 4 per cent., which has been market tested, none has been won by the in-house bid.

Base Closures

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the defence bases that have been closed and sold since 1990 together with the purchasers and the current use where known. [21229]

Mr. Soames: The information requested is as follows:

| Base | Purchaser | Proposed use at date of sale) |

NORTHERN IRELAND

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answer of 14 December, Official Report, column 692, if he will list those projects in privatised companies which have received European regional development funding since privatisation indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [20577]

Sir John Wheeler: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him on 1 May by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary for Industry and Energy, Official Report, column 14.

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress he hopes to achieve in his Department over the next three months to push forward the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the fourth UN conference on women; and if he will agree to incorporate a section on equal opportunities in his Department's annual report. [21478]

Mr. Ancram: The Government are committed to the principles set out in the regional platform for action agreed at the preparatory conference in Vienna for the fourth UN world conference on women. We have taken these forward through a wide range of programmes and initiatives and will continue to do so.

Progress on equal opportunity matters in relation to staff in the Northern Ireland civil service will continue to be reported in detail in the regular published reports produced by the service's equal opportunities unit.

Agricultural Workers

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total number of (a) farmers and (b) farm workers for each year since 1988, giving the figures as a percentage of the total population for Northern Ireland. [21860]

Mr Ancram: The information is given in the table:

| | Farmers | | Other farm workers | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Year | Persons | Per cent. of total population | Persons | Per cent. of total population |
| 1988 | 37,417 | 2.4 | 24,638 | 1.6 |
| 1989 | 36,709 | 2.3 | 24,987 | 1.6 |
| 1990 | 36,302 | 2.3 | 24,733 | 1.6 |
| 1991 | 35,991 | 2.2 | 23,821 | 1.5 |
| 1992 | 36,224 | 2.2 | 22,905 | 1.4 |
| 1993 | 34,408 | 2.1 | 25,216 | 1.5 |
| 1994 | 35,377 | 2.2 | 24,230 | 1.5 |

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many suicides occurred among (a) farmers, (b) farm workers and (c) the general population in each year since 1988. [21908]

Sir John Wheeler: The number of deaths registered as suicides in Northern Ireland in each year since 1988 are set out in the table. Deaths are recorded according to date of registration and not by date of occurrence.

| Year | Farmers | Farm workers | General population |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1988 | 10 | 2 | 153 |
| 1989 | 1 | 1 | 116 |
| 1990 | 3 | 0 | 158 |
| 1991 | 8 | 0 | 129 |
| 1992 | 2 | 1 | 107 |
| 1993 | 9 | 1 | 129 |
| 1994[1] | 5 | 1 | 95 |

Government Reform

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answer of 27 March, Official Report, column 482, on what date a copy of the proposed financial arrangements referred to was placed in the Library. [22209]

Mr. Ancram: A copy of the financial arrangements was placed in the Library on 27 March.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunities matters. [21507]

Mr. Burt: The Department is committed to equality of opportunity for its staff. Recent examples of progress include the continued improvement in the representation of women and ethnic minorities at management grades across the Department and the increased use of flexible working patterns. For example, 15 per cent. of staff now work part-time. Other initiatives to help staff balance home and work commitments include career breaks, alternative working patterns and special leave arrangements. The Department employs over 1,500 registered disabled staff and information gathered from staff surveys indicates that there are as many non-registered disabled staff. Harassment counselling networks are in place across the Department and equal opportunities awareness training is widely available.

A range of subsidised child care facilities are provided for staff, including 646 nursery places, 2,560 holiday playscheme places and child care referral services.

The Department was an early member of Opportunity 2000 and remains committed to the Cabinet Office programmes for action on women and race and the new programme for action on disability.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department. [21508]

Mr. Burt: This Department's policy, in line with guidance issued in 1992 by the ministerial group on women's issues, is that policy proposals should ensure that unlawful or unjustifiable sex or race discrimination does not occur and that similar principles apply to other groups such as people with disabilities and older people. This scrutiny is part of a continuous and routine process, as part of policy advice to Ministers.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which Minister in his Department has responsibility for equal opportunities issues. [21506]

Mr. Burt: I have.

Income Support

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the annual cost of providing income support to spouses of people who are in local authority residential and nursing home care. [22282]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is not available.

Widow's Payment

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to uprate the value of the widow's payment. [22224]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 10 January, Official Report, columns 56–57.

HEALTH

Health Policy

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action is being taken by her Department to meet the target set by the World Health Organisation European region in terms of reduction of differences in health status between different groups within countries; and if she will make a statement. [21054]

Mr. Sackville: Our "The Health of the Nation" strategy brings together all Government Departments to work to improve health among all groups. Health services in each part of the country are funded according to assessed health need and the national health service reforms mean that health authorities and general practitioners are able to take action locally to address the needs in their area. I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 23 March, Official Report, column 353–54.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on progress towards meeting the target set by the World Health Organisation European region in respect of reducing the differences in health status between different groups within countries. [21055]

Mr. Sackville: Our "The Health of the Nation" key targets are the primary measures against which we monitor progress on reducing avoidable illness and death, and risky behaviour affecting health, across the whole population. "The Health of the Nation" identifies different groups at particular risk and efforts are concentrated on those groups. Progress was reported in "One Year On" and there will be a further report later this year.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to include among the "The Health of the Nation" targets, the target set by the World Health Organisation European region in respect of reducing the differences in health status between different groups within countries. [21056]

Mr. Sackville: Meeting the targets already set in "The Health of the Nation" by focusing efforts on groups particularly at risk should help to reduce variations in health status between different groups.

The new national health service enables health authorities and general practitioners to take action locally to address needs in their area and a considerable amount of work is being done to achieve improvements.

I therefore have no plans to include the World Health Organisation European region target in "The Health of the Nation" targets.

Press Offices

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the budget of the press office in (a) the Department of Health and (b) the national health service executive in each of the last five years. [21747]

Mr. Sackville: The national health service executive does not have a separate press office. The budget for the press office is not separately identifiable from the Department's information division.

Press Officers

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many press and public relations officers have been employed by (a) the Department of Health, (b) the national health service executive (c) regional health authorities (d) district health authorities and (e) trusts in each of the last five years. [21746]

Mr. Sackville: Functions which are commonly associated with press and public relations for the Department of Health are carried out by the Department's information division. The number of staff employed in each of the last five years is:

1990–91: 37
1991–92: 36
1992–93: 39
1993–94: 39
1994–95: 37

Information about the number of press and public relations officers in regional health authorities, district health authorities, family health services authorities and national health service trusts is not available centrally.

NHS Reforms

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is her assessment of the effect of the introduction of GP fundholding on the need for administration within the NHS; [21750]

(2) what is her assessment of the effect of the introduction of the internal market on the need for administration within the NHS. [21749]

Mr. Malone: The national health service reforms have strengthened the management of the NHS and have led to a rise in activity, a fall in waiting times and a rise in consumer satisfaction.

GP Prescribing Costs

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money is to be made available to family health service authorities to enable them to make payments to general practitioners' practices which contain their prescribing costs. [21667]

Mr. Malone: We made £1.7 million available to health authorities to meet the cost of payments to non-fundholding general practitioner practices in respect of prescribing incentive schemes which operated in 1993–94. These payments, which are directly related to the reduction in prescribing expenditure achieved, are used to improve patient services.

Community Nursing

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the amount spent per head of the population on community nursing in London, Newcastle, Birmingham, Manchester and Liverpool in each year since 1990. [21917]

Mr. Sackville: Information is not available in the form requested.

Contracting Out

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what financial criteria her Department applies in the contracting out of services previously provided in-house. [21925]

Mr. Sackville: Financial criteria are applied and evaluated as an integral part of all major procurement, regardless of whether the services were previously provided in-house, in accordance with best professional purchasing practice and existing legislation. The purpose of this procedure is to minimise the risk to the Department of the financial failure of a supplier.

Nurses

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the latest figures for unemployment among nurses. [22009]

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Special Hospitals

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients are currently awaiting admission to and discharge from (a) Broadmoor, (b) Rampton and (c) Ashworth hospitals. [21921]

Mr. Bowis: This information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of the Special Hospitals Service Authority, which is responsible for the management of the special hospitals.

Accident and Emergency Departments

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many 24-hour accident and emergency departments there were in London in (a) 1980, (b) 1985, (c) 1990 and (d) 1994. [21919]

Mr. Sackville: Information on 24-hour accident and emergency services was first collected in 1987–88. Until 1991–92, data were collected at hospital level, but for subsequent years they were collected on the basis of national health service trusts and directly managed units, some of which may provide accident and emergency services on more than one site. The information available is shown in the table. Comparable information for earlier years is not available.

Trusts[1] and Directly Managed Units with Accident and Emergency Departments[2] London.

| Year | Number |
|---|---|
| 1991–92 | 41 |
| 1992–93 | 37 |
| 1993–94 | 34 |

[1] A trust or a directly managed unit may consist of a number of hospitals providing an A&E service on more than one site.

Primary Care

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 23 February, Official Report, column 323, how much of the expenditure per head of population on primary care is demand driven and how much allocated by formula; and if she will make a statement. [21927]

Mr. Sackville: Primary care consists of all four branches of the family health services—the general medical, dental and ophthalmic services and the pharmaceutical service, together with the community health services. The cost of various elements of these services is met by family health services authorities, the Dental Practice Board and health authorities. The family health services form by far the largest part, and are mostly demand-led apart from the costs associated with the direct reimbursement of certain general practitioner practice expenses and the drugs cost and practice expenses' elements of the budgets managed by GP fundholders. Expenditure on community health services is funded locally by health authorities but is not separately identifiable in data available centrally. It is not possible, therefore, to give a precise apportionment of the overall expenditure on primary care services between the demand-led and cash-limited elements, nor to calculate the proportion allocated by formula, although this would be small.

Weighted Capitations (Health Authorities)

Sir Terence Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the five most underfunded health authorities in England and the extent to which they are currently below capitation and the corresponding data for the previous 10 years. [21807]

Mr. Sackville: The weighted capitation positions for the five district health authorities furthest below target in 1993–94, 1994–95 and 1995–96 are listed. Corresponding information for previous years is not available centrally.

Weighted capitation positions for five health authorities furthest below target

| District | £ million | Percentage |
|---|---|---|
| 1993–94 distance from target | | |
| Worthing | 14.8 | –15.7 |
| Chichester | 9.0 | –13.5 |
| Oldham | 8.9 | –9.7 |
| Canterbury and Thanet | 10.2 | –9.0 |
| Southport | 4.0 | –8.9 |
| 1994–95 distance from target | | |
| Worthing | 10.1 | –10.2 |
| Blackpool | 11.4 | –8.7 |
| Chichester | 5.9 | –8.4 |
| Wigan | 8.6 | –7.7 |
| Hereford | 3.9 | –6.3 |
| 1995–96 distance from target | | |
| Worthing[1] | 15.7 | –13.0 |
| South Essex | 27.1 | –9.0 |
| Chichester[1] | 6.6 | –7.9 |
| Bedfordshire | 17.9 | –7.5 |
| East Sussex | 22.1 | –6.4 |

[1] Figures for 1995–96 were calculated prior to the subsequent merger of Worthing DHA and Chichester DHA with Mid Downs DHA to form West Sussex DHA as of 1 April 1995.
Notes:
1. Data are not necessarily comparable year on year or across boundaries within year because of differing regional policies eg. on the integration of capital charges, levels of top slicing and boundary changes.
2. For 1994–95 and 1995–96 the distance from targets have been calculated on a standardised basis which assumes all RHAs are at their capitation targets. They may therefore vary from locally published figures.

Medium Secure Units

Ms Tessa Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients were detained in medium secure units run by the NHS for each year since 1991. [21918]

Mr. Bowis: The number of places in purpose-built national health service medium secure units has increased from 597 in January 1991 to 792 in April 1995. The completion of our centrally funded building programme, to which we allocated more than £47 million between 1991 and 1995, will take this to over 1,150 places by the end of 1996. Further places are being developed by regions from the mainstream NHS capital programme.

The numbers of in-patients receiving treatment in these units, not all of whom will necessarily have been detained, were:

| | Number |
|---|---|
| 31 January 1991 | 492 |
| 31 January 1992 | 532 |
| 31 January 1993 | 591 |
| 31 March 1994 | 653 |

Source:
Department of Health annual census of NHS medium secure units

In addition, a number of patients were receiving treatment in NHS interim secure units, which in many cases are of medium secure standard, and as NHS patients in private sector medium secure units.

Continuing Care Beds (London)

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many continuing care beds there were in London in (a) 1980, (b) 1985, (c) 1990 and (d) 1994. [21920]

Mr. Bowis: Information available centrally on numbers of national health service beds does not include the classification "continuing care". Information according to ward classifications has been published for the years since 1988–89 in "Bed availability for England". In earlier years, beds were classified according to consultant specialty and "SH3 National and Regional Summaries" were published. Copies of the publications are available in the Library.

Psychiatric Units (London)

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she is taking to reduce bed occupancy in psychiatric units in inner London; and if she will make a statement. [21924]

Mr. Bowis: It is for district health authorities to assess the mental health needs of their local population and to purchase services to meet those needs. In recognition of the pressures on mental health services in inner London we commissioned the mental health task force London project to work with the London health authorities, local authorities and other agencies to identify key problems and to develop action plans to address these. The mental health task force London project follow-up report, published on 19 April, copies of which are available in the Library, shows that health authorities have got off to a good start in implementing their action plans to improve London's mental health services. The regional offices of the national health service executive will continue to monitor progress closely.

Marriages

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many marriages between British citizens and non-British, non-EU citizens were reported as bogus to the Secretary of State for the Home Department by the Registrar General in each year since 1989. [21817]

Mr. Sackville: Details of the total number of marriages suspected to have been arranged for the sole purpose of evading statutory immigration controls, reported by the Registrar General to the Home Department, since 1989 are shown. Details of the reports sent involving a marriage between British citizens and non-British citizens are not kept separately and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The number of marriages reported by the Registrar General to the Home Office were

1989: Nil
1990: Nil
1991: 19
1992: 94
1993: 304
1994: 404
1995[1]: 90

[1] Relates to the first quarter only

Hospital Development Schemes

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospital development schemes were started in (a) 1994–95, (b) 1993–94 (c) 1992–93; and how many are planned to be started in (i) 1995–96 and (ii) 1996–97. [22323]

Mr. Sackville: Information is available on all national health service building schemes, most of which are on hospital sites, with a works cost exceeding £1 million as follows:

| Year | Development started |
|---|---|
| 1992–93 | 85 |
| 1993–94 | 79 |
| 1994–95 | 94 |

To date, 97 schemes have been approved with expenditure programmed in 1995–96 and 1996–97.

Medical Devices Agency

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish the key targets for 1995–96 for the Medical Devices Agency. [27728]

Mr. Sackville: I have agreed the agency's key targets for 1995–96, and have placed copies in the Library.

Attention Deficit and Hyperactivity Disorder

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures she proposes to assist those suffering from attention deficit and hyperactivity disorder and their carers; and if she will make a statement. [20549]

Mr. Bowis: The Department recently issued a handbook on child and adolescent mental health, copies of which are available in the Library. This gives information about the prevalence of this disorder. Hyperkinetic disorder is among those mainly childhood disorders which authorities responsible for purchasing mental health services should recognise and provide for in their purchasing plans. We also support the work of voluntary organisations concerned with this disorder, including provision of grant aid to the hyperactive children's support group.

Children's Homes

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the current study into unregisterable children's homes will be completed; and what will be the date of publication. [21940]

Mr. Bowis: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave her on 24 January, Official Report, column 175.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nuclear Weapons

14. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the nuclear non-proliferation conference. [20431]

24. Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Britain's policy towards the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. [20443]

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the progress of the non-proliferation treaty conference in New York. [20444]

Mr. Hurd: I refer the hon. Members to my answer to the question from the hon. Member for Mid Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant).

China

21. Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to visit China to discuss human rights. [20440]

Mr. Goodlad: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has no plans at present to visit China. He raised human rights when he met the Chinese Foreign Minister in New York on 18 April.

EU Directives

22. Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Britain's record of compliance with European Union directives by reference to those of other European Union member states. [20441]

Mr. David Davis: The United Kingdom has a good record on compliance with EU directives. The latest figures show that the UK has implemented 92.3 per cent. of directives in force. This is the third best total among member states. The latest Commission report, containing figures for all member states, has been placed in the House Library.

India

26. Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps his Department is taking to improve co-operation between the United Kingdom and India, with particular reference to science and technology. [20445]

Mr. Baldry: Within the context of the highly successful Indo-British partnership initiative, my Department is co-ordinating an initiative designed to further strengthen science and technology co-operation particularly in those areas which have a commercial dimension. These activities will include a science and technology exchange scheme, an industry-funded postgraduate scholarship programme and a technician training exchange. In November my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster plans to visit India accompanied by a delegation to demonstrate British strengths in science, engineering and technology.

30. Ms Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has about the abuse of human rights in Madhya Pradesh, India, in relation to the work of wives and children of bonded labourers; and if he will make a statement. [20450]

Mr. Baldry: We have very little information on this subject. The Indian Government's policy is to liberate and rehabilitate all bonded labourers, but progress is slow. We have asked our high commission to try to establish more details and will report further in due course.

Bosnia

27. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of efforts to find a peaceful solution to the crisis in Bosnia. [20446]

Mr. Hurd: The Croatian offensive in West Slavonia and the refusal of the parties in Bosnia to extend the cessation of hostilities agreement have seriously increased tensions in the region. We urge all parties to show restraint and co-operate fully with the UN to prevent escalation. These developments underline the urgency of progress in the political process. The contact group is continuing its efforts to promote mutual recognition between the states of the former Yugoslavia and secure a resumption of negotiations on Bosnia on the basis of the contact group plan. Further meetings of contact group officials are being held this week.

Intergovernmental Conference

28. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to meet his European Union counterparts in preparation for the 1996 intergovernmental conference. [20448]

Mr. David Davis: The first meeting of the study group is on 2 June in Messina.

Export Promotion

29. Mr. Thomason: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what priority he attaches to export promotion in setting his Department's overall objectives. [20449]

Mr. Goodlad: Promoting trade is recognised by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary as one of the FCO's key long-term objectives.

Commercial work is our posts' largest single activity, accounting for 30 per cent. of front-line staff. They offer a wide range of commercial services for exporters. But there is no clear dividing line between export promotion and many of our posts' other activities. For instance ambassadors provide British companies with high-quality political and economic advice as well as invaluable door opening.

Gibraltar

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action is being taken to improve the flow of people and traffic between Spain and Gibraltar following the introduction of the Schengen agreement on EU external frontiers. [20426]

Mr. David Davis: When I met my Spanish opposite number, Mr. Westendorp, on 19 April, I made clear our concern about the unacceptable delays at the Spain-Gibraltar frontier.

Our ambassador in Madrid has also formally protested to the Spanish Government. We have left the Spanish Government in no doubt that we will not accept the implementation of the Schengen convention as an excuse for frontier delays.

It is up to the Schengen countries to provide adequate staff at their frontier posts with other EU countries to prevent any undue delay to EU citizens.

We have also reminded the Spanish Government that the Schengen external frontier is not equivalent to the EU's external frontier. Gibraltar is an integral part of the European Union and must be treated as such.

Malta

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current position of Malta's application to join the EC.

Mr. David Davis: The 10 April Foreign Affairs Council outlined the circumstances in which accession negotiations will begin six months after conclusion of the intergovernmental conference.

Poland

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he is taking to support the application of Poland to join the European Union; and if he will make a statement. [20932]

Mr. David Davis: We strongly support the eastward enlargement of the European Union to those associated countries of central Europe which wish to join, including Poland. To help them prepare for membership, the EU agreed a strategy at the Essen European Council in December 1994 which we welcomed. The United Kingdom is working to ensure the strategy's effective implementation.

Taslima Nasrin

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Bangladeshi Government and the Bangladeshi high commissioner regarding the case of Taslima Nasrin; and if he will make a statement. [21027]

Mr. Baldry: In the last few months, we, and our EU partners, have been in close contact with the Bangladeshi authorities on the case of Taslima Nasrin. In January, I discussed it with their Foreign Minister during my visit to Bangladesh.

Pakistan

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations on behalf of Her Majesty's Government he has made to the Government of Pakistan over the murder on 16 April of Iqbal Masih; and if he will make a statement. [22384]

Mr. Baldry: I have made no representations to the Government of Pakistan. We deplore the murder of Iqbal Masih and hope the Pakistan authorities will be able swiftly to identify and bring to justice those responsible.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to which British post in Pakistan Iqbal Masih applied for a visa to visit the United Kingdom; when his application was received; when it was referred to London; if the application was granted; when Iqbal Masih was informed of the decision; and if he will make a statement. [22386]

Mr. Baldry: We do not normally disclose details of an individual's entry clearance application to third parties without the applicant's consent. However, in this case I can say that Mr. Iqbal Masih applied for a United Kingdom visa in Stockholm on 11 November 1994.

The application was referred to Islamabad in line with normal practice. Before a reply was received from Islamabad, Mr. Masih returned to Pakistan.

Azad Kashmir

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received as to when the Government of Azad Kashmir will introduce an ordinance whereby those held in prison without trial for more than two years will be eligible for bail. [22385]

Mr. Baldry: We have received no recent reports.

Arms Sales

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those countries to which Her Majesty's Government refuse to sell arms, in each case giving the criteria for the embargo.

Mr. David Davis: We observe mandatory United Nations embargoes on Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Liberia, Former Republic of Yugoslavia, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) UNITA (Angola) and Rwanda; European Union embargoes on China, Burma, Zaire and Sudan; an Organisation on Security and Co-operation in Europe embargo on Armenia and Azerbaijan.

In addition we do not supply military equipment to Argentina or Iran.

We also observe the EU policy of applying a presumption of denial for new export licence applications for defence equipment for Nigeria, and the UN policy of encouraging a reduction in military expenditure by Cyprus.

Land-mines

Mr. Merchant: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the United Kingdom's policy on the export of land-mines.

Mr. David Davis: On 15 March I extended the scope of our indefinite moratorium on the export of anti-personnel land-mines. It now comprises a total ban on the export of non self-destructing or non-detectable anti-personnel land-mines; plus a ban on the export of all anti-personnel land-mines to countries which have not ratified the weaponry convention.

On 10 April the Foreign Affairs Council agreed a proposal for joint action on land-mines. The joint action includes an European Union-wide moratorium on the export of anti-personnel land-mines, identical in scope to our own moratorium; joint efforts to strengthen the UN weaponry convention; and support for demining.

EU Directives

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the record of (a) the United Kingdom and (b) other members states in complying with EU directives. [20416]

Mr. David Davis: The United Kingdom has a good record on compliance with EU directives. The latest figures show that the United Kingdom has implemented

92.3 per cent. of directives in force. This is the third best total among member states. The latest Commission report, containing figures for all member states, has been placed in the House Library.

UN Arms Register

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the United Kingdom has (a) completed and (b) submitted its 1994 return to the United Nations register of conventional arms; if he will place a copy of return in the Library; and if he will list the other states that have submitted their returns. [22317]

Mr. David Davis: The United Kingdom 1994 entry in the United Nations register of conventional arms was submitted to the United Nations on 1 May 1995. Arrangements have been made for copies of the return to be placed in the Library.

It is too early to say which other states have submitted returns at this stage.

Overseas Students

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many scholarships are available to overseas students for higher education and training in the United Kingdom. [22148]

Mr. Baldry: We have for many years funded substantial programmes of scholarships and awards to enable overseas students to study and train in the United Kingdom.

In 1993–94, the latest year for which complete figures are available, we provided some 21,000 scholarships and awards at a total cost of about £150 million.

Islamabad

Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to improve access for disabled persons to the visa interview section at Islamabad. [22340]

Mr. Goodlad: I have asked the high commission at Islamabad for details and shall arrange for my hon. Friend to receive a substantive reply as soon as possible.

British Council

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total expenditure by the British Council for (a) the interchange of people, (b) libraries and the purchasing of books and (c) the supply of specialist training in the fields of engineering, science and education for the years 1992 and 1994. [22146]

Mr. Baldry: Expenditure in financial years 1992–93 and 1994–95 was (in £m):

| | 1992–93 | 1994–95 |
|---|---|---|
| (a) Interchange of people | 204 | 200 |
| (b) Libraries and the purchasing of books | 49 | 59 |
| (c) Supply of specialist training in the fields of engineering, science and education | 65 | 77 |

SCOTLAND

School Buses

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to introduce legislation to make safety seat belts compulsory on school buses; and if he will make a statement

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 26 April 1995]: The Government are presently consulting on draft regulations which will require seat belts to be fitted to all coaches and minibuses whenever they are used specifically for the transport of children. It is proposed that the regulations will come into force 12 months after they are laid before Parliament to allow operators sufficient time to arrange for vehicles to be fitted with seat belts. The regulations will be made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and will extend to Scotland.

Animal Diseases

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases of Teschen disease occurred in each year since 1975. [21097]

Sir Hector Monro: No cases of Teschen disease have been recorded in Scotland since 1975.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases of African swine fever there has been each year since 1985. [21066]

Sir Hector Monro: No cases of African swine fever have been recorded in Scotland since 1985.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases of vesicular stomatitis occurred in each year since 1985. [21137]

Sir Hector Monro: No cases of vesicular stomatitis have been reported since it was made notifiable on 1 June 1991. Official records are not available for the period before that date.

Mink Farms

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number of licensed mink farms in each year since 1989. [21192]

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The number of licensed mink farms in each year since 1989 is as follows:

1989: 8
1990: 6
1991: 2
1992: 2
1993: 1
1994: —

Scottish Environment Protection Agency

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: To ask the Secretary for Scotland what plans he has to recruit a chief executive and members for the Scottish Environment Protection Agency and what costs may be associated with this exercise. [22729]

Mr. Lang: As the Environment Bill has received a Second Reading in the Commons, thereby indicating parliamentary support for the principle of the Bill, advertisements are being placed in the press for a chief executive and members of the Scottish Environment Protection Agency. The successful candidates will not be formally appointed until the Bill has received Royal Assent.

Parliamentary approval for the new service will be sought in a summer supplementary estimate for the housing and environmental services, Scotland vote, class XIV, vote 5. Pending that approval, urgent expenditure estimated at £40,000 will be met by a repayable advance from the contingencies fund.

This expenditure is urgent because of the need to have senior personnel in place as soon as possible after Royal Assent so as to ensure that the agency is full operational from 1 April 1996.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Children's Books

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick upon Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what was the cost of the children's books in the Family Room of the House; who chose them; and under what budget their purchase was made.

Mr. Beith [holding answer 24 April 1995]: In July 1989, the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee of the Services Committee gave approval to the idea that a small set of bookcases be provided to house children's books in the Members' Families' Room. The Services Committee and the Speaker endorsed this recommendation of the Sub-Committee. The then Librarian, Dr. Menhennet, agreed to find up to £150 from the Library's budget to purchase a modest number of suitable books which would be stamped as Library property. The assistant education officer was asked to advise on the selection of books. Early in 1994, an additional £30 was spent following a suggestion from a Member.

WALES

NRA Advisory Committee for Wales

Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what issues his Advisory Committee for Wales on National Rivers Authority functions has considered during 1994. [22779]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The committee's annual report for 1994 has been published today and I will arrange for copies to be placed in the Libraries of the House.

Divorces

Mr. Martin Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many cases of divorce have been reported during the last year; and what were the comparable figures for each of the previous four years. [20752]

Mr. Richards: The information requested for Wales is in the following table.

| Year | Divorces[1] |
|---|---|
| 1994[2] | 7,941 |
| 1993 | 8,517 |
| 1992 | 8,633 |
| 1991 | 8,542 |
| 1990 | 8,159 |

Notes:
[1] Divorces according to the date of decree absolute.
[2] The 1994 figure is provisional and is liable to revision to take account of late amendments.
Source:
Lord Chancellors Department.

Attention Deficit and Hyperactivity Disorder

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment his Department has made of the prevalence of attention deficit and hyperactivity disorder in Wales and in each health authority; what measures he proposes to assist sufferers and their carers; and if he will make a statement. [20548]

Mr. Richards: The determination of the level of need and the provision of appropriate services is a matter for health authorities.

CADW

Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what targets he has set for Cadw: Welsh Historic Monuments executive agency. [22778]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Cadw has been set the following key targets for 1995–96:

(i) To complete 90 per cent. of the approved conservation maintenance programme.
(ii) To complete 60 resurvey lists.
(iii) To resolve 75 per cent. of ad hoc listing cases within 17 weeks.
(iv) To complete 110 scheduling actions, of which at least 70 per cent. involve additional protection.
(v) To resolve 75 per cent. of listed building consent cases within four weeks, and 90 per cent. of cases within six weeks.
(vi) To resolve 75 per cent. of scheduled monument consent cases within 13 weeks, and 90 per cent. of cases within 17 weeks.
(vii) To resolve 80 per cent. of Historic Buildings grant applications within 17 weeks.
(viii) To resolve 80 per cent. of Ancient Monument grant applications within six weeks.
(ix) To pay 90 per cent. of properly presented claims for Historic Buildings and Ancient Monument grants within four weeks of receipt.
(x) To achieve a market share of 63 per cent. of the number of visitors to the top 20 heritage sites in Wales.
(xi) To increase the average income per visitor to 227.
(xii) To operate within allocated programme and running cost budgets.
(xiii) To achieve efficiency gains of at least 2 per cent.

Full details of Cadw's performance against its targets for 1995–96 will be published in the agency's annual report.

TRANSPORT

Rail Franchises

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the foreign national rail companies which are free to submit a bid to operate rail franchises in the United Kingdom. [22589]

Mr. Watts: There are no restrictions preventing foreign national rail companies bidding for franchises.

Railtrack

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what budget his Department has allocated for advertising and promoting the sale of Railtrack plc. [22590]

Mr. Watts: Costs of the sale will be published in due course.

Railways (Capital Expenditure)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of the total capital expenditure on British railways, including rolling stock, in 1994–95. [22444]

Mr. Watts: Capital expenditure on British railways, including expenditure on European Passenger Services Ltd., is expected to be over £1 billion in 1994–95.

The Minch (Vessel Traffic)

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what steps have been taken to monitor the traffic of vessels in the Minch since publication of the Donaldson report; and if he will make a statement; [21420]

(2) what assessment he has made of the number of large vessels currently using the deep water route in preference to the Minch. [21421]

Mr. Norris: These are operational matters for the Marine Safety Agency. I have asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from R. M Bradley to Mr. Robert Maclennan, dated 4 May 1995:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your Questions about monitoring tanker traffic in the Minch.

In the light of the BRAER grounding in January 1993, the International Maritime Organisation adopted a number of ship routeing and reporting recommendations for areas around the United Kingdom coast, all of which entered into force in late November of that year. Laden tankers over 10,000grt are recommended to use the Deep Water Route to the west of the Hebrides rather than the Minch, except in times of adverse weather, when using the sheltered waters of the Minch is a safer option for the ship and the marine environment. At the same time, all tankers intending to use the minch should report their movements to the HM Coastguard station at Stornoway.

This Agency has systematically analysed those ship movement reports to check for infringements of the international routeing recommendation. From January 1994 to March 1995 the Agency analysed reports from 814 ships, 603 of which were tankers. Of those tankers, 203 were laden and 53 of those were over 10,000grt. In only one case—in January 1994—was the routeing recommendation for the Minch infringed. The Agency took immediate action with the owners.

Lord Donaldson's report into measures to prevent pollution from merchant ships welcomed the Agency's monitoring of tanker traffic in the Minch and supported the retention by Masters of the option to use the Minch in times of adverse weather. The Agency is continuing to monitor closely the ship movement reports received by Stornoway Coastguard, and to follow-up any reported sightings of tankers that it receives periodically from other local sources.

The Agency is taking forward Lord Donaldson's recommendation that mobile radar should be used to survey the density and type of maritime traffic around the United Kingdom coast, and to ensure compliance with existing ship routeing and reporting recommendations. Planning is at an early stage, but it is envisaged that the waters of the Minch will be surveyed in this way over the coming year.

M25

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will set out the timetable in respect of his plans (a) to widen the existing carriageway of the M25 to five lanes in each direction between junctions 12 and 14 and 15 to 16 and (b) to create six lanes in each direction between junctions 14 and 15; [21577]

(2) what public inquiries will be held in respect of the proposed M25 widening between junctions 12 and 16; [21584]

(3) when he proposes to publish his environmental statements in respect of proposals to accommodate projected M25 traffic growth for the next 15 years. [21583]

Mr. Watts: The Highways Agency has embarked upon design work and an environmental assessment of the widening proposals following my right hon. Friend's announcement on 3 April. The agency expects to publish details of the scheme between junctions 12 and 15, including an environmental statement, early next year. A series of local public exhibitions will be held to provide an opportunity for people to see the proposals and discuss them with agency staff.

Preparation of the scheme between junctions 15 and 16 will take longer. Subsequent progress on both schemes will depend on successful completion of any necessary statutory procedures. If design work were to confirm that the proposals could be contained within the curtilage of the existing road layout, there would be no statutory obligation to hold a public inquiry.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he proposes to minimise the effects of noise arising from proposals to extend the M25. [21574]

Mr. Watts: This will be achieved by a comprehensive set of mitigation measures, including additional and heightened noise barriers.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set out his budget and precise proposals for land purchase in respect of the proposed M25 widening between junctions 12 to 16. [21578]

Mr. Watts: The precise amount of land, if any, to be purchased has yet to be assessed following further design work and the projected cost will depend upon estimates provided by the Valuation Office Agency.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he now has to introduce measures to enable the M25 motorway to perform its function as part of the strategic road network; and if he will make a statement. [21579]

Mr. Watts: The M25 is presently performing its function as part of the strategic road network.

New Motorways (Cost)

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the average cost per mile of new motorways. [21670]

Mr. Watts: This is an operational matter for the Highways Agency. I have asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Laurie Haynes to Mr. William O'Brien, dated 4 May 1995:

The Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr. John Watts MP, has asked me to write to you in reply to your recent Parliamentary Question concerning new motorway costs.

The cost of building a new motorway varies from site to site and is dependent on the standard of provision—ie, the number of traffic lanes in each direction, location, terrain and ground condition.

The typical cost of constructing a mile of new three lane motorway is shown below at 1994 prices.

| Road standard environment | Typical cost |
|---|---|
| Dual 3 lane motorway in rural environment | 8 to 17 |
| Dual 3 lane motorway in urban environment | 14 to 20 |

The above includes the cost of design and the cost of purchasing land but excludes VAT.

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 5 December 1994, Official Report, columns 35–36, if he will list those projects in privatised companies which have received European regional development funding since privatisation indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [20574]

Mr. Norris: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Energy, on 1 May Official Report, column 14.

London Underground

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many safety-related track speed restrictions were imposed on the London Underground network in each year from 1990 to 1995.

Mr. Norris: This information is not available in the form requested.

ENVIRONMENT

"Remedying Environmental Damage"

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to publish the Government's response to the report, "Remedying Environmental Damage", by the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities. [23139]

Mr. Atkins: The Department of the Environment has today published the Government response to the Committee's report and copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Legal Aid

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the cost to public funds which has been expended on legal aid in all vaccine damage cases in each year since 1979, giving the figure for (a) legal fees and (b) medical expenses. [21418]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The information requested is not available.

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunities matters. [21491]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lord Chancellor's Department has an equal opportunities policy statement in place. To support this, the Department has three separate action plans to achieve equality of opportunity for people of ethnic minority origin, for women and men and for disabled people. These action plans are regularly monitored and any necessary corrective action is taken to ensure that the policy is properly implemented.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what progress he hopes to achieve in his Department over the next three months to push forwards the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the fourth UN conference on women; and if he will incorporate a section on equal opportunities in his Department's annual report. [21493]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Government are committed to the principles set out in the regional platform for action agreed at the preparatory conference in Vienna for the fourth UN world conference on women. We have taken these forward through a wide range of programmes and initiatives and will continue to do so. Our Department's annual report already incorporates a section on equal opportunities. We shall continue to cover equality issues in our annual report.

Ms. Eagle: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department which Minister has responsibility for equal opportunity issues. [21490]

Mr. John M. Taylor: I am the Minister who has responsibility for equal opportunities within the Lord Chancellor's Department.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department. [21492]

Mr. John M. Taylor: This Department's policy, in line with guidance issued in 1992 by the ministerial group on women's issues, is that policy proposals should ensure that unlawful or unjustifiable race or sex discrimination does not occur and that similar principles should apply to people with disabilities.

Mrs. Kuldip Kaur

Mr. Madden: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when permission for an appeal by Mrs. Kuldip Kaur—Ref:Imm/ECR/0152/94s—was granted; on what date the post in Delhi was informed; on what date the explanatory statement was received; if the post has informed him of the correct case references; and if he will make a statement. [21730]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The regional adjudicator will decide as a preliminary issue on 12 May 1995 whether the appeal by Mrs. Kuldip Kaur may proceed out of time. If permission is granted, the immigration appellate authorities will request the post in New Delhi to prepare and forward the explanatory statement.

Public Records

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what consideration has been given to reducing the time in which records held by the Public Record Office are kept confidential. [21986]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Consideration was given at the time of the July 1993 White Paper on Open Government, Cm 2290, as to whether the 30-year closure period prescribed by the Public Records Act 1967 should be reduced.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (1) what is the reason for the withholding from release at the Public Record Office of the 1956 Medical Research Council paper on the report on Hiroshima and Nagasaki pregnancy studies, document reference D314/49; [22016]

(2) what is the reason for the withholding from release at the Public Record Office of the 1956 Medical Research Council report on leukaemia radiation, including Hiroshima and Nagasaki, containing mutation rates and minimum effective doses of radiation in various plants and animals, document reference D314/46. [22015]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Although the Medical Research Council is not governed by the Public Records Acts, it has acted to ensure that its archives are properly preserved and made accessible to researchers by transferring historical records to the Public Record Office. Questions of this nature should normally be directed to the MRC. Nevertheless, I am able to say on this occasion that the continued retention of these files by the MRC is due to preparation activity in relation to the transfer of MRC material.

National Survey of Court Users

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when he expects to make an announcement about the results of the national survey of courts users. [23141]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The report on the findings of the survey is published today, and copies have been placed in the Library.

TREASURY

VAT Audits

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many VAT audits have been conducted into the returns of the unlicensed private car hire or minicab firms in Greater London during each of the past three years; and if he will make a statement. [21173]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The information is not available. Customs central records do not distinguish licensed from unlicensed operators of taxis and other private hire.

EU Convergence Plans

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if the EU Commission will make public its reactions to the convergence plans submitted by member states of the EU; [22552]

(2) how many member states have now submitted their convergence plans to the EU Commission; when the United Kingdom submitted such a plan; and if he will publish it; [22551]

(3) what consideration has been given to national convergence programmes by the Monetary Committee of the EU and by the ECOFIN council. [22553]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The ECOFIN council has generally assessed each member state's initial convergence programme, on the basis of a report from the Commission and the Monetary Committee. The practice has varied for updated programmes, depending on the scale of any changes to the plans. Where there is no specific discussion, subsequent convergence programmes will be one of the sources of information used by the Commission in preparing reports for the council's regular multilateral surveillance discussions.

The Commission does not publish its assessment of national convergence programmes but when ECOFIN considers a convergence programme, it publishes the conclusions of its discussion in the form of a press notice.

All member states—apart from Luxembourg and the three new members, Austria, Finland and Sweden—have adopted convergence programmes. Revised and updated programmes have also been adopted, where appropriate, in the light of economic developments.

The UK produced an updated programme in March this year, based on the 1995–96 "Financial Statement and Budget Report". A copy of this and previous convergence programmes can be found in the House of Commons Library.

Departmental Annual Report

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much staff time, and at what estimated cost, was put into compiling the departmental annual report; and what were the figures for each year for which figures are available since 1990. [20171]

Mr. Nelson: To estimate the staff time for each year since 1990 would incur disproportionate cost. For the 1995 report—"Chancellor of the Exchequer's small Departments", Cm 2817—it is estimated that across the seven departments covered by the report approximately 50 man days, at a cost of some £17,000, was spent compiling the departmental report.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures the Department takes to assess the cost and staff implications of compiling material for the departmental annual report. [20172]

Mr. Nelson: The departmental report sets out spending plans, priorities, targets and achievements of the departments for which the Chancellor is responsible. The cost and staff implications for compiling material are kept to the minimum necessary to produce a clear and informative report.

Financial Institutions

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what role the Bank of England has taken in promoting and encouraging the merger or takeover by other financial institutions of building societies. [21905]

(2) what encouragement his Department is giving financial institutions to merge, amalgamate or takeover competitors. [21929]

Mr. Nelson: None. Such decisions are a matter for the commercial judgment of the directors and owners of those institutions.

Abbey National

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when was the most recent meeting he had with the chairman of the Abbey National. [21930]

Mr. Nelson: My right hon. and learned Friend has not had a meeting with the chairman of the Abbey National since becoming Chancellor.

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunities matters. [21517]

Mr. Nelson: In the last year, the Treasury ran a comprehensive programme of equal opportunities awareness training—attended by 75 per cent. of staff—issued a booklet to all staff outlining all aspects of equal opportunity policies which also included targets to fulfil the Treasury's undertakings as a member of Opportunity 2000 and an action plan on ethnic minorities. A survey of provision and arrangements for disabled staff was undertaken and an action plan is being prepared.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress he hopes to achieve in his Department over the next three months to push forward the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the fourth UN conference on women; and if he will agree to incorporate a section on equal opportunities in his Department's annual report. [21519]

Mr. Nelson: The Government are committed to the principles set out in the regional platform for action agreed at the preparatory conference in Vienna for the fourth UN world conference on women. We have taken these forward through a wide range of programmes and initiatives and will continue to do so.

The Treasury's latest annual report—March 1995, Cm 2817—set out the Department's progress on equal opportunities issues. The Treasury will continue to publish information on equal opportunities issues in its annual report, in accordance with the recommendations in the Oughton report,—"Career Management and Succession Planning in the Civil Service, Cabinet Office (OPSS), 1994," and the White Paper,—"The Civil Service, Taking Forward Continuity and Change", Cm 2748.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department. [21518]

Mr. Nelson: The Treasury's policy, in line with guidance issued in 1992 by the ministerial group on women's issues, is that policy proposals should ensure that unlawful or unjustifiable sex or race discrimination does not occur and that similar principles apply to people with disabilities. This scrutiny is part of a continuous and routine process, as part of policy advice to Ministers.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which Minister in his Department has responsibility for equal opportunities issues. [21516]

Mr. Nelson: I am the Minister responsible for equal opportunities issues.

Industrial Production

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the rate of increase in industrial production on the United Kingdom in each year since 1992; and what were the comparable figures for (i) the United States of America, (ii) Italy, (iii) Germany and (iv) Japan. [22208]

Mr. Nelson: Industrial production data for the United States of America, Italy, Germany and Japan can be found in the monthly OECD publication "Main Economic Indicators". UK industrial production data can be found on the CSO database, which is available in the House of Commons Library.

Export-led Growth (Definition)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his definition of export-led growth, with particular reference to the inclusion of (a) North sea oil and gas and (b) imports of manufactures. [22160]

Mr. Nelson: Changes in both gross and net exports are considered when assessing the sources of GDP growth. More detailed analysis looking at the commodity composition of exports and imports may also be relevant.

Taxpayers

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update the answer to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) of 26 October 1993, Official Report, columns 571-72, providing estimates for 1994–95 and 1995–96 for the number of taxpayers with gross and taxable income in income bands up to £150,000 supplying data at intervals of not more than £10,000. [21004]

Sir George Young [holding answer 25 April 1995]: Available information is given in the tables. The increase in taxpayer numbers is largely due to economic growth. Net effect of tax changes this April was to take more than 100,000 people out of tax. In addition, the number of people in work is increasing—the United Kingdom work force in employment went up 174,000 between December 1993 and December 1994.

[1] Gross income is defined as total income for income tax purposes. It excludes income from certain social security benefits and some investment income such as National Savings Certificates.

[2] Taxable income is defined as gross income for income tax purposes less those allowances and reliefs which are available at the taxpayer's marginal rate.

Company Ownership

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which a company owned 51 per cent. by the Government of another European Union country and 49 per cent. by an American company can bid by competitive tender for British business. [22047]

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 2 May 1995]: The EC treaty would normally require a company established in a member state to be treated equally with British suppliers. The treaty and the transparency directive—80/723/EEC as amended—will ensure that public funding which could give competitive advantage is subject to scrutiny. For public contracts and certain contracts in the energy, water, transport and telecommunications sectors, the EC procurement directives reinforce the treaty provisions and, as a rule, require competition. For Government contracts, the policy is to seek best value for money through competition, normally by competitive tender. However, it is not possible to give a definitive reply on the eligibility of a particular company without knowing the full circumstances.

Civil Servants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22075]

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 2 May 1995]: Compensation payments for early retirement on grounds of limited efficiency are age, salary and service related. There have been three retirements from the Treasury on grounds of limited efficiency over the past five financial years—all flexible early retirements—as follows:

| | Annual compensation payment to age 60 (£ rate pa) | Superannuation lump sum (£) | Lump sum compensation payment (£) | Compensation in lieu of notice (if any) (£) |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1990–91 | | | | |
| Flexible | 14,191.15 | 39,087.10 | 0 | 0 |
| Flexible | 3,736.76 | 10,299.15 | 0 | 0 |
| 1991–92 | | | | |
| Flexible | 15,411.50 | 44,680.00 | 0 | 0 |

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Lord President of the Council (1) what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunities matters; [21542]

(2) if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department; [21543]

(3) which Minister in his Department has responsibility for equal opportunities issues. [21541]

Mr. Newton: The Privy Council Office, of whose 38 staff 23 are women, continues to operate as an equal opportunities employer within the relevant code. My Department has no plans to prepare a gender assessment. No Minister within the Department has particular responsibility for equal opportunities issues.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Civil Servants

Mr. Peter Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many civil servants of executive grade were in post in 1980, 1990 and 1995. [22539]

Mr. Horam: Information for the years from 1980 to 1994 can be found in table 4 of "Civil Service Statistics", copies of which are in the Library. Information for 1995 is not yet available.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22091]

Mr. David Hunt: I am also answering on behalf of the Prime Minister.

Four elements usually make up the package received by those leaving on limited efficiency grounds—compulsory early retirement. The first three are the payments which would be made under the principal civil service pension scheme. The fourth element is set out in the civil service management code. The four elements are as follows:

1. An annual compensation payment/pension based on 1/80th of pensionable pay multiplied by the length of reckonable service. The reckonable service will usually include an enhancement of up to 6 2/3 years.
2. A lump sum of three times the pension.
3. A lump sum compensation payment of up to six months salary.
4. Pay in lieu of notice of up to six months salary.

Flexible early retirement does not include the third and fourth elements listed above.

The figures below cover the Cabinet Office—including the OPSS and its agencies—HMSO, and the COI. There have been four compulsory early retirements and one flexible early retirement on limited efficiency grounds in the past five financial years.

| | Annual compensation payments to age 60 £ pa | Superannuation lump sum £ | Lump sum compensation payment £ | Compensation in lieu or notice (if any) £ |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1990–91 | | | | |
| Compulsory | 7,000.19 | 18,025.17 | 11,901.54 | 11,974.00 |
| 1991–92 | | | | |
| Compulsory | 14,007.71 | 36,190.06 | 18,481.91 | 17,860.00 |
| 1992–93 | | | | |
| Compulsory | 11,737.00 | 33,480.60 | 11,737.00 | 0 |
| Flexible | 12,217.00 | 33,477.73 | 0 | 0 |
| 1993–94 | | | | |
| Compulsory | 8,541.59 | 25,140.95 | 4,103.33 | 0 |

1994–95

There have been no instances of compulsory early retirement or flexible early retirement on limited efficiency grounds in the central Department, HMSO, COI or the executive agencies in the financial year 1994–95.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Educational Low-priced Book Scheme

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the success of the educational low-priced book scheme in furthering the education and training of students in developing countries. [22150]

Mr. Baldry: A review of the educational low-priced books scheme in 1994 revealed that about a third of books sold under ELBS went to prosperous countries, including Hong Kong, Malaysia and Turkey. Our assessment is that the scheme is not reaching poorer students in the poorest countries who cannot afford to buy books and therefore is not able to further the education and training of many students in developing countries.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what was the result of the review of the educational low-priced book scheme; and if he will list those who were consulted during the review; [22153]

(2) what measures he intends to take to ensure that the work of the educational low-priced book scheme is maintained and adequately funded; and if he will make a statement. [22155]

Mr. Baldry: The educational low-priced book scheme is being phased out over two years. During this period, new strategies will be developed to achieve improved targeting and access to key text books and other essential learning materials for poorer students in the poorest countries, in pursuit of our developmental objectives.

The Publishers Association, publishing houses, the administrators of the scheme—International Book Development Ltd.—the British Council, ODA programme managers, ODA professional advisory groups and overseas students studying in the UK were consulted during the course of the review.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the educational low-priced book scheme operational budget for 1994; how this is distributed; and how many administrative staff are involved. [22154]

Mr. Baldry: The total budget in the financial year 1994–95 was £1.53 million, including £0.2 million for administration. International Book Development Ltd. administer the scheme under contract to ODA.

Details of sales by region, country and subject coverage from 1985 to 1993 will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses shortly.

Mrs Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list (a) the overseas countries, (b) the number of students and (c) the number of further educational establishments to have benefited from the educational low-priced book scheme. [22152]

Mr. Baldry: The educational low-priced books scheme has been available in the following countries:

Africa—Botswana, Burundi, Cameroon, Ethiopia, The Gambia, Ghana, Kenya, Lesotho, Liberia, Madagascar, Malawi, Mauritius, Mozambique, Namibia, Nigeria, Sierra Leone, Swaziland, Tanzania, Uganda, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Asia—Bangladesh, Bhutan, Hong Kong, India, Indonesia, Malaysia, The Maldives, Nepal, Pakistan, Phillipines, Sri Lanka, Thailand.

Pacific—Fiji, Papua New Guinea, Solomon Islands, Tonga, Vanuatu, Western Samoa.

Caribbean and Atlantic—Antigua, Barbados, Dominica, Grenada, Guyana, Honduras, Jamaica, St. Kitts-Nevis, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Trinidad and Tobago.

Mediterranean and Near East—Egypt, Jordan, Morocco, Turkey.

Under the scheme, books are sold through local commercial outlets. There is thus no central record of the number of students who have purchased books or which further education establishments may have benefited from the scheme.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs by what criteria he judges the value of the educational low-price book scheme in the sphere of higher education and vocational training in the developing world. [22149]

Mr. Baldry: The value of the educational low-priced books scheme is assessed against our normal developmental criteria. Our aim is to provide support for education for the poorer students in the poorest countries in the best targeted and most cost-effective way.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effect of the discontinuation of the educational low-priced book scheme on overseas students from developing countries who sit examinations set by the royal colleges. [22151]

Mr. Baldry: Phasing out the educational low-priced books scheme should not prevent developing country students who sit examinations set by the royal colleges from purchasing key text books. Text books provided under the scheme are predominately undergraduate rather than postgraduate. Since the books are sold through commercial outlets, the scheme cannot be targeted on specific groups of students. We intend to introduce a new strategy aimed at the needs of the poorer students in the poorest countries and which will not subsidise those students or others who can afford to pay the full price for books.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what status has been accorded to the Palestine Liberation Organisation at the non-proliferation treaty conference at the United Nations in New York. [22020]

Mr. David Davis: The conference has agreed to a request from the permanent observer mission of Palestine that Palestine be granted observer status.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list these states party to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty which accused the United Kingdom of breaking article I of the non-proliferation treaty, through the United Kingdom's military nuclear agreements with the United States of America, in representations made at the non-proliferation treaty conference in New York on 21 April. [22024]

Mr. David Davis: Mexico, quoting from an unsubstantiated report. UK-US collaboration is in full accord with the obligations imposed by the NPT.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response the United Kingdom delegation to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty review conference in New York made to the criticisms made by Turkey in main committee II of the conference that existing safeguards at reprocessing plants are inadequate. [22021]

Mr. David Davis: The statement by the Turkish delegation in main committee II dealt generally with International Atomic Energy Authority safeguards. We do not accept that IAEA safeguards measures on declared nuclear materials are inadequate.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response has been made by the United Kingdom delegation to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty conference in New York to the proposal by the Netherlands at the conference that full scope nuclear safeguards should apply to all nuclear facilities and materials without discrimination. [22023]

Mr. David Davis: The Dutch Foreign Minister, Mr Hans Van Mierlo, urged the NPT review and extension conference to accept the principle of the application of full scope safeguards on all peaceful nuclear activities without discrimination in nuclear weapon and non nuclear weapon States. All civil nuclear material in the United Kingdom is subject to international safeguards.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when Her Majesty's Government will respond to operative paragraph 2 of the European Parliament's motion on the extension of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, adopted on 5 April. [22351]

Mr. David Davis: The extension of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty is too important to be held hostage to any other issue.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government to the proposal made by the Government of South Africa at the nuclear non-proliferation treaty review and extension conference for the establishment of a committee to meet between review conferences to consider ways of strengthening the treaty. [22353]

Mr. David Davis: We believe that the treaty's review procedures provide ample opportunity for states' parties to voice their concerns about the implementation of the treaty, but we are giving careful consideration to the South African proposals.

East Timor

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 8 March, Official Report, column 198, on what date the staff attached to the jakarta embassy who visited East Timor on 14 to 19 November 1991 visited Wara Husada number 4 military hospital. [22285]

Mr. Goodlad: The member of the British embassy staff in Jakarta who visited East Timor from 14 to 19 November 1991 did not visit the Wara Husada number 4 military hospital.

British Prisoners Abroad

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many United Kingdom citizens were serving prison sentences in overseas prisons for drug offences on 18 April; and if he will list the figures (a) by gender (b) by country in what the sentences are being served. [22379]

Mr. Baldry: On 18 April 1995, there were 999 British citizens serving sentences for drugs offences around the world. In addition, there were a further 321 other British nationals, and others to whom we extend consular protection, for example, British dependent territories citizens, unrepresented Commonwealth nationals or EU nationals. Following is a table giving the breakdown by national status and by whereabouts.

A division by gender could be provided only at a disproportionate cost.

Mr. and Mrs. Anwar Jahan Rashid

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when a decision is going to be taken on the application made to the United Kingdom post in Islamabad by Mr. and Mrs. Anwar Jahan Rashid to visit the United Kingdom, Ref: V95/000618; and if he will make a statement. [22591]

Mr. Baldry: I have instituted inquiries and shall arrange for the migration and visa correspondence unit to write to the hon. Member when these are complete.

HEALTH

Prescriptions

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what level of net disposable income is required to allow (a) a single and (b) a married person to get help with NHS prescriptions under the NHS low income scheme. [19397]

Mr. Malone: The figure will vary according to individual circumstances. Intending claimants are advised to consult leaflet AB11—"Help with NHS costs"—a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Dental Services

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many additional staff will be required; and what will be the cost of introducing the more rigorous prior approval system for dental care; [20702]

(2) if she will make a statement on the details of the proposed more rigorous prior approval mechanism for dental treatment under the NHS; and to what extent this has been influenced by a study of the system in Russia; [20680]

(3) what is the maximum delay in providing dental care she will approve following the introduction of the more rigorous prior approval mechanism for dental care; [20696]

(4) what estimate she has made of the total additional administrative costs which will be incurred by dentists providing NHS dental care when the more rigorous prior approval mechanism for dental care is introduced. [20703]

Mr. Malone: The Government will develop more rigorous prior approval mechanisms for dental care to ensure that all treatments that are clinically essential are available through national health service dentistry, but that only those treatments which are clinically essential and for which there is no clinically acceptable, less costly, alternative are provided. This will promote better use of available resources. The Government's proposals were not influenced by study of the system in Russia. Details of the mechanisms will be developed in consultation with the dental profession.

The aim is to develop guidelines and protocols which will promote a clear understanding among dentists of the conditions under which treatment may be approved. This should prevent the submission of inappropriate requests for approval. If there are fewer requests, then there would be fewer rejections.

There is no reason to expect that patients would have to wait for a longer period for treatment to be approved under more rigorous prior approval than they do at present. Nor need there be an increase in administrative cost for the Dental Practice Board.

NHS Charges and Receipts

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the planned increase in charges and receipts from the figure given in the estimated outturn for 1994–95 to that cited in plans for 1995–96 NHS current and capital expenditure. [21755]

Mr. Sackville: The Government's expenditure plans, published in the departmental report, Cm 2812, show that total national health service income from charges and receipts is expected to be £1,470 million in 1995–96, comparable to 1993–94 outturn of £1,466 million. This is some £230 million more than the forecast outturn for 1994–95, although this is subject to revision at outturn—for example, to reflect late recording of some receipts.

Junior Doctors

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health from what date a compulsory requirement for junior doctors to serve in a casualty and accident department ceased to apply; what consultations took place between her Department and the relevant medical authorities concerning this change; and what estimate she has made of the impact of these measures on the supply of junior doctors to other departments. [21869]

Mr. Malone: The content of training programmes for junior doctors is the responsibility of the relevant royal college or faculty. Since January 1994, it has not been compulsory for doctors wishing to sit the fellowship examination of the Royal College of Surgeons to spend a part of their training programme in an accident and emergency department, although it is strongly recommended that they do so. Consultation on changes to training requirements are a matter for the relevant royal college.

We have consistently increased the number of junior doctors in recent years, both in accident and emergency medicine and in other specialties. The decision by some trainees, because of the change in the fellowship examination, not to opt to work in accident and emergency departments has also added to the supply of junior doctors in other specialties.

Suicides

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many suicides occurred in England among (a) farmers, (b) farm workers and (c) the general population in each year since 1988. [21907]

Mr. Bowis: The information is shown in the table.

Deaths assigned to ICD[1] codes E950–E959 (suicide and self-inflicted injury) and E980–E989 (injury undetermined whether accidentally or purposely inflicted), England, 1988–93

| | Farmers | | Farm workers | | All persons | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | E950–E959 suicide | E980–E989 undetermined | E950–E959 suicide | E980–E989 undetermined | E950–E959 suicide | E980–E989 undetermined |
| 1988 | 43 | 6 | 25 | 3 | 3,968 | 1,987 |
| 1989 | 32 | 5 | 21 | 6 | 3,515 | 1,868 |
| 1990 | 33 | 8 | 21 | 9 | 3,710 | 1,884 |
| 1991 | 36 | 10 | 18 | 2 | 3,630 | 1,937 |
| 1992 | 31 | 7 | 17 | 8 | 3,675 | 1,866 |
| 1993[2] | 31 | 3 | 14 | 11 | 3,299 | 1,323 |

[1] International Classification of Diseases, 9th Revision.
[2] 1993 figures are provisional. The system of coding underlying cause of death in England and Wales was changed on 1 January 1993.

Numbers for 1993 may not be comparable to earlier years for some causes, including suicide and injury undetermined whether accidentally or purposely inflicted. Work is continuing to clarify this, and further details will be available later in the year.

Marriages

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many marriages between British citizens and non-British, non-EU citizens were reported as bogus to the Registrar-General by individual registrars in each year since 1989. [21816]

Mr. Sackville: Superintendent registrars are instructed to send a report to the Registrar-General where they have good reason to suspect that a proposed marriage of a person from abroad has been arranged for the sole purpose of evading statutory immigration controls. The number of reports received from individual superintendent registrars since 1989 will be placed in the Library. Details of reports received of marriages between British citizens and non-British, non-EU citizens is not kept separately and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Residential Care

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what estimates she makes of the numbers of married people of each sex who are contributing (a) all or (b) part of their income from occupational pensions to the costs of local authority provided residential or nursing care; [22278]

(2) how many married people of each sex in local authority provided residential or nursing home care have a spouse remaining in their own home; [22283]

(3) how many married people of each sex are in receipt of occupational pensions and in local authority provided residential or nursing home care; [22276]

(4) what is the estimated total amount of money deriving from occupational pensions contributed by married people to the costs of local authority provided residential and nursing home care. [22279]

Mr. Bowis: This information is not available centrally.

GP Minor Surgery

Ms Church: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what cost-benefit analysis has been carried out on the likely effect of retaining the restriction on the number of minor operations at the same time as improving general practitioner's surgeries; [22387]

(2) what limit is placed on general practitioners per quarter in respect of minor operations and for what reasons; and what assessment she has made of the consistency of this policy with a primary care driver approach to health care. [22389]

Mr. Malone: General practitioners may claim specific fees under the statement of fees and allowances for up to 15 minor surgical procedures a quarter. This represents a balanced approach between the procedures on the minor surgery list and the other responsibilities of GPs to their patients. Procedures not on the minor surgery list may be performed by GPs under direct contract with a local purchaser, where this will provide an efficient and effective service to patients.

Ms Church: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to review the limit on minor operations to take into account (a) general practitioner list size and (b) differential needs across the country. [22388]

Mr. Malone: None.

Care in the Community

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list those statutes, statutory instruments, circulars, advice notes and departmental letters concerned with provision of care in the community in a table showing (a) the full title and date of publication of each item, (b) a summary of its subject matter, (c) whether it is concerned with services provided by health authorities, local authorities or both, (d) the address of the location from which copies are available, (e) its costs, (f) whether the item is available to the public on request and (g) whether stocks are presently available. [21031]

Mr. Bowis: This information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Clinical Audit

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the total cost of clinical audit in the national health service to date since 1991. [22458]

Mr. Malone: Between April 1991 and March 1995, £247 million was provided to health authorities and the royal colleges to support clinical audit in England. The main purpose of these funds has been to develop and sustain an infrastructure of clinical audit committees and audit support staff. The other cost associated with clinical audit is that of clinicians' time, which has not been costed, and is dependent on the pattern of each individual clinician's input to clinical audit.

Personal Social Services

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total income generated from charges to receipts of personal social services in each year from 1982–83, expressed in 1995 prices. [22390]

Mr. Bowis: The information requested, up to 1993–94, the last year for which it is available, is shown in the table. The increase in 1993–94 reflects the growth in local authority care activity following the community care reforms.

Fees and charges for personal social services

| Year | Fees and charges (£ million) |
|---|---|
| 1982–83 | 609.4 |
| 1983–84 | 613.8 |
| 1984–85 | 605.4 |
| 1985–86 | 672.5 |
| 1986–87 | 668.5 |
| 1987–88 | 625.1 |
| 1988–89 | 599.4 |
| 1989–90 | 608.6 |
| 1990–91 | 568.6 |
| 1991–92 | 556.8 |
| 1992–93 | 530.2 |
| 1993–94 | 639.1 |

England totals derived from local authorities' annual expenditure returns on form RO3. Constant 1995–96 prices, based on gross domestic product indices.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which of the advisory non-departmental public bodies sponsored by her Department are under a statutory requirement to (a) publish their advice to the Government, (b) publish an annual report and (c) lay an annual report before Parliament; and if she will list those bodies with a statutory basis. [21161]

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 27 April 1995]: The following Department of Health advisory non-departmental public bodies have a statutory requirement to:

Publish their advice to the Government:
The Committee on Dental and Surgical Materials.
The Standing Dental Advisory Committee
Publish an annual report:
The British Pharmacopoeia Commission.
The Committee on the Safety of Medicines.
The Health Advisory Service
The Joint Planning Advisory Committee.
The Medicines Commission.
Lay an annual report before Parliament:
The British Pharmacopoeia Commission.
The Medicines Commission.

The following Department of Health advisory non-departmental public bodies have a statutory basis:

The Administration of Radioactive Substances Advisory Committee.
The British Pharmacopoeia Commission.
The Clinical Standards Advisory Group.
The Committee on Dental and Surgical Materials.
The Committee on the Safety of Medicines.
The Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation.
The Medicines Commission.
The Standing Dental Advisory Committee.
The Standing Medical Advisory Committee.
The Standing Nursing and Midwifery Advisory Committee.
The Standing Pharmaceutical Advisory Committee.
The Unrelated Live Transplant Regulatory Authority.

Dentomycin

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement outlining the reasons why Dentomycin was not included on the list of products available for dental prescribing. [22040]

Mr. Malone [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The list for dental prescribing contains medicinal products which patients can obtain on national health service prescription. Dentomycin is solely for use by a dental professional during the provision of treatment and, therefore, should not be included on the list.

SCOTLAND

East Kilbride Development Corporation

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the chairman and board of East Kilbride development corporation to discuss (a) the future of Scottish Nuclear and (b) the impact of the Rolls-Royce closure announcement on the local economy. [22383]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 3 May 1995]: My meeting with the chairman planned for 1 May was deferred because of parliamentary commitments. It is currently being rescheduled.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much was spent on official hospitality by his Department in 1994–95. [21209]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The total expenditure on official hospitality for the Scottish Office for the financial year 1994–95 was 153,806.

Farmers and Farm Workers

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total number of (a) farmers and (b) farm workers for each year since 1988, giving the figures on a percentage of the Scottish population. [21858]

Sir Hector Monro: The figures are as follows:

| | 1988 | 1989 | 1990 | 1991 | 1992 | 1993 | 1994 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Farmers | 30,484 | 31,348 | 30,397 | 29,531 | 28,965 | 27,741 | 28,206 |
| Percentage of population | 0.60 | 0.62 | 0.60 | 0.58 | 0.57 | 0.54 | 0.55 |
| Farm workers | 41,141 | 40,275 | 41,850 | 40,762 | 40,749 | 40,577 | 41,226 |
| Percentage of population | 0.81 | 0.79 | 0.82 | 0.80 | 0.80 | 0.79 | 0.80 |

Source:
Agricultural Census and General Register Office (Scotland).
Note:
Farmers includes full-time and part-time occupiers. Farm workers include full-time and part-time spouses of occupiers doing farm work, and hired or family labour. Excluded are young people working under Youth Training. The figures are derived from the main and minor holdings' agricultural census.

Suicides

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many suicides occurred among (a) farmers, (b) farm workers, and (c) the general population in each year since 1988. [21909]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The number of deaths from suicide registered in Scotland since 1988, (a) where the deceased's occupation was given as "farmer" or "farm worker" and (b) in the general population, is as follows:

Deaths registered as suicide among farmers, farm workers and the general population

| Year | Farmers | Farm workers[1] | General population |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1988 | 7 | 5 | 598 |
| 1989 | 12 | 7 | 527 |
| 1990 | 13 | 3 | 535 |
| 1991 | 11 | 7 | 525 |
| 1992 | 13 | 6 | 569 |
| 1993 | 9 | 8 | 615 |
| 1994[2] | 12 | 3 | 622 |

[1] Includes farmers' wives.
[2] 1994 figures are provisional.

Geese, Islay

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many licences were issued under section 16 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 to permit the killing of (a) barnacle and (b) Greenland whitefronted geese on Islay to prevent serious agricultural damage in each year since 1982. [22348]

Sir Hector Monro: [holding answer 3 May 1995]: The information is as follows:

| Year | Number of barnacle licences | Number of whitefront licences |
|---|---|---|
| 1982–83 | 14 | — |
| 1983–84 | 50 | — |
| 1984–85 | 34 | — |
| 1985–86 | 26 | — |
| 1986–87 | 29 | — |
| 1987–88 | 40 | 13 |
| 1988–89 | 30 | 2 |
| 1989–90 | 28 | 8 |
| 1990–91 | 24 | 13 |
| 1991–92 | 26 | 12 |
| 1992–93 | 6 | 2 |
| 1993–94 | 2 | 1 |
| 1994–95 | 2 | 2 |

Ministerial Visits

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of times he has visited Brussels in the last year; with which Commissioners he has met on each occasion; and which policy matters were discussed. [16051]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 29 March 1995]: In the last year, I have undertaken two visits to Brussels. On 8 and 9 September, I visited Brussels to participate in the 50th anniversary celebrations of the liberation of Belgium but did not meet Commissioners on that occasion. On 21 and 22 March, I again visited Brussels and met Commissioner Liikanen to discuss budget reforms and Commissioner Fischler to discuss Scottish agricultural issues and structural funds for rural areas. I also spoke to Commissioner Sir Leon Brittan about trade issues. My noble Friend the Minister of State visited Brussels on 8

March when he met Commissioner Bonino and discussed matters relating to fisheries policy.

In addition to these meetings, Scottish Ministers have attended the following meetings of the European Council of Ministers in Brussels and other locations:

| | Meetings | |
|---|---|---|
| 12 April 1994 | Fisheries Council | Minister of State |
| 27–28 May 1994 | Justice/Interior Issues | Minister of State |
| 3–4 June 1994 | Regional Policy | Mr. Stewart |
| 10 June 1994 | Fisheries Council | Sir Hector Monro |
| 28 September 1994 | Fisheries Council | Sir Hector Monro |
| 23 November 1994 | Fisheries Council | Sir Hector Monro |
| 19–20 December 1994 | Fisheries Council | Sir Hector Monro |
| 22 December 1994 | Fisheries Council (Continuation) | Lord Fraser |
| 6 April 1995 | Fisheries Council | Sir Hector Monro |

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Official Receivers

Mr. Garnier: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish the digest of responses of official receivers to the consultation undertaken, prior to the laying of the draft order enabling the contracting out of various of their functions. [23140]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Yesterday, I published a digest of the responses of official receivers and copies have been laid in the Libraries of the House. They are also available in the Vote Office.

Government Assistance

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the president of the Board of Trade what will be the level of Government expenditure on the support for products under research and the small firms merit award for research and technology schemes in 1995–96.

Mr. Ian Taylor: Estimated Government expenditure in 1995–96 will be £9.75 million on the SPUR scheme and £13.75 million on the SMART scheme, including Scotland and Wales.

Exports and Imports

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate of the proportion of United Kingdom exports in 1990 and 1994 which were (a) imported in the same form and (b) assembled in the United Kingdom from imported components. [22161]

Mr. Needham: The information is not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish a table showing for 1990, 1992 and 1994 the value and volume of production, imports, exports and home sales of the goods falling within SITCD75. [22162]

Mr. Needham: Information on trade for division 75 of the standard international trade classification is available from "Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom". Information on production is not available under this classification. Information on trade and manufacturers' sales for class 33 of the standard industrial classification 1980—office machinery and data processing equipment—in 1990 and 1992 was published by the central statistical office in business monitors PAS3301 and 3302. These publications are available in the Library of the House. Information for office machinery and computers in 1994 is expected to be published later this year by Taylor Nelson AGB in the 1994 edition of "UK Markets Annual Report 61".

Computer Exports

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proportion of the United Kingdom export of computers is wholly or mainly constructed from imported components. [22163]

Mr. Needham: The information is not available.

Inntrepreneur Estates Ltd.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to receive the report of the Director of Fair Trading on the activities of Inntrepreneur Estates Ltd. [22439]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I understand that the inquiry by the Director General of Fair Trading into discounts in the brewing industry is near to completion. I anticipate that he will then announce his conclusions as to whether there is a case for further action under the Fair Trading Act 1973.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what communications he has had with the European Commission respecting the activities of Inntrepreneur Estates Ltd. [22440]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave the hon. Member on 3 March 1995, Official Report, column 751.

Military Goods (Exports)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, between December 1984 and August 1990, exporters were required to obtain end-user certificates for the export of goods, licensed under the Military List, to (a) Thailand, (b) Singapore, (c) Pakistan, (d) Portugal, (e) Cyprus and (f) Hong Kong. [19402]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I am having research done. I will be in touch in a short while.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Acceptance in Lieu Scheme

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if it is his policy to maintain Her Majesty's Government's support for the acceptance in lieu scheme at its present levels. [22293]

Mr. Dorrell: I have no plans to change the present level of Government support for the acceptance in lieu scheme. This scheme, together with all my Department's spending commitments, is, however, being examined in our fundamental expenditure review. This is currently in progress and I cannot at this stage anticipate its findings.

PRIME MINSTER

Ministerial Documents

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make it his policy to ensure that documents originated or acquired by Ministers in the course of their official duties are not sold by them or their heirs and assigns. [22621]

The Prime Minister: By convention, Prime Ministers, on leaving office, have taken with them copies of certain documents which they dealt with personally while in office. These include some documents originated or acquired by them in the course of their official duties. This convention has not applied to Ministers other than former Prime Ministers. The extent to which former Prime Ministers or their heirs and assigns may dispose of such papers, and how, depends on the circumstances of each case.

It is my policy that in future material removed from official custody at the end of an Administration should contain no official material other than that which is already in the public domain.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister in what circumstances a document subject when originated to the provisions of the Official Secrets Acts may be classified other than a state paper. [22527]

The Prime Minister: Documents originating from other than official sources, and which contain official information that should not be disclosed, come within the provisions of the Official Secrets Acts but are not state papers.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if retired Ministers are required to submit their memoirs for approval under the Official Secrets Acts before publication; [22531]

(2) if the right hon. Nigel Lawson submitted his memoirs for approval under the official Secrets Acts before publication, with particular reference to mention of the Governor of the Bank of England. [22622]

The Prime Minister: There is no requirement for former Ministers to submit their memoirs under the Official Secrets Acts before publication. The report of the Committee of Privy Counsellors on Ministerial Memoirs, Cmnd. 7386, recommended that former Ministers who wished to make public an account bearing on their ministerial life should let the Secretary of the Cabinet see in advance the full text of what they propose to say. The Cabinet Secretary offers advice to the author of the text, including on whether it contains material contravening the requirements of national security.

My right hon. and noble Friend Lord Lawson submitted his memoirs to the Cabinet Secretary in the normal way, without any particular reference.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will refer to the Nolan committee the propriety of Ministers or their heirs retaining and using for private gain information or documents acquired in the course of their official duties. [22526]

The Prime Minister: I have no plans to do so.

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 4 May. [21122]

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 4 May. [21121]

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Central Computer Database

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister what plans there are to create a central computerised database on individuals using the database of the national insurance recording system 2—to be available to other Government Departments; and if he will make a statement. [22540]

The Prime Minister: The recently announced replacement of the national insurance recording system—NIRS2—does not include any plans to create a separate computer database on individuals, nor does it involve extending access arrangements to the NIRS2 database to other than existing users of the current NIRS system.

Churchill Papers

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer of 27 April to the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), Official Report, column 978, what steps he has taken to establish whether the papers sold by the Churchill family to the national heritage memorial fund were at any time covered by the provisions of the Official Secrets Acts. [22423]

The Prime Minister: Churchill college has been advised on which papers in the Churchill archive can be released to researchers and which need to be withheld.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister what steps the Government took to purchase the annotated eight-page typescript of Sir Winston Churchill's El Alamein speech sold by Sotheby's in December 1994; and whether this is included in the Churchill documents purchased by the national heritage memorial fund. [22421]

The Prime Minister: The manuscript to which the hon. Member refers was sold by a private owner and was one of many which Sir Winston Churchill gave away during his lifetime. At no time did it form part of the Churchill archive and it does not do so now. It is for the national institutions which maintain archives to decide whether to commit funds to the purchase of papers which appear on the open market.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister how many of the papers sold by the Churchill family to the national heritage memorial fund are to be found in the Public Record Office in their original or a duplicate form; and what copyright fees have to be paid to the Churchill family when such documents in either location are reproduced. [22525]

The Prime Minister: The papers purchased by the national heritage memorial fund are the non-state papers. They are not normally to be found in the Public Record Office in either original or duplicate form. Copyright in the papers purchased by the national heritage memorial fund is a matter for the copyright owners.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister whether he will request the trustees of the national lottery fund to hand back the Churchill papers to the family in return for the money they have received. [22419]

The Prime Minister: No. The integrity of the Churchill archive has now been secured for the nation by the purchase of the non-state papers from the Churchill family and by the transfer of the state papers similarly to Churchill college.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make it his policy to reduce the fees charged for access to and reproduction of the Churchill papers; and if he will publish the proposed scale of charges. [22420]

The Prime Minister: No fees are levied on access to the Churchill papers at Churchill college. Reproduction is a matter for the copyright owners as is the question of charges. A licence has been granted which waives the copyright fee in respect of the reproduction of Crown copyright material for the purposes of research and private study. Other charges, for example the commercial use of the papers, will be levied in accordance with normal practice.

Civil Servants

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister whether civil servants who have been allowed to publish material which relies in any particular on what they have learnt or done in the course of their employment by the Crown are expected to hand to the Crown any profit derived by the author from the publication. [22424]

The Prime Minister: The extent to which a civil servant may be required to account to the Crown for any profit made from such publication will depend on whether the author produced all or part of the work during official time and whether the work is based on or otherwise used Crown copyright material.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister in what circumstances civil servants may publish without prior approval any material based directly or indirectly on what they have learnt or done in the course of their employment by the Crown. [22422]

The Prime Minister: Civil servants must clear in advance material for publication which draws on official material or experience.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22092]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 2 May 1995]: For these purposes my office is part of the Cabinet Office—Office of Public Service and Science. I refer the hon. Member to the reply given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister how much was spent on official hospitality in his official capacities in the financial year 1994–95. [21215]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The provisional total is £30,000

Rules of Succession

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister (1) in which country of which Her Majesty is Head of State the inheritance of the Crown is prohibited to adherents of certain religions; [20852]

. (2) in which countries of which Her Majesty the Queen is Head of State (a) the oldest child and (b) the oldest male child of the monarch succeed to the throne. [20853]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 25 April 1995]: I am not aware that any other Commonwealth realm has rules relating to the succession to the throne.

WALES

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunities matters. [21471]

Mr. Redwood: My Department has a full programme to promote equal opportunities for all staff. It includes detailed programmes of action for women, for staff with a disability and for staff from ethnic minorities. Progress is monitored continuously and a report produced annually. Monitoring shows, for example, that the proportion of women in middle and senior management grades is increasing.

Green Barriers

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy concerning green barriers. [22112]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Green barriers are a matter for local planning authorities, which may if they wish include proposals for such areas in their development plans together with appropriate policies.

Green Belts

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy concerning green belts; and if he will make a statement. [22113]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: It is for local planning authorities to decide whether green belts are necessary and useful within their area. It is then for an authority to promote a green belt through the development plan system allowing public consultation and discussion of both the principle and the detail of any proposals in the context of the whole plan.

Wales TUC

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met the Wales TUC; and if he will make a statement. [22115]

Mr. Redwood: I last met the executive committee of the Wales TUC on 5 December last year, when a range of topics were discussed.

EMPLOYMENT

Training

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the planned level of Government expenditure on (a) TECs and (b) LECs in 1995–96. [22445]

Mr. Paice: In 1995–96, the Government are planning to invest in excess of £1.2 billion in training and enterprise councils in England. This funding will be provided by the Employment Department, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department of the Environment, through the single regeneration budget. It will cover the range of activities for which TECs are responsible, notably management of training and vocational education initiatives, business support services and local economic regeneration.

The Government also invest considerable sums in local enterprise companies in Scotland and TECs in Wales. The extent of this funding is a matter for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales.

EDUCATION

Grant-Maintained Schools

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education, pursuant to her answer of 5 December 1994, Official Report, columns 53-56, if she will list, in chronological order, the "Going GM" conferences held in her Department on grant-maintained status since 21 November 1994 giving in each case, (a) the date, (b) the location, (c) the number of schools invited, (d) the number of schools represented, (e) the number of representatives attending and (f) the cost. [22596]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested is set out in the table.

| Date | Location | Number of schools invited[1] | Number of schools represented | Number of delegates | Cost[2] £ |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 5 December 1995 | Manchester | 3,192 | 61 | 127 | 9,273 |
| 27 January 1995 | Swindon | 357 | 24 | 65 | 5,446 |
| 23 February 1995 | Gatwick | 3,114 | 43 | 81 | 7,113 |
| 1 March 1995 | Norwich | 1,660 | 49 | 101 | 3,662 |
| 10 March 1995 | London | 3,500 | 75 | 147 | 7,327 |
| 14 March 1995 | Bournemouth | 3,114 | 75 | 164 | 7,044 |
| Total | | | | | 39,865 |

[1] The same schools were invited to more than one conference in order to give headteachers and governors more choice over date and location.
[2] Costs listed are those attributable to specific conferences.
In addition, there are two on-going contracts: one for support services, under which for these six conferences some £48,000 can be attributed, and one for mailings, with £8,500 attributable.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many delegates attended the GM speakers' conference at the Hotel Russell on 27 and 28 February; and what was the total cost of (a) the conference and (b) expenses claimed by delegates. [22452]

Mr. Robin Squire: A total of 190 delegates from GM schools attended this conference, which cost £32,676. They have claimed a further £8,743 in travelling expenses.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the total number of grant-maintained schools which submitted bids for the financial year 1995–96, for capital grant allocations for named projects; what was the value of the bids submitted; for how many schools an allocation for named projects was approved; and what was the total value of allocations for named projects. [22457]

Mr. Robin Squire: These matters are now the responsibility of the Funding Agency for Schools. I have asked the chairman of the funding agency to write to the hon. Member.

Grant Maintained Schools Foundation Ltd.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will list the offices of the Grant Maintained Schools Foundation giving, in each case, (a) the number of (i) information and (ii) administrative staff employed, (b) the rent paid for the offices and (c) to whom the rent is paid. [22455]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Grant Maintained Schools Foundation Ltd. has a network of seven local offices. The London office also serves as the headquarters. At the six offices in England, a total of 15.5 full-time equivalent staff are employed as shown. It is not possible to distinguish between information and administrative staff.

|---|---|
| London | 9.7 |
| Lancashire | 2.0 |
| Yorkshire and east Midlands | 0.8 |
| West Midlands | 1.0 |
| North east | 1.0 |
| South west | 1.0 |
| Total | 15.5 |

The GMSF's budget application for 1995–96 includes a forecast of £68,816 for rent. Information on the amount of rent paid for each office, and to whom the rent is paid is a matter for the Foundation and the relevant landlords.

The GMSF local office in Swansea is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the cost of running the Grant Maintained Schools Foundation in 1994–95; and what is the level of grant provision for 1995–96. [22456]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department paid grant of £695,000 to the Grant Maintained Schools Foundation Ltd. in 1994–95. Grant to a maximum of £815,000 is available for the current financial year.

History Curriculum

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what changes in the history curriculum of schools she plans to make to ensure that children have an understanding of the background to, and the conduct of, the second world war; and if she will make a statement. [22438]

Mr. Forth: The second world war will continue to occupy a prominent role within the national curriculum for history, as it has always done. Under the new history curriculum, which will be taught in schools from next September, all 11 to 14-year-olds in maintained schools will have to be taught about the second world war and its legacy for Britain and the world. The choice of teaching materials is a matter for individual schools and teachers.

Proposed Primary School, Liverpool

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education when she expects to announce a decision on the proposal to build a Christian primary school in Croxteth, Liverpool; and if she will make a statement. [22441]

Mr. Robin Squire: My right hon. Friend hopes to make a decision on these proposals shortly.

Independent Schools

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many non-United Kingdom nationals were enrolled in independent schools in Britain (a) in total and (b) as a percentage of the independent school population (i) in 1980 and (ii) currently. [2453]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department does not collect details of the nationality of pupils enrolled in independent schools. The annual census carried out by the independent schools information service, published on 25 April, found that nearly 6,800 foreign pupils enrolled last year in United Kingdom independent boarding schools.

Funding Agency for Schools

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the cost of running the Funding Agency for Schools in 1994–95; and what is the level of provision for 1995–96. [22454]

Mr. Robin Squire: Total grant paid to the agency in the financial year 1994–95 for its running costs—revenue and capital expenditure—was £10.927 million. Estimates provision for 1995–96 is £11.5 million.

Expenditure, Cumbria

Dr. John Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what assessment she has made of the effect on education in west Cumbria of the recent reductions in the education budget. [22741]

Mr. Robin Squire: It is for Cumbria county council to determine how much of its overall budget is allocated to education and how much to other services.

Schools, Ealing

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how much is currently spent per pupil in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools in Ealing by (i) school governors under delegated local management of schools budgets and by (ii) the Ealing education committee in terms of its own administrative organisations; and if she will make a statement. [22207]

Mr. Robin Squire: The figures are derived from the budget statement for 1995–96 published by the Ealing LEA under section 42 of the Education Reform Act 1988, in respect of expenditure on schools covered by its scheme for the local management of schools. The figures in the right-hand column relate to planned expenditure by the LEA under the head "management and administration".

£ per pupil

| Sector | Allocated to schools | Management and Administration |
|---|---|---|
| Primary | 1,729.63 | 56.39 |
| Secondary | 2,208.21 | 56.19 |

DEFENCE

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunities matters. [21537]

Mr. Soames: A statement about progress on equal opportunities for my Department's civilian staff and Service personnel was published in the Ministry of Defence 1995 departmental report, Cm 2801, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress he hopes to achieve in his Department over the next three months to push forward the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the fourth UN conference on women; and if he will agree to incorporate a section on equal opportunities in his Department's annual report. [21539]

Mr. Soames: The Government are committed to the principles set out in the regional platform for action agreed at the preparatory conference in Vienna for the fourth UN world conference on women. Where appropriate, my Department has taken these forward through a wide range of programmes and initiatives related to service and civilian employees, and will continue to do so. A section on progress made on equal opportunities matters in my Department is incorporated annually in the departmental report, a copy of which is placed in the Library of the House.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department. [21538]

Mr. Soames: My Department's policy for both civilian and service personnel, in line with guidance issued in 1992 by the ministerial group on women's issues, is that policy proposals should ensure that unlawful or unjustifiable sex or race discrimination does not occur.

For civilian personnel, similar principles apply in respect of people with disabilities. This scrutiny is part of a continuous and routine process, as part of policy advice to Ministers and is included in my Department's policy on equal opportunities.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which Minister in his Department has responsibility for equal opportunities issues. [21536]

Mr. Soames: Responsibility for these issues is shared between myself and my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence.

Naval Gunfire

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many incidents in the last 10 years in training exercises on the south coast there have been of naval gunfire landing where it was not supposed to. [21444]

Mr. Soames: There have been no recorded incidents in the period in question.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimated extra cost of using helicopters for the spotters, at the proposed naval firing range at Dodman point, Cornwall, per annum. [22059]

Mr. Soames: Observation from helicopters during naval gunfire support would mostly be undertaken by the firing ship's own helicopter, in a dual role of range safety and fall of shot observation. There would, therefore, be no additional cost. However, for those Royal Navy ships which do not have their own helicopter, which we estimate to be approximately one fifth of the 70 or so firing serials each year, the cost to the Royal Navy would be in the region of £3,000 per two-hour serial. This would, however, be substantially less than the cost of continuing NGS training at Lulworth cove.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department will review the effectiveness and cost of the use of Dodman point for the proposed naval firing range after it has come into use. [22061]

Mr. Soames: Yes. The efficacy and cost-effectiveness of all aspects of naval training are kept under constant review.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department have assessed which other areas along the coast other than Dodman point which might be suitable for the proposed naval firing range. [22060]

Mr. Soames: The whole of the south coast area, from Start point to the Lizard, was considered in broad terms, and within this a number of specific sites were considered in details. Of these, only the site off Dodman point met the specific criteria required for naval gunfire support training. The viability of continuing training at Lulworth was also considered carefully, but would prove too costly in terms of both fuel consumption and manpower availability.

Low Flying

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many interviews of people complaining of low flying have been conducted by the RAF police in the latest 12-month period for which figures are available. [21985]

Mr. Soames: Of the RAF police investigations into military aircraft activity initiated in 1994, 339 will have involved interviews with at least one complainant, and in some cases more than one. Statistics are not kept in such a way as to identify the precise number of complainants interviewed.

Portland Naval Base

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the criteria used for determining the successful bid in relation to the role of the Portland naval base; and if he will make a statement. [22547]

Mr. Soames: The criteria used to select the successful purchaser for Portland naval base were complex. A number of bids were shortlisted and then evaluated by the marketing agents, specialist advisors and officials. There was wide consultation at local level with various agencies including the borough and county councils, South Dorset Economic Partnership and the trade unions at the naval base.

The party finally selected was the one with the best proven track record to date, with viable commercial proposals that had financial backing, the best prospect of providing jobs and the best chance of obtaining planning permission for the proposed uses. The purchaser, Portland Port Ltd., has a strong management team and the resources to call on several marine oriented companies in the UK elsewhere. I believe that the company offers the best long-term solution for local people and reuse of the naval base.

Rosyth

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the nature of the contract on subcontract work undertaken at Rosyth by (a) KS Asbestos Removal Ltd. and (b) a company or partnership connected to Brooks; and what assessment he has made as to whether (i) the contract was obtained by means of a competitive tender, (ii) the lowest tenderer obtained the work, (iii) the work was actually carried out and completed satisfactorily and (iv) the company or its directors are eligible to obtain future work. [21572]

Mr. Freeman: Inquiries have failed to identify any ship work or works services contracts or payments to either KS Asbestos Removal Ltd. or Brooks Ltd. for work at Rosyth. Additional details will be required to enable further investigation.

Arms Export

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) under which military list specifications, as specified in group 1 of part III of schedule 1 to SI 1992 No. 3092 goods for export to (a) Taiwan, (b) Turkey, (c) the United States of America and (d) Yugoslavia were refused export licences in 1993; [20572]

(2) under which military list specifications, as specified in group 1 of part III of schedule 1 to SI 1992 No. 3092 goods for export to (a) India, (b) Iran, (c) Israel, (d) South Korea, (e) Libya, (f) Mozambique, (g) Oman, (h) Pakistan, (i) South Africa, (j) Sierra

Leone, (k) Singapore (l) Slovenia and (m) Syria were refused export licences in 1993. [20573]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I have been asked to reply.

The military list classifications of the goods in question are set out.

| | ML classification |
|---|---|
| India | 5, 6, 15 |
| Iran | 4, 8, 9, 10, 11, 15, 24 |
| Israel | 1, 3, 4, 6, 10, 11, 15, 16, 18 |
| Korea (South) | 11 |
| Libya | 3 |
| Mozambique | 15 |
| Oman | 1 |
| Pakistan | 4, 15 |
| Sierra Leone | 1 |
| Singapore | 15 |
| Slovenia | 11 |
| South Africa | 10, 11, 16, 17 |
| Syria | 4, 7 |
| Taiwan | 4, 5, 7, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15 |
| Turkey | 4 |
| USA | 11 |
| Yugoslavia | 17 |

VE Day Commemoration

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence who will be representing the parts of the former Soviet Union and the former Yugoslavia at Her Majesty's Government's official celebrations of the 50th anniversary of VE day. [22629]

Mr. Goodlad: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave my right hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) on 28 April 1995, Official Report, columns 743–45.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if cases which have had an award provisionally decided under the new tariff-based criminal injuries compensation scheme will now be automatically reviewed under the old scheme and have their appropriate level of compensation determined under the old scheme; [21728]

(2) if cases rejected under the eligibility rules for the criminal injuries compensation tariff scheme will be reassessed following the recent court decision as if they had been submitted under the old criminal injuries compensation scheme; and if any applicant who would have been rejected under the tariff scheme will be approached directly by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority to seek from them any additional information required to determine eligibility under the old scheme. [21727]

Mr. Maclean:: Yes.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board will notify applicants of any additional information required if they are to have their applications determined under the old scheme rather than the tariff scheme; [21725]

(2) in what circumstances applicants have to make a new application for a review of the award granted under the tariff scheme. [21729]

Mr. Maclean: I understand that the board has already written to every applicant or representative to tell them that their cases will now be decided under the terms of the old, 1990 scheme. The letters made it clear that where further information was required by the board for such assessment, it would be in touch with the addressees again. I further understand any such approaches will be made as soon as possible.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if applications now to be submitted to the CICA/CICB should be submitted using the old application form or the new application form based upon the tariff scheme. [21721]

Mr. Maclean: I understand from the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board that new applications should be completed on the 1990 scheme forms. Extra stocks of these have been ordered for distribution around the usual networks. Some supplementary application forms are also being printed, in order to enable those who have already completed a tariff scheme application to provide all the additional information required for assessment under the 1990 scheme.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to introduce new legislation to deal with criminal injuries compensation; and to what extent recipients of current criminal injuries compensation are safeguard against retrospective elements in future legislation abating their awards. [21723]

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche) on 26 April, column 561.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if cases rejected as out of time under the new criminal injuries compensation tariff scheme but which would have been in time under the old criminal injuries compensation scheme will now be re-opened; and if it will be necessary for applicants rejected under the new time limit on the tariff scheme to resubmit their applications. [21726]

Mr. Maclean: I understand that the chairman of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board will be considering personally all "out of time" applications rejected under the former tariff scheme. It will not be necessary for applications to be re-submitted, and the chairman's decisions will be notified to applicants as soon as practicable.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will now reinstate CICB members who were given notice of termination to deal with reassessments of cases which have now become necessary following the court decision on the tariff-based criminal injuries compensation scheme; and what assessment he has made of the impact of staffing levels on the time taken to determine applications. [21722]

Mr. Maclean: All board members who had not already stated a wish to stand down had already been offered reappointment to 31 March 1996, before the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the House of Lords. Invitations to join the board had also been extended to potential new members to keep the board at or near full strength. Present plans envisage an increase in support staff from 450 to 480 in the current financial year, but the position will be kept under review.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases submitted under the criminal injuries compensation tariff scheme have not yet been decided; and if they will be decided under the pre-tariff scheme or under the tariff scheme. [21724]

Mr. Maclean: Some 72,000 applications were received under the tariff scheme. They will all be assessed or reassessed under the reinstated, 1990, scheme.

Mr. Mike O' Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in cases where criminal injuries compensation would have been greater under the new scheme than under the old scheme, if applicants will receive less than the Home Secretary and the CICA have provisionally awarded to those applicants; and how many people are affected in each category of compensation. [21720]

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. and learned Friend has no direct responsibility for the assessment or award of compensation to individual applicants under the criminal injuries scheme.

Where any award reassessed under the 1990 scheme is lower than the tariff award, the latter will stand. It will not be known how many people fall into that category until all the tariff awards have been reassessed.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what proportion of (a) nurses, (b) firefighters, (c) shopworkers and (d) police officers awarded compensation under the criminal injuries compensation scheme were women; [22308]

(2) how many shopworkers (a) in London and (b) in England and Wales have been awarded criminal injuries compensation awards under the new tariff scheme; how many of those awards were less than they would have received under the old scheme; and what was the average amount by which each claimant received a reduced amount. [22309]

Mr. Maclean: Information about awards made to occupational groups under the 1990 scheme is not recorded centrally. It is not therefore possible to make the comparisons required. For awards made under the tariff scheme the proportion of awards made to women was as follows:

| | Per cent. |
|---|---|
| Medical personnel | 67 |
| Firefighter | 0 |
| Police | 8 |

The term "medical personnel" includes doctors and nursing grades.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, how many (a) firefighters, (b) police officers and (c) nurses (i) in London and (ii) in England and Wales were awarded criminal injuries compensation under the tariff scheme. [22310]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 3 May 1995]: The following tariff awards have been made:

| Occupational group | London | England and Wales (including London) |
|---|---|---|
| Police | 30 | 182 |
| Firefighter | 1 | 10 |
| Medical personnel | 9 | 51 |

The term medical personnel includes doctors and nursing grades. No further breakdown is readily available.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide a breakdown by gender of those awarded criminal injuries compensation under the tariff scheme. [22307]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 3 May 1995]: Some 3,332 awards have been made to male victims and 1,774 to female victims. Further awards may be made since all offers of award outstanding at the date of the tariff scheme's withdrawal on 5 April will be honoured if the offers are accepted by claimants. The applications will then be reassessed by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board under the reinstated, 1990, scheme in the usual way.

International Wildlife Crime

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will describe the areas of work currently being undertaken by the Interpol sub-group of wildlife crime. [21832]

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on the 29 March at column 674.

Greater Manchester Police

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will institute an inquiry into the Greater Manchester police in respect of the charity dinner held on 25 April; and if he will make a statement. [21810]

Mr. Maclean: I believe that the event to which the hon. Member refers took place on 10 March. This is a matter for the chief constable of Greater Manchester.

Firearms

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are his policies for (a) limiting the ease of use of stolen shotguns and (b) requiring them to be fitted with barrel locks when being stored. [22098]

Mr. Maclean: The primary purpose of the existing controls on firearms and shotguns is public safety. The firearms rules 1989 require all shotgun certificate holders to store their guns securely so as to prevent, as far as is reasonably practicable, unauthorised access and to take all reasonable precautions to prevent theft during transit. Appropriate security arrangements will depend upon the individual circumstances in each case. Home Office guidance on security suggests that barrel blocks may provide extra security but should never be used instead of a locked gun cabinet or other similarly secure container. The Firearms Consultative Committee, the independent body which advises my right hon. and learned Friend on firearms matters, recommended in its fourth annual report, 1992–93 that barrel block devices should not be made mandatory and there are no plans to do so.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many shotguns have been stolen from authorised firearm keepers in each of the last five years. [22097]

Mr. Maclean: The available information relates to the number of incidents in which shotguns were stolen in England and Wales. The following table gives the figures for the years 1989–1993.

Notifiable offences of burglary or theft recorded by the police in which shotguns were reported to have been stolen

|---|---|
| 1989 | 495 |
| 1990 | 479 |
| 1991 | 574 |
| 1992 | 570 |
| 1993 | 594 |

Telephones

Sir Terence Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what powers exist to prosecute those who clone portable telephones and use the numbers belonging to others to make telephone calls; and if he will make a statement. [21806]

Mr. Maclean: Under section 42 of the Telecommunications Act 1984, it is an offence to use a cloned portable telephone. If it can be shown that the telephone was stolen from its owner it may be possible, subject to the evidence, to prosecute the user for handling stolen goods contrary to section 22 of the Theft Act 1968. There is no legislation which prohibits the actual cloning of a portable telephone.

Electoral Voting

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what plans the Government have to review the format of the absent voter forms to prevent fraud by misappropriation of proxy votes; what systems are in place to monitor the number of people claiming proxy votes in elections; and if he will make a statement; [22289]

(2) what steps are being taken to monitor the exercising of proxy votes in the local government elections; [22288]

(3) if he will consider the collection of statistics on the use of proxy votes. [22286]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Absent voting application forms have been amended to ensure that electors indicate clearly whether they are applying to vote by post or proxy, and to ensure that all appointments of a proxy are signed by the elector. These amendments help to prevent fraud. The number of proxies appointed to vote was collated for the first time at the 1994 European parliamentary elections and similar statistics will be collated at the next general election. Figures relating to proxy voting at local government elections are not collected centrally.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans the Government have to increase the penalties for electoral fraud where the offence involves the deprivation of a vulnerable elector of his or her vote. [22290]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: None.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will consider the use in elections of travelling ballot boxes which can be taken to hospitals and residential homes where there are more than 10 residents. [22287]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: There are no plans to do so.

Police Powers

Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy that the power to require the drivers of moving vehicles to stop should be confined to the police. [22339]

Mr. Maclean: The Government have no plans to change the law in this regard.

Wandsworth Prison

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement as to the procedures that are now followed at Wandsworth prison in respect of inmates suspected of being a possible suicide risk. [22375]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 4 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the procedures that are now being followed at Wandsworth prison for any inmates suspected of being a possible suicide risk.

Mr. Butler, the Director of Personnel, wrote to you on 21 March in my absence, outlining the existing procedures at Wandsworth prison in respect of an inmate regarded as a possible suicide risk. The procedures which are followed at Wandsworth have not altered since Mr. Butler's letter.

Live Animal Exports Protests (Costs)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what are the estimated additional (a) daily costs and (b) total costs to date incurred by the Essex police as a consequence of the live animal exports protests at Brightlingsea; and if he will make a statement; [22195]

(2) if he will reimburse wholly or in part the additional costs incurred by the Essex police as a consequence of the live animal exports protests at Brightlingsea; and if he will make a statement. [22196]

Mr. Maclean: I understand from the chief constable that the average additional daily cost for the period to 15 April is estimated to be £19,580. The estimated total additional cost for the same period is £1,840,514.

The Home Office will reimburse 51 per cent. of the police expenditure incurred at Brightlingsea prior to 1 April 1995. After that date police grant is paid as a cash-limited sum and contributes to the cost of all police operations.

Police (Firearms Deaths and Injuries)

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many police officers have been (a) injured and (b) killed by firearms in (i) the Metropolitan police area and (ii) England and Wales in each of the last 10 years; [21893]

(2) how many working hours were lost by police officers in (a) London and (b) England and Wales arising from injuries by firearms in each of the last 10 years. [21897]

Mr. Maclean: The following table gives the information available to me which relates to the years 1988 to 1993. Information for earlier years is not available. Full information for 1994 is not yet available, but no police officer was killed by a firearm in that year.

Notifiable offences recorded by the police in which a police officer on duty was killed or injured by a firearm in England and Wales

| | Metropolitan police | | England and Wales | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | Injured | Killed | Injured | Killed |
| 1988 | 4 | — | 9 | 2 |
| 1989 | 8 | — | 10 | 1 |
| 1990 | 1 | 1 | 4 | 1 |
| 1991 | 4 | — | 7 | — |
| 1992 | 3 | — | 9 | [1] |
| 1993 | 1 | 1 | 9 | 1 |

[1] Special constable.

The information requested on the number of working hours which were lost through injuries caused by firearms is not held centrally.

Mr. Raghbir Singh Johal

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 1 May, Official Report, column 95. regarding correspondence over Mr. Raghbir Singh Johal, what is the average time taken for replies to be sent to members of the public over this case. [22597]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Fifteen working days.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if all information requested by the solicitors representing Mr. Raghbir Singh Johal has been supplied by his Department. [22542]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Mr. Singh's solicitors have been provided with all the information requested, as far as is consistent with the interests of national security.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what requests he has had to meet representatives of the Sikh community over the case of Mr. Raghbir Singh Johal; and what reply he has made. [22543]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: There have been two requests. No reply has yet been given.

Elections (EU Voters)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what representations he has received about the requirement, under the arrangements outlined in the circular RPA 394, for EU citizens resident in the United Kingdom to apply if they wish to register as European parliamentary electors; what arrangements apply to their registration in respect of local government elections; and if he will make a statement; [22632]

(2) when he proposes to bring forward legislation enabling arrangements to be made allowing European Union citizens resident in the United Kingdom to be included as local government electors on the register coming into force in February 1996; what is the latest estimate of the numbers of such EU citizens who may be included on the register throughout the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [22587]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: The treaty of European Union gave all nationals of the Union resident in a member state of which they are not nationals the right to vote and stand as a candidate in European parliamentary and local government elections. European citizens were eligible to vote and to stand as candidates in the European Parliament elections last year.

No formal representations have been received on circular RPA 394 on EU citizens resident in the UK wishing to register as electors.

Legislation to provide for registration of Union citizens as electors in future local elections will be presented to Parliament as parliamentary time allows. There are about 400,000 eligible EU citizens in the UK.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many EU citizens, resident in the United Kingdom, included on the register of those eligible to vote in the local elections on 4 May, were declared ineligible to vote before polling day. [22586]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: EU citizens, other than British and Irish citizens, were not eligible to vote in the elections on 4 May.

War Crimes Unit

Mr. Cyril Townsend: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers by rank, have been working in the war crimes unit in New Scotland yard, since 31 March; and what is the expected cost of the maintenance of this unit. [22595]

Mr. Maclean: Six police officers have been working in the war crimes unit since 31 March: two detective inspectors, one detective sergeant and three detective constables. The cost to the Metropolitan police of running this unit is approximately £77,000 per month.

North Tyneside Council (Criminal Allegations)

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, how many inquiries the police have conducted into the activities of organised criminals in connection with the Labour party in north Tyneside within the last year; and if he will make a statement. [22631]

Mr. Maclean: Investigation into the activities of organised criminals in north Tyneside is a matter for the chief constable of Northumbria police. I am told, though, that the police are at present conducting a preliminary inquiry into certain allegations connected with the North Tyneside council.

Deportation (National Security)

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases of notice of decision to deport on grounds of national security have gone to the appeals panel in the last five years; and on what number of such cases the panel has differed from his own decision. [22541]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: The independent advisory panel has considered representations in 54 cases in the last five years, all but three at the time of the Gulf war. The panel's advice is confidential.

Safer Cities Projects, Cardiff and Rhyl

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on when the safer cities projects in Cardiff and Rhyl will be established. [23136]

Mr. Maclean: I am pleased to announce that, following a tender competition, contractors have been selected to manage the two safer cities projects which I announced on 2 December 1994.

After careful evaluation of the tenders, Crime Concern has been chosen to manage the project at Cardiff, and the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders will manage the project at Rhyl.

Both organisations have significant experience in crime prevention, project management and working with voluntary agencies. We expect preliminary work to begin shortly, and the projects will come on stream in the summer.

Endangered Bird Species (Sales)

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the Secretary of State for the Environment's answers of 3 March, Official Report, columns 757-58, and 22 March, Official Report, column 201, how many police forces monitor trade journals for sales of birds listed in the convention on international trade in endangered species. [21878]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 2 May 1995]: This is an operational matter for chief officers of police and is not recorded centrally.

Market Testing

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the cost of employing consultants in connection with market testing programmes in which his Department has been engaged since their inception. [21370]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 1 May 1995]: From 1 April 1992 and 31 march 1995, expenditure on external consultancies in respect of the "Competing for Quality" programme is estimated to have been approximately £855,000 by the Prison Service and approximately £910,000 by the rest of the Home Office.

The estimated annual savings figures so far as a result of the "Competing for Quality" programmes since April 1992 are £19 million for the Prison Service and £11 million for the rest of the Home Office.

England v. Ireland Football Match

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will arrange the inquiry reports, by (a) the Irish Football Association, (b) Judge Finlay, (c) the Irish police and (d) all other relevant reports by English and Irish authorities into public disorder at the England v. Ireland football match in Dublin in February, to be placed in the Library; if he will list the main recommendations for action contained in these reports; and if he will make a statement. [22327]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 2 May 1995]: I understand that a copy of the report "Violence at Lansdowne Road" by Mr. Justice Thomas Finlay will be available shortly in the Library. It is for the relevant Irish authorities to decide whether to make their other corresponding reports publicly available. In respect of the report of the English Football Association I refer the hon. member to my written answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 199.

Prisoners (Police Cells)

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are currently in police cells (a) in each police station in England and Wales and (b) in each division of the Metropolitan police; and how many there were in (a) and (b), (i) one year ago, (ii) five years ago, (iii) 10 years ago and (iv) 15 years ago. [21608]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 4 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the number of prisoners currently held in police cells in each police station in England and Wales; in each division of the Metropolitan Police and the number held one year aged, 5 years ago, 10 years ago and 15 years ago.

The information you requested is not recorded centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Police forces are only required to provide the Prison Service with daily returns showing the total number of prisoners being held in police cells. Over the last 18 months the use of police cells has been confined to the north of England. The information about the number of prisoners held in police cells submitted by the police forces concerned over the last 18 months is contained in the attached table.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide a breakdown of the cost of keeping a prisoner in a police cell, giving the proportion of the total spent on police officers. [21709]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 4 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the breakdown of the cost of keeping a prisoner in a police cell.

The average cost per night of keeping a prisoner in a police cell in 1994 was £250. A breakdown of this figure is given below:

| | £ |
|---|---|
| Police officer costs | 197 |
| Civilian staff costs | 8 |
| Police support costs (travelling and subsistence) | 16 |
| Prisoner support costs (food, laundry, medical) | 13 |
| Administrative costs | 12 |
| Other costs (including nominal accommodation charge and prisoners' recreation | 4 |

Closed Circuit Television

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department who took the decision that CCTV bids in (a) Folkestone and Hythe and (b) Penrith and the Borders should be successful in receiving Government funding over the challenge scheme. [22312]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 3 May 1995]: I decided on all bids under the CCTV challenge scheme on the basis of recommendations made by an assessment panel of Home Office officials and consultants seconded to the Home Office.

Road Accidents (Police Vehicles)

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many road traffic accidents involving police patrol vehicles were reported in each police force area in England and Wales for each year since 1991; and how many (a) police officers and (b) civilians sustained injuries as a result. [21029]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 3 May 1995]: The latest information which is available centrally on the total number of police vehicle accidents in 1991–93 is shown in the following table. The information on injuries relates to those where death or serious injury has arisen in the course of either police pursuits or responses to emergency calls.

Prisoners (Drug Misuse)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners received medical treatment in each of the past 10 years (a) within prisons or (b) transferred to outside hospitals for the symptoms of drug misuse. [22223]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 3 May 1995]: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Paul Flynn, dated 4 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question on how many prisoners received medical treatment in each of the past 10 years (a) within prisons or (b) transferred to outside hospitals for the symptoms of drug misuse.

The information requested is not recorded centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. All Prison Service establishments provide detoxification, education and counselling facilities to prisoners with drug misuse problems through the health care centre, probation department or community drug agencies.

As part of the new Prison Service drugs strategy, published on 25 April 1995, all prison governors are required to develop and implement local drug strategies which will form part of their contract with their area manager. The local strategies will include provision for education, treatment and throughcare for prisoners who misuse, have misused, or are at risk of misusing drugs.

This year the Prison Service will be greatly expanding the number and types of drug treatment programmes. These programmes include therapeutic communities, 3-month treatment programmes, intensive counselling and education services, detoxification units and community linked throughcare programmes. Careful monitoring and evaluation of these programmes will help to determine the development of drug treatment in other establishments.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress he hopes to achieve in his Department over the next three months to push forward the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the fourth UN conference on women; and if he will incorporate a section on equal opportunities in his Department's annual report. [21509]

Mr. Burt: The Department will reflect, in its wide range of programmes and initiatives, any final commitments on equal opportunities undertaken by the UK Government at the Vienna preparatory conference for the fourth world conference on women and elsewhere.

The Department's 1996 annual report will include appropriate reference to equal opportunities.

Income Support

Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list (a) the percentage of cases found in error and (b) the estimated financial value of the errors in respect of income support in each year since 1988–89. [21808]

Mr. Roger Evans: The administration of income support is a matter for Mr. Ian Magee, the acting chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ian Magee to Mr. George Mudie, dated 3 May 1995:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking about the accuracy of Income Support and the value of errors since 1988.

The full range of information is not available. Although the Benefits Agency has longstanding procedures to provide information about the accuracy of benefit payments, a mechanism to establish the financial value of errors identified during checks was not put in place until April 1994. This information is not yet available for the full year ending March 1995. The information given in the attached table has been obtained from National Audit Office reports.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Extract of results of National Audit Office of income support 1988–89 to 1993–94

| Year | Cases containing financial error (per cent.) | Total monetary value of errors £ million |
|---|---|---|
| 1988–89 | 13.5 | 160.0 |
| 1989–90 | 14.4 | 219.6 |
| 1990–91 | 13.6 | 344.9 |
| 1991–92 | 16.9 | 411.8 |
| 1992–93 | 16.3 | 715.9 |
| 1993–94 | 16.8 | 681.5 |

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the cost of providing income support to spouses of people whose occupational pensions are contributing to the cost of local authority residential and nursing home care. [22280]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The information is not available.

Pensions (Expatriates)

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what agreements exist for the payment of uprated UK pensions to UK expatriates resident in (a) Commonwealth, (b) EU and (c) foreign countries, what were the dates of these agreements; and if he will make a statement on the factors underlying the absence of such agreements with other countries in which numbers of UK expatriates are resident. [21784]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The information is in the table.

In order to enter into an agreement with the UK, the other country's social security scheme has to be sufficiently similar to provide reciprocity. Increasingly, there has to be sufficient movement of workers between the two countries to justify the outlay of resources to negotiate, operate and maintain the agreement. Above all, any additional benefit costs have to be affordable.

The great majority of UK pensioners overseas, over 350,000, who do not receive uprated pensions in Australia, Canada, New Zealand and South Africa. Although the UK has reciprocal agreements with Australia, Canada and New Zealand, they do not allow for pension increases to be paid. Because of the considerable costs involved, the Government have no plans to revise these three agreements, or to negotiate an agreement with South Africa or any other country, to pay uprated pensions.

| Country | Date |
|---|---|
| (a) Commonwealth | |
| Barbados[1] | 1 April 1992 |
| Bermuda | November 1969 |
| Cyprus | 18 May 1957 |

| Jamaica | 1 October 1972 |
| Jersey | 4 April 1966 |
| Malta | 29 October 1956 |
| Mauritius | November 1981 |
| (b) EU and EEA[2] | |
| Austria | 1 October 1972 |
| Finland | 1 Feburuary 1984 |

Table of countries where annual pension increases are paid and the dates on which reciprocal social security agreements came into force

| Country | Date |

| U.S.A. | September 1969 |
| Yugoslavia (including the former Republics) | 1 September 1958 |

[1] This agreement fulfils a commitment given to the Government of Barbados in 1974.

[2] Annual pension increases must be paid to British citizens and other nationals of the European Union and the European Economic Area states living in the EU and EEA under the EC regulations on social security for migrant workers—regulation 1408/71. These regulations became binding on the Uk on 1 April 1973 and were extended to the EEA on 1 January 1994. The regulations largely supersede pre-existing reciprocal agreements with those countries. However, some such agreements remain relevant in respect of UK pensioners who are nationals of countries outside the EU and EEA, including the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands. Those agreements only are listed under "EU and EEA".

Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what consideration he has given to appointing a representative of pensioners, as stipulated in the Pensions Bill; [21834]

(2) what assessment he has made of the adequacy of his powers to ensure that interested parties are represented in the new authority stipulated in the Pensions Bill [Lords]. [21835]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This answer is based upon the assumption that both these questions relate to the composition of the board of the new Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority. There is no stipulation in the Pensions Bill that a representative of pensioners should be appointed to the board. The membership of the board will be drawn from a wide range of interests, following the model adopted for the Occupational Pensions Board which has long enjoyed a reputation for integrity and impartiality.

Housing Benefit

Sir Fergus Montgomery: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will exclude specialist housing for vulnerable people run by housing associations from comparison with average accommodation when he brings about changes to the housing benefit relations in October 1995. [22265]

Mr. Roger Evans: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey) that on 2 May, Official Report, column 165.

Weekly Incomes

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 4 April, Official Report, column 1074, on weekly income, to which tax year the table refers. [22659]

Mr. Burt: Pursuant to the reply by the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Evans), of 4 April, Official Report, columns 1074–76, the table provided shows the tax and benefits position for 1994–95. The original question did not specify the year for which information was required. The reply was therefore provided for the latest year for which all the necessary information was available.

Water Charges

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has made to compensate benefit recipients for increases in water bills in excess of the rate of inflation. [22546]

Mr. Burt: Variations in the cost of water are reflected in the indices used to uprate benefits.

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the proportion of a singe person's income support spent on water rates. [22545]

Mr. Burt: The Department does not hold such information. Income support recipients may manage their benefit according to their individual preferences.

War Widows

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his oral statement of 24 April, Official Report, column 532, if he will give full details of the calculations made to arrive at his estimate of £40 million in a full year as the costs of the Lords amendment to the Pensions Bill restoring war widows pensions to war widows who were widowed a second time, divorced or legally separated including, with particular reference to (i) the gross costs of this change, (ii) the amount of money saved by consequential non-payment of old age pensions, (iii) the amount of money saved by consequential non-payment of other benefits, listed by benefit and (iv) all assumptions about the net savings made as a result of war widows pension not being disregarded for the purpose of other benefits, including the number of local authorities and the number of war widow pensioners in each authority where minimum or only partial disregard is given. [22660]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The available information is in the following table:

| | £ million |
|---|---|
| Gross Cost | 120 |
| Retirement pension/widow's benefit offset | 50 |
| Income support offset | 10 |
| Housing benefit offset | 20 |
| Council tax benefit offset | 5 |
| Total income-related benefit offset | 30 |
| Net cost | 40 |

Notes:

1. Figures are based on restoring war widows pension to an estimated 16,500 former war widows. It is estimated that about 16,500 might gain; 15,000 of whom are estimated to have been widowed again, and 1,500 divorced or legally separated.
2. Figures are provided at 1995–96 prices; rounded to the nearest £5 million, but are estimates rather than being accurate to that degree.
3. Gross figures are based on an average WWP of £140 a week.
4. The estimate assumes that around 40 per cent. of the gross cost of restoring WWP would be offset through consequential non-payment of retirement pension widows benefits, and that around a further 25 per cent. would be offset through reductions in income related benefit expenditure. The income support offset ratio is estimated to be around 10 per cent.; the housing benefit offset at around 15 per cent.; and the council tax benefit offset at around 5 per cent.—rounded to the nearest 5 percentage points, but are estimates rather than being accurate to that degree. Figures may not sum due to rounding.
5. These offset ratios are based on information from the 1991–92 family expenditure surveys, uprated to 1995–96 prices. Due to the uncertainties contained in these estimates, they should be treated as indicating broad orders of magnitude only.
6. No assumptions were made about the war widows pension not being fully disregarded for housing benefit and council tax benefit. Had the law provided for such a disregard, the estimated cost of the Lords amendment to the Pensions Bill would have been greater.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sheep Dip

18. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many claims his Department has received for compensation arising from the use of organophosphorous sheep dip. [20954]

Mrs. Browning: None. Any such claims would be entirely a matter for the individual and the company concerned.

Live Animal Exports

19. Mr. Dowd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to obtain further legal advice with regard to taking action on the export of live animals from the United Kingdom. [20955]

Mrs. Browning: We have already taken extensive legal advice about the export of live animals. We are considering the new RSPCA legal opinion carefully alongside that advice.

British Veal

21. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he is taking to increase consumption of British-produced food, with particular reference to veal. [20957]

Mrs. Browning: Our marketing grants are helping UK suppliers to meet the needs of customers on both the domestic and export markets. In addition, MAFF Ministers initiated a catering project towards the end of 1993 to provide special encouragement in this sector.

As regards veal in particular, I opened a seminar on 24 February in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which brought together all those with an interest in welfare friendly veal. The Ministry will be funding a demonstration project into veal production, to show the best practices for producing veal under welfare-friendly systems, and to provide economic data.

Tobacco Regime

22. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the reform of the common agricultural policy tobacco regime. [20958]

Mr. Waldegrave: The tobacco regime reforms agreed in 1992 and applicable from the 1993 harvest, were a step in the right direction, in reducing the quantities of tobacco eligible for support, removing the facilities for intervention and export refunds in all but exceptional circumstances and switching production to lower tar, more marketable varieties. However, we do not believe that tobacco production should be subsidised or supported at all and will continue to take every opportunity to curb the regime.

Agri-environment Schemes

23. Sir Kenneth Carlisle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last visited the agri-environment schemes at the Halvergate marshes. [20959]

Mr. Waldegrave: I visited the Halvergate marshes within the broads environmentally sensitive area on 5 April this year.

Quarantine Regulations

24. Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to change the quarantine regulations concerning the entry of animals into the United Kingdom. [20960]

Mrs. Browning: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-mare (Sir J. Wiggin) on 25 January 1995, Official Report, column 216.

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures will be taken to inspect Spanish fishing boats entering the Irish box area for the first time next year. [20937]

Mr. Jack: Spanish vessels operating in the UK's section of the Irish box will be liable to fair and vigorous inspection by the Royal Navy as are all other fishing vessels found within British fishery limits. The resources necessary to ensure effective enforcement will be reviewed in the light of the final agreement on the detailed rules for this fishery.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the estimated cost to date to his Department of the appeal to the European Court regarding the legitimacy of the days at sea restrictions contained in the Sea Fish (Conservation) Act 1992. [20956]

Mr. Jack: The legal proceedings in question were initiated by the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations, not the Government. Liability for costs will depend on the outcome of the case. It is not therefore possible to give meaningful figures for the cost to MAFF of defending this action until final judgment.

Dental Health Warnings

Dr. Moonie: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to impose dental health warnings on drinks with a high sugar content. [20936]

Mrs. Browning: I refer the hon. Member to the oral answer given today to the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell).

Export Opportunities

Mr. Michael Spicer: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how he intends to develop export opportunities for the United Kingdom's food and drink industry. [20951]

Mr. Jack: The marketing development scheme introduced last June exists specifically to encourage industry to improve its marketing and export performance. We are also working closely with food export firms and Food From Britain on a plan for vigorous promotion of British food and drink over the next three years. For example, at the international food and drink exhibition in London last week, all the Ministers in this Department demonstrated their full support for British food companies aiming at international markets. We shall continue this support at every opportunity.

Biodiesel Production

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has on the present biodiesel production in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) other EU nations and (c) the USA. [21867]

Mr. Jack: The UK biodiesel industry is at an early stage and there is currently no commercial production of biodiesel in the UK. However, a proportion of oilseeds grown for industrial use on set-aside land in the UK is exported for biodiesel production elsewhere in the European Community.

No official information is available on biodiesel production in other member states or the USA.

Animal Diseases

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cases of Epizootic Lymphangitis occurred in each year since 1985. [22180]

Mrs. Browning: The last case of Epizootic Lymphangitis recorded in Great Britain was in 1906.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cases of paramyxovirus occurred in each year since 1985. [22171]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The number of confirmed outbreaks of paramyxovirus reported in England for the years in question is:

1985: 298
1986: 247
1987: 227
1988: 199
1989: 129
1990: 252
1991: 86
1992: 123
1993: 76
1994: 29

British Beef

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many beef producers in each country have suffered losses as a result of the failure of British Beef. [22607]

Mr. Jack: The information requested is not held by this Department.

Biocontrol Agents

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his latest evaluation of the research into the use of carnivorous snails and slugs to reduce the use of poisons in gastropod control. [22451]

Mrs. Browning: MAFF does not fund research into the use of carnivorous slugs and snails to control gastropods since the prevailing scientific view is that they are unlikely to offer any particular advantages as biocontrol agents except in a limited number of very specific control situations. MAFF is aware of work with carnivorous snails in France to control the snail vector of the liver fluke parasite which can be a problem in commercial watercress beds and on the use of carnivorous snails in Belgium for the control of garden slugs. However, other methods of biocontrol such as the use of nematodes, non-toxic chemical repellents and predatory beetles are considered to offer a greater potential for reducing the use of "poisons" in a wider range of pest control situations. Work on a number of these is supported by MAFF.

As biocontrol agents, carnivorous slugs and snails have a poor record and considerable care needs to be taken to ensure that non-target species will not be predated, particularly if non-indigenous species of carnivorous snails are to be used. The most notable situation in which a carnivorous snail was used to control a gastropod pest proved not only unsuccessful but highly ecologically damaging to a number of indigenous non-pest snail species. Carnivorous snails from Florida were used in an attempt to control the giant African land snail, which had become a pest on a number of Pacific islands. Unfortunately, the carnivorous snails ignored the giant land snails and found the indigenous snail population more to their taste.

Animal Health and Veterinary Group

Mr. French: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what conclusions he has drawn from the responses to his consultation document on the review of his Ministry's animal health and veterinary group, and if he will make a statement. [23231]

Mr. Waldegrave: In a written reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mr. Booth) on 24 October last, I announced the issue of a consultation document setting out the initial conclusions which I had reached in consultation with my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales on the review of the Ministry's animal health and veterinary group.

I am grateful to the many individuals and organisations who responded to the consultation document. My right hon. Friends and I have taken into account the views expressed in reaching the following decisions.

I intend actively to pursue consultations with the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons and other interested bodies on my proposal to make an Order under the Veterinary Surgeons Act 1966 to permit tuberculin testing to be carried out by suitably qualified lay personnel working under veterinary direction. The use to be made of such a facility will be a matter for further discussion with interested organisations.

I have considered carefully the future of the voluntary livestock health schemes in the light of the comments received. I now intend the Ministry to retain responsibility for the pig health scheme, the deer health scheme, and the poultry health scheme. Fees will need to be increased as necessary to meet the full costs of the schemes, but in view of the current position of the pig industry in this country I will forgo any increase in fees in that sector over the next three years.

A number of industry organisations expressed an interest in taking over the sheep and goat health scheme and I intend to pursue discussions with them with a view to implementing a smooth handover of this scheme, with the exception of the scrapie-free category which meets the export needs for breeding animals and will be retained by the Ministry along with the existing scrapie export register.

Similarly, the EBL-free category of the cattle health scheme will be retained by the Ministry, pending achievement of national EBL-free status. But discussions will be held with industry groups who have expressed an interest in taking over the other elements of the scheme.

As regards the Ministry's functions for animal welfare, I intend to proceed with my proposal. The number of visits to farms will continue at the same level but should concentrate where there is some reason to believe problems may be found. This should prove more effective than the current system of random visits.

As regards the organisational structure for this area of the Ministry, I recently announced the merger of the veterinary investigation service in England and Wales with the Central Veterinary Laboratory in an enlarged executive agency of the Ministry with effect from 1 October 1995. The agency will be responsible for the continuation in the public sector of the very important disease surveillance work carried out by the VI centres. Diagnostic services will continue to be made available to private veterinary practitioners. While it will be the responsibility of the chief executive, Dr. T. W. Little, to meet demanding targets for the efficient management of the agency, any reduction in the external availability of diagnostic services would be a matter for ministerial consideration.

Following a detailed study of the regional and divisional management structure of the veterinary field service, we intend to streamline this structure by moving from five to three regions and from 28 to 15 divisions in England, from two regions to one, and from seven to five divisions in Scotland, and by retaining one region and moving from four to three divisions in Wales. Although this will involve a concentration of administrative staff, the number of front-line veterinary staff will be maintained and will for the most part continue to be located in their existing offices. The restructuring should be mainly concluded by 1 April 1996. Consequential changes are proposed to the pay and grading of veterinary officers and their divisional heads, reflecting revised levels of responsibility and current circumstances of veterinary recruitment and retention.

Finally, I would like to record my appreciation of the loyalty and commitment shown by Ministry staff affected by the uncertainty necessarily caused by this protracted review. I believe that these decisions, once carried through, will provide a sound basis for continued effective and efficient implementation of the Government's animal health had welfare programme.

Meat and Hygiene Regulations

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many veterinary surgeons are employed in the United Kingdom from (a) Spain and (b) other EEC countries to advise on and enforce the Meat and Hygiene Regulations and to supervise at abattoirs; [22187]

(2) how many British veterinary surgeon are employed in other EEC countries to advise on and enforce the Meat and Hygiene Regulations and to supervise at abattoirs. [22158]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 2 May 1995]: Records are not held centrally of the nationality or country of origin of all the veterinary surgeons employed in the UK at meat premises. However, in Great Britain it is known that the Meat Hygiene Service directly employs two veterinary surgeons with German nationality who transferred to MHS when it took over responsibility for this work from local authorities on 1 April. The MHS also contracts with private veterinary practices for the provision of veterinary supervision at meat premises. As was the case when local authorities were responsible for this work, it is known that a small number of these veterinary practices employ a few veterinary surgeons who are not of British nationality.

We have no information about the numbers of British veterinary surgeons employed in other EEC countries.

Lawley's Mink Farm (Inspections)

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many inspections of Lawley's mink farm, Brooksbank avenue, Scholemoor, Bradford, have been undertaken by the State Veterinary Service since 21 October 1994. [21169]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The premises were visited by the State Veterinary Service on 16 November 1994, when no mink or Arctic fox were found there.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much was spent on official hospitality by his Department in 1994–95. [21208]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Some £63,684.81, provisional figure, was spent on official hospitality by the Department, excluding its agencies, during the financial year 1994–95.

The principal items of expenditure included hospitality:

to overseas officials and other visitors including, for example, visitors from EC organisations and from other member states;

to industry representatives, trade associations and professional bodies;

in the course of work being undertaken for the Department by individuals in an advisory capacity; at agricultural and trade shows.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proportion of expenditure in the last financial year has taken place in each month in each Northern Ireland Department; what percentage variations occur between months; and what is Her Majesty's Government's policy in relation to surges in expenditure so as to avoid departmental underspends at the end of the financial year. [21787]

Sir John Wheeler: The information requested is given in the following tables and excludes the following departmental expenditure.

Education—Teachers superannuation expenditure.

Economic Development—Privatisation of the electricity supply industry in Northern Ireland. A total of £190,189,000 was received during the year from the second payment in respect of the sales of shares. This sum less expenses of £3,444,000 was paid over to the Uk Consolidated Fund.

Finance and Personnel—£6 million payment made in March 1995 in respect of advance funding of early departure costs.

Departments should keep within annual budgets and decisions on spending should have regard to achieving the best possible value for money. Departments may carry forward into the following financial year running costs and capital underspends under the end of year flexibility schemes.

Advice Services

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how the Department of Health and Social Services will apply the policy of targeting social needs to advice services; [22103]

(2) what is the Department of Health and Social Services strategy in terms of funding advice services in areas of greatest need. [22104]

Mr. Moss: From 1 April 1995, new funding arrangements have been introduced for independent advice centres in Northern Ireland. The new arrangements will ensure that resources are targeted on areas of greatest need by taking account of the extent of social need in each area on the basis of objective indicators of deprivation. Additional resources are being made available by the Department of Health and Social Services to raise the grant available to district councils for their support of advice services from £260,000 in 1994–95 to £377,000 in 1995–96.

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current level of Government funding of advice services by (a) central Government and (b) local government. [22101]

Mr. Moss: The level of funding of advice services in Northern Ireland in 1993–94, the latest year for which information is available, is as follows:

| | £ |
|---|---|
| (a) central Government | 1,466,190 |
| (b) local government | 281,731 |

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will estimate the amount of increased income and increased benefit take-up generated on behalf of clients by independent advice agencies in (a) Belfast and (b) Northern Ireland; and what impact this has had on the local economy in (a) Belfast and (b) Northern Ireland. [22106]

Mr. Moss: The information required to carry out such estimates is not available.

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the Department of Health and Social Services' policy in terms of funding advice services in the areas of greatest need covering the making Belfast work area. [22105]

Mr. Moss: The Department's policy in this area is the same as applies throughout Northern Ireland. That is to ensure that resources are targeted to take account of the extent of social need in each area on the basis of objective indicators of deprivation. Under the Making Belfast Work initiative, additional funding has been made available to support the work of advice services in the greater Belfast area. In 1994–95 this amounted to £160,000. The aim of this initiative is to strengthen and better target the efforts being made by the community, the private sector and the Government in addressing the economic, educational, social, health and environmental problems facing residents in the areas of greatest need in Belfast.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Defamation

Mr. Waller: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when he expects to introduce legislation to assist parties seeking speedy and economic results in defamation proceedings. [22341]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Government announced in November 1994 that there would be a new summary procedure which would help parties to defamation proceedings to clarify the real issues much earlier, and provide an inexpensive fast track for the disposal of straightforward claims. We are making good progress in preparing the draft statutory framework and will introduce legislation as soon as there is a suitable opportunity.

Fraud

Mr. Amess: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment he has made of the adequacy of self-regulation by solicitors in respect of the treatment of fraud; and what assessment he has made of the impact of self-regulation on (a) the number of firms operating and (b) the number of claims against law firms. [22147]

Mr. John M. Taylor: I do not consider that the self-regulation by the Law Society in respect of the treatment of fraud is inadequate. The solicitors' profession functions independently of Government and it is the responsibility of the Law Society to maintain standards of conduct within the profession. The Law Society's statutory powers to deal with complaints about solicitors, including the investigation of fraud, have been delegated to the Solicitors Complaints Bureau. The SCB has responded to the apparent increase in fraud by increased fraud investigation work, including an increased number of inspections of solicitors' firms. The Law Society co-operates fully with other regulatory and Government bodies involved in combating fraud. It keeps under review the effectiveness of its response to the problem of fraud.

PRIME MINISTER

Kashmir Elections

Mr. Cox: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he has had with the Indian Government as to the holding of elections during the current year in the Indian-occupied area of Kashmir; and if he will make a statement on the criteria the British Government will expect to see followed to have confidence that such elections were free and fair. [22380]

The Prime Minister: I have had no recent discussions with the Indian Government, but my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed elections in Kashmir during his visit to India in January. We shall be considering with our European partners how best to assess the forthcoming elections in Kashmir.

Atlantic Trade

Mr. Gill: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on his discussions with President Clinton concerning a merger between the North American Free Trade Area and the European Union. [23039]

The Prime Minister: The UK Government, the European Commission and the US Administration are each looking at various specific ways of liberalising trade both across the north Atlantic and more generally. We believe Europe and north America must work together for free and open trade across the Atlantic.

EMPLOYMENT

Wages Council

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has happened to the pay of employees working in sectors formerly covered by wage councils, since their abolition in 1993. [18426]

Mr. Oppenheim: The labour force survey shows that average earnings of workers in the industrial sectors in which wages councils mainly operated increased by 6.3 per cent. over the 12 months to autumn 1994.

HEALTH

Local Pay

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is her estimate of the total administrative cost to NHS trusts of negotiating local pay schemes. [21677]

Mr. Malone: Information is not available centrally about local arrangements but it is expected that any additional costs for individual trusts would be more than offset by savings from increased flexibility in the use of staff. When trusts were established, infrastructure for human resources, which includes the ability to support local pay arrangements was an essential part of our investment in strengthening the finance, information technology and personnel functions throughout the national health service.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many chief executives of trusts had not set up local pay machinery by February; and of those that succeeded what was the average change in personnel staff and cost to trust hospitals. [21745]

Mr. Malone: Information is not available about the local arrangements established following the letter of 6 June 1994 from the chief executive of the national health service executive asking trusts to establish local pay machinery by February 1995. When trusts were established, infrastructure for human resources, which includes the ability to support local pay arrangements was an essential part of our investment in strengthening the finance, information technology and personnel functions throughout the national health service.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 24 April, Official Report, column 321, if she will list each of the trusts that have made local pay offers giving (a) the total percentage offered to staff, (b) what conditions are attached to the offer and (c) whether the offer has been accepted. [22813]

Mr. Malone: Comprehensive details of local negotiations are not available centrally. But it is understood that, by 2 May, at least 195 trusts in England had made their offers known, of which 147 are of around 3 per cent. We also understand that staff side representatives are generally unwilling to engage in negotiations.

NHS Trusts

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what have been the establishment costs including expenditure on conveyancing for trusts by former regional health authority areas in each of the five waves of trusts; and if she will list the number of trusts established by region in each wave. [21754]

Mr. Malone: This information will be placed in the Library.

Accident and Emergency Departments

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evidence she has that larger accident and emergency departments produce better clinical outcomes. [23173]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: There is a considerable body of scientific evidence showing that patients who have suffered a major injury receive more effective care in large, properly staffed, accident and emergency departments. I have today placed in the Library a review of the literature on the relationship between the size of accident and emergency departments and clinical outcomes prepared by my Department.

Medical (Professional Performance) Bill

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what undertakings have been made by Her Majesty's Government to the General Medical Council in respect of the Medical (Professional Performance) Bill, other than an intention to obtain Royal Assent to that Bill during the current Session of Parliament. [23012]

Mr. Malone: None.

General Medical Council

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the ministerial statements made in Standing Committee A, considering the Medical (Professional Performance) Bill on 2 May, if she will list the numbers, category and date of Parliamentary Assent by Resolution, or other procedures, of (a) regulations and (b) rules of the General Council now in force. [23011]

Mr. Malone: The General Medical Council has advised me that the following statutory instruments are currently in force.

| SI Number | Category | Laid before Parliament |
|---|---|---|
| 1977/827 | Order | 19 May 1977 |
| 1979/29 | Rules | 19 January 1979 |
| 1979/112 | Order | 14 February 1979 |
| 1979/844 | Regulations | [1]— |
| 1979/1358 | Rules | 5 November 1979 |
| 1980/860 | Rules | 1 July 1980 |
| 1980/941 | Rules | 10 July 1980 |
| 1982/1076 | Order | 9 August 1982 |
| 1986/23 | Order | 15 January 1986 |
| 1986/149 | Regulations | [1]— |
| 1986/1390 | Rules | 11 August 1986 |
| 1987/1120 | Rules | 6 July 1987 |
| 1987/2166 | Regulations | [1]— |
| 1987/2174 | Rules | 17 December 1987 |
| 1988/2255 | Rules | 22 December 1988 |
| 1989/496 | Order | 23 March 1989 |
| 1989/1837 | Rules | 10 October 1989 |
| 1990/1587 | Rules | 9 August 1990 |
| 1991/53 | Regulation | [1]— |
| 1994/2022 | Rules | 1 August 1994 |
| 1994/3171 | Rules | 13 December 1994 |
| 1994/3298 | Rules | 29 December 1994 |

[1]Regulations made under section 32 of the Medical Act 1983 do not need to be laid before Parliament but come into effect when approved by order of the Privy Council.

NHS (Private Practice)

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, how many private patients were treated in NHS facilities by region and in total in 1993–94. [22812]

Mr. Sackville: The information requested is due to be published in volume 1 of "Hospital Episode Statics, England; Financial Year 1993–94", shortly. Copies will be available in the Library.

Medical Negligence

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many cases of alleged medical negligence by the NHS were awaiting settlement or court hearing at 30 April in each of the last five years; [22814]

(2) what is the average time taken for an alleged medical negligence case to be settled; and if she will make a statement on how the average time has changed over the past five years; [22815]

(3) if she will list all current alleged medical negligence cases against the NHS by (a) type of allegation and (b) length of time waiting for settlement. [22816]

Mr. Malone: This information is not available centrally.

TREASURY

Financial Services Act 1986

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to alter the scope of the Financial Services Act 1986. [23138]

Mr. Nelson: It has been suggested that non-financial spread betting should no longer be regulated under the Financial Services Act. However, in the light of a number of representations from right hon. and hon. Members and others, I have concluded that such a change would not be justified, in the absence of alternative regulatory arrangements offering equivalent protection. I do not therefore propose to make any change at the present time.

GPs' and Consultants' Earnings

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effects of income tax at the rates of 1978 and 1995 on the average general practitioner's and on the average NHS consultant's earnings. [21741]

Sir George Young: Based on expected levels of average net incomes for general practitioners providing general medical services in 1994–95, a single GP will pay over £65 a week less income tax in 1995–96 than under a 1978–79 indexed tax regime. In addition, a GP could also earn income from non-GMS sources. For the purposes of the calculation, it has been assumed that the GP has no tax allowances or reliefs except for the basic personal allowance.

It is not possible to produce a comparable estimate for consultants because the latest available data relate to 1991–92 levels of earnings.

Retail Prices Indexes

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the retail prices index is comprised of water rates; and how the weighting of water rates within the retail prices index has changed over the last five years. [22544]

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 4 May 1995]: The information requested is available in table A3 of the publication "Retail Prices Index February 1995"; CSO "Business Monitor" MM23, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement outlining the differences in the procedures of the EU nations in formulating their cost of living indexes; and what endeavours there are to harmonise the methods of calculation. [22550]

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 4 May 1995]: Measures of consumer prices indices vary widely across the EU in terms of concepts, methods and practices. The most notable differences are in the treatment of owner-occupied housing, and health and educational services. The Statistical Office of the European Communities—EUROSTAT—has prepared a draft Council regulation, which, with the co-operation of national statistical offices, establishes a harmonisation programme with the aim of achieving comparability across member states.

Minicab Drivers

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how frequently and by what methods the Inland Revenue makes audits of drivers working at the unlicensed private hire or minicab firms within Greater London; and if he will make a statement. [21172]

Sir George Young [holding answer 4 May 1995]: Audits of employers' records are normally carried out by the Inland Revenue where there is reason to believe that the tax has not been correctly deducted from employees' pay under the PAYE system. Tax office staff also investigate self-employed people where there is reason to believe that they may not have properly declared income for tax purposes. Specific figures relating to private hire and minicab firms in London are not compiled.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Broadcasting Complaints

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many complaints were made to the Broadcasting Standards Councils in 1994; on how many it made a judgment; how many related to the BBC; and how many relating to the BBC or others were (a) upheld, (b) partly upheld and (c) not upheld. [21030]

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 4 May 1995]: The Broadcasting Standards Council records figures for complaints received by financial year, not calender year. I understand that the council received a total of 2,829 complaints in the financial year 1994–95. More detailed figures are not available at present but will be published in July in the council's annual report for 1994–95.

Churchill Papers

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will set up an independent committee to examine the history of the ownership of the papers which the Churchill family have sold to the national heritage memorial fund; and if the family has a right to charge for their reproduction. [22528]

Mr. Dorrell: I will not be setting up an independent committee to examine the history of ownership of the papers which have been acquired for Churchill college, Cambridge through lottery funds distributed by the national heritage memorial fund.

Subject to the fair dealing and any other available exceptions in the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988, it is for the copyright owners to license reproductions of copyright material and to charge for such reproductions if they think it appropriate. The owners of the copyright in the non-state papers sold to Churchill college retain this right in those papers but have granted a licence to enable the papers to be copied without payment of a royalty in the circumstances referred to in sections 37 to 43 of the 1988 Act—copying by libraries and archives. The Crown has retained similar rights in respect of the state papers and has also granted a similar licence.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) if he will publish the names of those people who advised the national heritage memorial fund on the valuation of the Churchill papers; [22117]

(2) if he will publish both the identities of the valuers and their valuation advice for all future purchases financed by the national heritage memorial fund; [22118]

(3) if he will publish all the valuation advice received by the national heritage memorial fund. [22119]

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 2 May 1995]: This is a matter for the national heritage memorial fund, which is an independent body. I understand, however, that the chairman has written to the hon. Member. I have asked him to place copies of his letter in the Library of the House.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage who will grant requests to reproduce documents purchased from the Churchill family by the national heritage memorial fund; and what steps will be taken to ensure that the family do not charge for the reproduction of any document at any time covered by the Official Secrets Acts. [22623]

Mr. Dorrell: Permission to reproduce the documents from the Churchill archive for commercial purposes will have to be sought from the copyright owners. Copyright in the non-state papers is vested in the Churchill family, copyright in the state paper is vested in the Crown.

Any person who wishes to reproduce for commercial purposes a work in which copyright subsists must ensure that he or she has the appropriate permission.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Haitian Refugees

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his estimate of the number of refugees from Haiti currently on the Turks and Caicos Islands; what action is being taken to capture and contain them; what further action he proposes to deal with their return; and if he will make a statement. [22428]

Mr. Baldry: There are no accurate figures for the number of Haitian migrants in the Turks and Caicos Islands—TCI. The total Haitian population in the territory is estimated to be around 8,000, of whom 1,500 hold work permits.

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees recommended a registration project, to be carried out by a non-governmental organisation. The project is designed to register all Haitian migrants in the TCI and to establish whether those migrants without a work or resident permit have a case for remaining in the territory. That decision would be taken by the TCI authorities.

We have received a draft project proposal from the International Catholic Migration Commission, an experienced NGO based in Geneva, and are currently discussing it with the TCI Government.

The TCI Government have negotiated a draft agreement with the Haitian Government on the orderly repatriation of Haitians identified as economic migrants by the registration project.

Meanwhile, the surge in illegal Haitian immigration into the TCI over Easter has forced the TCI Government to conduct regular immigration sweeps to identify, screen and repatriate recent arrivals in advance of any registration project.

In parallel, the TCI authorities are seeking to prevent further undetected arrivals of illegal immigrants with the temporary support of the West Indies guardship and units of the US coast guard.

Spiro Family (USA)

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions have taken place with representatives of the United States Government on the circumstances surrounding the death of members of the Spiro family in the United States of America. [22535]

Mr. Baldry: There have been a number of exchanges. Most recently our consul-general in Los Angeles pressed the San Diego authorities on 8 February 1994 for information from the medical examiner's records for the United Kingdom coroner. The San Diego county sheriff has said he will release the medical examiner's report as soon as his investigation is concluded. The consul-general is keeping in touch with the San Diego authorities.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will request representatives of the Government of the United States of America to ask United States law enforcement officers to interview Mr. Alain and Mr. Arthur Ivy on the question of what knowledge they may have as to the circumstances surrounding the death of the Spiro family. [22536]

Mr. Baldry: The Spiro family died in the United States of America and it is for the authorities of that country to pursue investigations into the incident.

Cuban Refugees

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to deal with the Cuban refugees currently remaining on the Cayman Islands; what discussions he has with the Governments of the United States and Cuba to try to prevent further exodus of Cubans to the Cayman Islands; and if he will make a statement. [22426]

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the statement issued on 2 May by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. The decision to repatriate any future Cuban migrants who fail the refugee screening process in the Cayman Islands was taken with the full agreement of the Cuban Government. The United States Government have now announced a similar policy.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his estimate of the cost of the United Kingdom police sent to the Cayman Islands to help deal with the Cuban refugees; how this is to be met; and if he will make a statement. [22427]

Mr. Baldry: The cost of deploying United Kingdom police to the Cayman Islands, including transport, is estimated to be £375,000. It will be met in full by the Cayman Islands Government.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimate he has made of the total cost of the Cuban refugees on the Cayman Islands including any repatriation and the costs of keeping those who are housed at Guantanamo; how he plans such costs should be met; what discussions he has had with the Government of the United States about their responsibilities for the costs involved; and if he will make a statement. [22425]

Mr. Baldry: The total cost to date is approximately £2.7 million, the majority of which has been met by the Cayman Islands Government. We have spent £175,000 in providing material and technical assistance. We are also pursuing the possibility of EU funding for the continuing cost to the Cayman Islands Government.

The US Government agreed in December 1994 to offer up to 900 places in their safe haven at Guantanamo bay for Cuban migrants who volunteer to transfer from the Caymans. A total of 723 have so far done so. The Cayman Islands Government agreed to meet the cost of transferring and supporting these migrants in Guantanamo bay. Subsistence costs in Guantanamo are US$10 per person per day, but no invoice has yet been raised by the Americans. The Guantanamo costs are therefore not included in the above total.

Turkey

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about Government policy in respect of the recent debate and vote at the Council of Europe meeting on the future membership of Turkey of the Council of Europe Assembly. [22406]

Mr. David Davis: The Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly debated and carried on 26 April a motion for a recommendation on

"Turkey's military intervention in northern Iraq and on Turkey's respect of commitments concerning constitutional and legislative reforms."

The recommendation will be discussed shortly in the Committee of Ministers. We are considering our position in advance of any discussion. We share the Assembly's concern about Turkey's human rights record. But we see continued dialogue through the Council of Europe as an important aspect of our relationship with Turkey, including as a means of conveying to the Turkish Government our concerns on human rights.

Iqbal Masih

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reasons the application of Iqbal Masih of Pakistan for a visa to visit the United Kingdom was refused; and if he will make a statement. [22580]

Mr. Baldry: As I said in my reply of 3 May columns 249–50 to the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) Mr Iqbal Masih's visa application was not refused.

Social Development Fund

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the United Kingdom will take part in the social development fund of the Council of Europe; and if he will make a statement. [22750]

Mr. David Davis: There are no plans for United Kingdom participation in the social development fund of the Council of Europe.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Schools, Derry

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the enrolment figures for each school in the Derry city council area for each year since 1984, according to educational sector. [21785]

Mr. Ancram: The enrolment figures are as follows:

Enrolment figures for each school in the Derry City council area 1984–85 to 1994–95

Community Relations

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current level of public funding of community relations by (a) central Government and (b) local government. [22102]

Mr. Ancram: The resources available for community relations are directed at consolidating a range of major initiatives which are designed to increase cross-community contact and encourage greater mutual understanding and respect of different cultures and traditions.

The current level of central Government funding for community relations work is £8.74 million. This includes grant of 75 per cent.—£1.87 million—to district councils for their own community relations programmes. The balance of funding is provided by local government. In addition, other local government programmes may involve projects relevant to community relations, notably community services and cultural facilities.

Fair Employment

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress he has made on the current review of the fair employment legislation in Northern Ireland, and if he will make a statement. [22111]

Mr. Ancram: In November 1994, my right hon. and learned Friend asked the Standing Advisory Commission for Human Rights to carry forward a review of employment equality after five years experience of the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989. The commission is taking steps to do so, and a review report should be available in 1996.

Education Administration

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what were the numbers of staff and the administrative costs of statutory bodies responsible for aspects of the administration of the education system in Northern Ireland in the year ended 31 March; and what are the projected costs for 1995–96. [21792]

Mr. Ancram: The numbers of staff and the administrative costs for those statutory bodies engaged in the administration of the education system in Northern Ireland for the year ended 31 March 1995 and projected costs for the 1995–96 year are as follows:

| | Staff numbers 1994–95 | Annual costs (£000s) 1994–95 | 1995–96 |
|---|---|---|---|
| Council for Catholic Maintained Schools | 37 | 964 | 857 |

Social Fund

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list those projects in privatised companies which have received European social fund support since privatisation indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [21293]

Mr. Ancram [holding answer 1 May 1995]: There are no privatised companies in Northern Ireland in direct receipt of support from the European social fund since their privatisation.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list those public projects which received European social fund support and were subsequently privatised over the last 10 years indicating (a) the level of funding and (b) the dates when it was received. [21292]

Mr. Ancram [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Over the last 10 years, three public sector organisations, Northern Ireland Electricity, Harland and Wolff and Short Brothers received support from the European social fund as follows:

ESF Paid (£)

| | NIE | H and W | Shorts |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1985 | 733,564 | 475,591 | 815,349 |
| 1986 | 873,671 | 170,547 | 790,429 |
| 1987 | 856,619 | 384,623 | 324,563 |

| 1993 | 176,390 | — | — |
| Total | 6,720,246 | 1,124,292 | 2,090,461 |

Funding was awarded to NIE to run EC–approved engineering apprenticeship training courses at a purpose-built training centre. H and W and Short Brothers did not make any further applications for ESF after 1988.

Animal Diseases

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases of brucellosis have occurred in each year since 1985. [21819]

Mr. Ancram: The number of herds in which brucellosis has been confirmed in Northern Ireland since 1985 is as follows:

1985: Nil

1986: Nil

1987: Nil

1988: Nil

1989: 3

1990: 1

1991: 4

1992: 3

1993: Nil

1994: Nil

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases of pleuro-pneumonia occurred in each year since 1985. [22169]

Mr. Ancram: None

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases of paramyxovirus occurred in each year since 1985. [22173]

Mr. Ancram: Six outbreaks of paramyxovirus occurred in 1991.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases of foot and mouth disease occurred in each year since 1978. [22177]

Mr. Ancram: None.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases of epizootic lymphangitis occurred in each year since 1985. [22181]

Mr. Ancram: None.

Prevention of Terrorism Legislation

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people in Northern Ireland have been (a) arrested and (b) convicted under (i) section 9, (ii) section 10, (iii) section 11, (iv) section 12, (v) section 13, (vi) section 17 and (vii) section 18A of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 since 1989. [22446]

Sir John Wheeler: The information is as follows:

(a) Arrests for offences under sections 9, 10 and 11 are made under section 14 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989. Data on arrests specifically for offences under 9, 10 and 11 are not available.

There are no powers of arrest under sections 12 and 13.

From the beginning of 1990, there were no arrests made under sections 17 or 18 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1983.

(b) Since the enactment of the Provision of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, up to the end of 1994, there have been 41 convictions under sections 9 to 11 and 16 convictions under section 18.

No convictions under section 17 have been recorded.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Indonesian Police

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 3 March, Official Report, columns 727-28, how many current or former Indonesian police officers who received any form of training paid for by his Department served with the Brigade Mobile—BRIMOB—of the Indonesian police force (a) before such training (b) during such training and (c) after such training. [22284]

Mr. Baldry: The Indonesian national police force inform us that one officer who has received training under our project has served with the Brigade Mobile. This officer is serving there at present.

EDUCATION

Reflexions Market Research Ltd.

Mr. David Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education (1) how many in-depth interviews her Department has commissioned Reflexions Market Research Ltd. to undertake; how many (a) parents, (b) teachers and (c) governors will be interviewed; how long the interviews will last; and what level of remuneration the interviewees will be given; [22463]

(2) how many focus groups her Department has commissioned Reflexions Market Research Ltd. to undertake to evaluate publicity material on grant-maintained schools; how many (a) parents, (b) teachers and (c) governors will be involved; and what level of remuneration the participants will be given; [22462]

(3) to how many schools her Department has written, and in what areas, to introduce a representative of Reflexions Market Research Ltd.; [22461]

(4) how much it is costing her Department to employ the services of Reflexions Market Research Ltd. to research the effectiveness of the Department's grant maintained schools publicity material;

(5) how many (a) video tapes and (b) pamphlets her Department has commissioned through Reflexions Market Research Ltd. [22459]

Mr. Forth: Reflexions Market Research Ltd. has been commissioned to undertake qualitative research to assist the Department to evaluate its publicity material on grant-maintained schools. Research of this type is common to all of our major information campaigns.

Eighteen in-depth interviews are being carried out: six with teachers, 12 with governors and none with parents. The interviews average 45 minutes. There are nine focus groups which comprise 21 parents, 35 teachers and seven governors.

In line with industry practice, each interviewee receives a nominal sum to cover travel and any child care costs.

A range of schools were written to in Northamptonshire, London, Sheffield, Sutton, Surrey and Warrington to obtain interviewees. These areas were chosen to provide a representative sample.

The cost of the research is commercial-in-confidence. No video tapes or pamphlets were commissioned from Reflexions.

Stratford Grant-maintained School

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what steps she is taking in relation to Stratford grant-maintained school. [23586]

Mr. Forth: Stratford grant-maintained school was inspected in November 1993 and found to be failing to provide an acceptable standard of education. Since then, it has been subject to regular termly monitoring by Ofsted. The most recent report from Ofsted shows that standards of teaching and learning remain poor, that management is inadequate, and that the school has shown no signs of improvement since it was first found to be failing 18 months ago.

This persistent failure to provide an acceptable standard of education cannot be tolerated. My right hon. Friend is, therefore, exercising her power to remodel the governing body. The chairman of the governing body, Mr. Mark Prisk, has resigned and my right hon. Friend is arranging for the appointment of four new governors: Dr. Peter Osbourne, Mrs. Pat Collarbone, Mrs. Joan Greenfield and Mr. Paul Lewis.

As a matter of urgency, this remodelled governing body will need to devise a strategy to revitalise the school. I look to the school's head teacher and her staff to give their whole-hearted support to raising standards at the school.

Student Loans Company

Mr. Barry Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education, what plans she has to allow medical students and those on above average length degree courses to borrow more money from the Student Loans Company. [22698]

Mr. Boswell: None.

Medical Students

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many medical students failed to complete their courses due to financial difficulties in each of the last five years.

Mr. Boswell: This information is not currently available centrally.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what steps she is taking to ensure that students undertaking medical science degrees are adequately financially supported during their courses. [22699]

Mr. Boswell: The total support available to all students in 1994–95 through the main rates of grant and loan is 4 per cent. higher than in 1993–94, thus maintaining its value in real terms. The extra weeks' allowances payable to students as part of the mandatory award who attend their courses for longer in the academic year than normal have also been increased by 4 per cent. Medical students, may benefit from these. The Government have also made £21 million in access funds available to universities and colleges in England for the 1994–95 academic year so that they can assist students, including medical students, in particular financial difficulty.

Student Expenditure

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what element of the maintenance grant for students is allotted for expenditure on books and equipment for (a) arts students, (b) social science students, (c) medical students and (d) engineering students. [22697]

Mr. Boswell: It is for students to decide how to spend the total resources available to them from both maintenance grants and loans according to their particular needs. Disabled students may be eligible for additional means-tested allowances to cover the cost of special equipment and materials. Local education authorities can also, in certain circumstances, make discretionary awards to pay for books and equipment to students who are not eligible for mandatory awards.

Educational and Youth Exchanges

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will make a statement on educational and youth exchanges between the United Kingdom and Pakistan. [22377]

Mr. Boswell: In 1993–94, the Government-funded scholarships and awards for 568 Pakistani students here in the United Kingdom at a cost of around £5.1 million. In that same year the British Council administered 330 exchange visits to the UK from Pakistan, and the League for the Exchange of Commonwealth Teachers, funded by the UK Departments of Education, arranged 21 teacher exchanges. Through Government funding provided to the Commonwealth Youth Exchange Council, 23 young Pakistanis came to the UK in 1992–93, with 20 of our young people going to Pakistan in 1993–94.

SCOTLAND

Education Administration

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the numbers of staff and the administrative costs of each education authority in Scotland and the number of school pupils for which each education authority was responsible in the year ended 31 March. [21789]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information on administrative costs and pupil numbers is given in the following table for 1993–94, the latest available year. Details of numbers of staff employed by each education authority are not held centrally. However the "Joint Staffing Watch" records that, at September 1993. Scottish education authorities employed a total of 53,212, full-time equivalent, teachers and lecturers and 25,651, full-time equivalent, other staff, including non-teaching staff in schools and administrative staff.

| | Net administrative expenditure of Education Departments £000 | Pupils Numbers (FTE) in local authority nursery, primary, secondary and special schools |
|---|---|---|
| Borders | 3,031 | 15,164 |
| Central | 6,553 | 42,417 |
| Dumfries and Galloway | 3,811 | 22,799 |
| Fife | 8,434 | 56,341 |
| Grampian | 10,587 | 79,371 |
| Highland | 4,191 | 34,727 |
| Lothian | 20,245 | 101,555 |
| Strathclyde | 40,427 | 359,344 |
| Tayside | 7,952 | 58,275 |
| Orkney | 806 | 3,349 |
| Shetland | 2,620 | 4,116 |
| Western Isles | 2,755 | 4,885 |

Scottish Nuclear

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he intends to contact Sir Donald Miller regarding the assurances the latter received from the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) when he was Secretary of State for Scotland regarding the independence of Scottish Nuclear. [22065]

Mr. Kynoch: My right hon. Friend has no plans at present to do so.

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussion he has had with the chairman of Scottish Nuclear regarding the future of that company. [22038]

Mr. Kynoch: My right hon. Friend has met Mr. Hann on several occasions in recent weeks to discuss a range of issues concerning Scottish Nuclear Ltd.

Education Expenditure

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average cost in 1993–94, per pupil, of (a) education at a local authority school, (b) meals, (c) travel and (d) any other incidental expense; and what were the all-Scotland totals in each of these categories. [21864]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Net current expenditure per pupil in local authority nursery, primary, secondary and special schools in Scotland is normally provided, for technical reasons, exclusive of the costs of school meals, home to school transport, central administration and loans charges. The figure on this basis for 1993–94 was £2,379 per pupil and £1.861 billion in total.

The equivalent figures for pupils consuming schools meals were £174 and £61.186 million respectively and for pupils benefiting from free home-to-school transport were £343 and £53.442 million respectively.

These figures have been derived from local authority financial returns which do not include a heading for other incidental expenditure.

Nuclear Industry

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the asset value of the nuclear energy industry in Scotland. [22037]

Mr. Kynoch: Such estimates are a matter for the companies concerned; information on asset values is contained in their annual reports and accounts.

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what measurement he has made regarding the security and safety implications of a privatised nuclear energy industry. [22039]

Mr. Kynoch: Safety in the nuclear industry, whether in the public or private sectors, is the responsibility of the companies concerned. Civil installations are subject to a licensing regime which is transparent, rigorous and robust. HM nuclear installations inspectorate will continue to administer this regime under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 and the relevant statutory provisions. Security of nuclear installations is also a matter for the organisations concerned, in consultation with the appropriate authorities.

Animal Diseases

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases of brucellosis have occurred in each year since 1985. [21821]

Sir Hector Monro: There has been only one confirmed brucellosis herd breakdown case in Scotland since 1985. This case occurred in 1989.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases of pleuro-pneumonia occurred in each year since 1985. [22167]

Sir Hector Monro: There have been no cases of pleuro-pneumonia recorded in Scotland since 1985.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases of epizootic lymphangitis occurred in each year since 1985. [22179]

Sir Hector Monro: There have been no cases of epizootic lymphangitis recorded in Scotland since 1985.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases of paramyxovirus occurred in each year since 1985. [22172]

Sir Hector Monro: The number of confirmed cases of paramyxovirus in Scotland for the years in question is as follows:

1985: 10
1986: 8
1987: 67
1988: 10
1989: 44
1990: 61
1991: 6
1992: 31
1993: 22
1994: 7

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases of foot and mouth disease occurred in each year since 1978. [22176]

Sir Hector Monro: There have been no confirmed cases of foot and mouth disease since 1978.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the link between rabbits and Johne's disease. [22347]

Sir Hector Monro: Mycobacterium paratuberculosis, the causative agent in Johne's disease, has been isolated from wild rabbits in the Perth-Angus area. It is not known whether this is the same strain of bacteria which causes disease in cattle and sheep and further research is being carried out.

Spottiswoode

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what consideration led to the Forestry Commission being allowed to dispose of the wood at Spottiswoode near Westruther in Berwickshire with no provision for protection for future access by the public; [21437]

(2) if he will pay an official visit to Spottiswoode to discuss the extent of use of the wood by the local community; [21438]

(3) what attempts he will now make to secure public assess when the wood at Spottiswoode is offered for sale; and if he will make a statement. [21441]

Sir Hector Monro: The Forestry Commission follows guidelines laid down by Ministers before selecting properties for sale. These guidelines take account of all relevant factors, including the existing levels of public access and recreation. The commission considered that the level of public access to Spottiswoode was low and that the wood could be sold. My right hon. Friend does not, therefore, consider it necessary to pay an official visit to Spottiswoode.

The Forestry Commission has already offered to enter into an access agreement with Borders regional council, which would have secured public access in the future, but the council declined the offer.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many school pupils visiting Pyatshaw outdoor centre used the wood at Spottiswoode for educational or recreational purposes over the past five years. [21439]

Sir Hector Monro: Pupils visiting the Pyatshaw outdoor centre may make occasional informal use of the wood for recreational purposes, but there is no record of this.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received regarding the disposal of Spottiswoode and its implications for public access. [21440]

Sir Hector Monro: My right hon. Friend and I have received representations from the British Horse Society and two individuals about the sale of Spottiswoode and its implications for public access.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Pensions

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, what steps are being taken to maintain the value of pensions to the clergy.

Mr. Alison: Clergy pensions are increased in line with the previous year's national minimum stipend. The most recent increase, which took effect on 1 April 1995, was 3.3 per cent.

On the wider issue of the funding of clergy pensions, a joint paper produced by the Central Board of Finance, the Church Commissioners and the Church of England Pensions Board was recently discussed at a national conference with the chairmen and secretaries of diocesan boards of finance. The draft paper will, after further discussion and refinement, be presented to the General Synod in July. It contains proposals for the establishment of a separate funded pension scheme. It is intended that the proposed arrangements will create a firm basis on which to provide continued security for the clergy in their retirement, as well as leaving sufficient funds to support the national ministry, particularly in poorer dioceses and parishes.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Directory of Westminster and Whitehall

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what were the costs of producing and advertising the 1995 Directory of Westminster and Whitehall; and how much revenue the Government estimate will be recouped from sales. [22900]

Mr. Horam: HMSO has not produced a 1995 Directory of Westminster and Whitehall, although a commercial publication bearing that title is believed to be imminent.

Historical Documents

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what special training is given to persons who have responsibility for assessing the historical significance of documents held by his Department. [23290]

Mr. Horam: Training in assessing the historical significance of departmental records is carried out under the guidance of the Keeper of Public Records. It is provided in a number of different ways, including courses on the appraisal of records and through conferences and seminars arranged by the Public Records Office.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Statute of Westminster

Mr. Mackinlay : To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to his answer of 3 May, column 208, if it is his intention to consult other countries under section 2 of the Statute of Westminster Act 1931 in respect of those aspects of the Regency Act 1937 that are to be varied by the Statute Law (Repeals) Bill [Lords] currently before Parliament; and if he will make a statement. [23167]

Mr. John M. Taylor: It is not my intention, being advised that no such consultation is necessary or appropriate.

Public Records

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on what occasions in the last 30 years he or his predecessors have authorised the deposit of public records in the Churchill archives; and under what provision of the Public Records Act this was done. [22914]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Under section 4(1) of the Public Records Act 1958, the Lord Chancellor has the power, now delegated to the Keeper of Public Records, to appoint places of deposit for public records to be kept outside the public Record Office itself. The Churchill archives centre, Cambridge has not been appointed a place of deposit for public records under the Act; it follows that there has been no authorisation under the Act for public records to be deposited there nor are any of the Churchill papers at the Churchill archive centre public records within the meaning of the Act.

TRANSPORT

British Transport Police

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on progress in discussions between his Department and the Home Office on extending the powers and jurisdiction of the British Transport police. [21565]

Mr. Watts: Discussions are continuing.

Acoustic Fencing (Motorways)

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what new sections of Britain's motorway network will be covered by acoustic fencing in the next year. [22123]

Mr. Watts: This is an operational matter for the Highways Agency. I have asked its chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. David Chidgey, dated 9 May 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr John Watts, has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question asking the Secretary of State for Transport, what new sections of Britain's motorway network will be covered by acoustic fencing in the next year.

Only schemes which had a start of works prior to April 1995 and are still under construction are included. It is dependent on the contractor's programme and progress.

The total length of Acoustic Barrier programmed to be erected this year on motorway construction schemes is approximately 10.3 miles

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the total expenditure by his Department in each year since 1990 on acoustic fencing on motorways. [22126]

Mr. Watts: This detailed information is not held centrally. It could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the exact locations of the sections of Britain's motorway network that are currently covered by acoustic fencing and the date that each section of acoustic fencing was implemented. [22129]

Mr. Watts: The detailed information is not held centrally. It could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are his Department's criteria for the implementation of acoustic fencing on (a) motorways and (b) other highways. [22130]

Mr. Watts: This is an operational matter for the Highways Agency. I have asked its chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. David Chidgey, dated 9 May 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr John Watts, has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question asking the Secretary of State, what are his Department's criteria for the implementation of acoustic fencing on (a) motorways and (b) other highways.

The criteria for the implementation of acoustic fencing on construction schemes for motorways and trunk roads are the same. Acoustic fences are provided where it is demonstrated that noise levels at a number of adjacent residential properties would otherwise be unreasonably high and that other measures would be less cost effective.

Compensation (New Roads)

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many people have submitted a claim in each year since 1990 for compensation for the decrease in property value as a result of the use of a new road from noise, vibration, smell, fumes, smoke, artificial lighting or other causes under part 1 of the Land Compensation Act 1973. [22124]

Mr. Watts: This is an operational matter for the Highways Agency. I have asked its chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. David Chidgey, dated 8 May 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr John Watts has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question asking the Secretary of State for Transport how many people have submitted a claim in each year since 1990 for compensation for decrease in property value as a result of the use of a new road from noise, vibration, smell, fumes, smoke, artificial lighting or other causes under Part 1 of the Land Compensation Act 1973.

This information is not held centrally for Highways Agency schemes and not held at all by the Agency for new road schemes which are the responsibility of other highways authorities. Therefore, I am sorry that this information cannot be provided except at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what has been the total amount paid by his Department in each year since 1990 for compensation for the decrease in property values as a result of noise from the use of a new road under part 1 of the Land Compensation Act 1973; [22127]

(2) what has been the total amount paid by his Department in each year since 1990 for compensation for the decrease in property values as a result of noise, vibration, smell, fumes smoke, artificial lighting or other causes under part 1 of the Land Compensation Act 1973. [22128]

Mr. Watts: These are operational matters for the Highways Agency. I have asked its chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. David Chidgey, dated 9 May 1995:

As you know, the Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr John Watts, has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Questions asking the Secretary of State for Transport how much has been paid in each year since 1990 in compensation for decrease in property values under Part 1 of the Land Compensation Act 1973.

Compensation for loss in value is not separately identified from expenditure on acquisition of property in central budgets or expenditure returns. Therefore, I am sorry that this information cannot be provided except at disproportionate cost.

Accounting Officers

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many times in the last 10 years, and on which dates, his departmental accounting officer has issued a minute in that role; and what was the issue in each case.

Mr. Norris: In my reply of 1 March 1994, Official Report, column 659 to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), I stated that Department records showed that since 1979 there had been no cases where such an instruction had been issued. This is still the case.

Concessionary Fares (Pensioners)

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the number of old-age pensioners in Great Britain (a) who are not provided with full free travel concessions and (b) not provided with partial travel concessionary travel passes; and if he will estimate the cost of providing free concessionary fares to all those presently not provided for. [22570]

Mr. Norris: It is not possible to give a precise figure for the cost of providing free concessionary fares for all old-age pensioners.

Minicab Firms

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many unlicensed private hire or minicab firms are known to the Metropolitan police in the London boroughs; and if he will make a statement. [21225]

Mr. Norris: I am advised that the Metropolitan police do not keep lists of unlicensed private hire or minicab firms in London; all these firms in the Metropolitan police district are unlicensed.

In February this year, the Government announced their agreement with the Transport Select Committee that minicabs in London should be regulated, Cm 2715, as part of their response to the Committee's recommendations.

Rail Franchises

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if the French National rail company, Société Nationale des Chemins de Fers, is allowed to submit bids to operate rail franchises in Great Britain. [22913]

Mr. Watts: There are no restrictions preventing foreign national rail companies from bidding for franchises.

Ferry Evacuation

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which are the four British-registered ferries which do not have 100 per cent. dry-shod evacuation; which routes they sail on, and what are the evacuation arrangements on these ferries. [22907]

Mr. Norris: This is an operational matter for the Marine Safety Agency. I have asked its chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from R. M. Bradley to Mr. Paul Flynn, dated 9 May 1995:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your question about four ferries which do not have 100 per cent dry-shod evacuation.

There are four UK registered vessels, which ply on the following routes and have evacuation arrangements as described:

PRIDE OF BRUGES—Dover to Calais.

Lifeboats and Marine Evacuation Systems are provided for 1158 persons and inflatable liferafts with overside ladders for 300 persons. The maximum permitted number of persons on board is 1400.

PRIDE OF CHERBOURG—Portsmouth to Cherbourg.

Lifeboats are provided for 798 persons and inflatable liferafts with overside ladders for 610 persons. The maximum permitted number of persons on board is 1297.

PRIDE OF HAMPSHIRE—Portsmouth to Cherbourg.

Lifeboats are provided for 798 persons and inflatable liferafts with overside ladders for 600 persons. The maximum permitted number of persons on board is 1302.

PIONEER—Plies between ports on the West Coast of Scotland, Western Isles and Northern Ireland. Lifeboats are provided for 80 persons and inflatable liferafts with overside ladders for 275 persons. The maximum permitted number of persons on board is 294.

Lyme Bay Activity Centre

Sir James Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he has taken in respect of the papers on the Lyme bay rescue operation forwarded to him in December 1994 on the direction of the trial judge. [23163]

Mr. Norris: HM Coastguard conducted its own internal investigation into the rescue operation. This was made available to the court during the trial of the company owning the activity centre, the managing director and the manager. HM Coastguard took action to discipline certain officers and to improve procedures and performance at the local rescue centre. In the light of the remarks of the trial judge I have asked John Reeder QC to conduct a review with the following terms of reference:

In the light of Coastguard internal inquiry, the evidence presented to the Lyme Bay trial and the judge's comments in his summing up—

(i) to review all the actions, both internal and external taken by Coastguard during and subsequent to the tragedy.

(ii) to consider how far this action was appropriate and whether any further action was necessary, and

(iii) to make recommendations.

Consideration under item (ii) should cover the suggestion by the hon. Member for Dorset, West that harbourmasters should be given a more formal role in Coastguard's emergency procedures.

The findings will be published.

Liverpool Vehicle Registration Office

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representation he has had from employees in the Liverpool vehicle registration office about the closure of the Liverpool office; and if he will make a statement. [23161]

Mr. Norris: Four hon. Members in the Liverpool area have drawn my attention to a letter dated 28 March which they received from two representatives of the Civil and Public Services Association on behalf of the staff about the closure of the Liverpool vehicle registration office. I have replied to these and the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency has replied to another. The lease of the accommodation for this office has expired and it formed part of a review of DVLA's local office structure last year, which concluded that vehicle registration offices should close progressively over the next three years, dependent on other arrangements being made for the work of the offices. No firm date has yet been fixed for the closure of the office and the staff will be kept fully informed of any plans to do so, with a minimum of six months' notice.

Road Safety

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his Department's policies for reducing death and injury on the roads. [23653]

Mr. Norris: We have today published the "Road Safety Report 1995", which describes measures being taken to reduce road accident casualties. Copies have been placed in the Library.

Dr. John Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to increase the level of funding made available to Cumbria county council for the implementation of road safety schemes; and if he will make a statement. [22737]

Mr. Norris: We are making available £50 million to local authorities for local safety schemes in 1995–96. This is planned to rise to £55 million in 1996–97 and to £60 million in 1997–98. The allocation of funds depends on the relative merits of the bid plans put forward by local authorities.

Historical Documents

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what special training is given to persons who have responsibility for assessing the historical significance of documents held by his Department. [23277]

Mr. Norris: Training is provided under the guidance of the Keeper of Public Records. It includes courses on the appraisal of records arranged by the Public Record Office.

Commercial Vehicle Operators

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what guidelines his Department issues to commercial road vehicle operators to effect the reduction of accidents. [22696]

Mr. Norris: Advice is given in the Department's "Guide to maintaining roadworthiness", which was produced in conjunction with the operator trade associations. The guide gives operators detailed information on how to set up and run a system for maintaining vehicles in a roadworthy condition.

Vehicle examiners from the Department's Vehicle Inspectorate also give advice to operators, both on an ad hoc basis, and when they visit operators premises in connection with corroborating compliance with the requirements of operator licensing.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to encourage commercial road vehicle operators to undertake specialist driver training. [22690]

Mr. Norris: We have no such plans, but specialist training is a statutory requirement for drivers of vehicles carrying dangerous goods.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of his Department's budget is allocated to initiatives which have been undertaken to secure private finance for his Department's projects. [22792]

Mr. Norris: Attracting private finance for infrastructure investment affects policy work throughout the Department and the related expenditure cannot meaningfully be estimated in isolation.

Road Accident Statistics

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to include causal factors in his Department's road accident statistics. [22689]

Mr. Norris: There are no plans to include causal factors in the Department's national road accident statistics. The Department is conducting research to evaluate the provision of causation factors in local area road accident statistics.

Passenger Coaches

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 28 April, Official Report, column 771, what percentage of passenger coaches checked at the roadside or on operators' premises were found to be defective in each of the last two years. [22802]

Mr. Norris: Ten per cent. of coaches at the roadside in 1993–94 and 9.2 per cent. in 1992–93 were found to have prohibitable defects.

Of coaches checked at operators' premises as part of a maintenance assessment, 8.7 per cent. were found to have prohibitable defects in 1993–94 as opposed to 8.5 per cent. in the previous year.

Heavy Goods Vehicles

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to make heavy goods vehicles safer. [22703]

Mr. Norris: There are already stringent controls regulating both the construction and use requirements of vehicles, which are continually being upgraded in line with technological improvements. Compliance with these requirements is checked at annual roadworthiness tests and enforcement spot checks both at the roadside and at operators' premises.

We also regulate vehicle maintenance through the operator licensing system and have a continuing programme of research directed at the development of new standards to help reduce the number and severity of accidents.

Air Traffic Control

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on what basis air traffic control facilities for commercial flights are shared with the military airspace. [22394]

Mr. Norris: Military air traffic services are currently provided primarily at the West Drayton and Prestwick ATC centres. Military controllers are responsible for providing the greater part of air traffic services to aircraft outside controlled airspace—be they military or civil, including general aviation.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to make an announcement in respect of the future of the national air traffic services, and if he will make a statement. [22396]

Mr. Norris: The Secretary of State announced in November 1994 that the Government continued to favour privatisation of the national air traffic services in principle, but that further work was needed on a number of important issues before any final decision could be made on whether to proceed with the privatisation. In addition, the Secretary of State is considering the report of the Transport Select Committee on this subject and will be making a formal response in the near future.

Joint Aviation Authority

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what parliamentary approval will be required prior to the introduction of the JAA proposals on European regulations for flight and duty times; [21879]

(2) what assessment he has made of the representations he has received from the British Airline Pilots Association relating to the JAA proposals on flight and duty times; [21881]

(3) when he last met the head of the Civil Aviation Authority to discuss the JAA proposals for European regulations on flight and duty times; what assessment he has made of the stringency of the proposals; and if the JAA proposals are equivalent to the current CAA regulations; [21880]

(4) to what extent the JAA proposals for regulations on flight and duty times will be extended to airports outside London; and how these proposals will be financed. [21882]

Mr. Norris: The Air Navigation Order sets annual and monthly limits on flight times for flight crews. Within those limits, the order requires operators to establish a flight time limitation scheme which has to be approved by the Civil Aviation Authority subject to such conditions as they think fit. The CAA's advice on how to formulate an acceptable flight time limitation scheme is contained in civil aviation publication 371. The JAA's present proposals do not affect the provisions of the Air Navigation Order and could be implemented in the United Kingdom by amending the advice in CAP 371. In the longer term, the proposals should come before the European Council for adoption as an EC regulation.

Specific responsibility for, and expertise in, flight and duty time limitation schemes rests with the CAA's flight operations policy section. My noble Friend the Minister for Aviation last met the head of this section to discuss the JAA proposals on 28 February 1995. The British Air Line Pilots Association has expressed concern about certain aspects of the JAA proposals which differ from the advice contained in CAP 371, but the CAA stresses that flight time limitation schemes have to be seen as an overall "package" of measures. The CAA is satisfied that the JAA proposals would achieve a comparable level of protection against the onset of fatigue to the current UK requirements.

The cost of crew scheduling in accordance with any flight and duty time limitation scheme is borne by individual operators.

Stockport Bypass

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his new revised timetable for the building and completion of the A6(M) Stockport north-south bypass. [21993]

Mr. Watts: This is an operational matter for the Highways Agency. I have asked its chief executive to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Sir Thomas Arnold, dated 9 May 1995:

The Minister for Railways and Roads, Mr John Watts, has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question asking the Secretary of State for Transport, what is his revised timetable for the building and completion of the A6(M) Stockport North-South Bypass.

The next stage for this scheme will be the publication of Orders followed by a public inquiry. It will take us some time to prepare for this and at this stage I cannot give you an indication of the dates. Progress of the scheme will be dependent on detailed investigations, design work, statutory procedures and availability of resources. I hope you will understand that these uncertainties preclude me from making any worthwhile predictions about the programme in the longer term.

Noise Pollution

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration his Department gives to minimising noise pollution when selecting the type of surfacing for a motorway under construction or repair. [22125]

Mr. Watts: This is a operational matter for the Highways Agency. I have asked its chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. David Chidgey, dated 9 May 1995:

As you know, the Minister of Railways and Roads, Mr John Watts, has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question asking the Secretary of State for Transport, what consideration his Department gives to minimising noise pollution when selecting the type of surfacing for a motorway under construction or repair.

The permitted alternatives for the surfacing of motorway construction schemes are constrained where noise is a matter of concern. Concrete surfaces are not currently used where traffic is expected to exceed 75,000 vehicles per day, although quieter concrete surfaces are undergoing trials. In particular sensitive situations, porous asphalt may be specified as a noise mitigation measure when the additional cost of construction and maintenance are considered to be justified. But porous asphalt is not technically suitable for use in all cases.

It is not the Agency's policy to apply mitigation to existing roads.

Special Advisers

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 1 May, Official Report, column 61, if he will make a statement on the possible conflicts of interest involving special advisers, listing the names of the individuals, the nature of the conflicts concerned and how the matters were resolved. [22906]

Mr. Norris: It is not my practice to comment on information about the private interests of staff.

Baggage Checks

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of hold baggage passing through Heathrow airport is now subject to regular checking; and what was the percentage immediately before the Lockerbie bombing. [23184]

Mr. Norris: All hold baggage passing through Heathrow airport for international flights is subjected to a range of security controls. All such baggage must be accounted for and authorised, passengers are questioned about their baggage and, in addition, an increasing proportion of baggage is screened by X-ray or other technology.

Good progress is being made towards the Department's objective of screening 100 per cent. of international hold baggage. The percentage of hold baggage currently being subjected to screening by X-ray or other technology is approximately 26 per cent., although 100 per cent. of hold baggage on those flights considered to be at greater risk is screened. It is estimated that about 4 to 5 per cent. of hold baggage was being screened prior to the Lockerbie bombing.

Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what use his Department makes of hand-held and car-based mobile telephones; what were the costs for each financial year of these services since mobile telephones were first introduced to his Department; and how many mobile telephones are currently in use. [23447]

Mr. Norris: The Department has 351 hand-held mobile telephones and 25 car telephones. The equipment is issued on the basis of operational need, especially where staff have to work away from the office. The main users of the equipment are staff in the Coastguard agency, the Highways Agency, the Vehicle Inspectorate, the aircraft accidents investigation branch and ministerial offices. Figures are not available centrally for annual operating costs.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many mobile telephones being utilised by his Department have been cloned during the last 12 months. [23429]

Mr. Norris: Four hand-held telephones were cloned during the last 12 months.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations his Department has made to the Department of Trade and Industry concerning the need for legislation to prevent the cloning of mobile telephones. [23468]

Mr. Norris: No representations have been made to the DTI concerning the need for legislation to prevent the cloning of mobile telephones.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what costs his Department has incurred during the last 12 months as a result of cloning of mobile telephones being utilised by his Department, with particular reference to the making of unauthorised calls. [23487]

Mr. Norris: The cost of unauthorised calls made due to cloning is estimated at £500. However, this is not a cost to the Department as all mobile telephone airtime suppliers accept that the costs of unauthorised calls on cloned telephones are not charged to users.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps his Department has taken to prevent the cloning of telephones being utilised by his Department; and if his Department has discussed this matter with any official agencies. [23453]

Mr. Norris: Cloning of existing analogue phones is impossible to prevent. However, mobile telephone airtime suppliers have mechanisms in place to detect suspicious activity and the majority of clonings are detected early enough to stop serious misuse. No discussions have been held with official agencies. My Department has a policy of migration from the old analogue telephones, which are susceptible to cloning, to the new digital networks on which cloning is technically impossible.

Track Access Charges

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the track access charge per mile charged in April 1994; and if he will list each change in the charge per mile since that date, and the date when each change was made. [23400]

Mr. Watts: Initial access charges were entered into between the British Railways Board and Railtrack and came into effect on 1 April 1994. These charges, contained in unregulated access agreements comprised of a variable charge for track usage and traction current and fixed element and cannot be expressed as charges per mile.

Since that time, new access agreements have been entered between Railtrack and the train operating companies subject to the approval of the rail regulator. The regulator's approach to the approval of track access charges was set out in policy statements published in November 1994, January and February 1995 copies of which are in the House of Commons Library.

TREASURY

Barings Bank

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with the Governor of the Bank of England about the latter's allegation of criminal offences committed by Barings executives. [21129]

Mr. Nelson: My right hon. and learned Friend has regular meetings with the Governor, at which a wide range of issues is discussed.

Banking Supervision

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he will take to regulate the speculation in derivatives by United Kingdom based banks and their offices overseas. [21177]

Mr. Nelson: Responsibility for supervising all activities of United Kingdom authorised banks, including their overseas' operations, rests with the Banks of England, where appropriate in collaboration with other regulators in the UK or overseas.

Inland Revenue

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) which activities of the Inland Revenue are currently outsourced to overseas countries; and to which countries this work is sent; [22137]

(2) what plans he has to outsource further activities of the Inland Revenue to overseas countries; which activities these plans cover; and to which countries this work will go. [22136]

Sir George Young: No Inland Revenue activities have been outsourced to overseas countries and there are no plans to do so in the future.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many short-term contracts at each Inland Revenue office in the United Kingdom are due to expire in the next 12 months. [22141]

Sir George Young: The information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many civil servants, including those on short-term contracts, he expects to be employed by the Inland Revenue in (a) one year, (b) two years and (c) five years. [22135]

Sir George Young: The Inland Revenue expects to employ mostly permanent staff for the foreseeable future. Some staff are expected to be employed on a short-term or casual basis, but the pattern of need for the next five years cannot be predicted with any accuracy at this stage.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many civil servants, including those on short-term contracts, are currently employed at each Inland Revenue offices in the United Kingdom; [22166]

(2) how many civil servants are currently employed on short-term contracts at each Inland Revenue office in the United Kingdom. [22142]

Sir George Young: The information requested has today been placed in the Library.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will define short-term contract in the context of a contract of employment with the Inland Revenue. [22140]

Sir George Young: There is no specific definition of a short-term contract with the Inland Revenue. In essence, a short-term contract could be any form of contract which does not result in the employee becoming a permanent civil servant.

Tax Regime

Ms Corston: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what programme of research he proposes to introduce to assess the impact of macro-economic, taxation and other policies on family wellbeing and inequalities and poverty, with particular reference to women, as agreed in the programme of action resolved at the world summit for social development, article 27a. [22271]

Sir George Young: My right hon. and learned Friend keeps the tax regime and its impact on the economy and particular groups under continual review. As a result of our policies the average income of all economic groups and family types has risen since we came into office in 1979.

PRODCOM Statistics

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which organisations have purchased the collected PRODCOM statistics in electronic form and may market the data to the public; and if he will make a statement. [22615]

Mr. Nelson: Taylor Nelson AGB plc is currently the only organisation to have purchased the PRODCOM statistics. It is permitted to market the data in hard copy, CD-ROM and facsimile formats only.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which organisations were invited to tender for marketing the PRODCOM statistics. [22613]

Mr. Nelson: Five organisations submitted marketing proposals to the Central Statistical Office for PRODCOM data. These proposals were submitted on a commercial-in-confidence basis.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will ensure that when PRODCOM statistics are located in libraries, the public will be enabled to photocopy them. [22611]

Mr. Nelson: In accordance with the normal conventions on copyright, photocopying of PRODCOM data will be permitted for non-commercial use.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he takes to ensure that there is minimum delay in public access to PRODCOM statistics. [22614]

Mr. Nelson: PRODCOM statistics are released for publication as soon as the CSO is satisfied with their quality. They are published by Taylor Nelson AGB as soon as practicable thereafter.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the PRODCOM statistics were first collected; how much of the first year's data in the series has been published; and when the first year's total data will be published. [22612]

Mr. Nelson: The first PRODCOM data were collected on a quarterly basis from April 1993 and on an annual basis from January 1994 onwards. In all, publishable PRODCOM data spans 90 annual and 34 quarterly reports. Of these, 84 annual and 28 quarterly have been published to date; the remaining 12 are due to be published by the end of May 1995.

Bretton Woods Institutions

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer with whom and with what organisations he is consulting in regard to Govnerment policy on the work and structures of the International Monetary Fund and World bank prior to the 50th anniversary conferences of the Bretton Woods institutions. [22436]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The 50th anniversary conference of the Bretton Woods institutions took place in September 1994 prior to 1994 annual meetings of the World bank and IMF. I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 19 October to the hon. member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) Official Report, column 272–74.

Income Tax

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effects on (a) inflation, (b) interest rates and (c) the balance of payments according to the Treasury model for the years 1996 to 2000, consequent upon a 2p reduction in the basic rate of income tax in April 1996, assuming no changes in other given exogenous factors. [22443]

Mr Nelson [holding answer 4 May 1995]: Since 1978, it has not been the practice to provide results from the Treasury model in response to parliamentary questions, but the hon. Member will be aware that the model is available for Members' use through the Library of the House.

Accounting Officers

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many times in the last 10 years, and on which dates, his departmental accounting officer has issued a minute in that role; and what was the issue in each case. [22558]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Where a Minster overrules an accounting officer's advice on an issue of propriety or regularity or one of value for money, the accounting officer should request a written instruction from the Minister to take the action in question. No such instructions have been issued during the last 10 years.

All such instructions are now reported to the Comptroller and Auditor General who, after making whatever investigations he considers appropriate, will report his finding to the Public Accounts Committee.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 9 May 1995. [21898]

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 9 May. [21899]

Mr. Newton: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is currently on an official visit to Moscow as part of the VE day commemorations.

Bank Holidays

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Prime Minister which of his Ministers has responsibility for designation of bank holidays in (a) Scotland, (b) England, (c) Wales and (d) Northern Ireland. [22820]

The Prime Minister: Bank holidays are designated in the Banking and Financial Dealings Act 1971. Power to vary the specified dates or to designate additional dates is exercisable by Her Majesty by royal proclamation or in the case of Northern Ireland by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. By virtue of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's overall responsibility for the 1971 Act, the Treasury currently co-ordinates advice on any designations for royal proclamation in consultation with other Departments as necessary.

St. Paul's Angels' Nursery

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Prime Minister if he expects to make a further visit to St. Paul's Angels' nursery before September. [23132]

The Prime Minister: I currently have no plans to do so.

Public Records

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will introduce legislation to prohibit individuals, acting in a private capacity, from charging for the reproduction of any document or other material produced directly or indirectly in the service of the Crown. [23069]

The Prime Minister: No. Such legislation is not necessary. It is already the law, under section 163 of the Copyright, Design and Patents Act 1988, that Crown copyright subsists in any work made by an officer or servant of the Crown in the course of his or her duties.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will publish the whole of the correspondence with the Churchill family and their advisers relating to the expenditure of £13.5 million on the purchase of public and other records created during Sir Winston Churchill's periods of office as well as the records of all meetings of the commission with the Churchill Trust to discuss the matter. [23070]

The Prime Minister: No, it is not my normal practice to publish private correspondence.

Contrary to the impression given in the question, no public records were purchased. The national lottery memorial fund funded the purchase of non-state papers; the Government have transferred the state papers so that the whole archive is preserved, intact, at Churchill college.

Historical Documents

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister what special training is given to persons who have responsibility for assessing the historical significance of documents held by his Department. [23280]

The Prime Minister: Training and assessing the historical significance of departmental records is carried out under guidance of the Keeper of Public Records. It is provided in a number of different ways, including courses on the appraisal of records and through conferences and seminars arranged by the Public Record Office.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Offshore Oil and Gas Structures

Mr. Clappison: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he intends to publish guidelines relating to the abandonment of offshore oil and gas structures. [23517]

Mr. Eggar: The Department issued detailed guidelines on Thursday 4 May. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

Executive Salaries

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals he has to introduce statutory controls over the salaries of senior executives. [21632]

Mr. John Owen Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals he has to introduce statutory controls over the salaries of senior executives. [21634]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Sir Richard Greenbury's committee is considering the structure within which remuneration for directors of public companies is determined and disclosed. Once it has made its recommendations, the Government will consider whether any of these should be reinforced by legislative change. But executive salary levels and details of remuneration packages are matters for individual companies and their shareholders. It is not for the Government to intervene in these decisions or to limit companies' ability to pay competitive salaries.

Small Businesses

Mr. Hutton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about his Department's policy towards promoting employment in small businesses. [21644]

Mr. Page: The Government fully recognise and appreciate the importance of small businesses to the economy and the vital contribution they make to job creation.

The Government encourage the role played by small businesses in job creation by creating an economic environment in which they can flourish and grow. This includes stabilising interest rates and inflation and reducing legislative and administrative burdens.

My Department is developing a network of business links based on partnerships between local authorities, TECs, chambers of commerce, and enterprise agencies, to develop a wide range of high-quality business support services, particularly to businesses with the potential for growth.

It is my intention that the wide range of services delivered by my Department will be available through the business link network.

British Beef Co. Ltd.

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what were the outstanding liabilities of British Beef when it went into receivership. [22606]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: British Beef Co. Ltd. went into administrative receivership on 23 March 1995. The joint receivers have informed my officials that the directors estimated the realisable value of the company's assets at that date to be £14 million and that secured creditors were owed £8.5 million, preferential creditors £0.75 million and unsecured creditors £6 million.

Copyright and Rights of Performers Regulations 1995

Mr. Key: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received from representatives of the performing arts about the draft Copyright and Rights of Performers Regulations 1995; and if he will make a statement. [21567]

Mr. Ian Taylor: About 500 representations have been received in response to the consultative draft of these regulations issued by my Department with a request for comments by 28 April. Some 460 of these were from representatives of the performing arts, the great majority being from individual performers belonging to the Musicians Union or other performers' organisations and expressed in near identical terms. The remainder of the submissions were from other interested parties, most in the form of responses by national organisations replying on behalf of all their members. I am considering all the representations received and will in due course lay a statutory instrument before Parliament under the affirmative resolution procedure.

Accounting Officers

Mr. Meacher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many times in the last 10 years, and on which dates, his departmental accounting officer has issued a minute in that role; and what was the issue in each case. [22557]

Mr. Heseltine: Where a Minister overrules an accounting officer's advice on an issue of propriety or regularity or one of value for money the accounting officer should request a written instruction from the Minister to take the action in question.

The cases where such an instruction has been issued were set out in the reply given to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) on 8 March 1994, Official Report, column 211. No new cases have arisen since then.

All such instructions are reported to the Comptroller and Auditor General who, after making whatever investigations he considers appropriate, will report his findings to the Public Accounts Committee.

Public Records

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 2 May, column 131, to what extent (a) professional historians and (b) qualified archivists are involved at any stage in the 10-year and 25-year sifts. [22939]

Mr. Heseltine: (a) When the Department needs the advice of a professional historian, it obtains this via the Public Record Office, which maintains close links with the academic community.

(b) Those staff at the Public Record Office whose role is to guide and inspect the work of my Department's records review section include one qualified archivist who carries out checks on 10-year sifts and two to three qualified archivists who are involved with the 25-year reviews.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 2 May, column 131, what special training is given to persons who have responsibility for assessing the historical significance of documents held by his Department. [22940]

Mr. Heseltine: The Department provides internal, on-the-job training for records review staff, who are also supported by on-the-job coaching from qualified archivist staff from the Public Record Office. The Department also avails itself of formal training courses, annual conferences and special seminars provided by the Public Records Office.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Simpson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, what percentage of his Department's budget is allocated to initiatives which have been undertaken to secure private finance for his Department's projects. [22793]

Mr. Heseltine: The private finance initiative within the DTI is one of the responsibilities of the MINIS—management information system for Ministers—unit within the finance and resource management division of my Department. This unit is expected to cost £249,000 in 1995–96 against a total gross running costs provision of £318,883,000.

Brent Spar Oil Platform

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations have been received by Her Majesty's Government in regard to the permission given to Shell to scuttle the Brent Spar oil platform in the Atlantic. [22928]

Mr. Eggar: Under the terms of section 1(3) of the Petroleum Act 1987, Shell UK Exploration and Production was required to consult a number of interested parties about its abandonment programme for the Brent Spar installation. Replies were received from the Joint Nature Conservation Committee, Scottish Natural Heritage, the Scottish Fishermen's Federation and British Telecom International.

Since I approved the programme, Greenpeace has made representations to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bovine Somatotropin

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what surveys and investigations he has conducted into the acceptability of the use of synthetic BST in milk among (a) farmers and (b) consumers.

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 1 May 1995]: A formal consultation of over 200 organisations and individuals, including farmers and consumer groups was conducted last year seeking views on the future availability of BST products. A copy of the responses received is available from the main Ministry library in Whitehall place. We have also received a number of representations on the subject via hon. Members and direct from both farmers and consumers. In addition, the subject has been raised at farmers and consumer meetings which my ministerial colleagues, have attended around the country.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which of the advisory non-departmental public bodies sponsored by his Department are under a statutory requirement to (a) publish their advice to (b) publish an annual report and (c) lay an annual report before Parliament; and if he will list those with a statutory base. [21598]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 28 April 1995]: The information is as follows:

(a) None, but in practice a number do.

(b) Only the Veterinary Products Committee is required to publish an annual report, but the Advisory Committee on Pesticides and the Food Advisory Committee also do so.

(c) None.

The following advisory non-departmental public bodies have a statutory basis:

The Advisory Committee on Pesticides
The Agricultural Dwelling House Advisory Committees
The Consumers' Committee for Great Britain
The Committee of Investigation for Great Britain
The Committee on Agricultural Valuation
The Hill Farming Advisory Committee
The Veterinary Products Committee.

Fish Farming, Wiltshire

Mr. Key: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the business name and address of each site at which fish are farmed in the country of Wiltshire. [21566]

Mr. Jack: All fish farming businesses are required to register with MAFF for disease control purposes under the Registration of Fish and Shellfish Farming Businesses Order 1985 made under the Diseases of Fish Act 1983. There are currently 25 fish farm sites registered in the country of Wiltshire.

Under the terms of the Act, information obtained for disease control purposes relating to the particulars of any one person or business may be disclosed only in certain specified circumstances. I regret that I am therefore unable to provide details of the business name and address of each site at which fish are farmed.

Coastal Erosion

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will institute a comprehensive technical survey of the coastline between Flimby and Silloth with a view to establishing the scale of coastal erosion arising from tidal action in poor weather conditions. [22537]

Mr. Jack: This Department commissioned a survey of coast protection works and eroding coastlines in England in 1993 and the then Minister, my right hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South-West (Mrs. Shephard), announced it publication by written answer on 30 March 1994, Official Report, column 774. A copy of the report on the survey was placed in the Library of the House.

More detailed studies of coastal erosion in local areas are the responsibility of the relevant coast protection authority, which for the coastline between Flimby and Silloth is the borough of Allerdale council. I understand that the council intends to prepare a plan for the future management of the shoreline in its area, taking account of coastal erosion patterns. This Department may provide grant aid for studies leading to the preparation of such shoreline management plans or to proposals for improved coastal defences.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from Crosscanonby parish council as to coastal erosion on the west Cumbrian coast. [22538]

Mr. Jack: We have no record of any such representations from Crosscanonby parish council having been received by this Department.

Accounting Officers

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many times in the last 10 years, and on which dates, his departmental accounting officer has issued a minute in that role; and what was the issue in each case. [22559]

Mr. Waldegrave: Where a Minister overrules an accounting officer's advice on an issue of propriety or regularity or one of value for money, the accounting officer should request a written instruction from the Minister to take the action in question.

The cases in which such an instruction has been issued between 1979 and February 1994 were set out in my reply to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) on 25 February 1994, Official Report, column 496.

No such minutes have been subsequently issued by the accounting officer,

All such instructions are now reported to the Comptroller and Auditor General who, after making whatever investigations he considers appropriate, will report his findings to the Committee of Public Accounts.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of his Department's budget is allocated to initiatives which have been undertaken to secure private finance for his Department's projects. [22797]

Mr. Jack: At present, a modest proportion of the resources of my financial policy division, my building and estate management division and some other divisions with significant capital budgets are devoted to this initiative.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many, and what proportion of, vacancies advertised by his Department, and by each of his Department's agencies, in the last three years have listed the attainment of national vocational qualifications as an acceptable entry requirement; and, of those, how many have required (i) level 1 NVQs, (ii) level 2 NVQs, (iii) level 3 NVQs and (iv) other level NVQs. [22973]

Mr. Goodlad: My Department and its agencies have not listed the attainment of NVQs in advertised vacancies as an acceptable entry requirement in the last three years.

For those vacancies where academic qualifications are an entry requirement, the Department accepts GCSEs and equivalent qualifications including NVQs.

Military Training Assistance Scheme

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the annual cost to his Department of UK military training assistance scheme in each of the last five financial years. [23242]

Mr. David Davis: The annual cost of the United Kingdom military training assistance scheme for the last five financial years was:

1990–91: £18.1 million
1991–92: £15.2 million
1992–93: £12.5 million
1993–94: £11.9 million
1994–95: £12.1 million (forecast outturn)

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those countries which have benefited from the United Kingdom military training assistance scheme since 1 June 1990. [23247]

Mr. David Davis: The countries which have benefited from United Kingdom military training assistance since 1 June 1990 are Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua, Argentina, Bahamas, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belarus, Belize, Botswana, Brazil, British Virgin Islands, Bulgaria, Cameroon, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Cote d'Ivoire, Czech Republic, Dominica, Ecuador, Egypt, Estonia, Ethiopia, Fiji, Gambia, Ghana, Grenada, Guatemala, Guyana, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Ireland, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Latvia, Lebanon, Lesotho, Lithuania, Macedonia, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Malta, Mauritius, Mexico, Montserrat, Morocco, Mozambique, Namibia, Nepal, Nigeria, Pakistan, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Romania, Russia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Slovakia, Slovenia, South Africa, South Korea, Sri Lanka, St. Kitts, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Sudan, Swaziland, Tanzania, Thailand, Trinidad, Turkey, Turks and Caicos, Uganda, Ukraine, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Zaire, Zambia and Zimbabwe.

Entry Clearance

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, how many entry clearance officers were in post in (a) New York, (b) Moscow, (c) St. Petersburg, (d) Accra, (e) Lagos, (f) Abuja, (g) New Delhi, (h) Bombay, (j) Calcutta, (k) Madras, (l) Dhaka, (m) Islamabad, (n) Karachi and (o) Colombo in the financial years (i) 1992–93, (ii) 1993–94 and (iii) 1994–95 to the latest convenient date. [22646]

Mr. Baldry: The number of entry clearance officers at the posts listed, for the calender years 1992, 1993 and 1994, is given in man years as follows:

| | 1992 | 1993 | 1994 |
|---|---|---|---|
| (a) New York | 2.9 | 1.42 | 3.00 |
| (b) Moscow | 5.13 | 3.81 | 4.90 |
| (c) St. Petersburg | — | 1.75 | 1.80 |
| (d) Accra | 5.64 | 4.83 | 4.96 |
| (e) Lagos | 19 | 17.67 | 14.33 |
| (f) Abuja | — | — | 1.58 |
| (g) New Delhi | 15.41 | 14.95 | 14.42 |
| (h) Bombay | 14.21 | 11.9 | 11.54 |
| (j) Calcutta | 1.45 | 1.4 | 1.17 |
| (k) Madras | 1.8 | 1.6 | 1.4 |
| (l) Dhaka | 17.5 | 12.3 | 12.08 |
| (m) Islamabad | 28.34 | 27.25 | 25.77 |
| (n) Karachi | 6.63 | 6.5 | 6.15 |
| (o) Colombo | 3.72 | 3.64 | 3.56 |

It should be noted that St. Petersburg and Abuja only started entry clearance work in November 1993 and February 1994 respectively.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what were the costs of the entry clearance work at each post in the Indian subcontinent in (a) 1992–93, (b) 1993–94 and (c) 1994–95; what they are forecast to be in (i) 1995–96 and (ii) 1996–97; and how they are calculated. [22644]

Mr. Baldry: The costs of entry clearance work at each post are shown on the table.

These reflect the numbers and grades of staff, both UK-based and locally engaged, employed on entry clearance as a proportion of total staff at post.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what were the costs of the entry clearance work at the British posts in (a) New York, (b) Moscow, (c) St. Petersburg, (d) Accra,

(e) Lagos and (f) Abuja, in the financial years (i) 1992–93, (ii) 1993–94 and (iii) 1994–95; what are they forecast to be in (i) 1995–96 and (ii) 1996–97; and how they are calculated. [22645]

Mr. Baldry: The cost of entry clearance work at each post are shown on the table.

These reflect the numbers and grades of staff, both UK-based and locally engaged, employed on entry clearance as a proportion of total staff at post.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many entry clearance officers in (a) New York, (b) Moscow, (c) St. Petersburg, (d) Accra, (e) Lagos, (f) Abuja, (g) New Delhi, (h) Bombay, (j) Calcutta, (k) Madras, (l) Dhaka, (m) Islamabad, (n) Karachi and (o) Colombo have other duties; and what proportion of their time, respectively, is spent on these. [22639]

Mr. Baldry: The number of entry clearance officers in the following posts with other duties; and the percentage of their time spent on them is as follows:

| | Number | ECO per cent. | Other per cent. |
|---|---|---|---|
| St. Petersburg | 1 | 90 | 10 |
| Abuja | 1 | 50 | 50 |
| Calcutta | 1 | 75 | 25 |
| Madras | 2 | 70 | 30 |
| Colombo | 2 | 80 | 20 |
| Colombo | 2 | 98 | 2 |

All other Entry Clearance Officers are 100 per cent. engaged on entry clearance work.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications for visit entry clearance were (a) made, (b) granted and (c) refused at the British post in Kingston, Jamaica in (i) January to June 1993, (ii) July to December 1993, (iii) January to June 1994 and (iv) July to December or the latest convenient date in 1994. [22640]

Mr. Baldry: We do not have a half-yearly breakdown of the details requested.

The number of UK applications for entry clearance—both settlement and non-settlement—made, granted and refused in 1993 and 1994 at Kingston was as follows:

| | Number |
|---|---|
| 1993 | |
| Applied | 2,835 |
| Granted | 2,044 |
| Refused | 804 |
| 1994 | |
| Applied | 4,026 |
| Granted | 2,978 |
| Refused | 1,034 |

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications for visit entry clearance were (a) made, (b) granted, and (c) refused at the British posts in (i) Ottawa, (ii) Moscow, (iii) Wellington and (iv) Canberra in (1) January to June 1993, (2) July to December 1993, (3) January to June 1994 and (4) July to December or the latest convenient date in 1994. [22642]

Mr. Baldry: We do not have a half-yearly breakdown of the number of the details requested.

The number of applications for visit entry clearance made, granted and refused in 1993 and 1994 at the posts listed was as follows:

| | 1993 | | | 1994 | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | A | G | R | A | G | R |
| 1) Ottawa | 8,808 | 8,241 | 19 | 10,019 | 9,937 | 51 |

| 3) Wellington | — | — | — | 1,995 | 2,720 | 28 |
| 4) Canberra | 11,593 | 11,076 | 16 | 17,317 | 16,065 | 12 |

It should be noted that Wellington started entry clearance work in February 1994.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications for visit entry clearance were (a) made, (b) granted and (c) refused at the British posts in (i) Manila, (ii) Tokyo, (iii) Sana'a and (iv) Addis Ababa in (1) January to June 1993, (2) July to December 1993, (3) January to June 1994 and (4) July to December or the latest convenient date in 1994. [22643]

Mr. Baldry: We do not have a half-yearly breakdown of the details requested.

The number of UK applications for visit entry clearance made, granted and refused in 1993 and 1994 at the posts listed was as follows:

| | 1993 | | | 1994 | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|

Antarctic Treaty

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his letter of 26 April to the hon. Member for Linlithgow, what action was taken by Her Majesty's Government's delegation to the Antarctic treaty consultative meeting in Seoul about the condition of the Amundson-Scott base at the south pole. [22661]

Mr. David Davis: The Antarctic treaty consultative meeting in Seoul does not finish until Friday 19 May. I will write to the hon. Gentleman giving a substantive reply after that date.

Former Soviet Union (Visas)

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what basis certain citizens of the countries of the former Soviet Union are not charged for visas to travel to the United Kingdom; when this policy was started; and what plans there are to extend it to other countries. [22649]

Mr. Baldry: The exchange of notes between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics concerning the mutual abolition of consular fees on visas, Moscow, 13 April 1964, provides for entry clearance application fees to be waived for nationals of the former Soviet Union.

There are no plans to introduce similar arrangements for nationals of other countries.

Belgium (Passport Control)

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the stamping of United Kingdom passports at the Belgian frontier; and if it is his intention that Belgian passports should be stamped at the United Kingdom frontier. [22773]

Mr. David Davis: We are aware of a number of cases recently where the passports of UK nationals have been date-stamped by Belgian immigration officials at the Belgian frontier. We have no reason to believe that this practice amounts to immigration control on UK nationals, which would be illegal. Nevertheless, we have brought it to the attention of the Belgian authorities. The UK has no intention of date-stamping the passports of Belgian or any other EU nationals.

EDUCATION

Accounting Officers

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many times in the last 10 years, and on which dates, her departmental accounting officer has issued a minute in that role; and what was the issue in each case. [22556]

Mr. Robin Squire: Where a Minister overrules an accounting officer's advice on an issue of propriety or regularity or one of value for money the accounting officer should request a written instruction from the Minister to take the action in question.

In a reply to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) of 3 March 1994 Official Report, column 808, it was reported that the Secretary of State had not since 1979 issued any formal instructions to override the advice of his accounting officer on a matter of propriety or regularity or one relating to economy, efficiency and effectiveness. No direction has been issued since the date of that reply.

All such instructions are reported to the Comptroller and Auditor General who, after making whatever investigations he considers appropriate, will report his findings to the Public Accounts Committee.

Special Needs

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will make a statement on progress of the special educational needs code of practice; to what extent teachers are reporting increased work load as a result; and what plans there are to revise it. [22634]

Mr. Forth: The code of practice on the identification and assessment of special educational needs came into effect in September 1994. It has been widely welcomed as reflecting and supporting good practice in schools. Some schools have expressed concern at the increased work load as they change their procedures in the light of the guidance in the code. The Department is monitoring the implementation of the code and will in due course evaluate its effectiveness. There are no plans to revise the code at this stage.

Nursery Places

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the current average cost of providing a full-time nursery place in each local education authority in England and Wales. [22822]

Mr. Forth: This information is not held centrally for local education authorities in England. Local education authorities in Wales are the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Wales.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will list the grant-maintained schools which have sought a change in their planned admission level or their standard number; and in each case (a) if the application has been successful, (b) how many objections were submitted and (c) if an objection was submitted by the local education authority. [23127]

Mr. Forth: Schools set published admission levels above their approved admission numbers in any particular year without applying to my right hon. Friend for approval.

Details of applications from grant-maintained schools to vary their approved admission numbers are shown in the table. Applications from grant-maintained schools in stage 2 and 3 areas are the responsibility of the Funding Agency for Schools. I have asked its chairman to write to the hon. Member.

| School | Successful (a) | Number of objections (b) | LEA objection (c) |
|---|---|---|---|
| All Saints CE Primary, Sutton | No | Nil | No |
| Beaconsfield High, Buckinghamshire | Yes | Nil | No |
| Beechen Cliff, Avon | Yes | Two | No |

| School | Successful (a) | Number of objections (b) | LEA objection (c) |
|---|---|---|---|
| Deacon's School, Cambridgshire | Yes | Nil | No |
| Homewood School, Kent | Yes | None | No |
| Queensmead School, Harrow | Yes | None | No |
| St. Bartholomews School, Berkshire | No | None | No |
| Tiffin Boys' School, Kingston | Yes | [1]One | Yes |

[1] LEA objection.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what were the total numbers of schools new to the grant-maintained sector since the previous year for each financial year from 1990–91 to 1995–96 (a) from which bids for capital grants for named projects were received and (b) to which allocations were approved.

Mr. Forth: These matters are now the responsibility of the Funding Agency for Schools. I have asked its chairman to write to the hon. Member with this information.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will list the grant-maintained schools which have sought approval for changes in their admissions policy to introduce the selection of pupils by reference to their aptitude or ability which do not constitute a significant change of character; and in each case (a) if their application has been successful, (b) how many objections were submitted and (c) if an objection was submitted by the local education authority. [23126]

Mr. Forth: This information is not readily available. I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education which grant-maintained schools have applied for a change of character; and what was her decision in each case. [23128]

Mr. Forth: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Nursery Education

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will list the Acts of Parliament, and the statutory instruments in force arising therefrom, relating to (a) standards for premises for nursery education, (b) qualifications of nursery school teachers, (c) training and qualifications of nursery assistants and (d) ratios of (i) qualified teachers and (ii) assistants to pupils in nursery education. [23101]

Mr. Forth: The standards for premises at maintained schools attended by nursery pupils are set out in the Education (School Premises) Regulations 1981 made under the Education Act 1944.

The qualifications required of teachers employed at maintained nursery schools are governed by the Education (Teachers) Regulations 1993 made under the Education Reform Act 1988.

There are no statutory requirements for staff-pupil ratios and nursery assistant qualifications in maintained nursery schools and classes. Guidance on such matters is given in the Children Act 1989 guidance.

Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what steps her Department has taken to prevent the cloning of telephones being utilised by her Department; and if her Department has discussed this matter with any official agencies. [23458]

Mr. Forth: The Department has a code of good practice for all users of analogue mobile phones, which includes advice received from British Telecom about security and password protection. The Department has started to purchase the latest digital technology mobile phones, which British Telecom states cannot be cloned.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what costs her Department has incurred during the last 12 months as a result of cloning of mobile telephones being utilised by her Department, with particular reference to the making of unauthorised calls. [23494]

Mr. Forth: No costs have been incurred during the last 12 months as a result of cloning of mobile telephones.

Mr. Donhoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what use her Department makes of hand-held and car-based mobile telephones; what were the costs for each financial year of these services since mobile telephones were first introduced to her Department; and how many mobile telephones are currently in use. [23437]

Mr. Forth: Mobile telephones have been in use in the Department since 1990. Currently, 115 mobiles are held at annual rental of £31,050 plus calls charges. No central record of call charges is available. Last year, 100 mobiles were held at an annual rental of £27,000 plus. Minimal use is made of car-based mobile telephones.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many mobile telephones being utilised by her Department have been cloned during the last 12 months. [23502]

Mr. Forth: No mobile telephones have been cloned during the last 12 months.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what representations her Department has made to the Department of Trade and Industry concerning the need for legislation to prevent the cloning of mobile phones. [23397]

Mr. Forth: Cloning of mobile phones has not been a problem for the Department. No representations have been made to the Department of Trade and Industry.

WALES

Psychiatry Beds

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide a table showing the number of elderly mental illness beds in each of the district general hospital areas of Wales. [21587]

Mr. Richards: The following table lists those NHS trusts and directly managed units which had, at 31 March 1994, a district general hospital and beds allocated to old-age psychiatry.

| NHS Trust/Management Unit | Beds allocated to old age psychiatry at 31 March 1994 |
|---|---|
| Bridgend and District NHS Trust | 158 |
| Ceredigion and Mid Wales NHS Trust | 5 |
| Llandough Hospital NHS Trust | 37 |
| Merthyr Cynon Health Unit | 61 |
| University Hospital of Wales/Cardiff Royal Infirmary Group of Hospitals | 58 |

Administration Costs

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what were the numbers of staff and the administrative costs of each education authority in Wales and the number of school pupils for which each education authority was responsible in the year ended 31 March. [21790]

Mr. Richards: The latest available information on administrative costs and pupil numbers for each local education authority are given in the table. Administration costs refer to all education services administered by local authorities, including continuing education and the youth service. Pupil numbers refer only to pupils of maintained primary, secondary and special schools. Information on administrative staff numbers, for individual local authorities, is not held centrally.

Local Education Authority gross expenditure on Administration and Inspection 1993–94[1]

| | Staff costs[2] £000 | Total[3] £000 | Pupil numbers[4] |
|---|---|---|---|
| Clwyd | 2,189 | 8,413 | 62,107 |

| West Glamorgan | 2,022 | 4,918 | 58,482 |
| Total Wales | 20,340 | 50,424 | 466,500 |

[1] Provisional outturn.

[2] Includes teaching, education support, premises related, administrative, clerical and other staff within the education management and support services sector.

[3] Includes expenditure on service strategy and regulation, management and administration and the inspection and advisory services within the education management and support services sector.

[4] Full-time equivalents at January 1994. Excludes grant-maintained schools.

Brucellosis

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many cases of brucellosis have occurred in each year since 1985. [21820]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The only years since 1985 in which there were confirmed brucellosis cattle herd breakdowns are as follows: 1985 four; 1986 eight; 1987 one; and 1993 one.

Chernobyl

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total compensation paid to farmers for loss of earnings and clean-up of radioactive contamination on Welsh farms arising from the fallout from the Chernobyl nuclear accident in 1986. [22026]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The sheep compensation scheme was introduced in July 1986 to compensate farmers whose enterprises had been disrupted as a result of movement and slaughter restrictions and other effects of the Chernobyl accident. The total paid out under the scheme in Wales up to the end of March 1995 is £7,524,272. Most of this sum has been compensation for costs associated with monitoring and marking animals before movement under consent.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many farms in Wales are still affected by restriction notices imposed due to radioactive contamination following the Chernobyl nuclear accident in 1986; and what land area these farms constitute as a percentage of available farmland in Wales. [22017]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: A review of the number of holdings now affected by post-Chernobyl restrictions, and of the extent to which those holdings are affected, was recently undertaken to assess the effects of recent derestrictions and the numerous changes in land ownership and tenure which have occurred during the past nine years.

The outcome of the review shows that 196 holdings now remain wholly affected by restrictions. A further 247 holdings are partially affected by virtue of their having access to some land inside the restricted area; this includes those holdings which have grazing rights within the area whether they are taken up or not, and those holdings which have some land, whether leased, owned or rented, within the restricted area. These figures will be subjected to future variation because of the frequent and often significant changes which will inevitably continue to occur in land ownership, tenure and occupation, including factors such as amalgamations and fragmentation of holdings.

Restrictions now cover about 160,000 acres which represents about 4 per cent. of agricultural land in Wales.

Farmers and Farm Workers

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total number of (a) farmers and (b) farm workers for each year since 1988, giving the figures as a percentage of the Welsh population. [21859]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Farmers and farm workers in Wales, 1988 to 1994:

| | Farmers[1] | | Farm workers[2] | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | Total population[3] | As a percentage of total | Total population[3] | As a percentage of total |
| 1988 | 34,854 | 1.22 | 30,992 | 1.09 |
| 1989 | 35,309 | 1.23 | 30,273 | 1.06 |
| 1990 | 35,046 | 1.22 | 29,992 | 1.04 |
| 1991 | 34,248 | 1.18 | 30,341 | 1.05 |
| 1992 | 35,115 | 1.21 | 29,819 | 1.03 |

| | Farmers[1] | | Farm workers[2] | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | Total population[3] | As a percentage of total | Total population[3] | As a percentage of total |
| 1993 | 35,977 | 1.24 | 29,149 | 1.00 |

NHS Trusts

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with health trusts concerning the matter of finance; and if he will make a statement. [22114]

Mr. Richards: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I meet the chairmen of NHS trusts periodically to discuss a range of issues, including finance.

Nursery Education

Mr Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy concerning nursery education and if he will make a statement. [22116]

Mr. Richards: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made clear last October that the Government are committed to making available a nursery place for every four-year-old whose parents want to take it up. We are considering carefully how to deliver that commitment in Wales and will consult widely on proposals.

Livestock Diseases

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many cases of foot and mouth disease occurred in each year since 1978; [22178]

(2) how many cases of epizootic lymphangitis occurred in each year since 1985; [22182]

(3) how many cases of pleuro-pneumonia occurred in each year since 1985. [22168]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: None.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of (a) men and (b) women aged 40 and over who are out of work. [22810]

Mr. Redwood: In January 1995, the numbers of males and females aged 40 and over, who were in the unemployment claimant count in Wales were 27,076 and 7,925 respectively.

Class Sizes

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the total extra money required to be allocated to local education authorities in Wales to ensure class sizes throughout of 30. [22807]

Mr. Richards: My right hon. Friend has made no such assessment. Class sizes are a matter for individual schools to determine.

Birds of Prey

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number and species of birds of prey poisoned in each year since 1987. [22364]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Information held by the Department on the number and species of birds of prey poisoned in Wales since 1987 is as follows:

| | Red Kite | Buzzard | Peregrin Falcon |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1987 | — | 1 | 1 |
| 1988 | — | 1 | — |
| 1989 | 7 | 5 | 1 |
| 1990 | — | 1 | — |
| 1991 | 1 | 1 | — |
| 1992 | 6 | 1 | — |
| 1993 | 3 | 4 | — |
| 1994 | 2 | 1 | 2 |

Accounting Officers

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many times in the last 10 years, and on which dates, his departmental accounting officer has issued a minute in that role; and what was the issue in each case. [22561]

Mr. Redwood: Where a Minister overrules an accounting officer's advice on an issue of propriety or regularity of expenditure or one of value for money, the accounting officer should request a written instruction from the Minister to take the action in question.

Details of the two cases where such an instruction was given to my Department's accounting officer were set out in my reply of 23 March 1994 to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) Official Report, column 317. There have been no subsequent cases.

All such instructions are now reported to the Comptroller and Auditor General, who after making whatever investigations he considers appropriate will report his findings to the Public Accounts Committee.

S4C

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, what information he has received from (a) departmental surveys and (b) S4C on the proportion of Welsh speakers that watches Welsh language television; and if he will make a statement. [22828]

Mr. Richards: The Welsh social survey, which was conducted in 1992, showed that 81.5 per cent. of Welsh speakers watched S4C regularly or sometimes. S4C's annual report for 1993 indicated that independent audience measurement carried out by the Broadcasters Audience Research Board showed that, on average, 84 per cent. of Welsh speakers watched S4C at some point in any given week.

Medium Secure Units

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, if he will list by regional health authority and by district health authority the current number of beds in medium secure units run by health authorities; what were the figures for each of the last four years; and if he will make a statement. [23513]

Mr. Richards: There are 19 medium secure beds available in the Caswell clinic, Glanrhyd hospital, Bridgend, which is the only such NHS facility operational within Wales. An extension to the facility is to be officially opened in June of this year and will subsequently increase the provision to 33 beds.

In north Wales, planning approval to develop a purpose-built, 25-bed medium secure unit at Llanfairfechan was obtained on 9 November 1994. The facility is expected to open in the first half of 1997.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Private Finance

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what percentage of his Department's budget is allocated to initiatives which have been undertaken to secure private finance for his Department's projects. [22795]

Mr. Dorrell: My Departments operates mainly through its many sponsored bodies and agencies and undertakes little capital expenditure on its own account. Its effort is therefore largely devoted to encouraging those whom it sponsors to exploit to the full in their own capital programmes the opportunities of the private finance initiative. I estimate that the cost of the promotional effort across my Department is about £65,000.

Accounting Officers

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many times, and on which date, his departmental accounting officer has issued a minute in that role; and what was the issue in each case. [22554]

Mr. Dorrell: There have been no occasions on which such action has been taken since the establishment of my Department in April 1992.

Works of Art

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage for what reasons a sculpture by Antonio Canova and a painting by Albrecht Altdorfer, were omitted from the list given in his written answer to the hon. Member for Warley, East on 8 March, Official Report, columns 177-78, on the progress of cases relating to the export of works of art; and if he will make a statement on the status of these items. [23168]

Mr. Dorrell: The answer given on 8 March included only those items where the decision to withhold the issue of an export licence had been taken during the half year ended 31 December 1994.

The sculpture "The Three Graces" by Antonio Canova was referred to in a reply to the hon. Member on 18 January 1994, Official Report, columns 497-98. The subsequent decision, taken in the half year ended 30 June 1994, was detailed in Parliamentary Command paper 2710, the fortieth report of the Reviewing Committee. The sculpture has been acquired jointly by the Victoria and Albert museum and the National Galleries of Scotland.

A decision on the painting "The Adoration of the Magi" by Albrecht Altdorfer was taken during January 1995. An export licence has been issued for this painting.

A Departmental press release of 30 March 1995 included these two cases as it is the practice to publicise details of all cases where decisions on export licence applications have been deferred.

S4C

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what criteria he uses in considering whether S4C is proving a satisfactory service to the people of Wales and whether S4C is being managed effectively and in a satisfactory manner. [22827]

Mr. Dorrell: The Welsh Fourth Channel Authority has the duty under the Broadcasting Act 1990 to ensure that S4C provides a satisfactory service. My Department needs to be satisfied that S4C has suitable arrangements in place to ensure that its financial systems are sufficient to safeguard public funds and that voted expenditure is being used for the purposes set out in the Act.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will place in the Library copies of the S4C's corporate strategy and its most recent operational plan. [22823]

Mr. Dorrell: I am arranging for copies of S4C's 1995 business plan to be placed in the Library of the House.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will list all discussions or correspondence with S4C, at ministerial or official level, since 31 March 1994, concerning staffing levels, remuneration and staff grading. [22824]

Mr. Dorrell: Staffing levels, remuneration and staff grading are matters for S4C which reports to Parliament each year through its annual report and accounts. I have had no discussions or correspondence on these topics.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what discussions he has had with S4C on the implications for S4C of the recent Welsh Office social survey on television viewing habits; and if he will make a statement. [22826]

Mr. Dorrell: I have had no such discussions with S4C. It is for S4C, if it wishes, to draw any lessons for the Welsh Office social survey to inform their programming decisions.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will inquire into the relationship between S4C and Teledwyr Annibynnol Cymru to assess whether the arrangements for funding TAC and its training and sponsorship affiliates are an appropriate use of S4C's programme funds. [22817]

Mr. Dorrell: The financial and other relationships between S4C and Teledwyr Annibynnol Cymru form part of the terms of reference of the study my Department has commissioned from Mr. John Beastall.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage on how many occasions in the last year he has formally met the chairman of S4C to discuss the affairs of the authority. [22637]

Mr. Dorrell: I have formally met the chairman of S4C once in the last year.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will list all meetings between his Department and officials of S4C since January 1994. [22635]

Mr. Dorrell: Since January 1994, my Department has held formal meetings with S4C on three occasions: 16 March 1994, 1 July 1994 and 8 March 1995. My officials responsible for broadcasting matters are, of course, in regular contact with S4C.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will list by grade those of his officials whose duties are related solely to S4C. [22638]

Mr. Dorrell: I have no officials whose duties are related solely to S4C.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will list by grade the staff in his Department whose duties involve S4C who are able to conduct their responsibilities through the medium of Welsh. [22636]

Mr. Dorrell: I have no staff whose duties involve S4C who are able to conduct their responsibilities through the medium of Welsh.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what consultation (a) his Department and (b) the Welsh Language Board had with the S4C Authority before S4C's service provision was split; and what was the statutory basis of the decision. [22650]

Mr. Dorrell: The Welsh Fourth Channel Authority was established under the Broadcasting Act 1980, and now operates as S4C under the Broadcasting Act 1990. The Government undertook wide consultation prior to the introduction of legislation on both occasions. One of the S4C's statutory duties is to ensure that a substantial proportion of the programmes that it broadcasts are in Welsh and the programmes broadcast between 6.30pm and 10pm each day consist mainly of programmes in Welsh. How it carries out this remit is an editorial matter for S4C.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what were the staffing levels of S4C at 31 March in each year since 1991 and on 31 December 1994. [22825]

Mr. Dorrell: S4C publishes figures for the average number of employees in each calender year in its annual report and accounts, copies of which are laid before Parliament and are in the Library of the House. Figures for the last four years are as follows

1991: 116
1992: 108
1993: 199
1994: 127

The 1994 annual report and accounts have not yet been published.

Business Sponsorship Incentive Scheme

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what were the costs of the investigations instigated by his Department into the alleged misuse of the BS1S for matching private and public funds for the support of the arts. [23014]

Mr. Dorrell: The investigation was carried out by Mr. John Beastall, who is a Treasury civil servant. My Department is responsible for travel costs arising from his study. The cost of these is expected to amount to £320.

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make a statement on investigations (a) instigated and (b) evaluated by his Department into the alleged misuse of the BSIS for matching private and public funds for the support of the arts. [23015]

Mr. Dorrell: My Department has received the report which I announced on 27 February had been commissioned from Mr. John Beastall, Official Report, column 680. Once the findings have been evaluated, I shall make his report available to the House.

Mr. Beastall was asked in his review to take account of reports received by my Department from the Association for Business Sponsorship of the Arts and from the Welsh Fourth Channel Authority, S4C. He has also drawn on an examination of the relevant records and a series of interviews with staff of S4C and the companies and organisations involved in the applications, conducted, at S4C's request, by Grant Thornton, S4C's auditors.

Churchill Papers

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will list the names of foreign organisations or individuals who have been (a) negotiating with the trustees or (b) bidding for the Churchill Trust Papers over the past five years. [22945]

Mr. Dorrell: This is a matter for the Churchill family trustees.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) if he will publish the legal advice he has received on the ownership of copyright of the Churchill papers; [22120]

(2) when his Department began inquiries into the ownership of copyright of the Churchill papers; and at what cost in legal advice and action; [22121]

(3) what advice he has taken on the ownership of copyright of the Churchill papers. [22122]

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 2 May 1995]: The Government have received advice that copyright in state papers belongs to the Crown. It has also been advised that it does not own the copyright in the non-state papers in the Churchill archive.

The Government took advice on these subjects in July 1991 and again in May 1994. The advice cost £3,100 exclusive of VAT.

Cinema Ownership

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make it his policy to promote diversity in the ownership of cinemas in the United Kingdom. [21990]

Mr. Dorrell: It is not the government's policy to interfere in the ownership of private companies, except in circumstances defined in legislation.

Public Bodies

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is the target, expressed in percentage terms, for female membership of the boards of his Department's sponsored bodies. [20994]

Mr. Dorrell: My Department hopes to achieve its goal of 35 per cent. representation of women on its public bodies by September 1996.

European Football Championship

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, pursuant to his answer of 28 April, Official Report, column 738, on the European football championship, by whom supporting programmes of cultural events are being drawn up. [22532]

Mr. Dorrell: Supporting events are being planned by, among others, host local authorities and regional arts boards—in liaison with the Football Association, regional tourist boards and the British Tourist Authority, and the English tourist board.

Television Licence Reminder Forms

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what discussions he has had with the BBC licence fee unit regarding the possible changes in the television licence reminder forms; and if he will make a statement. [22924]

Mr. Dorrell: Under the Broadcasting Act 1990, responsibility for the administration and enforcement of the television licensing system passed to the BBC with effect from 1 April 1991. It is therefore for the BBC to determine the content and presentation of the television licence reminder forms it uses.

National Lottery

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which a small regional charity designed to assist children to take up dancing courses past the age of 16, may be eligible for assistance from the national lottery; and if he will make a statement about dance. [22633]

Mr. Dorrell: Any dance organisation which meets the criteria set out in the guidance for applicants for national lottery proceeds issued by the four national Arts Councils can apply to one of those bodies for financial assistance.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Court Escort Service

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list escapes from the court escort service in (a) London and (b) England and Wales in (i) 1979, (ii) 1985, (iii) 1990 and (iv) the last year for which figures are available. [21895]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 3 May 1995]: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 9 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question asking for a list of escapes from the Court Escort Service in (a) London and (b) England and Wales in (i) 1979, (ii) 1985, (iii) 1990 and (iv) the last year for which figures are available.

The Court Escort Service started escorting prisoners in England and Wales (Area 7—East Midlands and Humberside) from 5 April 1993 and in London (Metropolitan) from 27 June 1994. The Metropolitan Court Escort Service is being phased in and is not yet fully implemented.

The information for the last year available (5 April 1994—31 March 1995) is given below:

| Period | Escort Service Area | Number of Escapes |
|---|---|---|
| 5 April 1994–31 March 1995 | Area 7 | 13 |
| 27 June 1994–31 March 1995 | Metropolitan | 2 |

Figures exclude prisoners recaptured within 15 minutes provided no further offences has been committed

Information about escapes from police forces in earlier years is not recorded centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Training

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the content of training provided to officials in the admission and asylum procedure with respect to (a) knowledge of international legal instruments, (b) asylum law, (c) humanitarian law, with particular reference to the Geneva convention and protocols, (d) language skills, (e) interview techniques, (f) inter-cultural training and (g) other matters. [22743]

Mr. Nicholas Baker [holding answer 5 May 1995]: The power to grant or refuse passengers leave to enter the United Kingdom is exercised by immigration officers. However, the determination of asylum claims is entirely a matter for officers in the asylum division of the Home Office who receive training based on the 1951 United Nations convention relating to the status of refugees and its 1967 protocol. Training regularly addresses most of the issues listed. Language skills are not required as interpreters are used when necessary.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what types of personnel are recruited to train officials in admission and asylum procedure; how they are recruited; and if he will make a statement on the training methods and materials used. [22744]

Mr. Nicholas Baker [holding answer 5 May 1995]: Trainers are recruited internally by competitive selection. Essential qualities include well developed inter-personal and communication skills coupled with detailed knowledge and experience of the appropriate subject matter. The methodology and materials used vary according to circumstances, and include role play, classroom presentations and video.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department to what extent training of officials in the admission and asylum procedures is carried out by a training institution; and how training is organised. [22745]

Mr. Nicholas Baker [holding answer 5 May 1995]: Training is delivered by immigration and nationality department staff trainers experienced in asylum related work. There is a continuing programme of courses and specialist seminars, with contributions from outside organisations such as the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the objectives set for the training of border officials in dealing with asylum-seekers and refugees as set out in (a) legislative tests, (b) regulations, (c) guidelines and (d) other documents. [22746]

Mr. Nicholas Baker [holding answer 5 May 1995]: The objectives of immigration officer training in asylum work are to:

(a) familiarise officers with the general principles of the 1951 United Nations convention relating to the status of refugees and its 1967 Protocol.

(b) instruct them in the relevant immigration rules and legislation.

(c) inform them of the procedures to adopt when interviewing applicants, referring applications to the asylum division and implementing asylum decisions.

(d) ensure that consistently high standards of professionalism and courtesy are maintained when dealing with asylum applicants, as with any other category of passenger.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list the category of officials who may come into contact with asylum seekers arriving in the United Kingdom; [22747]

(2) if he will list the categories of officials who have been assigned a specific role in the admission and asylum procedure. [22749]

Mr. Nicholas Baker [holding answers 5 May 1995]: Passengers arriving in the United Kingdom are examined by an immigration officer in accordance with the Immigration Act 1971. Passengers who apply for asylum will be interviewed initially by an immigration officer. All such cases will then be referred to the asylum division of the Home Office for determination of the asylum claim.

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what financial resources were devoted to the training of officials in admission and asylum procedures in the current and previous financial years; and what is the percentage change. [22752]

Mr. Nicholas Baker [holding answer 5 May 1995]: The information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. In any event, asylum training is an integral part of the immigration and nationality department training programme and to separate the costs from the overall training expenditure would be misleading.

Recruitment

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how officials who have been assigned a specific role in the admission and asylum procedure are recruited; and what is the minimum level of education required. [22748]

Mr. Nicholas Baker [holding answer 5 May 1995]: For external recruitment of executive and immigration officers, advertisements are placed in the national press, and selection is by fair and open competition on merit. Minimum educational qualifications are five GCSE/GCE passes at grade C and above, including English Language, of which two must be at A-level.

Commission for Racial Equality

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the names, qualifications and the relevant background of members of the Commission for Racial Equality, with their dates of appointment and tenure. [22575]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: The posts of commissioner at the Commission for Racial Equality are the personal appointment of the Home Secretary. They are initially appointed for a two-year period with the possibility of further extensions up to a total of five years. The current commissioners are:

| Name | Appointed | Until |
|---|---|---|
| Mr. Herman Ouseley | 19.04.93 | 18.04.98 |
| Mr. Aubrey Rose | 01.11.90 | 31.10.95 |
| Dr. Michael Chan | 01.11.90 | 31.10.95 |
| Mr. Ranjit Sondhi | 15.11.90 | 14.11.95 |
| Dr. Raj Chandran | 01.01.93 | 31.12.96 |
| Mr. Michael Hastings | 01.05.93 | 30.04.97 |
| Mr. Bob Purkiss | 01.05.93 | 30.04.97 |
| Dr. Dwain Neil | 01.05.93 | 30.04.97 |
| Mrs. Marie Cunningham | 01.05.03 | 30.04.97 |
| Dr. Zaka Khan | 01.05.93 | 30.04.97 |
| Mrs. Zahida Manzoor | 22.11.93 | 31.03.97 |
| Mr. Moussa Jogee | 01.09.94 | 31.08.95 |
| Mr. Hugh Harris | 01.01.95 | 31.12.96 |
| Mrs. Jaslien Singh | 01.01.95 | 31.12.96 |

Detail of commissioners' backgrounds are set out in the Commission for Racial Equality's annual reports, the most recent of which will be published on 6 June; a copy will be placed in the Library.

Entry Clearance

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for visit entry clearance were (a) made, (b) granted and (c) refused at the British post in (i) New Delhi, (ii) Bombay, (iii) Dhaka, (iv) Islamabad, (v) Colombo, (vi) Calcutta, (vii) Madras and (viii) Karachi in (1) January to June 1993, (2) July to December 1993, (3) January to June 1994 and (4) July to December or the latest convenient date in 1994. [22641]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: The information is given in the table.

Applications for entry clearance made by visitors, students and others for temporary purposes received, granted and refused, by post, 1993–94

Police Cells

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoner nights were spent in police cells in (a) 1979, (b) 1985, (c) 1990 and (d) the last year for which figures are available; and on what date he expects to eliminate the use of police cells. [21268]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 9 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about how many prisoner nights were spent in police cells in (a) 1979, (b) 1985, (c) 1990 and (d) the last year for which figures are available; and the date on which it is expected that the use of police cells will be eliminated.

Figures for the number of prisoners held in police cells have been collected centrally since 1980. The information available on how many prisoner nights were spent in police cells for 1980, 1985, 1990 and 1994 is given in the following table:

| Year | Number of prisoner nights spent in police cells |
|---|---|
| 1980 | 235,425 |
| 1985 | 16,425 |
| 1990 | 241,835 |
| 1994 | 54,277 |

The use of police cells is currently confined to the north west of England. The provision of 260 new places at Buckley Hall prison on 1 May and the return to use, following refurbishment, of a further 217 places at Manchester by 28 May, should end the use of police cells this summer.

Ethnic Minority Prisoners

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what special health and medical arrangements the Prison Service has in relation to ethnic minority prisoners. [23090]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. Derek Lewis to Mr. Doug Hoyle, dated 9 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about special health and medical arrangements in relation to ethnic minority prisoners.

The Prison Service is committed to eliminating racial discrimination in all aspects of its work. Medical officers are required under the race relations policy to ensure equality of access to all health care facilities for all inmates.

more than 50 per cent. of prison medical officers are from ethnic minorities.

If there are language differences which make communication difficult, prison medical officers are able to make use of the translation service which is available to governors. In establishments with large numbers of foreign detainees, multi-lingual picture card materials are available which provide symptoms, signs, medical conditions and medical symptoms to facilitate understanding.

European Economic Area Nationals

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 23 November, Official Report, column 158, if he will account for the differences in the numbers of EEA nationals required to leave given in that answer and in the answer of 22 June 1994 to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), Official Report, column 173. [23025]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: The written answer given to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), on 22 June 1994 at columns 172-73 contained a mis-print. The figure of "108" in column 173 should have read "280". The error was not noted in time for the Official Report to be corrected, but I wrote to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North on 24 November 1994 informing him of the printing error. A copy of my letter was placed in the Library. The figures contained in my reply of 23 November were correct for the period April to December 1993.

Prevention of Terrorism (Exclusion Orders)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many exclusion orders under the Prevention of Terrorism Acts have been in existence in each month of the past year; and when the most recent one was approved by him. [23040]

Mr. Howard: The information requested is as follows:

Exclusion orders made under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989: the number in force at the end of each month

| Month | Orders made by Home Secretary | Orders made by Secretary of State for Northern Ireland |
|---|---|---|
| 1994 | | |
| May | 72 | 9 |
| June | 72 | 9 |
| July | 70 | 10 |
| August | 67 | 10 |
| September | 64 | 10 |
| October | 62 | 10 |
| November | 61 | 10 |
| December | 58 | 10 |
| 1995 | | |
| January | 57 | 10 |
| February | 54 | 0 |
| March | 40 | 0 |
| April | 40 | 0 |

The most recent order was made on 16 January 1995 on the expiry of an order which was already in force.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of his Department's budget is allocated to initiatives which have been undertaken to secure private finance for his Department's projects. [22716]

Mr. Howard: Work associated with the private finance initiative is undertaken by Home Office staff as part of their normal duties. Separate information on this aspect of their work is not available. Resources allocated specifically to overseeing and developing the initiative amount to 0.002 per cent. of my Department's budget.

Liquor Licences, Durham

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list (a) the number of late licences issued by Durham magistrates over the last three years, (b) the organisations granted the licences, (c) the length of time of the extension, (d) the special occasion for which the licences were issued and (e) the number of applications which have been refused. [22581]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: We understand from the clerk of the justices at Durham magistrates court that the numbers of special orders for exemption granted by the court in the last three years are:

1992: 543
1993: 218
1994: 284

The clerk also informs us that the other information requested, which is not available centrally, could be obtained only at disproportionate cost, but that most special orders of exemption granted by Durham magistrates court to extend evening licensing hours run until 11.30 pm.

Rape

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many rape cases were heard in courts in England and Wales during each of the last three years. [22376]

Mr. Maclean: Information on the number of defendants prosecuted for rape offences is published annually in "Criminal statistics England and Wales Supplementary tables, Volume 1, Proceedings in magistrates' courts". Table S1.1(A) refers to it. The most recent edition is for 1993. The 1994 data will be available in the autumn.

Deportation

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement as to who has the responsibility for (a) men and (b) women who have served their prison sentence and are detained by the immigration services in prison awaiting deportation orders. [22378]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: The Prison Service is responsible for the day-to-day care of such detainees and the immigration service is responsible for reviewing the continued need for detention, the handling of the caseworkassociated with the making of a deportation order and making arrangements for removal from the United Kingdom, but the overall responsibility rests with the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Hunger Strikes

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of (a) men and (b) women who had been on hunger strike in prisons in England and Wales for more than 14 days on 17 April. [22205]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison

Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 9 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the number of men and women who had been on hunger strike in prisons in England and Wales for more than 14 days on 17 April.

There was only one male prisoner who had been on hunger strike for over 14 days on that date.

Action Against Crime

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much was spent producing his Department's recent Action Against Crime packs; and how many were produced. [22266]

Mr. Howard: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Bristol, South (Ms Primarolo) on 24 April, Official Report, column 385.

Smoking

Mr. Peter Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what facilities are provided and arrangements made for the well-being and comfort of staff who (a) smoke and (b) do not wish to be affected by smoking at (i) the work-station and (ii) rest, recreation and refreshment facilities at 50 Queen Anne's gate, London. [21911]

Mr. Howard: At 50 Queen Anne's gate smoking is not allowed in lifts, toilets and conference rooms. There is a small smoking area in the staff restaurant. The extent to which smoking is allowed in offices is a matter for heads of divisions, taking into account the individual preferences of their staff.

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunities matters. [21527]

Mr. Howard: My Department is committed to ensuring that all staff are treated fairly and have an equal opportunity to contribute to the office's work. This stems not only from considerations of equity, but from the need to ensure that the Department makes the best use of the qualities that its staff possess.

To this end, the Department works towards implementing the three programmes for action produced by the Cabinet Office—Office of Public Service and Science—which cover issues of race, gender and disability and provide a framework for departmental policy on equal opportunities.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress he hopes to achieve in his Department over the next three months to push forward the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the fourth UN conference on women; and if he will agree to incorporate a section on equal opportunities in his Department's annual report. [21529]

Mr. Howard: The Government are committed to the principles set out in the regional platform for action agreed at the preparatory conference in Vienna for the fourth UN conference on women. We have taken these forward through a wide range of programmes and initiatives and will continue to do so.

Material on equal opportunities is incorporated in the Home Office annual report each year.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department. [21528]

Mr. Howard: The Department's policy, in line with guidance issued in 1992 by the ministerial group on women's issues, is that policy proposals should ensure that unlawful or unjustifiable sex or race discrimination does not occur and that similar principles apply to people with disabilities, older people or ex-offenders. This scrutiny is part of a continuous process, as part of policy advice to Ministers.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which Minister in his Department has responsibility for equal opportunities issues. [21526]

Mr. Howard: I have overall responsibility for personnel matters in the Department, including equal opportunities for staff. Other Ministers deal with equal opportunities issues as they arise within the subject areas for which they are responsible.

Fazakerley and Bridgend Prisons

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what financial penalties he proposes to build into the contracts for Fazakerley and Bridgend prisons which could be invoked if, by a decision of Government, the contracts were terminated; [21221]

(2) if he will place copies of the tender documents and proposed contract documents from Fazakerley and Bridgend prisons in the Library; [21219]

(3) if he will list the types of circumstances in which the successful tendering for the operation of Fazakerley and Bridgend prisons under the terms of the proposed contracts can be held to be in breach of contract; [21223]

(4) what review periods and at what frequency he proposes to build into the proposed contracts for Bridgend and Fazakerley prisons; [21218]

(5) what duration he proposes to put on the contracts for Fazakerley and Bridgend prisons; [21222]

(6) what financial or other kinds of penalties he proposes to build into the contracts for operating Bridgend and Fazakerley prisons; penalties could be invoked. [21220]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. George Howarth, dated 9 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about the contracts for the prisons to be built at Fazakerley and Bridgend.

Evaluation of the bids to design, construct, manage and finance the prisons at Fazakerley and Bridgend has not yet been completed and, therefore, it is not yet possible to set out the exact terms and conditions relating to performance and termination that will be included in the final contract.

However, the Prison Service has proposed that the contracts should be for the provision of a custodial service for 25 years. Also, the Authority will retain the right to terminate the contracts both voluntarily and in the event of default by the contractor. A system of performance measurement will be included in the final contracts, providing the ability to penalise the contractor for sub-standard performance. The financial settlement due in respect of any of the above events is still a matter included in the above negotiations, but the invitation to tender described the amount to be paid on termination for default as whichever is the lesser sum of the value of the project to the contractor or the contractor's loan liabilities at the time.

I have arranged for a copy of the invitation to tender to be placed in the library, and shall arrange for a copy of the final unpriced version of the contracts to be placed in the library when the have been signed.

SOCIAL SECURITY

National Insurance Recording System

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security who will own the data following the letting of the contract for the national insurance recording system number 2; and if he will make a statement. [22577]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The Secretary of State for Social Security will remain the owner of all data held within the national insurance recording system—NIRS2. Custodianship and management of the data are delegated to the Contributions Agency, which directs the service provider in all matters connected to content and use of NIRS2 data.

Income Support

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the savings to the Exchequer from the lowest rate of income support benefit payable to those aged between 18 and 25 years. [22407]

Mr. Roger Evans: The current annual cost of raising the income support rate for 18 to 24-year-olds to that payable for single people aged 25 and above would be about £240 million.

Notes:

1. The figure is based on the 1990, 1991, 1992 family expenditure surveys, uprated to 1995–96 prices and benefit levels.

2. The figure includes the additional cost of linked increases in housing benefit and council tax benefit.

Social Security Benefits

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on departmental policy, or performance targets relating to benefit payments made to claimants who are patients detained under the Mental Health Acts and on leave of absence from hospital with particular reference to whether they are entitled to receive full entitlement to state benefits as soon as they leave hospital; what reassessment they undergo on leaving hospital; who is responsible for informing his Department that a patient so detained is on leave of absence from hospital; what reductions are made to the level of state benefits of patients so detained; and whether detained patients allowed leave of absence from hospital for rehabilitation receive lower benefits than the level to which they had been entitled before they were detained. [22131]

Mr. Hague: With the exception of people transferred to hospital from prison while still under sentence, people detained in hospitals under the Mental Health Acts are treated in the same way as any other person in hospital. The effect of a period in hospital on the main benefits likely to be in payment to a patient are detailed in the table. Provided that the person still satisfies the conditions of entitlement, benefits are normally restored in full when a person leaves hospital—whether on leave or permanently. No other re-assessment is needed unless the person's general circumstances have changed.

It is the responsibility of the individual to tell the Department when he leaves hospital.

| Weeks | |
|---|---|
| 4 | Attendance allowance and disability living allowance (care component) withdrawn. |
| | Severe disability premium in income support withdrawn. |
| 6 | Retirement pension, widow's benefit, incapacity benefit, severe disablement allowance reduced by £11.75 for a person with a dependant, or £23.50 for a person without a department. |
| | Income support reduced to £14.70 for a single person and by £11.75 where the patient is one of a couple. |
| 52 | Retirement pension, widow's benefit, incapacity benefit, severe disablement allowance reduced by £11.75 for a person with a dependant and reduced to £11.75 for a person without a dependant. |
| | Income support reduced to £11.75. Members of a couple must make separate claims. |

Note:

Periods in hospital punctuated by periods of leave of four weeks or less are aggregated.

Accounting Officers

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many times in the last 10 years, and on which dates, his Departmental accounting officer has issued a minute in that role; and what was the issue in each case. [22565]

Mr. Hague: Where a Minister overrules an accounting officer's advice on an issue of propriety or regularity or one of value for money, the accounting officer should request a written instruction from the Minister to take the action in question.

All such instructions are reported to the Comptroller and Auditor General who, after making whatever investigations he considers appropriate, will report his findings to the Committee of Public Accounts.

No such directions have been issued as stated by the Secretary of State in his reply to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney, (Mr. Rowlands) on 24 February 1994, Official Report, column 372.

Mortgage Interest

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much money his Department expects to save as the result of the new regulations relating to assistance for mortgage interest payments; and what they estimate is the average saving per claimant. [23026]

Mr. Roger Evans: The Social Security Advisory Committee has consulted widely on the proposals for changes to assistance with mortgage interest payments, and I expect to receive its report shortly. The financial effects will depend on the final details of the scheme, which will not be decided until I have studied its report.

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people received assistance with mortgage interest payments in each year since 1990; and what is the current average level of assistance, by standard economic region. [23028]

Mr. Roger Evans: I will write to the hon. Member shortly.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the likely effect of his proposed changes to housing benefit rules, which take effect from October, on those living in housing association-owned special needs hostels and sheltered housing for the elderly. [23079]

Mr. Roger Evans: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey) on 2 May, Official Report, column 165.

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received regarding his proposed changes to housing benefit rules, which take effect from October; and if he will make a statement. [23080]

Mr. Roger Evans: We await the report from the Social Security Advisory Committee following its public consultation exercise on our proposals for housing benefit changes from October 1995. We have also formally consulted the local authority associations, from which we have received representations. In addition, we have received representations from other interested parties, including the National Federation of Housing Associations, the Chartered Institute of Housing and the National Association of Citizens' Advice Bureaux, as well as individuals.

Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations his Department has made to the Department of Trade and Industry concerning the need for legislation to prevent the cloning of mobile telephones. [23478]

Mr. Hague: None

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what steps his Department has taken to prevent the cloning of telephones being utilised by his Department; and if his Department has discussed this matter with any official agencies; [23463]

(2) what costs his Department has incurred during the last 12 Months as a result of cloning of mobile telephones being utilised by his Department, with particular reference to the making of unauthorised calls; [23497]

(3) what use his Department makes of hand-held and car-based mobile telephones; what were the costs for each financial year of these services since mobile telephones were first introduced to his Department; and how many mobile telephones are currently in use. [23454]

Mr. Hague: I will write to the hon. Member shortly on these matters.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many mobile telephones being utilised by his Department have been cloned during the last 12 months. [23500]

Mr. Hague: Ten.

National Insurance

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the effect on Treasury revenue in a full year of raising the upper earnings limit for national insurance by (a) £5, (b) £10 and (c) £15. [23346]

Mr. Arbuthnot: It is estimated that, for 1995–96, the additional income from class 1 employee contributions and class 4 self-employed contributions would be:

(a) £55 million

(b) £115 million

(c) £165 million

Source:

Government Actuary's Department

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the effect on Treasury revenue in a full year of raising the lower earnings limit for national insurance to the level of the personal tax allowance; and how many people would be taken out of national insurance by this measure. [23347]

Mr. Arbuthnot: It is estimated that there would be a reduction in national insurance contributions of about £500 million in a full year and that about 500,000 people would be removed from the coverage of the national insurance scheme.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, what is his estimate of the cost, in each of the years 1996–97, 1997–98 and 1998–99, of reinstating contributory jobseeker's allowance for a period of 312 days in respect of (a) people who are registered disabled, (b) people who move from incapacity benefit to sign on as unemployed and (c) people who place restrictions on their availability for work because of their physical or mental condition. [21601]

Mr. Roger Evans [holding answer Friday 28 April]: Extending the period of contribution-based jobseeker's allowance to 312 days, in respect of people who move from incapacity benefit as a result of the new medical test, would bring costs of £10 million in 1996–97, £15 million in 1997–98, and from £10 million in 1998–99.

No information is available relating to the proportion of unemployed claimants who are registered disabled. It is not possible to estimate the number of claimants likely to agree restrictions on their availability for work because of their physical or mental condition under jobseeker's allowance.

Notes:

1. Assumes 2.4 million unemployed and an unemployment benefit caseload of 500,000 in 1997–98 if jobseeker's allowance had not been introduced.

2. Figures rounded to the nearest £5 million.

3. Figures make no allowance for any possible claims deterrent effect of the new medical test in incapacity benefit.

4. Estimates made using data from the 1990–91–92 family expenditure surveys uprated to 1994–95 and benefit rates.

Social Fund

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has received the Social Security Advisory Committee's report on his proposals for changes to the social fund funeral payments scheme; and if he will make a statement. [19209]

Mr. Roger Evans [pursuant to his reply, 5 April 1995, c. 1231]: I can confirm that the Social Security Advisory Committee's report, and the Secretary of State for Social Security's response to it, have been laid before Parliament today along with amending regulations for a new social fund funeral payment scheme which take effect from 5 June.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many absent parents have received an interim assessment from the Child Support Agency since its inception; [21793]

(2) how many absent parents who have received an interim assessment from the Child Support Agency since its inception have subsequently become (a) unemployed and (b) recipients of income support; [21794]

(3) what steps the Government are taking to monitor the relationship between Child Support Agency interim assessment orders and subsequent unemployment. [21795]

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Miss Ann Chant to Mr. Mike Gapes, dated 5 May 1995:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Questions to the Secretary of State for Social Security about Interim Maintenance Assessments (IMA) issued by the Child Support Agency.

Since launch to the end of February 1995 the Agency completed and issued a total of 133,167 IMAs. From April this year there have been changes in the use of IMAs; a new higher rate IMA may be imposed on high earners; a non-punitive IMA has been introduced for self-employed earners; a protected earnings rate has been introduced in cases where an IMA is being collected via a deductions from earnings order, and once the absent parent (AP) has provided all required information, their liability under the preceding IMA will revert to that of the Full Maintenance Assessment.

The Agency cannot monitor the relationship between the imposition of IMAs and any subsequent unemployment of APs. IMAs are imposed either because an AP fails to provide the Agency with the necessary information required to carry out a maintenance assessment, or, as in the majority of such cases, the AP fails to return a maintenance enquiry form at all. An analysis of the number of APs who become unemployed following the imposition of an IMA is not possible, as the Agency often has no personal details of the AP other than their name and address.

I hope this is helpful.

Disability Living Allowance Unit, Blackpool

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the arrests of four members of staff at the DLA unit, Blackpool; what were their duties; and what plans there are to review the cases with which they had dealt. [22630]

Mr. Hague: This is a matter for Mr. Ian Magee, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ian Magee to Mr. Robert N. Wareing, dated 4 May 1995:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the Disability Living Allowance Unit.

As the matter to which you refer is sub judice, I regret that I am unable to comment at this time.

SCOTLAND

Civil Servants

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in his Department and the agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21760]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The number of Scottish Office employees appointed at administrative assistant and administrative officer levels is shown in the table. The figures comprise appointments to associated Departments and agencies. They include both fixed-term and permanent appointments, but exclude casual appointments, promotions and regradings.

Appointments made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts by the Scottish Office: September 1993–April 1995

| Total | 66 | 18 | 5 | 16 | 9 | 10 | 20 |

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the individual value of each (a) compulsory early retirement and (b) flexible early retirement package received by civil servants leaving his Department on grounds of limited efficiency in each of the last five years. [22079]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 2 May 1995]: Compensation payments for early retirement on grounds of limited efficiency are age, salary and service related. Over the period in question, no officers who left the Department on limited efficiency grounds received compulsory early retirement terms. Seven left under the flexible early retirement package:

1 in 1990–91

1 in 1991–92

1 in 1992–93

3 in 1993–94
1 in 1994–95

The payments received by these officers are listed in descending order of magnitude. Year dates are not shown to avoid individuals being identified.

Bank Holidays

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy to protect traditional Scottish bank holidays in the event of the Scottish clearing banks harmonising bank holidays with their English counterparts. [22157]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The statutory bank holidays in Scotland remain those set out in schedule 1 to the Banking and Financial Dealings Act 1971 or proclaimed each year under that Act. Their purpose is to safeguard the banks if they choose to close on these days. The days on which banks decide to close or open however, is a matter for them. Statutory bank holidays have always had less general significance in Scotland than in other parts of the UK. Public, or local, holidays, determined by each local authority for its own area, tend to be observed rather than the statutory bank holidays. This is part of the Scottish tradition.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to amend the Banking and Financial Dealings Act 1971 to impose a statutory obligation that Scottish clearing banks must close on Scottish bank holidays. [22159]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Government believe that it would not be right to make bank holidays prescriptive. That would be over-regulatory and would deny freedom of choice.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidance his Department will give to the Scottish clearing banks on the issue of harmonisation of bank holidays; and what guidance has been given in past discussion. [22158]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This is not a matter in which the Government have any role. The Scottish clearing banks took the decision to adjust their bank holidays for business reasons, after taking their own legal advice. They did not consult the Government, nor were they required to do so.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next plans to meet the banking unions to discuss harmonisation of bank holidays throughout the United Kingdom. [22156]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The days on which banks open and close is a matter for the banks to discuss with their employees. There are therefore no plans for any such meeting.

Shell Petroleum (Brent Spar Terminal)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what permissions have been given to Shell Petroleum to dispose of the terminal Brent Spar in deep water; and what assessment has been made of the ultimate destination of arsenic, cadmium and other dangerous substances. [22658]

Sir Hector Monro: The Scottish Office has issued a licence under the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 and an authorisation under the Radioactive Substances Act 1993 to allow disposal of the Brent Spar buoy, stripped of detachable equipment, at sea in accordance with the abandonment programme approved by the President of the Board of Trade. In line with our obligations under international conventions, a thorough survey was undertaken to identify the deep-sea disposal site in the north Atlantic to deposit the Spar at a depth in excess of 2,000 m and beyond the reach of fishing activity. Detailed assessments have been made of the likely impact on the environment of this disposal method, including what contaminants remain in the Brent Spar. It has been concluded that any effects of these contaminants on the marine environment will be negligible.

Epilepsy

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many neurologists, neuropsychiatrists and neurosurgeons specialising in epilepsy there are in Scotland; how this relates to the recommended level in each case; and if he will make a statement. [22432]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information on staff specialising in epilepsy is not collected centrally. Neuropsychiatry is not recognised as a separate specialty.

The whole-time equivalent numbers of consultants in neurology and neurosurgery at 30 September 1994 were:

Neurology: 21.0
Neurosurgery: 16.5

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many epilepsy clinics there are in Scotland; how this relates to the recommended level; and if he will make a statement; [22433]

(2) what is the mean waiting time for out-patient treatment for epilepsy in each health board area in Scotland; how this relates to the patient's charter waiting times; what plans he has to improve the position; and if he will make a statement. [22434]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not available centrally.

Dental Services

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of dental practitioners in Caithness and Sutherland working within the national health service. [21781]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 May 1995]: Dentists who wish to provide NHS general dental services must join a health board's dental list. At present, there are 86 general dental practitioners on Highland health board's dental list, of whom 15 have practice addresses within Caithness and Sutherland.

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has about the number of dental practitioners working in the highlands who have left the national health service over the past two years giving their reasons for so doing. [21782]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: A dentist must join a health board dental list in order to provide NHS dental services. A dentist can withdraw from a health board dental list at any time, subject to giving the required notice, and need not give a reason for withdrawing. The information requested is not therefore available.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list the dental practices in Banff and Macduff that are still registering patients and that are not exempt from dental charges, under the national health service; and if he will make a statement; [22716]

(2) if he will list the dental practices in the town of Turriff that are still registering and treating patients under the national health service; and if he will make a statement. [22717]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not available centrally.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he intends taking to improve the provision of national health service dental facilities in the town of Turriff, Banff and Macduff; and if he will make a statement. [22718]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Grampian health board is responsible for NHS dental services within its area. If necessary, a health board may seek approval from the Secretary of State to appoint a salaried dentist to ensure access to NHS services.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State if he will list the distances a resident of (a) Turriff, (b) Banff and (c) Macduff would have to travel to attend a dental practice registering patients, not exempt from dental charges, under the national health service; and if he will make a statement. [22719]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not available centrally.

Private Hospitals

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the NHS hospitals built by the private sector and operated by the private sector; and if he will make a statement. [22666]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There are no NHS hospitals in Scotland built and operated by the private sector.

Birds of Prey

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number and species of birds of prey poisoned in each year since 1987. [22363]

Sir Hector Monro: The numbers and species of birds of prey recorded as having been poisoned in Scotland are:

| | 1987 | 1988 | 1989 | 1990 | 1991 | 1992 | 1993 | 1994 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Buzzard | 9 | 11 | 11 | 12 | 11 | 11 | 18 | 13 |
| Eagle | 2 | 4 | 1 | 2 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 1 |
| Hen Harrier | — | 1 | — | 2 | — | 1 | — | — |
| Peregrine Falcon | — | — | 3 | — | — | — | — | 2 |
| Red Kite | — | — | 1 | — | — | — | 1 | — |
| Sparrowhawk | — | — | — | — | — | 1 | — | — |
| Tawny Owl | — | 2 | — | — | — | — | — | — |
| Total | 11 | 18 | 16 | 16 | 12 | 14 | 20 | 16 |

Ravenspark Hospital

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the current position in respect of conclusion of the contract between Irvine Care Ltd. and Ayrshire and Arran health board for the replacement facility for Ravenspark hospital. [23492]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The contract has not yet been signed. Irvine Health Care Ltd. is still awaiting planning permission for the project. That will be considered by Cunninghame district council later this month.

Medium Secure Units

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list by regional health authority and by district health authority the current number of beds in medium secure units run by health authorities; what were the figures for each of the last four years; and if he will make a statement. [23508]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Medium and high security beds for Scotland are provided solely at the state hospital, Carstairs.

The state hospital has a maximum capacity of 340 beds. This level of provision has not varied in the last four years.

DEFENCE

Phosgene Gas

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what quantity of phosgene gas cannisters has been dumped by his Department in Lune Deeps, near Fleetwood, since 1965. [22143]

Mr. Soames: None.

Former Yugoslavia

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what assessment his Department has made of the command structure required for any possible pull-out of UN forces from the former Yugoslavia; [23019]

(2) what assessment his Department has made of the role that NATO's allied reaction corps would play in any possible UN withdrawal from the former Yugoslavia; [23020]

(3) what assessment his Department has made of the number of troops required to enable a withdrawal of UN forces from the former Yugoslavia; and if he will make a statement; [23021]

(4) what assessment his Department has made of the time scale required for any withdrawal of UN troops from the former Yugoslavia; and if he will make a statement. [23023]

Mr. Soames: At the request of the UN Secretary-General, NATO is continuing with contingency planning for a NATO commanded operation to withdraw UN forces from the former Yugoslavia, should that become necessary. The UK is co-operating closely with NATO and good progress has been made. It would not, however, be appropriate for me to comment on the details of the plan, which are a matter for NATO.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department has taken part in Exercise Arcade Guard relating to a possible UN withdrawal from the former Yugoslavia; what lessons were learnt as a consequence of this exercise; and if he will make a statement. [23022]

Mr. Soames: Some 400 UK Army personnel took part in NATO's Exercise Arcade Guard. NATO is currently evaluating the results of the exercise, which concluded on 28 April.

Mr. MacDonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what body made the initial recommendation to withdraw the British contingent from Gorazde; if he will make it his policy that the British contingent will not be withdrawn until a replacement contingent is in place together with all necessary equipment; and if he will make a statement. [22145]

Mr. Soames: The Government do not intend to replace British troops in Gorazde when their tour ends in September 1995. The UN was informed of this decision in April to allow it sufficient time to identify suitable replacements.

Mr. MacDonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will end the practice of describing Bosnian Government forces as Moslem forces on the weekly situation maps produced for public circulation by British forces Headquarters in Bosnia.

Mr. Soames: I have asked for the map to be amended.

Bevin Boys

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recognition is being given during the commemorations to mark the 50th anniversary of the end of the second world war for the role of Bevin boys who served in British coal mines. [23024]

Mr. Soames: Events to mark the 50th anniversaries of VE day and VJ day offer a welcome opportunity to pay tribute not only to the military but to the civilian contribution to the war effort. The Government are well aware of the vital role played by many who were not in uniform during the second world war. The Bevin boys have been invited, through the Bevin Boys Association, to be represented at this year's commemorative events.

Defence Establishment, Malvern

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many personnel at his Department's Defence Establishment at Malvern were (a) administrators and (b) scientists in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [23045]

Mr. Freeman: This is a matter for the chief executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. I have therefore asked him to reply.

Letter from John Chisholm to Dr. David Clark, dated 9 May 1995:

In today's written answer the Secretary of State for Defence informed you that I would be replying to your question concerning the number of administrators and scientists employed at DRA Malvern over the last 10 years.

I am only able to provide you with figures showing staff numbers since 1 April 1992. Although the DRA was formed in April 1991 our staff database was not created until later in the year. I do not, therefore, have a breakdown of the 1991 staff numbers nor do I have figures for the earlier years. I have, however, shown in the table below the overall numbers working at Malvern. This separately identifies scientific and other technical staff who make an important contribution to our work. On the specific point about scientists, you will see that their numbers have grown significantly under the agency.

| DRA Malvern | 1 April 1992 | 1 April 1993 | 1 April 1994 | 31 March 1995 |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Scientists | 690 | 768 | 842 | 966 |
| Administrators | 185 | 180 | 160 | 168 |
| Other technical staff (PTO's, Engineers etc) | 404 | 382 | 281 | 237 |
| Other support staff (industrials etc) | 369 | 408 | 404 | 342 |
| Total | 1,648 | 1,738 | 1,687 | 1,713 |

I hope this is helpful.

Mr. Perry Miller

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 1 May, Official Report, column 84, if he will specify the reasons for the departure in February 1993 of Mr. Perry Miller, his former special adviser; and what payments were made to Mr. Perry Miller. [23046]

Mr. Rifkind: Mr. Perry Miller informed me that he wished to end his appointment as my special adviser in order to take up a position in the private sector. Mr. Miller gave notice of his resignation as required under his terms and conditions of employment and received no payment on giving up his appointment.

Export Services Organisation

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the relationship between the Defence Export Services Organisation and the Defence Sales Agency. [22578]

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 20 December 1994, Official Report, column 1197, about the function of the Disposal Sales Agency.

Accounting Officers

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many times in the last 10 years, and on which dates, his departmental accounting officer has issued a minute in that role; and what was the issue in each case. [22567]

Mr. Soames: Where a Minister overrules an accounting officer's advice on an issue of propriety or regularity or one of value for money, the accounting officer should request a written instruction from the Minister to take the action in question.

Cases in which such an instruction has been issued were set out in my answers to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) on 10 March 1994, Official Report, column 401, and to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on 22 March 1994, Official Report, column 174, and in the statement by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 9 March 1995, Official Report, columns 459–60.

Job Losses

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the reduction by relevant category in the number of his Department's posts resulting from the competing for quality programme. [22571]

Mr. Freeman: Under my Department's delegated financial structure, budget holders operate within financial allocations which cover a range of operating costs, including staff. Between April 1992 and September 1994, some 14,700 service and civilian posts were reviewed under the CFQ programme. As a result, reductions of 11,167 posts have been proposed. Details of the categories of the posts reduced are not held centrally.

Army Base Repair Organisation

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the possible sale of ABRO Old Dalby, Leicestershire. [22775]

Mr. Freeman: As announced on 31 January, Official Report, column 556, we are proceeding with the withdrawal of MOD activity away from the workshop as my Department is no longer able to make effective use of the modern high technology facilities at the site for their existing purpose. We are considering possible alternative defence uses for the site, but in the interim every effort will be made to encourage the private sector to put forward innovative proposals for alternative uses. My Department is working closely with the local authorities on this. Marketing consultants have been appointed and we will shortly be mounting an expressions of interest marketing campaign to determine what demand there might be for commercial uses for the site.

Portland Naval Base

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the meetings held in the last 12 months between (a) Ministers and (b) officials of his Department and prospective bidders for the purchase of the Portland naval base. [23129]

Mr Soames: No Ministers have had meetings in the last 12 months to discuss with prospective purchasers the sale of the Portland naval base. Officials have met prospective purchasers on 11 occasions during that period.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the (a) representations received from officials of the National Audit Office and (b) the meetings with officials of the NAO held to discuss the role of the Portland naval base. [23131]

Mr. Soames: A meeting about the sale of the Portland naval base was held between my officials and those of the National Audit Office on 25 April. No representations have been received from officials of the National Audit Office about the sale of the site.

Al Yamamah Offset Programme

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the progress and the value of offset projects arising from the Al Yamamah I and II agreement. [23130.]

Mr. Freeman: Six projects have been implemented since the Al Yamamah offset programme was launched in 1989. They are as follows:

1. Saudi development and training—providing a wide range of vocational training packages and performing training assessment tasks. The company is fully operational.

2. Aircraft accessories and components co-servicing of vital aircraft components. Commenced full operations in mid 1993.

3. Glaxo Saudi Arabia—a facility manufacturing ethical pharmaceutical products. Trial production commenced in March 1995.

4. United Sugar Co—Tate and Lyle are shareholders in a world scale sugar refinery project. Construction will start in June 1995.

5. Middle East Propulsion Co—the repair and maintenance of civil and military gas turbines. Rolls-Royce are partners in this project. Factory construction to start in mid 1995.

6. Cyclar—a licensing venture to produce aromatics from Liquefied Petroleum Gas using a process jointly developed by UOP and BP. The project is still at the pre-engineering stage.

The total value of the projects is approximately £460 million.

Defence Equipment Gifts

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 1 May, Official Report, columns 87-88, if he will list the overseas Governments receiving gifts of defence equipment since April 1992, the date of the gift, the nature of the defence equipment and its estimated value. [22915]

Mr. Freeman: The information is as follows:

| Country | Date | Item | Value £ |
|---|---|---|---|
| Canada | 15/10/92 | Armoured vehicles | 1,600 |
| Nepal | 16/02/93 | 70 light machine guns | 7,000 |
| Lebanon | 08/10/93 | 500 self-loading rifles | 40,000 |
| Albania | 21/12/93 | ACR430 system | 10,000 |
| France | 31/03/94 | AR martel missiles | 30,000 |
| Belize | 11/03/94 | Harrier GR3 | 1,200 |
| Nepal | 01/08/94 | SLRs LMGs | 10,000 |
| Jordan | 15/12/94 | Single Sea Hunter andspares | 22,000 |
| Australia | 09/01/95 | Gannet MKT5 | 5,000 |

Auxiliary Air Force

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what redundancy or other compensation payments are available to members of the Auxiliary Air Force whose contracts were terminated as part of "Options for Change" in April 1994. [22768]

Mr. Menzies-Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what redundancy or other payments will be made to members of the Auxiliary Air Force whose contracts were terminated as part of "Options for Change" in April 1994. [23332]

Mr. Soames: There is no provision in the regulations for the Royal Auxiliary Air Force to make redundancy or other compensation payments to those who are discharged on the disbandment of their unit.

Mr. Menzies-Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the employment status of members of the Auxiliary Air Force who were employed on various bases up until April 1994, and whose contracts were terminated as part of "Options for Change". [22767]

Mr. Soames: All those who served with the two Royal Auxiliary Air Force units which disbanded on 18 April last year were volunteer members of that force.

Magherafelt Base (Fire)

Mr. Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, when he intends to publish the results of the inquiry into the fire at the Royal Irish Regiment base in Magherafelt. [22916]

Mr. Soames: The board of inquiry into the fire at the Royal Irish Regiment's base at Magherafelt has not yet been completed. The results of the inquiry will be made available as soon as possible after completion.

Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, what use his Department makes of hand-held and car-based mobile telephones; what were the costs for each financial year of these services since mobile telephones were first introduced to his Department; and how many mobile telephones are currently in use. [23438]

Mr. Soames: Some use is made within my Department of hand-held and car-based mobile telephones for routine administrative purposes. No central record is maintained, however, either of the numbers of mobile telephones in use at present or of the aggregate cost to the Department. This information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

HMS Victorious

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many missiles HMS Victorious will collect from the United States facility at Kings bay prior to her deployment; and if he will make a statement. [23521]

Mr. Rifkind: HMS Victorious will collect 12 Trident D5 missiles from the US Navy's strategic weapon facility Atlantic at Kings Bay, Georgia, prior to her deployment at around the turn of the year.

HEALTH

Nurses' Pay

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the percentage change in nurses' pay in the last six years; what data source were used in calculating it; if she will give details of the calculation; and if the figure applies to nurses across the United Kingdom. [23294]

Mr. Malone: The Department of Employment's new earnings survey data show that nurses' average earnings in Great Britain increased by 78 per cent. between April 1988 and April 1994.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what account the Government have taken of the change in clinical grading in calculating the change in nurses' pay in the past six years. [23295]

Mr. Malone: The 78 per cent. increase in nurses' average earnings takes account of all the factors which have led to increases in earnings.

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS trusts have agreed the terms of local pay schemes for nurses and midwives. [21678]

Mr. Malone: It is understood that, by 2 May, at least 195 trusts in England had made their offers known, of which 147 are of around 3 per cent.

Medical Negligence

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of medical negligence involving the national health service have been settled in the last three years; and how many have remained outstanding. [22204]

Mr. Malone: Information about outstanding cases is not available centrally. For information about numbers of cases settled, I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) on 6 March at columns 41-42.

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment her Department has made of the procedures for dealing with claims for medical negligence in the national health service; and what proposals she has to improve the system; [22199]

(2) what plans she has to speed up the process of dealing with claims for medical negligence involving the national health service. [22200]

Mr. Malone: The clinical negligence scheme for trusts, which I announced on 29 March, will contribute to improved claims handling in those national health service trusts which decide to become members. Guidance will also be made available to all trusts on claims handling procedures. In addition, we are introducing a pilot mediation scheme in two English regions which will enable the parties to agree a satisfactory outcome without going to court.

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the latest figures for the length of time taken to resolve cases of medical negligence involving the national health service. [22202]

Mr. Malone: This information is not available centrally.

Opencast Mining

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what information she has on medical surveys in the United Kingdom linking high levels of serious illness with dust from opencast mining, with particular reference to areas covered and number of cases; [22616]

(2) if she will commission monitoring of levels of serious illness in areas where there is opencast mining generating significant levels of dust. [22617]

Mr. Sackville: Research on the effects on health of air pollution, including that of dust from opencast mining, has been referred to the independent advisory Committee on the Medical Effects of Air Pollutants. COMEAP has considered the suggestion that opencast coal mining might have a deleterious effect on the health of those living close to the workings. A study by Temple in 1992 was considered and COMEAP agreed that the results reported were consistent with an association between the opening of an opencast mine and an increase in asthma consultations. However, the committee considered that local awareness of the opening of the mine and concern about its possible effects on health were plausible explanations for the association and that further work would be needed to sustain a causal hypothesis.

In 1994, the Department of the Environment, the Department of Health and the Medical Research Council issued a joint call for proposals for work on air pollution and respiratory disease. The Department is currently considering the proposals that were put forward, including studies on the health effects of opencast mining.

Residential Care

Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will commission research to ascertain whether local authorities are using the personal expenses allowance to support married people whose spouse is in a local authority provided residential or nursing home care; and if she will make a statement. [22592]

Mr. Bowis: We have invited, but not as yet received, hard evidence to suggest that local authorities are not sensibly using their discretion to help spouses at home. However, the residential accommodation charging rules are kept under constant review, including whether any action in this area is necessary.

Cervical Cancer

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what reports she has received of women suffering from cervical cancer whose condition has worsened as a result of experimental treatment carried out by health trusts and health authorities. [22605]

Mr. Sackville: We are aware that several women who received radiotherapy treatment for cervical cancer in the 1980s have experienced significant adverse effects which they believe to have been caused by the treatment that they received as part of a research project.

Medical (Professional Performance) Bill

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her oral statement of 25 April in response to an intervention by the hon. Member for Croydon, North-East, (Mr. Congdon), Official Report, column 700, in what circumstances the provisions of the Medical (Professional Performance) Bill would apply in the case of a single act committed by a doctor falling short of serious professional misconduct. [22408]

Mr. Malone: A single incident would come within the performance procedures if the action of the doctor suggested that his general standard of professional performance could be seriously deficient. In those circumstances, the single incident would trigger an assessment to establish whether there was a pattern of serious deficiency.

NHS Trust Hospitals

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the NHS trust hospitals built by the private sector and operated by the private sector; and if she will make a statement. [22665]

Mr. Sackville: There are no national health service trust hospitals built by the private sector and operated by the private sector.

Dental Services

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the provision for transplant patients in respect of their specific dental care needs; and what are the particular treatments and financial assistance available for the dental care needs of transplant patients. [22670]

Mr. Malone: The range of treatments available to transplant patients is not different from that available to other dental patients. The general dental service, hospital dental service and community dental service are able to provide a range of treatments which deal comprehensively with any complication which may arise as a result of immunosuppression treatment in transplant patients. Transplant patients are subject to the same eligibility requirements for exemption from, or financial assistance towards, dental costs as other dental patients.

Yellow Card System

Ms Hodge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of general practitioners are making use of yellow card systems for reporting adverse side-effects of drugs. [22926]

Mr. Sackville: The survey by the department of clinical pharmacology at the university of Newcastle upon Tyne and the Medicines Control Agency published in March 1995 found that 77 per cent. of general practitioners had reported one or more suspected adverse reactions through the yellow card scheme.

NHS Trust Meetings

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will include in the new code on openness in the NHS a requirement for NHS trusts to hold their meetings in public and for health authorities to stop the practice of routinely closing their meetings to the public for significant parts of their agendas for items which are not confidential. [22731]

Mr. Malone: It is already a requirement that national health service trusts must hold an annual public meeting. The code of practice on openness in the NHS, published in April 1995, points to holding more public meetings as good practice, in line with the steps already being taken by an increasing number of trusts.

Health authorities must hold all their board meetings in public, though there is a provision for certain issues to be taken in a private part of the meeting. Whether and when to exclude the press and public is a matter for authorities themselves to decide.

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many, and what proportion of, vacancies advertised by her Department, and by each of her Department's agencies, in the last three years have listed the attainment of NVQs as an acceptable entry requirement; and, of those, how many have required (a) level 1 NVQs, (b) level 2 NVQs, (c) level 3 NVQs and (d) other level NVQs. [22955]

Mr. Sackville: No advertisements placed by the Department or its agencies listed the attainment of national vocational qualifications as an entry requirement.

Respite Care

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she is taking to ensure that the respite care needs of disabled people are fulfilled. [22694]

Mr. Bowis: The improvement in provision of respite care for disabled people has been a key objective of the community care reforms from the outset. Local authorities and health authorities must make provision for all local needs, including those for respite care. In the 1994–95 community care monitoring round, local authorities reported that they had been able to increase the number of respite care admissions above those made in the same period in the previous year. An extra £30 million is available this year, in the special transitional grant, for developing home and respite care.

Accounting Officers

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many times in the last 10 years, and on which dates, her departmental accounting officer has issued a minute in that role; and what was the issue in each case. [22555]

Mr. Sackville: Available records show no cases in the last 10 years in which the accounting officer has requested a written instruction from a Minister because the Minister has overruled the accounting officer's advice on an issue of propriety, regularity or value for money.

Treatment Costs

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the percentage change in the average cost of treating an acute patient between 1982–83 and 1992–93. [22776]

Mr. Sackville: Figures for 1992–93 are shown in the table. It is not possible to compare average costs between 1982–83 and 1992–93 because of changes in accounting practices. Since 1991–92, figures have included overheads and capital charges.

Heatherwood Hospital

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what has been the change in the provision of paediatric, maternity and accident and emergency services at Heatherwood hospital over the past year: and what change is planned in the next year; [22830]

(2) if she will make a statement on the consultations on the future of Heatherwood and Wexham Park NHS trust; [22831]

(3) if she will make it her policy that existing paediatric, maternity and accident and emergency services be maintained at Heatherwood hospital before the outcome of the consultation on the future of Heatherwood and Wexham Park Hospitals trust. [22829]

Mr. Sackville: There has been no significant change in the provision of paediatric, maternity and accident and emergency services at Heatherwood hospital over the past year. The future pattern of these services is currently the subject of public consultation and this has been extended to 6 June. There will be no change to the provision of these services prior to the outcome of the consultation exercise.

Camden and Islington Health Authority

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health from which budget the legal fees and moneys to settle the case of Dr. Chris Johnstone v. Camden and Islington health authority will come from; and to what extent her Department has underwritten the costs incurred by Camden and Islington health authority. [22901]

Mr. Malone: Any legal costs incurred by Camden and Islington health authority as a result of compensation claims made by former staff who were employed in the 10 trusts located within the boundaries of Camden and Islington before trust status was granted are paid out of a legal costs reserve created by the authority. If any claims were to exceed that reserve, the authority could seek access to the North Thames region's legal reserve.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on Dr. Johnstone's case against Camden and Islington health authority and its settlement with particular reference to her Department's involvement; and if she will indicate how much Camden and Islington health authority has spent in the last six years in legal fees on this case. [22902]

Mr. Malone: Dr. Johnstone's legal action began in March 1989 and he withdrew his claim on 24 April 1995. In order to minimise costs, Camden and Islington health authority paid £5,600 into court with the offer to meet his expenses; there was no admission of liability. The decision to reach this settlement was a matter for the authority and the Department of Health was not involved.

To date, the authority has spent £69,327 in legal fees.

Mental Health

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what was the percentage of patient episodes that were mental health related in the last available year; [22754]

(2) what was the total number of mental health related patients episodes in the last available year. [22753]

Mr. Bowis: The number and percentage of finished consultant episodes in England for 1993–94, the latest year for which figures are available, for the mental illness and mental handicap specialities are 292,000 and 2.9 per cent.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total sum given to mental health related voluntary organisations in the last available year. [22756]

Mr. Bowis: Awards under the Department's section 64 general scheme of grants to voluntary organisations in the field of mental illness totalled £2.46 million in 1994–95.

Housing and Health

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the relationship between housing and health. [22758]

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate she has made of the level of NHS expenditure undertaken each year to treat ill health caused by poor housing conditions. [23186]

Mr. Sackville: Due to the complex interaction of a number of factors, it is difficult to quantify the effects of any one factor and to establish causal links between housing conditions and health.

No estimates have been made of national health service expenditure on ill health related to housing conditions.

Royal Hospitals NHS Trust

Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost of the inquiry set up in December 1994 by Bruce Martin QC on behalf of the Royal Hospitals NHS trust into the leaking of confidential documents relating to Sir Colin Berry; what were the conclusions of the inquiry; when the findings will be made public; who will bear the cost of the inquiry; and which individual or individuals initiated the inquiry. [22821]

Mr. Sackville: This is a matter for the Royal Hospitals NHS trust. The hon. Member may wish to contact the trust chairman, Sir Derek Boorman, for details.

Junior Doctors

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many junior doctors are currently working more than an average of 72 hours per week. [22903]

Mr. Malone: At 30 September 1994, the latest date for which firm figures are available, there were 3,870 junior doctors contracted for more than an average of 72 hours a week in hard-pressed on-call posts. There were a further 2,196 junior doctors contracted for more than 72 hours a week in non-hard-pressed on-calls posts which are not subject to the current targets for reducing hours.

Our task forces conducted a further monitoring round on 8 February this year and I expect to be able to announce the results of that exercise very shortly.

Upper Limb Disorders

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research has been conducted into work-related upper limb disorders and repetitive strain injury; and if she will make a statement. [22910]

Mr. Sackville: The main agency through which the Government support biomedical and clinical research is the Medical Research Council, which receives its grant in aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. The Medical Research Council is not currently supporting any research specifically into work-related upper limb disorders or repetitive strain injury, but is willing to consider scientifically based sound proposals for research. I understand that the Health and Safety Executive, which is responsible for policy on prevention of upper limb disorders caused by work, has sponsored a number of studies with particular emphasis on finding practical means of intervention to prevent and control risks. The Health and Safety Executive is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment.

Voluntary Organisations (Funding)

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total sum given by her Department to voluntary organisations in the last available year. [22755]

Mr. Bowis: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge) on 5 April, Official Report, column 1212.

Death Rates

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the death rate in socio-economic group (a) 1 and (b) 5 in each year since 1979. [22757]

Mr. Sackville: The information is not available in the form requested.

Mortality of men in the longitudinal study 1976 cohort, by Registrar General's social class, for the periods 1979–81, 1982–85 and 1986–89 will be published with commentary in "Population Trends 80" in June 1995. Infant mortality by Registrar General's social class is published annually in the DH3 mortality series, copies of which are available in the Library.

Tobacco

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evidence she has that (a) banning tobacco advertising and (b) increasing the price of cigarettes will decrease the consumption of tobacco. [22759]

Mr. Sackville: In 1992, the Department reviewed all the available evidence on the effect of tobacco advertising on tobacco consumption. The evidence is listed in the discussion document, "Effect of Tobacco Advertising on Tobacco Consumption", copies of which are available in the Library. The Government concluded on the basis of the evidence reviewed that a ban on tobacco advertising in the United Kingdom would not have a major impact on reducing levels of smoking.

The Department recently published its view of the effect of price on tobacco consumption in the pamphlet, "The Importance of Price in Reducing Tobacco Consumption", copies of which are available in the Library. Studies show that an increase of 10 per cent. in the price of tobacco products can be expected to lead to a drop of between 3 per cent. and 6 per cent. in tobacco consumption. The studies are cited in the pamphlet.

Registration of Doctors

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to seek amendments to the Medical Acts in relation to limited registration of doctors and the standardisation of registration. [22766]

Mr. Malone: None at present.

London Ambulance Service

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will require the London ambulance service to postpone further action for changing the distribution of staff and reorganisation of rotas, as recommended by its operational research in health report, until after the publication of the report on the London ambulance service by the Health Committee. [23102]

Mr. Sackville: This is a matter for the London ambulance service.

Unemployment (Health Costs)

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate she has made of the level of NHS expenditure undertaken each year to treat ill health caused by unemployment. [23185]

Mr. Sackville: None.

East London and City Health Authority (Land Sales)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health who is responsible for the sale of any building and land within the area of the East London and City health authority found surplus to requirements; what public body has the duty of monitoring or auditing such sales; to what accounts and for what purposes the proceeds of any sale are devoted; and which authorities makes decisions related to the proceeds of such sales. [23612]

Mr. Sackville: Property which has not been transferred to a national health service trust is retained by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. That property will be managed by the local regional health authority, which in this instance is the North Thames regional health authority. The regional health authority will dispose of the property. The proceeds will show in its accounts, and it will decide how those proceeds will be used within its capital development programme. Those sale proceeds will be reinvested in the provision of health care.

Land and property transactions in the NHS are subject to policy, procedures and guidance issued by the NHS executive as part of Estatecode.

The accounts of health authorities and NHS trusts are subject to annual examination by auditors appointed by the Audit Commission.

St. Bartholomew's Hospital

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she expects to receive the report of the body she has established to examine the report on the use of premises at St. Bartholomew's hospital not to be used by the Royal Hospital trust; and what criteria she has asked it to apply in making such recommendations other than to reduce the call on public funds. [23611]

Mr. Malone: Sir Ronald Grierson has agreed to lead a project team which is being established to advise the Royal Hospital trust on future use of the Smithfield site. Terms of reference for the project team have yet to be finalised.

Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what use her Department makes of hand-held and car-based mobile telephones; what were the costs for each financial year of these services since mobile telephones were first introduced to her Department; and how many mobile telephones are currently in use. [23436]

Mr. Sackville: Mobile telephones are issued to mainly medical, scientific, professional and managerial staff who are required to maintain contact with the Department and the national health service when travelling or while out of normal working hours. Some 500 mobile telephones were in use in 1993–94 at an annual running cost of £302,000. For 1994–95, the corresponding figures are 477 mobile telephones at a cost of £288,000. Figures are not available prior to 1993–94.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many mobile telephones used by her Department have been cloned during the last 12 months. [23503]

Mr. Sackville: Four.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations her Department has made to the Department of Trade and Industry concerning the need for legislation to prevent the cloning of mobile telephones. [23479]

Mr. Sackville: None.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what costs her Department has incurred during the last 12 months as a result of cloning of mobile telephones being used by her Department, with particular reference to the making of unauthorised calls. [23495]

Mr. Sackville: None. The mobile telephone air time providers have not charged the Department for calls made by cloned telephones.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps her Department has taken to prevent the cloning of telephones being used by her Department; and if her Department has discussed this matter with any official agencies. [23465]

Mr. Sackville: Since cloning has not been a significant problem experienced in the Department, no preventive advice has yet been issued and no discussions have taken place with any official agencies.

Thalidomide

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research her Department has (a) funded and (b) evaluated into the transmission of damage caused by Thalidomide across generations. [23512]

Mr. Malone: The main agency through which the Government support medical and clinical research is the Medical Research Council, which receives its grant in aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. However, the Department has set up an advisory group on research into congenital limb reduction defects and a report was published in February this year recommending that a review of relevant research be carried out. The Government have also established a sub-group of the inter-departmental group on disability to focus on the delivery of health and other services. The group's report will reflect concerns of the Thalidomide action group, the trust and the society.

A number of initiatives are being taken forward by the Government, including providing more detailed knowledge for the medical profession on the longer-term effects of disability caused by Thalidomide.

Members' Inquiries

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many times in each of the last three years the NHS Executive has issued advice to chairmen and regional directors of health authorities and trusts on how to reply to the written inquiries of hon. Members. [23396]

Mr. Malone: It is a primary role of the national health service executive to give advice to the NHS and it has done so on numerous occasions during the past three years.

Medium Secure Units

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list by regional health authority and by district health authority the current number of beds in medium secure units run by health authorities in England; what were the figures for each of the last four years; and if she will make a statement. [23506]

Mr. Bowis: The figures for regions are shown in the table. They do not include places in national health service interim secure psychiatric units—many of which are of medium secure standard—or those funded by health authorities in independent sector facilities. Information for individual districts is not available centrally.

These places have been funded from the NHS central capital programme. Nearly 400 more places funded from this source are due to open by the end of next year.

Total central NHS capital investment in the medium secure programme amounts to more than £100 million—at 1993 prices—of which over £47 million was allocated between 1991 and 1995. In addition, further medium secure places are being developed by regions from mainstream NHS capital programme.

There were no purpose-built NHS medium secure places in 1979, despite the fact that the Glancy committee had recommended them in its 1974 report.

ENVIRONMENT

Capital Finance Regulations

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will amend the capital finance regulations to enable local authorities in England to fund new energy efficiency measures in local authority housing through operating leases without these counting against the authority's capital spending limits. [22267]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The capital finance regulations do not specify the kinds of equipment which may be the subject of operating leases. Instead, they lay down general criteria for such leases which ensure that the risk of ownership remains with the lessor. It is for local authorities and their auditors to decide whether these criteria are met in any particular case.

Local Government (Derbyshire)

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people were employed by each local authority in Derbyshire (a) full-time and (b) part-time excluding teachers in each year since 1983. [22164]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The information is given in the table.

The levels of employment in individual authorities are not directly comparable because of variations in, for example, population structure and social characteristics, the extent of the use of private firms and contractors and the level of work undertaken for other authorities and public bodies on an agency basis.

Avian Pest Species

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on avian pest species. [22343]

Sir Paul Beresford: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 1 May, Official Report, column 22.

Peregrine Falcon

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is taking to protect the peregrine falcon. [22344]

Sir Paul Beresford: All naturally occurring wild birds in the UK are protected by the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 which fulfils the UK's obligation under the EC birds directive to protect wild birds. Additionally, anyone found guilty of an offence against this species is liable to a special penalty.

Article 4.1 of the birds directive requires member states to take special conservation methods for certain vulnerable species, including the establishment of a network of special protection areas and breeding peregrine falcons are found on several classified sites.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many licences for taking wild peregrine falcons have been issued in each year since 1984; [22359]

(2) how many quarry licences for falconry were issued in each year since 1984; and what quarry species were involved. [22360]

Sir Paul Beresford: Details of licences issued under section 16 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 are contained in the reports by the United Kingdom to the European Community on derogations under article 9 of the directive on the conservation of wild birds, 79/409/EEC. Copies of the derogation report are held in the Library. Figures are not yet available for 1994.

Wild Birds' Eggs

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment in what circumstances it is possible to confiscate wild birds' eggs which have been illegally collected after the Protection of Birds Act 1954 came into force; how many cases have occurred of eggs collected after 1954 but before 1981 being confiscated in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [22345]

Sir Paul Beresford: Under the Protection of Birds Act 1954, section 1(c), it was an offence to take or keep wild bird eggs except in specified circumstances. The present law regarding the possession of wild bird eggs is set out in section 1(2) and (3) of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. Section 12(1)(b) of the 1954 Act enabled the police to:

> "seize and detain for the purposes of proceedings under this Act any wild bird, whether alive or dead, or any egg or nest of a wild bird, or any weapon or other article capable of being used to kill or take wild birds, which may be in that person's possession."

Section 19(1)(d) of the 1981 Act contains similar provisions for offences committed under that Act.

No records of court confiscations are kept centrally.

Migratory Geese

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the killing of migratory geese. [22346]

Sir Paul Beresford: All wild birds, including migratory species, in the UK are protected by the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 which enacts our statutory obligations under the EC birds directive. Those migratory geese—greylag, pink-footed and white-fronted—which are included on schedule 2 to the Act can be hunted outside the close season. Licences may be given for killing geese and other birds for the purposes specified in section 16 of the Act.

Opencast Mining

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, by name, the planning applications for opencast mining in the United Kingdom which have been refused by the local planning authorities and which have gone to appeal to the Planning Inspectorate in the last 10 years; how many have been successful and approved by the Planning Inspectorate; how many have been rejected by the Planning Inspectorate followed by the reversal of the decision by him; and how many have been successful and approved by the Planning Inspectorate but rejected by him. [22609]

Sir Paul Beresford: The provision of information on planning appeals is the responsibility of the Planning Inspectorate. I have asked its chief executive, Mr. Chris Shepley, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from C. J. Shepley to Mr. Gerry Steinberg, dated 5 May 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your Question about planning applications for opencast mining which have, on appeal, been decided by the Planning Inspectorate or the Secretary of State in the last 10 years.

Information on planning appeals decided before January 1988 is not available. Since then, 80 appeals involving opencast coal extraction have been determined—49 by Inspectors and 31 by the Secretary of State after exercising his power to recover jurisdiction of the appeals. 47 appeals were allowed (30 by Inspectors and 17 by the Secretary of State), and 33 were dismissed (19 by Inspectors and 14 by the Secretary of State). Details of these appeals are given in the enclosed tables.

Decisions taken by Inspectors are final, and the Secretary of State has no powers to overrule them. In respect of the appeals decided by the Secretary of State, his decision was not in accord with an Inspector's recommendation on only one occasion—that for the former Stagshaw Colliery, Corbridge, Northumberland (R2900/A/91/190575) which was dismissed on 18 February 1993.

As the tables are too long to be printed in the Official Report, arrangements will be made for a copy to be deposited in the Library.

European Regional Development Funding

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the projects within the Greater London area that have received European regional development funding in each of the last three years. [22405]

Sir Paul Beresford: My Department's records are as follows:

| Name of project | Borough | Amount paid £ |
|---|---|---|
| 1992–93 | | |

Birds of Prey

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many licences were granted for the taking of birds of prey from the wild; and how many birds of prey were taken under such licences, by species, in each year since 1982; [22361]

(2) how many falconry licences were issued in each year since 1982, broken down by the categories and numbers of prey species involved; and if figures are collected by the Department in respect of the numbers of prey taken. [22362]

Sir Paul Beresford: Details of licences issued under section 16 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 are contained in the reports by the United Kingdom to the European Community on derogations under article 9 of the directive on the conservation of wild birds, 79/409/EEC. Copies of the derogation report are held in the Library. Figures are not available for 1982, 1983 or 1994.

Accounting Officers

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment how many times in the last 10 years, and on what dates, his departmental accounting officer has issue a minute in that role; and what was the issue in each case. [22566]

Sir Paul Beresford: Where a Minister overrules an accounting officer's advice on an issue of propriety or regularity or one of value for money the accounting officer should request a written instruction from the Minister to take the action in question.

I am not aware that any such instruction has been issued to the accounting officer of my Department during the period in question.

All such instructions are reported to the Comptroller and Auditor General who, after making whatever investigations he considers appropriate, will report his findings to the Public Accounts Committee.

Opencasting, Tinsley

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he or any of his Ministers gave approval to the agreement between Sheffield development corporation and Budge which split responsibility for the provision of the infrastructure for an airport at Tinsley, Sheffield, and the opencasting of the Tinsley site; [22705]

(2) if he will undertake a public inquiry into the agreement between Sheffield development corporation and Budge, in relation to the profit accruing to RJB Mining from opencasting at Tinsley, Sheffield, and the liquidation of A. F. Budge and the effect on the infrastructure for an airport; [22711]

(3) what involvement and knowledge he and his Department had about the agreement reached between Sheffield development corporation and Budge which divided responsibility for providing the infrastructure for an airport at Tinsley, Sheffield, and the authority for operating the site. [22713]

Sir Paul Beresford: There was never a joint agreement covering coal extraction and the construction of an airport at Tinsley. Coal extraction was subject to an agreement between A. F. Budge (Mining) Ltd. and British Coal Opencast and operated from 1989.

In 1990, Ministers in my Department gave approval to the sale of land by Sheffield development corporation to A. F. Budge (Mining) Ltd. for the construction of an airport under a development agreement with the corporation.

Ministers were not involved in the later transfer of this agreement from A. F. Budge (Mining) Ltd. to Sheffield Airport Ltd. a subsidiary of the A. F. Budge parent group. Sheffield development corporation informed my Department of the proposed transfer but no further approval was necessary from my Department as the parent company guarantee was to remain in place.

We have no plans for a public inquiry.

Housing Association Tenants

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many tenants of housing associations in the west midlands have brought their homes for each year since 1979 under (a) right-to-buy legislation, (b) shared ownership schemes or (c) voluntary sales by housing associations. [22760]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The table below shows the numbers of tenants of housing associations in the west midlands who have bought their homes since 1989–90 under right-to-buy legislation and voluntary sales by housing associations; and the numbers of people purchasing properties under shared ownership schemes. Figures before 1989–90 are not available.

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many housing association tenants have taken up the tenants incentive scheme, or the previous home ownership for tenants of charitable housing associations scheme in the west midlands for each year since 1979. [22761]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The table shows the number of housing association tenants in the west midlands who have taken up the home ownership for tenants of charitable housing associations scheme and the tenants incentive scheme since 1984–85, when the home ownership scheme began.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 1 May, column 24, if he will make a statement on the possible conflicts of interest involving special advisers, listing the names of the individuals, the nature of the conflicts concerned and how the matters were resolved. [22904]

Sir Paul Beresford: In accordance with their appointment letters, special advisers have reported any possible conflicts of interest emerging during their periods of service to senior officials or Ministers, and have followed the advice they received about the action required to avoid actual conflicts emerging.

Right-to-buy Scheme

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information is available on the right-to-buy scheme in London. [23316]

Sir Paul Beresford: The right-to-buy performance of London authorities has been monitored by my Department for a number of years. Annual monitoring is carried out of each authority's performance at the end of September, with poor performers submitting additional reports on a monthly basis. Data from the latest survey are given in the table.

I am pleased to report that data for September 1994 show that the number of tenants whose applications are being unduly delayed continues to decline. Across London as a whole delays beyond statutory deadlines have fallen by over 40 per cent., from 403 to 238. This compares with over 15,000 delayed cases in March 1989 when the Government's "tenants sanctions" procedures came into effect.

Only Hackney was monitored on a monthly basis in 1994. I am glad to say that Hackney's performance has continued to improve and I have recommended that monthly monitoring can now cease. To September 1994, over 185,000 dwellings have been sold under the right to buy schemes in London.

Objective 1 Programme

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much objective 1 money for Merseyside the Government are holding in (a) the Consolidated Fund, and (b) in other accounts; to what extent such money is yet allocated for projects, and if he will make a statement. [23162]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Merseyside objective 1 programme was approved in July 1994 and since then the European Commission has transferred £55.283 million to Government. These resources are held not in the Consolidated Fund but in accounts operated by Departments until they are claimed by, and paid to, project sponsors.

To date, £23.704 million has been authorised for payment to project sponsors. The balance continues to be used in funding the £65.498 million of schemes already approved in the first round of project submissions. The speed at which the funds will be paid to project sponsors is overwhelmingly dependent on the speed at which they deliver their schemes.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is ready to announce the conclusion of the review of radioactive waste management policy. [23587]

Mr. Gummer: In May last year, I announced that my Department would be heading a review of radioactive waste management policy to be conducted in parallel with, but separately from, the nuclear review. Reappraisal of the policy was necessary in view of the developments that had taken place in the 10 years since the Department published its strategy for the long-term management of radioactive waste. Our primary aim in conducting the review has been to ensure that radioactive waste, irrespective of whether it is produced by public sector or private sector operations, is managed in such a way as to ensure that people and the environment are not exposed to unacceptable risks either now or in the future.

The review's preliminary conclusions were published in a consultation paper last August. All the responses received have been carefully considered and the final conclusions of the review will be published in a White Paper this summer. In advance of that, I am ready to announce the conclusions that have been reached on two issues—the timing of UK Nirex Ltd.'s proposed repository for intermediate-level waste, ILW, and the Government's policy in respect of decommissioning nuclear plant. These matters are relevant to the conclusions of the nuclear review, which my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade is announcing today. There are also proposals in the nuclear review White Paper about the future structure of Nirex.

The Government continue to favour a policy of deep disposal rather than indefinite storage for ILW and consider it appropriate that Nirex should continue with its programme to identify a suitable site. The question had been raised of whether a delay of 50 years in construction of the repository might have advantages. However, the review concluded that the balance of argument was against any such delay. The Government therefore believe that the repository should be constructed as soon as reasonably practicable once a suitable site has been found, although the precise timetable will depend on the granting of planning consent and compliance with regulatory requirements, including the establishment of a sound safety case.

We are aware of the concern expressed by environmental groups and others and that the options available to future generations should not be foreclosed by irreversible action taken now. However, given the length of time needed to develop the repository and the period over which it will remain operational, action now to pursue deep disposal leaves options open until at least the latter half of the next century.

A planning inquiry is due to be held later this year into Nirex's application to construct a rock characterisation facility RCF, at Longlands farm near Sellafield to test further the geology and hydrogeology of the site. I have already outlined the matters about which I particularly wish to be informed to help me reach my decision on this case. These do not include the merits of national policy on the deep disposal of ILW. It has been established through the courts that while, of course, Government policy can be a material consideration that may be taken into account at a local planning inquiry, it may not be disputed and made a central area of debate. Policy on deep disposal of ILW has, in any case, already been the subject of wide consultation in the course of the review.

On the decommissioning of nuclear plant, the Government's view is that this should be undertaken as soon as it is reasonably practicable to do so, taking account of all relevant factors. The Government will in future ask all nuclear operators to draw up strategies for decommissioning their redundant plant. These will need to include justification of the timetables proposed and a demonstration of the adequacy of the financial provision being made to implement the strategies. As with all other operations on nuclear sites, decommissioning will be undertaken in accordance with conditions attached to the nuclear site licence by the nuclear installations inspectorate of the Health and Safety Executive in order to ensure the safety of the site, workers and the public. Disposal of wastes arising during decommissioning will be subject to regulation under the Radioactive Substances Act 1993 by the environment agencies which will replace Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution and, in Scotland, Her Majesty's industrial pollution inspectorate.

The current decommissioning strategy for Magnox and AGR power stations involves three stages—defuelling immediately on shutdown, dismantling buildings external to the reactor shield five to 10 years later, and demolition of the reactor itself 100 years after shutdown. Given that regulatory approval for decommissioning is required on a case-by-case basis, the Government believe—as we said in the preliminary conclusions of the review—that it would be unwise at present for the operators of nuclear power stations to take steps which would foreclose technically or economically the option of completing the decommissioning process on an earlier timescale should that be required, and that they should recognise, when provisioning, the potential uncertainties regarding the timing of the second and third stages. Nevertheless, the Government confirm the preliminary conclusion of the review that there are a number of potentially feasible and acceptable decommissioning strategies for nuclear power stations available to the operator, including the safestore strategy proposed by Nuclear Electric and Scottish Nuclear. To ensure that operators' decommissioning strategies remain soundly based as circumstances change, they will be reviewed quinquennially by HSE, which will consult the environment agencies.

The Government recognise that, in addition to nuclear power stations, a variety of other nuclear facilities are in the process of being decommissioned, or are to be decommissioned in the future. As with power stations, decisions on decommissioning these facilities should be taken on a case-by-case basis and the same general principles apply in respect of timing. Proposals for dealing with such facilities will need to be included in the operators' decommissioning strategies.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Overtime

David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list for each agency and the central Department for which he is responsible (a) the total hours of overtime worked for which payment has been made, (b) the total amount paid in overtime and (c) the total time in days and its monetary equivalent lost through sickness in each of the last three years. [19679]

Sir John Wheeler: The information requested is listed. However, the monetary value of days lost through sickness cannot be provided, as there are too many variables involved and it would be difficult to rely on the accuracy of any such calculation.

Social Need

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, if he will list the plans in each Government Department for targeting social need, and if he will make a statement. [22109]

Mr. Ancram: Targeting social need is one of the Government's expenditure priorities in Northern Ireland and is an integral part of departmental policies and programmes. Departments seek to ensure that resources in all relevant programmes are targeted on areas of greatest need. The following specific measures have a particular TSN impact: the Department of Education skews financial resources to board areas and individual schools with highest social need. Current initiatives include measures to raise standards in under-achieving schools and projects under the "Making Belfast Work" programme and the Londonderry initiative.

The Department of the Environment takes account of targeting social need in resource planning for each functional area. Budget areas with the most direct impact on social need objectives are "Making Belfast Work", the Londonderry development office, the regional development office, housing and public transport.

The Department of Health and Social Services made targeting health and social need one of the priority themes in its regional strategy for health and personal services 1992–97. The strategy addresses inequalities in health status and social well-being in the Northern Ireland population.

The Department of Economic Development in 1994 commissioned a review of how the objectives of TSN relate to those of the Department. Following the review's recommendations for improvements to the existing mechanisms for monitoring progress in the targeting of resources, guidelines on the application of TSN are being drawn up. In addition, each agency is preparing a three-year action plan which will establish its current baseline, set out its proposals for action, and consider any need to adapt existing programmes or create new ones.

The Department of Finance and Personnel seeks to ensure that mainstream expenditure focuses resources on the most disadvantaged areas and people. TSN aims are consonant with the strategic objectives of the Northern Ireland single programming document 1994–1999 and are reinforced by many of its sub-programmes. Two specific targeting social need measures within the physical and social environment sub-programme aim to enhance employment opportunities in the most disadvantaged areas and to encourage the acquisition of educational and vocational qualifications.

The Department of Agriculture administers the rural development programme, which is targeted on areas of disadvantage.

The Northern Ireland Office applies TSN principles in funding crime prevention initiatives and the Probation Board's community development initiatives.

Unemployment (Catholic Males)

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans and strategies he will implement in order to reduce Catholic male unemployment in Northern Ireland. [22110]

Mr. Ancram: The Government are strengthening the Northern Ireland economy and reducing unemployment through increasingly successful efforts to attract inward investment, develop tourism, encourage exports and encourage higher innovation in Northern Ireland companies. Through the targeting social need initiative, the Government seek enhanced economic activity in disadvantaged areas.

In addition, the Training and Employment Agency has recently introduced in areas of greatest unemployment the new jobskills programme and pilot community work programmes are now in operation. Along with the existing action for community employment scheme, these provide high-quality training and additional work prospects for all those who are long-term unemployed.

Punishment Beatings

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many punishment beatings have come to the attention of the Royal Ulster Constabulary since the ceasefire; which organisations are thought to have carried them out; and how many arrests have been made of instigators of punishment beatings in the current year. [23041]

Sir John Wheeler: Between 1 September 1994 and 30 April 1995, a total of 92 so-called punishment beatings took place, of which 35 were attributed to Loyalist and 57 to Republican groups; 80 of these have taken place since 13 October 1994.

Figures for the number of arrests which have been made of instigators of punishment beatings in the current year are not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Birds of Prey

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his estimate of the number and species of birds of prey poisoned in each year since 1987. [22366]

Mr. Moss: There is no information available to enable an estimate to be made of the number of birds of prey poisoned in each year since 1987. The number scientifically examined and found to have been poisoned is as follows:

| Year | Number of birds poisoned | Species |
|---|---|---|
| 1987 | 0 | — |
| 1988 | 0 | — |
| 1989 | 2 | 2 Buzzards |
| 1990 | 0 | — |
| 1991 | 1 | Red Kite |
| 1992 | 0 | — |
| 1993 | 1 | Peregrine Falcon |
| 1994 | 2 | 2 Buzzards |

Housing Benefit

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he will take to ensure that the upper limit of housing benefit entitlement may be waived in circumstances where it is more cost-effective for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive to pay higher benefit than to pay the costs of temporary accommodation for homeless or A1 families or individuals. [22354]

Mr. Moss: There is no upper limit on housing benefit entitlement.

The amount of housing benefit may be restricted where the Northern Ireland Housing Executive considers the dwelling is larger than is reasonably required by the householder and his family, or where the rent is considered unreasonably high compared with that for suitable alternative accommodation.

Bed-and-breakfast Accommodation

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give details of the current cost of bed-and-breakfast accommodation to the Northern Ireland Housing Executive for a family of two parents and seven children at 237 Kilkeel road, Annalong; and if he will give the equivalent full entitlement to a housing benefit for a similar family in four-bedroomed accommodation. [22355]

Mr. Moss: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive and I have asked the chairman to write with the details requested.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many individuals or families are currently in bed-and-breakfast or similar accommodation at the expense of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, in each region, pending rehousing from the homeless, or A1 housing waiting lists. [22356]

Mr. Moss: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive; The chief executive has advised me that at 1 May 1995 the numbers with homeless or A1 status in temporary accommodation are as follows:

| Region | Bed/breakfast accommodation | NIHE hostel |
|---|---|---|
| Belfast | 67 | 60 |
| North East | 25 | 10 |
| South East | 34 | 33 |
| South | 7 | Nil |
| West | 92 | 30 |
| Total | 225 | 133 |

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total cost of bed-and-breakfast or similar accommodation to the Northern Ireland Housing Executive in each region in each of the past three quarters, for the placement in temporary accommodation of homeless or A1 category families or individuals. [22357]

Mr. Moss: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive but the chief executive has advised me that the information requested is not readily available for the last three quarters. However, for the year 1994–95, the total costs of temporary accommodation for households accepted as homeless and awarded 'A1' waiting list priority, households where investigations are not yet completed and households where an appeal against a homelessness decision is pending, are as follows:

| Region | Bed/breakfast accommodation £ | NIHE hostel £ |
|---|---|---|
| Belfast | 487,002.95 | 380,393 |
| North East | 192,242.04 | 53,870 |
| South East | 278,827.73 | 147,398 |
| South | 102,572.56 | 19,762 |
| West | 825,262.69 | 97,392 |
| Total | 1,885,907.97 | 698,815 |

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the average weekly cost to the Northern Ireland Housing Executive in each region for housing homeless or A1 category families or individuals in temporary accommodation for (a) a single individual with no dependants, (b) a couple with no dependants, (c) a couple with two children and (d) a couple with four children; and if he will give equivalent entitlements to full housing benefit for suitable accommodation. [22358]

Mr. Moss: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but the chief executive has advised me that the information is not available in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Accounting Officers

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many times in the last 10 years, and on which dates, his departmental accounting officer has issued a minute in that role; and what was the issue in each case. [22563]

Sir John Wheeler: Where a Minister overrules an accounting officer's advice on an issue or propriety or regularity or one of value for money the accounting officer should request a written instruction from the Minister to take the action in question.

No such instructions have been issued in the Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments in the last 10 years.

Education Authorities

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the education authorities in Northern Ireland together with the total number of pupils for which each education authority was responsible in the year ended 31 March. [23317]

Mr Ancram: The education authorities in Northern Ireland are the five education and library boards which are responsible for the management of the controlled sector. The number of pupils for which each board was responsible in 1994–95 is as follows:

| Area board | Pupils |
|---|---|
| Belfast | 22,680 |
| Western | 18,843 |
| North-Eastern | 45,165 |
| South-Eastern | 40,107 |
| Southern | 27,994 |

Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations his Department has made to the Department of Trade and Industry concerning the need for legislation to prevent the cloning of mobile telephones. [23476]

Mr. Ancram: None.

Medium Secure Units

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list by regional health authority and by district health authority the current number of beds in medium secure units run by health authorities; what were the figures for each of the last four years; and if he will make a statement. [23507]

Mr. Moss: There are no medium secure units in Northern Ireland.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

11. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his latest estimate of the number of women in work in Leeds, West (a) full-time and (b) part-time; and what percentage of the work force these figures constitute. [21626]

Miss Widdecombe: As the hon. Member will be aware, information for areas of this size is available only from the census of employment. Results of the latest census, for 1993, will be available in September 1995.

Results from the autumn 1994 labour force survey for west Yorkshire showed 222,000 women in full-time work and 195,000 in part-time work as employees or self-employed, equivalent to 23 per cent. and 21 per cent. respectively of the total.

12. Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many changes have been made since 1979 to the categories of persons included as unemployed in the data issued by his Department; and if he will list those categories and the numbers eliminated or added at each change. [21627]

Mr. Oppenheim: There have been nine changes to the benefit system which have significantly affected the claimant count. In order to maintain consistency, we produce a series of figures taking account of these changes for comparison purposes. These changes do not, of course, affect the Department's other measure of unemployment, the labour force survey which is based on the International Labour Organisation standards.

15. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the size of the work force currently in employment; and what was the equivalent figure a year ago. [21630]

Mr. Oppenheim: There were 25.6 million in the work force in employment in the United Kingdom in December 1994 compared with 25.4 million in December 1993.

Long-term Unemployed People

13. Mr. Legg: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement about the Government's policies on helping long-term unemployed people to find jobs. [21628]

Mr. Paice: In April we introduced Jobmatch, job finder's grants, Workwise and 1-2-1, four new national programmes. In addition, we extended community action and expanded work trials. There are 240,000 places on these programmes alone.

EC Employment Direction

14. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what discussions he has had with his EU counterparts about future EC employment direction; and if he will make a statement. [21629]

Mr. Portillo: At every meeting of the Social Affairs Council, I have urged my fellow Employment Ministers to make job creation the first priority and not to pursue new labour market restrictions and regulations which can only destroy jobs.

Spanish Employment Minister

16. Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he last met the Spanish Employment Minister to discuss labour markets and competitiveness; and if he will make a statement. [21631]

Mr. Portillo: I last met the Spanish Minister of Labour at the end of March. We share the view that European countries need in their own ways to improve the performance of their labour markets, to increase competitiveness and achieve sustainable reductions in structural unemployment.

Take-home Pay

17. Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what recent evidence he has to show how take-home pay in the United Kingdom compares with that in other EC countries. [21633]

Mr. Oppenheim: Independent research shows that British workers' average take-home pay is among the best in the European Union, better than France, Italy or Denmark and comparable with western Germany.

Youth Unemployment

18. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he last met other EU employment ministers to discuss youth unemployment. [21635]

Mr. Paice: Employment matters feature regularly in the discussions that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has with ministerial counterparts. I am pleased to say that the rate of youth unemployment in the UK is well below the Community average.

25. Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has made of the effects of labour market regulation on levels of youth unemployment. [21642]

Mr. Paice: The Government believe that labour market regulation damages the level of employment, particularly for young people.

Unemployment

19. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures the Government are taking to encourage unemployed people to try different jobs. [21636]

Miss Widdecombe: Employment Service advisers encourage unemployed people to apply for a wide range of vacancies. Last year, the ES placed 1.87 million people in work. The Government also provide 1.5 million opportunities to help unemployed people to improve their employability, job search activities and skills.

Age Discrimination

20. Mrs. Angela Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what the "Too Old, Who Says?" campaign aims to achieve; and what assessment he has made of how successful it has been. [21637]

Miss Widdecombe: The aim of the campaign is to counter age discrimination in the workplace. Through the "Too Old, Who Says?" booklet, supporting roadshows and media coverage, we offer help, advice and support to older people seeking work. It is too early to judge the success of the campaign which is still on-going. The initial response has been very encouraging.

23. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has made of whether the "Too Old, Who Says?" campaign is achieving its aims. [21640]

Miss Widdecombe: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash, (Mrs. Knight) earlier today.

Unemployment, Ealing, Southall

21. Mr. Khabra: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the rate of unemployment in the constituency of Ealing, Southall in 1979; and what is the latest figure calculated using the same methodology. [21638]

Mr. Oppenheim: Claimant unemployment rates are not available below the level of self-contained labour markets known as travel-to-work areas.

Employment Select Committee Report

22. Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his response to the proposals made in the first report of the Employment Select Committee, Session 1994–95, "Mothers in Employment". [21639]

Miss Widdecombe: We are considering the report and will respond to the Committee in due course.

Wage Rates

26. Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many employees are being paid at a rate of £2.50 an hour or less. [21643]

Mr. Oppenehim: The results of the latest new earnings survey show that, for full-time and part-time employees in Great Britain whose pay was not affected by absence, some 17 per 1,000 earn £2.50 per hour or less.

Careers Service

27. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what improvements are being made to the running of the careers service. [21645]

Mr. Paice: We have been establishing clear quality standards and making significant investment through contracts and competition, which give accountability with innovation.

Stockport Training and Enterprise Council

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the cumulative total paid by Stockport training and enterprise council to the Damar Group of St. Petersgate, Stockport (a) in total since the TEC was established and (b) in each year. [21174]

Mr. Paice: Training and enterprise councils are private companies and the contracts they enter into are subject to commercial confidentiality. Accordingly, the information requested is not collected by the Department.

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment which Minister in his Department has responsibility for equal opportunities issues. [21460]

Miss Widdecombe: I have responsibility for sex equality issues, people with disabilities and older workers.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim), deals with race equality issues, while my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South (Mr. Paice) is responsible for special needs training.

Teesside TEC

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, what has been the expenditure of Teesside TEC on the East Cleveland training and employment group in each of the last 10 years. [21436]

Mr. Paice [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Training and enterprise councils are private companies and the contracts they enter into are subject to commercial confidentiality. Accordingly the information requested is not collected by the Department.

Training for Work

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how much his Department plans to spend on training for unemployed people living within the Greater London area in the present financial year. [22404]

Mr. Paice: The budget for training for work for unemployed adults for the London training and enterprise councils for the 1995–96 financial year is approximately £94.4 million.

Graduate Unemployment

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the present level of graduate unemployment; what proportion of trainees on Government schemes move from their training into related areas of employment; and what forms of assistance are accorded to trainees to move from training into such employment. [22530]

Mr. Paice: The latest estimates from labour force survey for autumn 1994 show that 185,000 graduates of working are ILO unemployed.

There are a number of ways that the Government help to equip trainees for entry into the labour market. Training and enterprise councils are encouraged to give jobsearch help to trainees and training for work is now more jobs focused with payment being made for outcomes achieved. We are working towards a target of 50 per cent. of leavers going into jobs by 1997–98. Training enables young people to gain nationally recognised vocational qualifications and receive advice and guidance which equips them to compete in the labour market.

The tables show what proportion of trainees move from their training into related areas of employment:

Percentage of those who trained in each occupational area and who got a job, where that job was in the same occupational area as their training

Training Provisions

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many places were provided by each TEC in (a) the current year, (b) the previous three years for (i) special needs trainees, (ii) those unemployed for 12 months or over and (iii) those unemployed for 24 months or over; [22994]

(2) what is the average length of stay for (a) men, (b) women, (c) each ethnic group and (d) special needs trainees on (i) youth training and (ii) training for work or employment training; and, for each programme, how many trainees and, what proportion have been in training for (1) more than 20 weeks, (2) between 20 and 52 weeks,

(3) more than 52 weeks but under 104 weeks and (4) over 104 weeks; and what were the corresponding figures in each of the last five years; [22993]

(3) how many people (a) applied for and (b) were in receipt of (i) enterprise allowance and (ii) business start-up allowance for each TEC area, in each region, and for Great Britain as a whole in each of the last five years; [22995]

(4) in each of the last three years, what has been the number of NVQs achieved, and at what levels, by entrants to (a) the YT programme and (b) the training for work programme for each TEC in (i) each region and (ii) the United Kingdom; [22952]

(5) how many (a) men, (b) women, (c) members of each ethnic group and (d) special needs trainees currently have places on (i) YT and (ii) training for work or ET for each TEC in (1) each region and (2) for each country of the United Kingdom; and what were the figures in each of the last five years; [22988]

(6) what is the average length of stay on (a) training for work and (b) YT programmes broken down by (i) gender, (ii) ethnic group and (iii) those with a disability or health problem for each TEC in (1) each region and (2) the United Kingdom. [22951]

Mr. Paice: As this information is contained in a number of tables, I will write to the hon. Member and place a copy of my reply in the Library.

Employment Measures (Disabled People)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what progress has been made since the introduction of special contracts arrangements to employ more people with a disability. [22702]

Miss Widdecombe: The special contracts arrangement was introduced on 29 November 1994 to help supported employment programme providers compete for contracts tendered by Government Departments and agencies.

Ninety-one workshops have now registered under the special contracts arrangement and the size of the supported employment programme has remained steady at around 21,000 severely disabled participants.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of his Department's budget is allocated to initiatives which have been undertaken to secure private finance for his Department's projects. [22799]

Miss Widdecombe: Options for securing private finance are considered as a part of normal project arrangements in the Department. No specific element of the budget is set aside for this purpose.

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many, and what proportion of, vacancies advertised by his Department and by each of his Department's agencies in the last three years have listed the attainment of NVQs as an acceptable entry requirement; and, of those, how many have required (a) level 1 NVQs, (b) level 2 NVQs, (c) level 3 NVQs and (d) other level national vocational qualifications. [22990]

Miss Widdecombe: This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Special Contracts

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment his Department has made of the success of the special contracts arrangements [22701]

Miss Widdecombe: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) on 15 March 1995, Official Report, column 624.

Accounting Officers

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many times in the last 10 years, and on which dates his departmental accounting officer has issued a minute in that role; and what was the issue in each case. [22562]

Miss Widdecombe: I know of no such cases.

Employment Services (Targets)

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment on what basis he decided the target of 9.5 per cent. of initial claim inquiries made to the Employment Service not to be pursued as new claims, target No. 7 in the Employment Service's annual performance agreement for 1995–96; what factors have led to an increase in this target from the equivalent target in the annual performance agreement for 1994–95; and if he will make a statement. [23048]

Miss Widdecombe: The purpose of this target is to ensure that each client has been: informed of all the conditions necessary to qualify for unemployment benefit; referred to make a claim for the appropriate benefit and offered any suitable vacancies before attending a new claims interview. It is the client's decision whether or not to pursue a claim to benefit.

In deciding the target level for 1995–96, a number of factors have been taken into account. These include performance against the target during 1994–95 and the labour market and the operational context in which the Employment Service will be working in the coming year.

Employment Service (Claims)

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will list (a) the total number of claims made to the Employment Service which were referred to adjudication, in each case giving the reason for referral to adjudication, (b) the total amount spent on adjudication services in the Employment Service and (c) the percentage of the Employment Service budget spent on adjudication services for each year since 1988; [23047]

(2) if he will list (a) the number of claims for unemployment related benefits made to the Employment Service which are referred to adjudication and (b) the percentage of those cases where the adjudication officer has decided in favour of the Employment Service's referral, in each case giving the reason for referral to adjudication for each year since 1988. [23049]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for the subject of the questions has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Ms Harriet Harman, dated 9 May 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your questions about claims referred to adjudication, and about the cost of adjudication services in the Employment Service (ES).

Unfortunately information is not available in the form you have requested. We record the number of adjudication decisions and opinions given rather than the number of cases referred to adjudication. Decisions are recorded as allowed, disallowed, reviewed in the claimant's favour, reviewed adversely to the claimant, referred to the Social Security Appeal Tribunal for a decision, or not reviewed.

Information on the number of adjudication officer's decisions and opinions is contained in a published document entitled "Analysis of Adjudication Officers' Decisions". This provides information on all the main entitlement questions arising on claims. Copies of this document are held in the Library of the House. The latest available information relates to the quarter year to December 1994.

Approximately £25.2 million was spent on adjudication services in the ES during the year April 1994 to March 1995. This figure includes the cost of salaries, general administrative expenditure, and premises costs, and represents some 2.4% of the total ES Gross Running Costs Budget for the year. I am sorry that this information is not available for the earlier years. 1994/95 was the first year for which total adjudication costs have been calculated.

I hope this is helpful.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Daya Bay Nuclear Plant

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has received as to the reason for the indefinite shutdown of the Daya bay nuclear plant close to Hong Kong. [19320]

Mr. Goodlad: The Daya bay nuclear power station is in China some 50 km away from the urban area of Hong Kong. It is operated by Chinese companies. The Hong Kong Government have no involvement in its day-to-day operation, but are being kept informed of developments.

Iran Murder Trial

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what observers of Her Majesty's Government have arranged to be present at the trial of those accused of murdering the three Christian leaders in Iran; and what assessment the observers have made regarding the trial proceedings. [23065]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The European Union has agreed to send a presidency representative to attend the trial as an observer. The trial is in its early stages and it is too early to make an assessment of the proceedings.

Thailand

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government are taking to seek to put an end to Burmese military incursions against Karen refugee camps in Thailand. [23066]

Mr. Goodlad: Together with our EU partners we have made clear our concerns about the safety of the Karen people to the ruling military regime in Burma, the State Law and Order Restoration Council. We called in the Burmese ambassador on 17 February to reinforce an earlier EU demarche in Rangoon. On 10 March the EU issued a statement condemning the offensive against the Karen people and calling upon the SLORC to find a swift and peaceful solution to the ethnic minority problem in Burma.

We view with concern the recent attacks against refugee camps in Thailand and welcome the continuing commitment of the Thai Government to provide refuge for those seeking safety in their territory. We continue to monitor the evolution of the situation closely and are considering appropriate action in consultation with our EU partners.

Kashmir

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what indications the European Union has received in respect of the date and organisation of elections in Kashmir; if the European Union has been invited to send observers to monitor any such elections; what measures the European Union is taking to assess on the ground the prospect of elections in Kashmir; what assessment (a) Her Majesty's Government and (b) the European Union has made of the elections; and if he will make a statement. [23095]

Mr. Baldry: The Indian Government have yet to make any official announcement of their intentions with respect to the date and organisation of elections in Kashmir. It follows that there has been no invitation to send observers, and we and our European partners are not in a position to assess the elections.

Pakistan

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the Pakistan Government about the detention of Anwar Masih in Faisalabad; and if he will make a statement. [23098]

Mr. Baldry: We regularly make representations to the Pakistan Government about the treatment of Christians and other minorities. We recently joined our European partners in raising Anwar Masih's case with the Pakistan authorities.

Landmines

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to ban the production, export and stockpiling of landmines; and if he will make a statement. [23099]

Mr. David Davis: We are actively pursuing through various fora further controls on the production, stockpiling, transfer and use of anti-personnel landmines. But such measures need to be realistic, and widely applied, if they are to be effective. A complete ban at this stage would not secure broad international support or be properly implemented.

Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy in respect of preambular paragraph L of the European Parliament's motion on the extension of the nuclear non-profileration treaty, adopted on 5 April. [22352]

Mr. David Davis [holding answer 4 May 1995]: We agree with the preambular paragraph.

Nuclear Safety

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what position was taken by the British ambassador to the board of governors of the International Atomic Energy Agency in regard to the proposals under discussion of the programme 93 + 2 on safeguards, at the board of governors' meeting on 27 to 30 March, that greater access to sites by nuclear inspectors should be implemented. [22931]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I have been asked to reply.

The United Kingdom supports the need to strengthen the IAEA's safeguards system. The general outline of the proposals were presented in the March meeting of the board of governors. More specific proposals will be presented and discussed at subsequent meetings.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals in regard to technical, legal and financial implications of a strengthened nuclear safeguards system will be put forward by the United Kingdom at the next board of governors' meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency in June. [22930]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I have been asked to reply.

The IAEA will submit proposals for strengthening the safeguards system at the meeting of its board of governors in June.

SCOTLAND

Wigtown District Council

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consultation of tenants has been carried out by Wigtown district council regarding the future tenure of their houses; what options were put to the tenants; what advice was given by the council to tenants; and if he will make a statement. [22430]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I understand that Wigtown district council has been informally consulting tenants by means of newsletters and public meetings for several months about its proposal to transfer its entire stock of housing to the locally based Wigtown housing association. The statutory consultation procedures began late in April when the council issued a formal consultation document to tenants setting out the details of its proposals and the likely consequences of the transfer. Tenants have also been given access to independent advisers to assist them to reach an informed view on the proposals.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much has been budgeted by Wigtown district council to conduct a ballot on the disposal of its houses to the Wigtown housing association; whether the council has received section 25 consent for expenditure already incurred; and if he will make a statement. [22429]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The cost of any ballot of its tenants is a matter for Wigtown district council. The Secretary of State is currently considering an application from the council for consent under section 25 of the Local Government Act 1988 to enable the council to make a loan to assist the newly formed Wigtown housing association with its setting up costs.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what conditions he has imposed upon Wigtown district council regarding the procedures, majority required and advice to tenants before any ballot result of council tenants regarding transfer of ownership is given his approval. [22431]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Wigtown district council is aware that it must act in accordance with the provisions contained in schedule 6A of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 in consulting tenants on the disposal of any of its housing stock. The council is also aware that the Secretary of State cannot consent to any such transfer if it appears to him that a majority of tenants do not wish the disposal to proceed.

It is for the council to decide how best to determine the extent of tenant's support for its proposals and I understand that it plans to ballot all tenants on the subject. The Secretary of State will have regard to the outcome of that ballot in determining whether to grant his consent to any stock disposal.

Special Protection Areas

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those sites which (a) have been designated or (b) meet the criteria for designation as (i) special protection areas under the European Community directive on the conservation of wild birds or (ii) Ramsar sites under the convention of wetlands of international importance. [22369]

Sir Hector Monro: The information is set out in the tables. Sites are designated by my right hon. Friend on the advice of Scottish Natural Heritage. The lists of sites at (b)(i) and (ii) contain those which in the opinion of Scottish Natural Heritage qualify by designation.

Red Deer

Mr. Gallie: Top ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what conclusions he has reached on the proposals for amendment to deer legislation in Scotland submitted to him by the Red Deer Commission. [23851]

Sir Hector Monro: We have given careful consideration to the Red Deer Commission's proposals and my Department has consulted organisations with a particular interest in deer matters in Scotland. In the light of the responses to this consultation, we have decided on the following proposals for deer legislation:

a. amendments to the general functions of the Red Deer Commission to include reference to furthering the "sustainable management" of all species of wild deer in Scotland. The title of the Red Deer Commission to change to "Deer Commission for Scotland";

b. the introduction of new arrangements for the appointment of members to the commission by the Secretary of State to provide for greater flexibility together with a permissive power to allow the Secretary of State to pay remuneration to members if, at some time in the future, he should think this appropriate;

c. amendments to the existing powers of the commission to appoint local panels;

d. an extension of the commission's existing powers to provide advice and a new power to support demonstration and experimentation projects;

e. amendments to the powers of the commission to deal with damage caused by deer and, in particular, the introduction of new powers to allow the commission to instigate control schemes when this is necessary to protect the natural heritage of Scotland or to safeguard public safety;

f. a new provision to allow for voluntary control schemes to facilitate co-operative action amongst adjoining landowners to control deer;

g. amendments to the provisions relating to close seasons for the shooting of deer to allow for these to be set by order;

h. an amendment to allow the commission to authorise the use of vehicles or aircraft to drive deer with the intention of carrying out essential culling work;

i. an updated definition of the types of agricultural land over which agricultural owners and occupiers can shoot deer, if necessary, to protect crops, pastures etc;

j. amendments to the provisions relating to marauding deer and out of season shooting to allow the commission to authorise shooting to prevent damage to the natural heritage and to unenclosed woodlands or to protect public safety;

k. amendments to the provisions relating to night shooting of deer so that all night shooting is subject to authorisation by the commission.

Our intention is to introduce the legislation along these lines when there is a suitable legislative opportunity.

These legislative proposals draw significantly on the ideas put forward by the Red Deer Commission and the Government would like to acknowledge its valuable help and assistance in this matter, together with all the other bodies who responded to the public debate. The proposals represent an important step forward in ensuring the sustainable management of wild deer populations in Scotland.

National Galleries

Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the arrangements for the next policy and financial management review of the national galleries of Scotland. [23852]

Sir Hector Monro: Departments which sponsor non-departmental public bodies carry out regular policy and financial management reviews of individual bodies. The last such review of the national galleries of Scotland was undertaken in 1987 and a further review is now under way, to be completed by the end of July. As with all such reviews, the first stage will take the form of a "prior options" study, to examine the scope for discontinuing or undertaking in some other way some or all of the functions of the national galleries. Subject to the outcome of the first stage, the review will examine comprehensively, with regard to value for money, the main aims and objectives of the body, as well as its resource management and planning systems. The review will be conducted by Mr. Colin Imrie, a principal at the Scottish Office attached to the Scottish Office Education Department for this purpose. Comments from interested parties would be welcome and should be sent to Mr. Imrie at the following address by 30 June 1995:

The Scottish Office Education Department
Room 613
43 Jeffrey Street
Edinburgh
EH1 1DN

Tel: 0131 244 5360
Fax: 0131 244 5526

Area Tourist Boards

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list the names of people who are members of more than one of the existing area tourist boards; and what offices, they hold on these boards; [22572]

(2) if he will list the names of people who are members of a steering group for one of the new area tourist boards as well as being members of an existing tourist board for an area which is not included in the area covered by the steering group; [22573]

(3) if he will ensure that no-one will be a member of more than one area tourist board under the new system to be introduced in April 1996. [22574]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 9 May 1995]: Membership arrangements and office bearer appointments are the responsibility of area tourist boards themselves. The information requested is not held centrally. I understand that current practice is that bodies or individuals may be members of more than one board.

We are at present consulting on the terms of the statutory schemes which will establish the new boards. It is likely, however, that the requirements for membership will follow current practice.

Membership of the steering groups which have been established by local interests in advance of the appointment by my right hon. Friend of the first members of the controlling bodies of the new boards is entirely a matter for these interests to determine. My right hon. Friend will make his appointments on the basis of nominations from the existing area tourist boards and from local authorities. Nominations will be sought shortly.

TREASURY

Business Rate Assessment Appeals

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many business rate assessment appeals have been (a) lodged and (b) dealt with in each year since 1989. [22786]

Mr. Nelson: The number of business rate appeals (a) lodged and (b) dealt with in England and Wales in the years since 1 January 1989 are shown in the table. During this period appeals were lodged and dealt with in respect of both the 1973 valuation lists and the 1990 non-domestic rating lists.

Answer (a)

| | Number lodged | |
|---|---|---|
| Period | 1973 Appeals | 1990 Appeals |
| 1.1.89 to 31.3.89 | 51,063 | n/a |
| 1.4.89 to 31.3.90 | 127,508 | n/a |
| 1.4.90 to 31.3.91 | n/a | 611,593 |
| 1.4.91 to 31.3.92 | n/a | 188,439 |
| 1.4.92 to 31.3.93 | n/a | 195,214 |
| 1.4.93 to 31.3.94 | n/a | 154,409 |
| 1.4.94 to 31.3.95 | n/a | 219,070 |
| Total | 178,571 | 1,368,725 |
| Grand total all appeals | | 1,547,296 |

Answer (b)

| | Number dealt with | |
|---|---|---|
| Period | 1973 Appeals | 1990 Appeals |
| 1.1.89 to 31.3.89 | 49,250 | n/a |
| 1.4.89 to 31.3.90 | 190,207 | n/a |
| 1.4.90 to 31.3.91 | 181,600 | 28,660 |
| 1.4.91 to 31.3.92 | 28,246 | 232,349 |
| 1.4.92 to 31.3.93 | 2,479 | 348,891 |
| 1.4.93 to 31.3.94 | 448 | 312,195 |
| 1.4.94 to 31.3.95 | 511 | 269,017 |
| Total | 452,741 | 1,191,112 |
| Grand total all appeals | | 1,643,853 |

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many business rate assessment appeals lodged since 1 January 1989 are still waiting to be heard. [22785]

Mr. Nelson: Because of the way in which the statistics were obtained, it is not possible to identify the number of outstanding 1973 valuation list business rate appeals in England and Wales which were lodged in the period 1 January 1989 to 31 March 1990. Of the 1990 rating list business rate appeals received since 1 April 1990, a total of 283,096 were outstanding at 31 March 1995.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average length of time that a business has to wait in order for the business rate assessment appeal to be heard. [22784]

Mr. Nelson: Statistics are not kept of the average time between the making of an appeal by a business ratepayer and a hearing. Valuation tribunals are, however, conscious of the need to deal with cases as quickly as is consistent with a full consideration of the merits of each case.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect of the reduction in Inland Revenue staff on the rate at which business rate assessment appeals are heard. [22787]

Mr. Nelson: Business rate appeals are dealt with by valuation officers of the Valuation Office Agency, an executive agency of the Inland Revenue. In the year 1994–95, a total of 269,528 appeals were settled. The target for 1995–96 published in the agency's business plan is to settle 330,000 appeals and sufficient resources will be made available to meet this target.

Manufacturing Trade

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what was the deficit on trade in manufactures with the EEC countries for each year since 1992 and the annual rate in the three months from January 1995; and what has been the effect on output and employment to date; [23310]

(2) what was the change in the last 12 months in the volume of imports of manufactures from the EEC and the effect on output and employment to date in the United Kingdom; [23311]

(3) what has been (a) the change in volume of imports of manufactures from the EEC in the three months to January 1995 and (b) the effect on output and employment to date; [23307]

(4) what was the deficit on trade in manufactures with the non-EEC countries for each year since 1992 and the annual rate for the three months from January 1995; and what has been the effect on output and employment to date. [23309]

Mr. Nelson: Figures for EC and non-EC trade in manufactures and domestic output are available on the Central Statistical Office database, which can be accessed through the Library of the House. From these figures the direct contribution of changes in EC and non-EC trade volumes to GDP growth can be calculated. It is not possible to isolate the overall effects of trade performance on output and employment growth.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the volume of (a) imports of finished manufactures from the EEC and (b) exports of finished manufactures to the EEC since 1992. [23308]

Mr. Nelson: The information is available from the CSO database which may be accessed by the House of Commons Library.

Interest Rates

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 27 April, Official Report, column 646, concerning the effect of the three increases in interest rates between 12 September 1994 and 2 February 1995 (1) what definition he attaches to the words (i) inflation and (ii) low; [23325]

(2) if the Government's objective of permanently low inflation excludes the possibility of a non-low rate of inflation generated by a high rate of growth in the leading sectors of the economy. [23324]

Mr. Nelson: The Government's objective is permanently low inflation. The aim is to keep underlying inflation as measured by the retail prices index, excluding mortgage interest payments—in the range 1 to 4 per cent. and bring it down in to the lower half of this range by the end of the present Parliament. Providing a stable macroeconomic environment with low inflation is the best way to ensure sustainable growth in all sectors of the economy.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 27 April, Official Report, column 646, concerning the effect of the increases in interest rates between 12 September 1994 and 2 February 1995, what has been the effect of each on the exchange rate. [23326]

Mr. Nelson: The exchange rate is determined by many factors. It is not possible to isolate the effect of changes in UK interest rates.

Hotels (VAT)

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his response to representations of the British tourist industry to bring VAT on hotel accommodation in line with European Union levels; and if he will make a statement. [22579]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: There is no uniformity in the rate of VAT applied to hotel accommodation by the other EU member states. The Government have no plans to alter the standard rate of VAT applicable to hotel accommodation in the United Kingdom.

Training

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what special training is given to persons who have responsibility for assessing the historical significant of documents held by his Department. [23276]

Mr. Nelson: Training in assessing the historical significance of departmental records is carried out under the guidance of the keeper of public records. It is provided in a number of different ways, including courses on the appraisal of records and conferences and seminars arranged by the Public Records Office.

Staff who deal with departmental records have experience of the work of the Treasury and receive on the job desk training together with guidance from of the public Records Office.

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Barron: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many and what proportion of vacancies advertised by his Department, and by each of his Department's agencies, in the last three years have listed the attainment of NVQs as an acceptable entry requirement; and, of those how many have required (a) level 1 NVQs, (b) level 2 NVQs, (c) level 3 NVQs, and (d) other level NVQs. [222971]

Mr. Nelson: HM Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer's agencies are happy to consider national vocational qualifications at the appropriate level as alternatives to traditional educational qualifications of recruitment. None of the recruitment schemes over the past three years has specifically referred in advertisements to the acceptability of NVQs.

Tobacco

Mr. Barron: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to stop overseas mail order arrangements for selling through a personal agent operated by certain tobacco companies to avoid the payment of United Kingdom tax and duty. [22962]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: A case of this kind is currently the subject of a judicial review application before the High Court. Customs and Excise consider that this scheme is a distance selling operation which should give rise to a charge of UK excise duty and VAT. The court is expected to give judgment later this month.

Official Statistics

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how he proposes to ensure the success of the recently published Government official statistics code of practice regarding public access to official statistics through libraries and other public archives. [22610]

Mr. Nelson: Statisticians in all Government Departments act on the guidelines contained within the official statistics code of practice. A series of inter-departmental committees help to co-ordinate these activities and to share best practices. The Government statistical service dissemination committee covers public access issues and to this end has links with the committee of librarians and statisticians.

The central statistical office is strongly committed to increasing the availability of its statistics to schools, libraries and the academic world. Through its library extension and education programme it has a valuable programme of assistance including provision of information, advice and assistance. The CSO will also be co-operating with the British Library for the improved provision of archival material. The CSO also plans a public access library for its new Drummond Gate site in London.

Single European Currency

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effects on the United Kingdom's foreign, gold and other reserves, with particular reference to assignment and ownership in whole or in part of a decision on the part of the United Kingdom to join a single European currency. [21788]

Mr. Nelson: Article 105, paragraphs 2 and 3, of the treaty on European union and articles 30 and 31 of the statute of the European system of central banks and of the European central bank relate to the holding and management of foreign exchange reserves in stage 3 of economic and monetary union.

Under the United Kingdom's protocol to the treaty, these provisions will not apply to the United Kingdom if the United Kingdom does not move to stage 3.

EU Funding

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what extent it is possible for a project to receive funds from both the EU social fund and the cohesion fund; and if he will make a statement. [22772]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 9 May 1995]: It is possible for a project to receive funds from both the EU social fund and the cohesion fund, although no individual item of expenditure under the project may benefit from both. The combined assistance of the cohesion fund and other EU aid for a project must not exceed 90 per cent. of the total project expenditure. Only Ireland, Spain, Portugal and Greece are eligible for funding from the cohesion fund.

Mortgage Protection

Mr. Darling: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out his proposals to amend the law with regard to the taxation of payments made under mortgage protection policies; and if he will make a statement. [23158]

Sir George Young [holding answer 9 May 1995]: The Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposals concerning the taxation of benefits paid under mortgage protection insurance policies were set out in his statement of 2 May, a copy of which is available in the Members' Library.

TRANSPORT

Railway Privatisation

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport to what extent a private company taking over any of the functions formerly carried out by British Rail will be liable for industrial injury claims brought by employees who find themselves in the employment of a new railway contractor. [22313]

Mr. Watts: All of BR's rights, powers, duties and liabilities under or in connection with contracts of employment of persons employed by BR in an undertaking will transfer to a new railway contractor taking over that undertaking by virtue of the operation of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981.

New employers will therefore be liable for claims in respect of industrial injury. Any arrangements between new employers and BR about such liabilities must remain commercially confidential.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport to what extent a private company taking over any of the functions formerly carried out by British Rail will be liable for industrial injury claims brought by retired employees of British Rail. [22314]

Mr. Watts: The Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 are not relevant to retired employees. I understand that BR's policy is to meet successful industrial injury claims brought by their retired employees.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) to what extent the Department of Transport will be liable for industrial injury claims brought by retired British Rail employees following privatisation of British rail; [22315]

(2) to what extent the Department of Transport will be liable for industrial injury claims brought by former employees of British Rail who find themselves in the employment of a new railway contractor following the privatisation of British Rail. [22316]

Mr. Watts: The Secretary of State will not be so liable. He will make available to the British Railways Board each year an appropriate level of public expenditure cover and in so doing will have regard to the contractual and other obligations of the board.

Gatwick Express

Mr. Tim Renton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now take the necessary steps to expedite the full process of privatising the Gatwick Express; and if he will make a statement. [23296]

Mr. Watts: The Franchising Director intends to issue invitations to tender for the Gatwick express franchise later this year.

A23

Mr. Tim Renton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will reconsider the criteria for paying compensation to those seriously affected by the widening of the A23 south of Pease Pottage. [23297]

Mr. Watts: New guidelines will be introduced for the discretionary purchase of off-line property, enjoyment of which will be seriously affected by a proposed trunk road widening scheme, which take into account loss of value of the property. There are no proposals to reconsider the arrangements for payment of compensation under part I of the Land Compensation Act 1973 for loss in value of property affected by a new or altered road which has been opened to traffic. If my hon. friend is aware of particular cases where there are difficulties, he may care to write to the chief executive of the Highways Agency, Lawrie Haynes, about these cases.

Vehicle Inspectorate

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about funding for the vehicle inspectorate's programme of enforcement checks against lorries, buses and coaches. [23779]

Mr. Norris: I intend to make new funds of £350,000 available to the vehicle inspectorate in 1995–96 to increase its enforcement effort against heavy goods vehicles and public service vehicles. These funds, together with efficiency savings already achieved, will allow the recruitment of additional front line enforcement staff. The new funding further reinforces the Government's commitment to support effective enforcement against unsafe vehicles and underlines their determination not to compromise on safety. As the costs of VI enforcement activity are recovered through HGV and PSV operator licence fees, the Department has today issued a consultation document about a minor increase in HGV operator fees to make the income sufficient to cover these additional costs.

Cars

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to start a publicity campaign to discourage people from using their cars for shorter journeys. [23518]

Mr. Norris: The Government take opportunities in their advice to motorists to encourage them to walk or cycle or to use public transport where it is safe and reasonable to do so. I have no current plans for a wider campaign, although I am following with close attention the efforts of local authorities, including Hertfordshire and Hampshire, where transport awareness programmes are underway.

South Eastern Railways

Ms Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the passenger service requirement for South Eastern Railways will be published; and if he will make a statement. [23142]

Mr. Watts: The passenger service requirement for South Eastern will be developed and issued for consultation with local authorities and the rail users' consultative committees in accordance with the franchising director's timetable for franchising the line during or after 1996. The timetable is under continual review as the franchising programme progresses, and franchises may be brought forward.

Ms Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the latest statistics for overcrowding on South Eastern suburban services. [23144]

Mr. Watts: The latest statistics on overcrowding for the South Eastern train operating unit are as follows:

| Date | [1]Passengers in excess of capacity Per cent. |
|---|---|
| Autumn 1993 | 2.1 |
| Autumn 1994 | 1.4 |

[1]Total percentage of passengers over the total capacity of the train including standing passengers.

Further improvement in train capacity will result from the continuing introduction of Networker rolling stock.

Ms Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects South Eastern to be ready for franchising. [23143]

Mr. Watts: The franchising director's timetable is to franchise South Eastern during or after 1996. The timetable is under continual review as the franchising programme progresses, and franchises may be brought forward.

Highways

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to require highway authorities to consult and secure the approval of residents of streets where it is proposed to remove stone or concrete flags and replace them with tarmac other than for reasons of safety. [22933]

Mr. Norris: No.

Passenger Ships (Safety)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research his Department has done into the length of time needed to passenger evacuations of (a) ro-ro ferries and (b) other passenger ships; and what is his estimate of the length of time needed to evacuate a ro-ro ferry carrying 2,000 passengers. [22909]

Mr. Norris [holding answer 9 May 1995]: There has been no research funded by the Department of Transport on passenger evacuation times from passenger ships during the last 15 years, although research findings on the wider context of passenger and crew behaviour in emergency situations are currently being considered.

Current escape and life saving arrangements are designed so that passenger ships can be evacuated within 30 minutes, regardless of the number of passengers on board.

EMPLOYMENT

Industry Training Organisations

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the names and grades of the training, enterprise and education directorate staff that represent the Department at meetings of industry training organisations; and if he will make a statement on their role. [22999]

Mr. Paice: The names of the development managers who represent the Department at meetings of industry training organisations are shown in the list of ITOs produced by the National Council of Industry Training Organisations. A copy of the latest list is in the Library. Development managers communicate Government training policy to ITOs and manage projects under the standards, ITO support and modern apprenticeship programmes.

Training

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the amount of funding per start available from his Department for (a) youth training and (b) training for work or employment training; and what it has been in each of the last five years. [23000]

Mr. Paice: This information is provided in the following table, each year's budget being divided by the number of starts achieved or anticipated.

| Year | Youth training (YT) £ | Training for work/employment training (TfW/ET) £ |
|---|---|---|
| 1995–96 (plans) | 4,533 | 2,569 |
| 1994–95 (provisional) | 3,697 | 2,473 |
| 1993–94 | 3,951 | 2,603 |
| 1992–93 | 3,526 | 2,588 |
| 1991–92 | 3,895 | 2,817 |
| 1990–91 | 3,387 | 2,990 |

Notes:
1. All figures are for England only except TfW and ET figures for 1991–92 and 1992–93 which take account of Employment Action in Scotland and Wales (1991–92) in Scotland (1992-93).
2. The figures for YT are cost per first time entrant.

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment for each industrial sector, what have been the amounts paid by his Department in each of the last 10 years to each (a) industry training organisations, (b) lead body and (c) awarding body where different organisations fill these roles; and for what purpose these amounts were paid. [22949]

Mr. Paice: The information is not available in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. In 1994–95 approximately £20 million was spent by this Department on approximately 900 separate contracts with lead bodies and industry training organisations.

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide a breakdown of the £578 million allocated to training for work to show the amount planned for expenditure on (a) starts, (b) outcomes, (c) special needs, (d) fees to training and enterprise councils, (e) administrative costs, (f) payments of benefits, (g) pilots or other non-generalised funding and (h) the remaining amounts; if he will give the figures by TEC and region, and if he will provide a similar breakdown for youth training. [22986]

Mr. Paice: The budgets of individual training and enterprise councils are treated as commercial in confidence between the Department and TECs until the autumn, after TECs have completed negotiations with providers of training.

The following tables give regional allocations of training for work and youth training budgets for 1995–96.

On TfW the fees budget to TECs is split 25 per cent. for starts and 75 per cent. for outcomes. Starts payments are not made for YT except for certain pilot schemes. Outcome budgets on YT differ with individual TECs, but, except for pilots, are up to a maximum of 40 per cent. of the total budget. Separate budgets are not dedicated for those with special needs on either programme. There are no specific budgets for administrative costs within these programmes, though TECs receive a management fee as a contribution to their administrative expenditure across all their activities.

Training for work 1995–96

| | Fees budget £ million | Allowance budget £ million |
|---|---|---|
| Central development | 4.4 | 0 |
| Others | 19.7 | 6.3 |
| South East | 23.3 | 24.3 |
| London | 47.4 | 47.0 |
| Eastern | 18.9 | 19.7 |
| South West | 23.6 | 24.6 |
| West Midlands | 29.2 | 30.4 |
| East Midlands | 19.2 | 20.0 |
| Yorks and Humberside | 32.6 | 33.9 |
| North West | 30.0 | 31.3 |
| Merseyside | 20.0 | 20.8 |
| North East | 25.0 | 26.0 |
| Total | 293.3 | 284.4 |

Notes:
1. The Allowance budget is paid through the Employment Service.
2. 'Others' covers funding for residential training centres, performance-related funding and for pit closure areas.

Youth programmes 1995–96

| | Budget £ million |
|---|---|
| Central development | 2.0 |
| Others | 23.0 |
| South East | 77.4 |
| London | 59.1 |
| Eastern | 63.4 |
| South West | 54.5 |
| West Midlands | 73.7 |
| East Midlands | 61.1 |
| Yorkshire and Humberside | 76.4 |
| North West | 102.8 |
| Merseyside | 32.0 |
| North East | 55.0 |
| Total | 680.4 |

Notes:
1. The budget covers fees and allowances for youth training, youth credits and modern apprenticeships.
2. 'Others'covers funding for bridging allowances, the Ministry of Defence and Department of Transport schemes, performance-related funding and performance pool.

Business Start-up Allowance

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many representations he has received in the last year concerning business start-up allowance. [22997]

Mr. Paice: About 170 written representations were recorded in the 1994–95 year.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the amount allocated to each TEC (a) in each region and (b) in the United Kingdom for (i) training fees, (ii) starts funding and (iii) outcomes funding. [22985]

Mr. Paice: The budget of individual training and enterprise councils are treated as commercial in confidence between the Department and TECs until the autumn, after TECs have completed negotiations with providers of training.

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the target for NVQs and how many NVQs were achieved for each TEC in (a) each region and (b) the United Kingdom; at what level these were achieved in each year since their launch; and what are the targets for achievement this year and next year. [22950]

Mr. Paice: There are no targets for numbers of National Vocational Qualifications. The total number of NVQs awarded between their launch and 31 December 1994 is about 765,000 according to figures supplied by the National Council for Vocational Qualifications. Information for training and enterprise councils and regions is not available.

Instruments of Torture Equipment

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what support training and enterprise councils or his Department directly have given to manufactures of torture equipment. [22721]

Mr. Paice: The Employment Department does not collect information from training and enterprise councils which enables it to identify individual companies which receive TEC support.

The Department has not knowingly given support to manufactures of torture equipment.

Labour Statistics

Dr. John Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of 16 to 24 year-olds in West Cumbria is in full-time employment. [22735]

Mr. Paice: The information requested is not available for West Cumbria. However, estimates from the autumn 1994 labour force survey show that in the north region, excluding Tyne and Wear, 41 per cent. of 16 to 24-year-olds were in full-time employment.

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will state for each February since 1979 the number of males aged 50 to 65 years in full-time employment; and what percentage this is of the relevant population. [18084]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 4 April 1995]: The information requested is shown in the following table:

Males aged 50 to 65 in full-time employment Great Britain 1979–1994[1]

| Spring | Numbers (000s) | Per cent. |
|---|---|---|
| 1979 | 3,298 | 71 |
| 1981 | 2,882 | 62 |
| 1983 | 3,087 | 67 |
| 1984 | 3,016 | 65 |
| 1985 | 2,955 | 64 |
| 1986 | 2,859 | 62 |

Males aged 50 to 65 in full-time employment Great Britain 1979–1994[1]

| Spring | Numbers (000s) | Per cent. |
|---|---|---|
| 1987 | 2,773 | 61 |
| 1988 | 2,810 | 62 |
| 1989 | 2,833 | 63 |
| 1990 | 2,825 | 63 |
| 1991 | 2,752 | 62 |
| 1992 | 2,636 | 59 |
| 1993 | 2,538 | 56 |
| 1994 | 2,576 | 57 |

Source:
Labour Force Survey (LFS).
Note:
[1] Information not collected for 1980 or 1982.

The fall in the proportion of men aged 50 to 64 in full-time employment reflects several factors, including an increase in the numbers taking early retirement. The spring 1994 labour force survey showed that, of those who were economically inactive, three quarters said that they did not want a job.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Concessional Aid Debt

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list by country the total stock of existing, estimated and outstanding concessional aid debt owed to the United Kingdom by developing countries for each year from 1990 to 2000. [22673]

Mr. Baldry: The information has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Afghan Refugees

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to instigate the discussions with representatives of the Pakistan Government, together with the United Kingdom's European partners, to assess the political, economic and social implications of Afghan refugees and displaced persons remaining in Pakistan; if he will make it his policy to undertake, with the United Kingdom's European partners, a comprehensive strategy designed to enable Afghans to return to their own country; and if he will make a statement. [23096]

Mr. Baldry: The status of Afghan refugees in Pakistan is regularly monitored by the world food programme and the UN High Commissioner for Refugees and the results discussed with the Pakistan Government and bilateral donors. A joint WFP/UNHCR/donors food assessment mission, including an EC representative, has just ended. It found that Afghan refugees in Pakistan enjoy a relatively good socio-economic and nutritional status. It expects that 200,000 refugees will return from Pakistan this year.

The mission's full report will form the basis of a conference organised by UNDP and Sweden in Stockholm on 1–2 June. The conference will discuss how to bring about the transition from humanitarian assistance to longer-term rehabilitation, reconstruction and development, necessary to enable Afghans to return to their own country.

Pakistan Cotton Crop

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 2 May Official Report, column 141, when the study funded by the Overseas Development Administration on cotton pest management, is expected to be completed; if he will list the preliminary conclusions of the study; and what evaluation he has made of reports from Natural Research Institute staff working in Pakistan. [23134]

Mr. Baldry: The study is expected to be completed by early July. Preliminary conclusions are not available. The study will cover all the factors affecting the cotton crop in Pakistan, and not only pest management.

ODA funded research carried out by the Natural Resources Institute is monitored by ODA's renewable natural resources research strategy monitoring panel. Reports of earlier phases of NRI's work in Pakistan, together with information from other sources, were the basis for the decision to focus its current research into cotton on the use of pheromones in controlling cotton pests, and on pesticide resistance. Pheromone research undertaken by NRI in Pakistan and Egypt is currently the subject of an ODA evaluation study.

Caribbean Banana Industry

Mr. Brandreth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the United Kingdom is going to secure the long-term prospects of the Caribbean banana industry. [23928]

Mr. Baldry: The UK has assisted the Windward Islands banana industry over many years. We fought hard to safeguard their interests in the EC banana regime which allows preferential access for Windward Islands bananas to the EU market until 2002. We have recently funded a wide-ranging consultancy review of the industry's current structure and future strategy. The recommendations of this review have been broadly accepted by the Windwards Prime Minister and the industry. We are now co-operating with the EC on a second study which will provide detailed plans to enable the industry to become more competitive.

Policy Objectives

Mr. Brandreth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the progress report of the ODA's policy objectives described on page 65 of the 1995 departmental report (CM 2802) will be put into the public domain. [23929]

Mr. Baldry: The progress report has just been finalised, and copies have been placed in the Libraries of the House. Further copies are available from the ODA Library.

Northern Iraq

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what monitoring was carried out of the expenditure of Overseas Development Administration assistance through Cornish-Kurdish Medical Aid and its temporary agent Mr. Stephen Crouch for a medical project in northern Iraq;

(2) if he will seek a report on the expenditure of the funds made available to Cornish-Kurdish Medical Aid for a medical project in northern Iraq.

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 28 April 1995]: In June 1991 ODA made a payment of £12,855 to Cornwall Kurdish Medical Aid. This reimbursed against detailed documentation the cost of medical supplies and personal effects for 17 volunteers provided by the non-governmental organisation as part of the 165-member ODA team in northern Iraq at that time.

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what monitoring was carried out of the expenditure of Overseas Development Administrator's assistance by the Kurdish Relief Organisation and its associate Mr. Stephen Crouch for a medical project in northern Iraq. [21707]

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 28 April 1995]: Physical monitoring of ODA assistance to Kurdish relief agencies in northern Iraq in 1991 and 1992 was carried out by visits from British embassy officials based in Ankara. In addition, the agencies submitted written reports to the ODA.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Benzodiazepines

Mr. Steen: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when he expects to reply to the letters from the hon. Member for South Hams dated 31 March and 30 April about Benzodiazepine problems. [23421]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lord Chancellor is considering my hon. Friend's letters and a reply should be with him shortly.

Crown Court Cases

Mr. Straw: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the number of cases coming to trial at the Crown court; what was the number of acquittals; and what was the number of convictions for every year since 1987. [23626]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The question concerns a specific operational matter on which the chief executive of the Court Service is best placed to provide an answer and I have accordingly asked the chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from Michael Huebner to Mr. Jack Straw, dated 9 May 1995:

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, has asked me to reply to your Question about the number of cases coming to trial at the Crown Court during the past 8 years.

The following statistics show the number of cases coming to trial at the Crown Court each year since 1987:

1987: 28,006
1988: 26,820
1989: 26,830
1990: 26,177
1991: 27,608
1992: 27,113
1993: 25,583
1994: 27,627[1]

You also ask for information about the number of acquittals and convictions. I am only able to provide this in respect of defendants who entered pleas of not guilty to all counts, as follows:

| Year | Acquitted | Convicted |
|---|---|---|
| 1987 | 15,560 | 15,475 |
| 1988 | 17,542 | 14,507 |
| 1989 | 17,517 | 13,827 |
| 1990 | 17,241 | 12,752 |
| 1991 | 17,760 | 12,773 |
| 1992 | 15,576 | 12,274 |
| 1993 | 14,800 | 10,680 |
| 1994 | [1]15,700 | [1]10,500 |

[1] These figures are provisional and therefore liable to revision to take account of late amendments.

WALES

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department. [21472]

Mr. Redwood: Welsh Office policy, in line with guidance issued in 1992 by the ministerial group on women's issues, is that policy proposals should ensure that unlawful or unjustifiable sex or race discrimination does not occur and that similar principles apply to people with disabilities. Guidance on the appraisal and evaluation of policy for equal treatment has recently been reissued to everyone at higher executive officer level and above in the Welsh Office. This scrutiny is part of a continuous and routine process, as part of policy advice to Ministers.

Animal Diseases

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many cases of Paramyxovirus occurred in each year since 1985. [22174]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The number of confirmed outbreaks of Paramyxovirus that have occurred each year in Wales since 1985 is as follows:

1985: 69
1986: 29
1987: 24
1988: 6
1989: 8
1990: 11
1991: 4
1992: 3
1993: 2
1994: 0

Vacant Dwellings

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of empty council houses; and if he will make a statement. [22808]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Information on the number of vacant local authority dwellings in Wales is published annually in table 6.9 of Welsh Housing Statistics No. 14, 1994, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Employment (Over 40s)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are his policies to ensure that the over-40s age group can find employment. [22809]

Mr. Redwood: The Government's policies are aimed at creating the right macro-economic and micro-economic conditions for success: low inflation; sound public finances; markets that work properly; and a minimal regulatory and tax burden on business. The recipe is promoting sustained economic growth and higher living standards, from which all age groups will benefit.

The Government is aware of the problems faced by older unemployed people and is keen to encourage employers to make full use of the skills and experience they have to offer. At the end of 1993, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Employment launched the "Getting On" campaign, aimed at persuading employers to retain and recruit employees on the basis of ability rather than age.

However, it is never too late to learn a new skill and this is becoming an increasingly more significant part of people's working lives. "People and Prosperity—An Agenda for Action in Wales" stresses the importance of lifelong learning. It sets out the action that is needed to help adults gain information on, and access to, education and training opportunities.

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many, and what proportion of, vacancies advertised by his Department, and by each of his Department's agencies, in the last three years have listed the attainment of NVQs as an acceptable entry requirement; and, of those, how many have required (i) level 1 NVQs, (ii) level 2 NVQs, (iii) level 3 NVQs and (iv) other level NVQs. [22983]

Mr. Redwood: Except where professional or specialist qualifications are required, all vacancies are advertised as requiring appropriate academic and equivalent qualifications which include NVQs. Over the last three years there have been five recruitment competitions for posts for which NVQs would be appropriate qualifications: three at NVQ level 2, and one each at NVQ level 3 and 4.

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what initiatives he is taking to ensure that, consequent on the impending local government reorganisation, chief officers and their subordinate colleagues are not rendered unemployed; and if he will make a statement. [22811]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The new authorities are responsible for deciding their staffing structures, including the number and grade of posts. My right hon. Friend told the House on 14 December 1994 that he expected them to make the fullest possible use of existing staff—if necessary by redeploying and retraining them—rather than spending large sums of public money on redundancies and recruitment.

Audit Commission Guidelines

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what guidelines he has issued to the Audit Commission with regard to district audit functions in Wales; and if he will make a statement in respect of the work of the Commission in Wales. [23076]

Mr. Redwood: The Audit Commission operates under a code of audit practice issued under section 14 of the Local Government finance Act 1982. The code is updated every five years and agreed by me and my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Environment and Health. The code prescribes the way in which auditors are to carry out their functions under part 111 of the 1982 Act and is currently under review.

Designated Conservation Sites

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those sites which (a) have been designated or (b) meet the criteria for designation as (i) special protection areas under the European Community Directive on the Conservation of Wild Birds or (ii) Ramsar sites under the Convention of Wetlands of International Importance. [22368]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The list of designated sites in Wales is as follows:

Special protection areas
Skokholm and Skomer
Grassholm
Traeth Lafan, Conway Bay
Ynys Feurig, Cemlyn Bay and the Skerries
Glannau Aberdaron (Aberdaron Coast) and Ynys Enlli (Bardsey Island)
Glannau Ynys Gybi (Holy Island Coast)
Burry Inlet[1]
Dee Estuary[1 2]

Ramsar sites
Cors Fochno and Dyfi
Llyn Idwal
Llyn Tegid
Cors Caron
Crymlyn Bog
Burry Inlet[1]
Dee Estuary[1 2]

[1] Joint Special Protection Areas and Ramsar sites.
[2] Cross border site.

Additional sites are under review and a list will be published in due course.

Child Abuse

Sir Wyn Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he is able to announce details of the investigation to be undertaken by a QC into child abuse in children's homes in north Wales. [23849]

Mr. Redwood: I have today appointed Nicola Davies QC to advise me, in the light of her examination of relevant papers held by the various agencies concerned, whether an inquiry is required and if so, the form that it should take and the issues to be addressed. I intend to publish her recommendations and her reasons for them.

There may be some matters which for legal reasons it might not be possible to publish.

Welsh Language

Sir Wyn Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has for the future management of the Government's grants to support the Welsh language. [23850]

Mr. Richards: The Government are considering transferring responsibility for grant-aiding the four major Welsh language non-statutory organisations—the Welsh Books Council; the Welsh nursery schools movement, Mudiad Ysgolion Meithrin; the National Eisteddfod; and the Welsh youth movement, Urdd Gobaith Cymru—from the Welsh Office to the Welsh Language Board. A consultative paper seeking the views of the four organisations and other interested parties is being issued today with comments invited by 7 July. A copy has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 1 May, Official Report, column 119, if he will make a statement on the possible conflicts of interest involving special advisers, listing the names of the individuals, the nature of the conflicts concerned and how the matters were resolved. [22905]

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 9 May 1995]: It is not my practice to comment on information about the private interests of staff.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Appointments

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many civil service appointments were made to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in his Department and the agencies for which he is accountable in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. [21780]

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 1 May 1995]: The information in respect of permanent and fixed term appointments to core—MAFF is as follows:

| | AA | AO |
|---|---|---|
| September—December 1993 | 49 | 27 |
| January–March 1994 | 16 | 36 |
| April–June 1994 | 31 | 11 |
| July–September 1994 | 3 | 20 |
| October–December 1994 | 21 | 50 |
| January–April 1995 | 25 | 24 |

I have asked agency chief executives to reply to the hon. Member direct.

Letter from T. W. A. Little to Mr. Nick Ainger, dated 10 April 1995:

The Minister has asked me to reply to your question about appointments made in the Administrative Assistant and Administrative Officer grades at CVL.

You asked for a breakdown by each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. For the majority of this time we have not made any appointments in these grades but, where we have, the position is as follows:

| Quarters | Administrative Officer | Administrative Assistant |
|---|---|---|
| 1.4.94–30.6.94 | 1 | — |
| 1.7.94–30.9.94 | — | 10 |
| 1.10.94–31.12.94 | — | 1 |

Letter from Guy Stapleton to Mr. Nick Ainger, dated 10 April 1995:

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has asked me to reply to your question about Civil Service appointments made to Administrative Officers and Administrative Assistants in this Agency between September 1993 to April 1995 as this matter is within my operational responsibility.

In the quarter September to December 1993, 20 administrative officers were recruited and appointed. No new appointments in the Administrative Officer or Administrative Assistant grades were made during the remainder of the period between January 1994 to April 1995.

Letter from J. M. Morris to Mr. Nick Ainger, dated 10 May 1995:

The Minister of Agriculture has asked me to reply directly to you in answer to your question (Number 1164) which asked how many Civil Service appointments were made to the administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in this Agency in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995. ADAS was created as an Executive Agency in June 1992 under the joint ownership of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Welsh Office.

The figures that you require are as follows:

| | Administrative Assistant | Administrative Officer |
|---|---|---|
| 1.9.93–31.12.93 | 1 | 2 |
| 1.1.94–31.3.94 | 1 | 1 |
| 1.4.94–30.6.94 | 1 | 2 |
| 1.7.94–30.9.94 | 0 | 4 |
| 1.10.94–31.12.94 | 2 | 0 |
| 1.1.95–31.3.95 | 0 | 1 |

Letter from J.M. Rutter to Mr. Nick Ainger, dated 10 May 1995:

The Minister has asked me to reply to your question about the number of Civil Service appointments made by the Veterinary Medicines Directorate to Administrative Assistant and Administrative Officer posts in each quarter from September 1993 until April 1995, as this is an operational matter for which I am responsible.

During this period, three administrative assistants were appointed in the quarter from 1 July 1994 to 30 September 1994.

Letter from G.K. Bruce to Mr. Nick Ainger, dated 10 May 1995:

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has asked me to reply, in respect of the Pesticides Safety Directorate (PSD), to your question about appointment of Administrative Assistants and Administrative Officers since September 1993.

The number of appointments has been as follows:

| | AA | AO |
|---|---|---|
| September 1993 | 1 | 0 |
| October–December 1993 | 0 | 0 |
| January–March 1994 | 0 | 0 |
| April–June 1994 | 0 | 0 |
| July–September 1994 | 3 | 2 |
| October–December 1994 | 15 | 10 |
| January–March 1995 | 1 | 0 |

The appointments made in the second half of 1994 were as a result of the relocation of PSD from London to York in October last year.

Letter from P I Stanley to Mr. Nick Ainger, dated 10 April 1995:

Number of civil service appointments to administrative assistant and administrative officer posts in MAFF and its agencies from September 1993–April 1995.

The number of Civil Service appointments to the Administrative Assistant (AA) and Administrative Officer (AO) grades, made by the Central Science Laboratory (CSL) for each quarter during the period between September 1993 and April 1995 are as follows:

| Quarter | AA grade | AO grade |
|---|---|---|
| 1.10.93–31.12.93 | 4 | 0 |
| 1.1.94–31.3.94 | 2 | 1 |
| 1.4.94–30.6.94 | 0 | 1 |
| 1.7.94–30.9.94 | 0 | [1] |
| 1.10.94–31.12.94 | 0 | 0 |
| 1.1.95–31.3.95 | 0 | 0 |

[1] Fixed-term appointment

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Barron: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many and what proportion of vacancies advertised by his Department, and by each of his Department's agencies, in the last three years have listed the attainment of national vocational qualifications as an acceptable entry requirement; and, of those, how many have required (i) level 1 NVQs, (ii) level 2 NVQs, (iii) level 3 NVQs and (iv) other level NVQs. [22979]

Mr. Jack: None.

Republic of Ireland

Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to what extent the British Govnerment directly financially support agriculture in the Republic of Ireland. [23044]

Mr. Jack: The Govnerment do not provide any direct financial support to agriculture in the Republic of Ireland.

Tobacco Sector

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what procedure is available to establish whether the former head of the European Commission's tobacco sector was involved in any misdemeanour. [22771]

Mr. Jack: The Commission called in the Belgian police to investigate the circumstances surrounding the suicide of the former head of the tobacco sector. Separately the matter was subject to internal investigation by the Commission. We understand that inquiries are continuing with the competent authorities in Italy and Greece relating to this investigation.

Suspected tobacco irregularities have been of interest to the Govnerment and every opportunity is taken to press the Commission for information on what action it has taken. In this respect, the European Parliament, in its draft report on the discharge of the 1993 European Communities budget, has specifically asked the Commission to inform it about the measures it has taken so far to implement the conclusions in the European Court of Auditors special report on the operation of the tobacco regime. The Government welcome this as it will provide the opportunity to apply further pressure on the Commission on the question of irregularities.

Table Wine

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, if he will make a statement on the figures for wine consumption in table 4.14 of "National Diet and Nutrition Survey: Children aged $1\frac{1}{2}$ to $4\frac{1}{2}$ years." [23258]

Mrs. Browning: The survey shows that a small number of children, less than 1 per cent. of those surveyed, consumed small quantities of wine during the four days for which the dietary record was kept. The mean daily intake was 4.3 g—less than 1 teaspoon—and the maximum daily intake was 14.4g—about 1 tablespoon. Although it is unlikely that the health of these children will be damaged by these small amounts of wine, we will be including advice to avoid giving alcohol to young children in a future "Food Sense" booklet aimed at providing advice on healthy feeding to parents of pre-school children.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to what extent he takes into account the relative financial transfer to United Kingdom farmers as against other EU farmers and the effect on the United Kingdom's net contribution to the EU when he assesses possible changes in the CAP. [22774]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 9 May 1995]: The factors taken into account in Council negotiations on proposals for changes to the CAP are covered in the explanatory memoranda which my Department prepares whenever such proposals are issued. Copies of explanatory memoranda are available in the Library of the House.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will publish the gender assessment being prepared by his Department. [21487]

Mr. Sproat: This Department's policy, in line with the guidance issued in 1992 by the ministerial group on women's issues, is that policy proposals should ensure that unlawful or unjustifiable sex or race discrimination does not occur and that similar principles apply to people with disabilities, older people or ex-offenders. This scrutiny is part of a continuous and routine process, as part of policy advice to Ministers.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what progress he hopes to achieve in his Department over the next three months to push forward the declaration signed in October 1994 at the Vienna conference in preparation for the fourth UN conference on women; and if he will agree to incorporate a section on equal opportunities in his department's annual report. [21488]

Mr. Sproat: The Government are committed to the principles set out in the regional platform for action agreed at the preparatory conference in Vienna for the fourth UN world conference on women. We have taken these forward through a wide range of programmes and initiatives and will continue to do so. The DNH annual report in each of the last two years refers to the progress the Department is making on equal opportunities issues.

Royal Naval College, Greenwich

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if his Department will assume responsibility for the maintenance of the premises in Greenwich formerly occupied by the Royal Naval college and the Joint Services Defence college. [22210]

Mr. Sproat: The Department of National Heritage is jointly responsible with the Ministry of Defence for the maintenance of the premises currently occupied by the Royal Naval college. As my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces explained on 30 March, Official Report, columns 746-47, decisions on the future of the Royal Naval college site have yet to be taken, but it is hoped that a further announcement will be made before the end of the year. Decisions will take into account the importance of ensuring that, as far as possible, these fine historic buildings are properly maintained in future.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Metropolitan Police

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the total amount spent by the Metropolitan police force on driver training in each year since 1975; [22653]

(2) how many Metropolitan police officers took (a) basic, (b) intermediate and (c) advanced driving courses in each year since 1975; [22654]

(3) how many police officers with the advanced driving qualification were employed by the Metropolitan police force in (a) 1994, (b) 1991, (c) 1987, (d) 1983, (e) 1979 and (f) 1975. [22655]

Mr. Maclean: The following is the information requested for the years after 1990. I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that, prior to 1991, such information is not retained in a form which allows it to be readily retrieved:

| Year | Amount spent on driver training £ | Number of officers taking intermediate[1] course | Number of officers taking advanced course |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1991 | 2,421,480 | 533 | 327 |
| 1992 | 3,007,290 | 826 | 312 |
| 1993 | 3,277,560 | 1,200 | 246 |
| 1994 | 2,260,830 | 750 | 228 |

[1] The intermediate course is the first level of driver training beyond possession of a full driving licence.

In 1991 there were 4,794 officers in the Metropolitan police who held advanced driving qualifications. The number in 1994 was 5,486.

Police Patrol Vehicles (Accidents)

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) pursuant to his answer of 4 April, Official Report, column 1019, how many of the accidents which resulted in civilian injuries in each year since 1991 involved (a) basic patrol vehicles, (b) area or fast response vehicles and (c) unmarked police vehicles; [22656]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 4 April, Official Report, column 1019, how many of the accidents which resulted in civilian injuries in each year since 1991 involved police drivers who had not been trained to advanced level. [22657]

Mr. Maclean: The following shows the number of road traffic accidents involving police patrol vehicles since 1991; the numbers of injuries to civilians and police officers; and the number of accidents involving drivers trained to advanced level which resulted in civilian injuries.

The figures for injuries to civilians and police officers given in my answer of 4 April, column 1019, were transposed in three places and the following table corrects that error.

| Year | (a) Number of accidents | (b) Number of civilian injuries | (c) Number of police officer injuries | (d) Total (b)+(c) | (e) Accidents resulting in civilian injuriesadvanced class driver | Other |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1991 | 4,150 | 366 | 671 | 1,037 | 123 | 180 |
| 1992 | 4,143 | 318 | 710 | 1,028 | 121 | 173 |
| 1993 | 4,246 | 372 | 831 | 1,203 | 136 | 191 |
| 1994 | 4,063 | 321 | 858 | 1,179 | 113 | 176 |

These figures do not include accidents in which a police vehicle was in the vicinity but not directly involved.

The Metropolitan police did not record the type of vehicle involved in accidents prior to January 1995.

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have been knocked down by speeding police vehicles in each of the last three years (a) nationally and (b) in the Metropolitan police area; how many have been fatally injured; and how much compensation has been paid out in each of the last three years. [22943]

Mr. Maclean: The latest information available centrally on accidents involving police vehicles for police forces in England and Wales, excluding the Metropolitan police, is for the period 1991–1993 and is shown in table A. The latest available figures for the Metropolitan police are for the period 1992–94 and are shown in table B.

The information in both tables relates to death and serious injury caused to both police officers and civilians in the course of either police pursuits or responses to emergency calls. Information about any compensation paid by the police following these accidents is not available centrally.

Joint Enterprise Cases

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the review undertaken by his Department into joint enterprise cases in which a child has lost its life. [22918]

Mr. Maclean: I am considering the issues raised by joint enterprise cases in which a child loses it life, and hope to reach a conclusion soon.

"Action Against Crime"

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the bodies involved in drafting his Department's "Action Against Crime" pack. [22919]

Mr. Maclean: The "Action Against Crime" pack was drafted by officials in my Department.

Knives

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what consideration he has given to restrictions on the buying of knives by children; [22722]

(2) what representations he has received on the purchase of knives by children. [22725]

Mr. Maclean: The question of the sale of knives to children has been raised with my right hon. and learned Friend from time to time—he has received three letters from hon. Members about this in the last 12 months. Banning such sales would do little to reduce the availability of knives given that they are available in most homes.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what talks he has had with the police on the control of knives; [22723]

(2) what work has been carried out on behalf of his Department to define for legislative purposes the difference between assault and working knives; and what plans he has to resume this work. [22727]

Mr. Maclean: Chief officers of police were last formally consulted about controls on the sale of knives during the preparation of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 (Offensive Weapons) Order 1988. This lists 14 weapons the sale of which is prohibited. No item has been added to the list. We will consider adding to the list weapons which have no legitimate use and have some feature which enables them to be distinguished from ordinary knives. Whether these criteria apply is considered in relation to individual items. An assault knife, although possibly offensive in the way it is described, may, depending on its exact specification, not be distinguishable in practice from an ordinary domestic knife.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the figures for knife-related incidents for each of the last five years (a) for the country as a whole and (b) by region. [22724]

Mr. Maclean: The available information relates to an ad hoc survey concerning notifiable offences recorded by the police in which knives were involved. The results were published in table 2.24 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1989". A copy of this publication is available in the Library.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many children were arrested for knife-related incidents in each of the last five years (a) in the country as a whole and (b) by region. [22726]

Mr. Maclean: This information is not collected centrally.

Parole

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average current delay in parole for prisoners in (a) London and (b) England and Wales. [22835]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Provisional figures for the period January to April inclusive 1995 show that, out of 794 prisoners in England and Wales notified of their parole decisions, 237 were notified before their parole eligibility date or its anniversary. The remainder were notified of decisions, on average, 7.7 weeks after their parole eligibility date or its anniversary. These figures include decisions to refuse as well as decisions to grant parole.

I regret that information relating to London is not available separately.

Crime Victims

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the statement of service standards for victims of crime to be published. [22839]

Mr. Maclean: We hope to publish the statement in July.

Naturalisation

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average time it takes to process applications for naturalisation at the most recent date; what was the time five years ago; and if he will make a statement. [23657]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: The average waiting time for certificates of naturalisation issued in April 1995 was 13 months, compared with 28 months in April 1990.

Manslaughter

Mrs Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance is given by his Department to (a) the judiciary and (b) secure mental hospitals regarding the minimum length of time for which those convicted of manslaughter on the ground of diminished responsibility should be detained in a secure mental hospital. [23519]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The law does not provide for the period of detention under a hospital order to be fixed in advance. A patient subject to such an order will be detained until this is judged to be no longer necessary on account of his health or safety or the safety of others. Where a hospital order is accompanied by a restriction order, the power of discharge by the responsible medical officer may be exercised only with the consent of my right hon. and learned Friend.

Blasphemy

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the benefits and disbenefits of retaining the offence of blasphemy on the statute book. [22941]

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. and learned Friend considers that an unacceptable legal vacuum would be created if the legal protection afforded by the law on blasphemy were removed and nothing introduced in its place. It would be a mistake to attempt to legislate on what is a sensitive matter of conscience without a wide consensus as to the best way forward; in the Government's view there is no such consensus.

Unescorted Prisoners

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements are made to secure the safety of the public and railway employees when prisoners travel unescorted by train. [21657]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. John Heppell, dated 10 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the director general from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the arrangements made to secure the safety of the public and railway employees when prisoners travel unescorted by train.

Following the announcement made by the Home Secretary on 6 April about changes to the Prison Rules, new stricter arrangements for the unescorted temporary release of prisoners were implemented on 25 April. Under the new system, there will be substantially fewer prisoners released on temporary licence and prisoners will have to serve longer in prison before their application for release on licence will be considered. Governors may only release suitable eligible prisoners for specific and justifiable purposes if they have satisfied a stringent risk assessment which includes an assessment of the proposed travelling arrangements and the prisoner's compliance with the terms of the licence issued. Instructions to Governors governing the new national policy of release on temporary licence are set out in Prison Service Instruction 36/1995, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Accelerated Promotion Scheme

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of prison staff on the accelerated promotion scheme are of ethnic minority origin. [23092]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 9 May 1995]: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. Doug Hoyle, dated 10 May 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the proportion of prison staff on the Accelerated Promotion Scheme who are of ethnic minority origin.

There are at present 89 members of the Prison Service on the Accelerated Promotion Scheme, none of whom is of ethnic minority origin.

Accounting Officers

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many times in the last 10 years, and on which dates, his departmental accounting officer has issued a minute in that role; and what was the issue in each case. [22568]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 9 May 1995]: Where a Minister overrules an accounting officer's advice on an issue of propriety or regularity or one of value for money, the accounting officer should request a written instruction from the Minister to take the action in question.

All such instructions are reported to the Comptroller and Auditor General who, after making whatever investigations he considers appropriate, will report his findings to the Committee of Public Accounts.

There are no known instances of this in the Home Office in the last 10 years.

Asylum Procedures

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what indicators or other methodologies are used to measure the impact of training on performance of officials in admission and asylum procedures. [22751]

Mr. Nicholas Baker [holding answer 5 May 1995]: The quality of decision making is monitored by senior officers. An important measure of quality is the number of refusal decisions which are upheld on appeal by the independent appellate authorities. At present only 5 per cent. of appeals by failed asylum seekers are allowed by special adjudicators.

ENVIRONMENT

Interim Development Orders

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many interim development order permissions were re-registered within one specified time limit, broken down by local authority area, indicating in each case the name of the company making the application. [22604]

Sir Paul Beresford: This information is not held centrally. However, according to statistics prepared for the County Planning Officers Society the following number of IDOs was registered in England and Wales, broken down by region:

| Region | Number |
|---|---|
| Northern (31): | Cumbria 3Northumberland 10Tyne and Wear 1Durham 17 |
| Yorkshire and Humberside (44) | |
| North West (22): | Lancashire 18Greater Manchester 3Cheshire 1 |
| East Midlands (64): | Derbyshire 12Nottinghamshire 14Lincolnshire 13Leicestershire 24Northamptonshire 1 |
| West Midlands (54): | Shropshire 10Staffordshire 33Walsall 5Warwickshire 6 |
| East Anglia (17): | Cambridgeshire 7Norfolk 7Suffolk 3 |
| South East (103): | Oxfordshire 7Buckinghamshire 3Bedfordshire 7Hertfordshire 7Essex 13Berkshire 7Hampshire 8Surrey 6West Sussex 18East Sussex 7Kent 20 |

| Region | Number |
|---|---|
| South West (99): | Cornwall 18 |
| | Devon 17 |
| | Somerset 24 |
| | Dorset 13 |
| | Wiltshire 2 |
| | Avon 22 |
| | Gloucestershire 3 |
| Wales (74): | Gwynedd 13 |

| | Dyfed 19 |
| | Powys 7 |
| | West Glamorgan 2 |
| | Mid Glamorgan 8 |
| | South Glamorgan 5 |
| | Gwent 4 |

There was only one time period allowed for registration applications to be submitted to local mineral planning authorities. This period was six months and ran from 25 September 1991 to 25 March 1992—see paragraph 8a of MPG8.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of his Department's budget is allocated to initiatives which have been undertaken to secure private finance for his Department's projects. [22798]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Department and its sponsored bodies seek to maximise the amount of private finance it raises to assist in the implementation of a wide variety of programmes, most notably in housing, inner cities and urban regeneration. Over 60 per cent. of the Department's discretionary expenditure—excluding demand led programmes such as housing revenue account subsidy—is on programmes which attract private finance. The Department expects to generate some £4 billion of private investment this financial year.

Housing Capital Receipts, Harrogate

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the gross receipts from the sales of (a) council dwellings, (b) property assets and (c) land assets realised by Harrogate borough council for each of the last five years. [22804]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The information reported by Harrogate borough council is as follows. The figures for council house sales are based on their value after discount, and without subtracting the value of any mortgage lending by the local authority.

Housing capital receipts in Harrogate borough council (excluding lending for council house purchase)

| | 1989–90 | 1990–91 | 1991–92 | 1992–93 | 1993–94 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Sale of: Council Dwellings | 3,058 | 1,367 | 1,480 | 888 | 1,487 |
| Other property assets | 48 | 89 | 0 | 18 | 0 |
| Sale or lease of land | 57 | 55 | 271 | 278 | 7 |

These receipts figures also exclude any repayments of discount, or sums outstanding, on council house sales; repayments of principal of mortgages to private persons; and repayments of principal of loans to housing associations.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library a copy of the document on safety fundamentals and standards for radioactive waste management as agreed by the International Atomic Energy Agency board of governors at its meeting on 27 to 30 March; and what contribution was made by United Kingdom specialists to this document. [22932]

Mr. Atkins: A copy of the International Atomic Energy Agency safety fundamentals "The Principles of Radioactive Waste Management" and safety standard No. 1 "Establishing a National Legal System for Radioactive Waste Management", which were adopted by the IAEA board of governors in March, will be placed in the Library when published later this year. The UK made a full contribution to the preparation of these documents.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what British specialists Her Majesty's Government have nominated for the group of experts being convened by the board of governors of the International Atomic Energy Agency to prepare a convention on the safety of radioactive waste management. [22929]

Mr. Atkins: Officials from my Department and, as appropriate, from other Government Departments, agencies and organisations will be involved in preparations for the proposed International Atomic Energy Agency convention on the safety of radioactive waste management.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what investigations have been carried out into the radioactive waste found at Poplar farm, Northamptonshire, on 13 January; and what these investigations conclude is the source of this material. [23043]

Mr. Atkins: The investigations undertaken to date by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution in order to trace the origin of the depleted uranium found at Poplar farm, Chelveston, have included the following: firstly, identifying the type of material found; secondly, identifying the sources of such material; and, finally, visiting all these locations in order to either eliminate them from the investigation, or to identify the site as a possible source for the material. The investigations are still under way.

National Vocational qualifications

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many, and what proportion of, vacancies advertised by his Department, and by each of his Department's agencies, in the last three years have listed the attainment of national vocational qualifications as an acceptable entry requirement; and, of those, how many have required (i) level 1 NVQs, (ii) level 2 NVQs, (iii) level 3 NVQs and (iv) other level NVQs. [22977]

Sir Paul Beresford: My Department, its agencies and DOE personnel staff in Government offices are happy to accept national vocational qualifications at the appropriate level as alternatives to traditional educational qualifications. The Buying Agency has run one advertising scheme in the last three years with NVQs, level 1 or 2 as a requirement—4 per cent. of vacancies. No other vacancies advertised in the last three years have specifically referred to the acceptance of NVQs.

Domestic Properties

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many domestic properties in (a) Lancashire, (b) the north-west and (c) England are valued below £20,000 and £30,000 and between £30,000 and £40,000. [22942]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The information requested is not available centrally.

Council tax valuation band A covers all properties up to and including those valued at £40,000 on 1 April 1991; properties in band A are not separately graded into the valuations requested.

Non-domestic Properties

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the total net rateable value of non-domestic property for each district council in England and for each London borough. [22780]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The table shows the total of rateable values at 1 April 1995 in the local rating lists for all billing authorities in England. In addition, the aggregate of rateable values in the central rating list was £2.9 billion.

Construction Industry

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans the Government have to (a) implement the Latham report and (b) introduce legislation on contracts in the construction industry; and if he will make a statement. [22740]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: I refer to the answer given to the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Gapes) on 5 April, Official Report, columns 1283–84, and the answer given to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Cunningham) on 21 April, Official Report, column 286.

Business Start-ups

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance he has issued regarding the availability of business start-up allowance following its absorbtion into the single regeneration budget. [22998]

Sir Paul Beresford: The bidding guidance issued for the first and second rounds of the SRB challenge fund, published in April 1994 and April 1995 respectively, made it clear that the fund is available to provide business support. Copies of the guidance is in the Library of the House. Subject to the preparation of delivery plans, some 60,000 new business start-ups are forecast to be supported under schemes approved in round 1. Successful bidders are expected to ensure that local people know what assistance is available.

Training and enterprise councils can also continue to support those intending to start up in business through the training for work programme or, where circumstances allow, from their own resources. TECs publicise these arrangements in whatever way seems appropriate locally.

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the effect of changes to the administration and availability and take-up of the business start-up allowance following its incorporation into the single regeneration budget; and if he will make a statement. [22996]

Sir Paul Beresford: The business start-up scheme became part of the single regeneration budget on 1 April 1994 and ceased as a separate programme on 31 March 1995. Participants starting before then will continue to receive the agreed levels of support. Support for new businesses is one of the objectives of the SRB challenge fund. Subject to the preparation of delivery plans some 60,000 business start-ups are forecast to be supported under schemes approved in the first challenge fund bidding round. The second bidding round was launched on 12 April and this will provide further opportunities for similar support.

Commercial Leases

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to ensure that smaller landlords are adequately protected under the terms of commercial leases. [22692]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Lease terms are a private contractual matter for the parties; it is up to them to take appropriate professional advice to ensure that their leases give them adequate protection.

If the hon. Member's questions are prompted by specific cases, he may wish to write to me with details for further comments.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to ensure that commercial tenants do not gain unfair advantages through legal loopholes in commercial leases. [22691]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Commercial lease terms are a matter for negotiation between the parties prior to occupation. No doubt each party will seek to use its bargaining strengths but it should ensure professional advice is sought to avoid terms which are potentially damaging.

If the hon. Member's questions are prompted by specific cases he may wish to write to me with details for further comments.

Tree Preservation

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total number of tree preservation orders issued by Sheffield city council for each of the last two years; and if he will make a statement. [23073]

Mr. Atkins: The information requested is not held centrally.

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice is issued by his Department to local authorities regarding tree preservation orders; and if he will make a statement. [23072]

Mr. Atkins: To supplement existing advice in DOE circular 36/78, my Department published a comprehensive guide to the tree preservation order system for local planning authorities in October 1994—"Tree Preservation Orders—A Guide to the Law and Good Practice". Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to change planning law to protect trees. [23075]

Mr. Atkins: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on 21 July 1994, Official Report, columns 450-52.

Training

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, what special training is given to persons who have responsibility for assessing the historical significance of documents held by his Department. [23287]

Sir Paul Beresford: Training in assessing the historical significance of departmental records is carried out under the guidance of the Keeper of Public Records. It is provided in a number of different ways, including courses on the appraisal of records and through conferences and seminars arranged by the Public Record Office.

Enterprise Zones

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on co-operation between the Welsh Office and his Department in relation to the designation of enterprise zones; what is the average length of time the necessary procedures take; and if he will make a statement. [21975]

Sir Paul Beresford: Enterprise zones in Wales are the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Wales. I am satisfied that there is full co-operation between my Department, other interested Government Departments and the Welsh Office in considering the case for designating further enterprise zones in Wales. The arrangements for establishing enterprise zones, including those for enforcing European Community restrictions on state aids, mean that zones now take at least two years to designate.

Special Protection Areas

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those sites which (a) have been designated or (b) meet the criteria for designation as (i) special protection areas under the European Community directive on the conservation of wild birds or (ii) Ramsar sites under the convention of wetlands of international importance. [22367]

Sir Paul Beresford: The following table lists all those sites in England which have been designated as either special protection areas, or Ramsar sites, or both.

A list of areas identified on the basis of scientific evidence as potentially qualifying for classification as special protection areas in England was published in planning policy guidance note 9, issued in October 1994. This list and the list of potential Ramsar sites is currently under review. When this work is completed a revised list will be published.

Women's Refuges

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what funding is provided by Her Majesty's Government to support women's refuges throughout the United Kingdom; how much is to be provided in each of the next three years; and if he will make a statement. [23093]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: In 1995–96 the Government will be providing through the Housing Corporation about £3.25 million in revenue support for 1,910 bed spaces in women's refuges, and capital amounting to £2.5 million to develop further schemes. The Government are also making available to the Women's Aid Federation (England) £151,200 in core funding to provide support services for women and children who are victims of domestic violence in the home; £49,000 towards their national telephone help line and £55,000 over three years to fund a national housing co-ordinator. Other Government funding includes £252,662 to Welsh Women's Aid and an estimated £362,000 for projects in individual refuges and advice centres in Wales; £45,000 to Scottish Women's Aid for projects associated with tackling homelessness by women escaping domestic violence; and £159,609 in grant under sections 9 and 10 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 for training and administration costs.

Funding for future years depends upon the outcome of public expenditure decisions.

Recycling

Sir Kenneth Carlisle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which local authorities will receive supplementary credit approval resources for recycling projects in 1995–96; and if he will make a statement. [23930]

Mr. Atkins: I am announcing today the allocation of £16.4 million in supplementary credit approval resources for investment in recycling by local authorities in 1995–96. This is the fifth year of the programme, and we have been able to allocate more resources than ever before.

The £16.4 million of SCAs available for 1995–96 forms part of the Government's environmental partnership initiative, which aims to maximise investment through a combination of Government resources, authorities' own resources and private sector contributions. Authorities which aim to do this have done well in the allocations.

A variety of schemes, ranging from large scale material reclamation facilities to home composting initiatives, have received support. Schemes to collect waste oil, and chlorofluorocarbons and plastics have been given particular priority.

We have received bids totalling over £23 million. Each authority is today being notified of the outcome of its bid. A list of the allocations has been placed in the Library.

Some authorities have already received considerable support from the private sector to develop recycling projects and we expect to see private sector funding increase as industry works towards achieving recovery targets as part of our producer responsibility initiative.

For instance, one of the objectives of our producer responsibility initiative for packaging waste is to extend "close-to home" recycling facilities to eight out of 10 homes by the year 2000. If the packaging industry is to meet this target, it will need to work with local authorities to build on the recycling infrastructure which they have already established.

Many local authorities are promoting composting as a means of contributing to the target of recycling 25 per cent. of household waste by the year 2000. The Government are keen to support new composting initiatives which make good environmental and economic sense.

The composting schemes supported this year include some large scale composting plants, but the majority are home composting schemes, which put the onus on householders to make better use of their own garden and kitchen waste. We all need to take responsibility for the waste we produce and I would urge householders to support these initiatives where the opportunity arises.

Special Wastes

Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the interim technical guidance on special wastes will be produced for consultation. [23931]

Mr. Atkins: We are publishing the interim technical guidance on special wastes for consultation today. Our consultation paper on the special waste regulations and the hazardous waste directive issued on 27 March concerned the procedural controls which would apply under the revised special waste regulations. This technical guidance document sets out a series of desk procedures for checking whether a particular waste has characteristics which show it to fall within the control system of the regulations. It will be "interim" guidance until the Department is ready to publish a complete revision of waste management paper No. 23. The consultation period will be until 8 June 1995.

Contaminated Land

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance he is planning to issue in respect of contaminated land. [23932]

Mr. Atkins: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has today issued a draft of the guidance on the definition and identification of contaminated land which will help inform the debate on the contaminated land clause of the Environment Bill. Copies have been placed in the Library. Further guidance as set out in the clause, including guidance on remediation standards and notices, special sites and the "appropriate person" on whom to serve a remediation notice will follow in due course.

In addition, the draft issued today contains an extensive list of technical guidance reports that my Department has either issued or has in hand. This represents a very important contribution to the methodology of dealing with contaminated land.

Furthermore, the Construction Industry Research and Information Association will be publishing 12 reports on contaminated land which are part-funded by my Department, working in partnership with the construction industry. The first batch of these will be launched at the forthcoming International Land Regeneration Expo 95 on 23 May 1995. Once again, these reports will form an important body of expertise for those working with contaminated land.

Housing Association Tenancies

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the total numbers of tenancies provided by housing associations that are (a) charitable, (b) charities and (c) non-charitable in the west midlands; and how many of these tenancies are included within the right-to-buy legislation. [22762]

Mr. Robert B. Jones [holding answer 9 May 1995]: The total number of self-contained units for rent owned by housing associations in the west midlands is 71,108. Of these, charitable associations own 36,270 units, associations which are charities own 7,676 units and non-charitable associations own 27,162 units. Most secure tenants of non-charitable associations registered with the Housing Corporation have the right to buy their homes. There are various exclusions from the RTB—for example special rules apply to sheltered housing for the elderly, disabled or mentally ill people. In England some 29 per cent. of housing association tenants have the right to buy. Detailed regional figures are not available.

Social Housing

Mr. Timms: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will publish the background information on the need for new social housing lettings which he used in his decisions on the 1995–96 Housing Corporation approved development programme.

Mr. Robert B. Jones [pursuant to his reply, 1 February 1995, c.685-86]: My right hon. Friend has today sent a paper on estimates of housing demand to the Environment Select Committee as an annexe to my Department's supplementary memorandum on its annual report and estimates. A copy has also been placed in the Library,

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensions Bill

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what consultations he has had with hon. Members with regard to amendments to the Pensions Bill [Lords] with particular reference to proposals for nominated trustees as representatives of pensioners. [21833]

Mr. Arbuthnot: All Government Ministers meet hon. Members from time to time to discuss a wide range of issues.

Social Development

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will issue a Green Paper to assist his Department to fulfil the Government's agreement to commitment 2f of the world summit for social development; [22270]

(2) if he will issue a consultative document, following the world summit for social development, on the co-ordination of national and international definitions required by every country to plan for the eradication of absolute poverty and reduce overall poverty. [22268]

Mr. Burt: The Department will reflect in its wide range of programmes and initiatives, agreements reached at the UN world summit for social development. Details of expenditure plans, targets and objectives for the social security programme are published in the Department's annual report.

The UN world summit for social development recognised that national indictors of poverty and vulnerability should be developed in the light of national circumstances. The Department already publishes statistical reports, analysis and research material on a wide range of aspects associated with low income in order to assist in the appropriate development of social policies.

Recruitment

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, how many, and what proportion of vacancies advertised by his Department, and by each of his Department's agencies, in the last three years have listed the attainment of national vocational qualifications as an acceptable entry requirement; and, of those, how many have required (i) level 1 NVQs, (ii) Level 2 NVQs, (iii) level 3 NVQs and (iv) other level NVQs. [22978]

Mr. Hague: The Benefits Agency, Child Support Agency and Contributions Agency all accept NVQs as an acceptable entry requirement, although detailed information in the form requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Other parts of the Department where recruitment has been more limited, are considering accepting NVQs for future recruitment exercises.

Benefit Payment Card

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what he estimates in current cost terms will be the annual cost of administering and maintaining the benefit payment card system when fully operational. [23008]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The estimated gross running costs in the feasibility study were £77 million per annum before offsetting savings from phasing out the current system. Competitive proposals, including running costs, are now being sought from five potential prime contractors.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many benefit payment cards he estimates will have to be issued if all benefit payments at post offices are to be automated; and if he will list the benefits involved and his estimate of the numbers of recipients involved with each benefit. [23004]

Mr. Arbuthnot: There are currently around 19,000,000 customers who choose to be paid their benefits at post offices. All of these will receive a card and all social security benefits payable by the DSS will be involved.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he intends to issue the first benefit payment cards; and when he expects that all benefits payable at post offices will be included in the system. [23006]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The first benefit payment cards are expected to be issued in 1996 and the whole implementation process is expected to take up to three years.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many post offices in the United Kingdom will be adopted for the use of benefit payment cards. [23005]

Mr. Arbuthnot: All post offices will be able to make benefit payments using the card.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what will be the cost of issuing benefit payment cards to all recipients of DSS benefits receiving payment through post offices, including the costs of installing equipment in the post offices concerned. [23003]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The feasibility study estimated set up costs to be £135 million. Competitive proposals, including set up costs, are now being sought from five potential contractors.

Housing Benefit

Mr. George Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide, for each district and metropolitan borough council in England and Wales, for each available year since 1991-92, (a) a breakdown of the numbers of housing benefit claimants, split into rent rebate and rent allowance categories and the total amounts paid under each heading, (b) the numbers and amount of housing benefit backdated payments, regulation 72(15) and the amount paid as a percentage of each local authority's housing benefit expenditure, (c) the number, amount and percentage of amount in relation to total housing benefit expenditure in relation to discretionary payments, regulation 69(8) revised to regulation 61(2) and (d) the numbers and amounts of each category of housing benefit overpayment and the amount as a percentage of the authority's overall housing benefit expenditure. [23172]

Mr. Roger Evans: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood) on 23 February, Official Report, column 283.

Historical Documents

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what special training is given to persons who have responsibility for assessing the historical significance of documents held by his Department. [23278]

Mr. Hague: Staff in the Department of Social Security who have responsibility for assessing the historical significance of documents are trained by the Public Record Office and by departmental staff already experienced in the work.

Non-British Nationals

Mr. Dicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many non-British nationals are currently claiming social security benefits; and what is the cost of the Exchequer of paying such benefit; [23416]

(2) how many non-European Union nationals are currently claiming social security benefits; and what is the cost to the Exchequer of paying such benefits. [23417]

Mr. Hague: The information requested is not available as nationality is not a condition of benefit entitlement.

Correspondence

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to reply to the letter dated 28 February from the hon. Member for South Hams about Mr. Lord McLeod of Murtwell cottage, Murtwell, Diptford, South Devon; what are the reasons for the delay in replying; and if he will make a statement. [23420]

Mr. Burt: I replied to the hon. Member on 4 May.

Benefits: Capital Limits

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list all the current capital limits to the entitlement to benefits and other assistance together with the year of introduction; what was the value of each in real terms at the time of the introduction; and if he will make a statement. [16611]

Mr. Roger Evans [pursuant to his reply 30 March, Official Report, column 779]: The information regarding the Social Fund capital limit for funeral and maternity payments, up to age 60, was incorrect. The correct information is as follows:

The five income-related benefits—council tax benefit, disability working allowance, family credit, housing benefit and income support—all have a lower capital limit, above which deductions are made from benefit, and an upper capital limit, above which no benefit can be paid. The lower capital limit in all those benefits is also the level above which no personal allowance can be paid for a dependent child if he possesses that amount of capital or more.

Additionally, in qualifying for a social fund maternity or funeral payment, community care grant or budgeting loan, if capital is held above a certain limit, deductions are made from any payments awarded.

The limits and the dates when they were introduced or last increased are set out in the table.

| | Date fixed | Value now if uprated in line with prices[1] £ |
|---|---|---|
| Council Tax Benefit | | |
| Lower capital limit £3,000 | April 1993 | 3,108 |

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Straw: To ask the Attorney General (1) how many cases were discontinued by the Crown Prosecution Service in 1994–95;

(2) what was the total number of cases (a) received by magistrates courts and (b) finalised in magistrates courts for every year since 1987–88;

(3) how many cases were (a) received by the Crown Prosecution Service from the police, (b) completed in the magistrates court, (c) discontinued by the Crown Prosecution Service before or at the magistrates court hearing, (d) committed to the Crown Court by the magistrates court or (e) otherwise disposed of in each Crown Prosecution Service region in total for every year since 1987–88.

The Attorney-General: The following tables show the number of defendants' cases dealt with by the Crown Prosecution Service in the magistrates courts since April 1987. Tables 1 to 6 show figures for the original 31 areas of the CPS, while tables 7 to 8 show figures for the present 13 areas. The figures do not include the specialised casework undertaken by CPS headquarters.

The number received comprises all those forwarded to the CPS by the police during each period, and the number finalised comprises all those completed during the period. Both totals include cases forwarded to the CPS for pre-charge advice only, and the number of these is specified for each year.

Also included in the totals received and finalised are a number of non-criminal proceedings, such as forfeiture proceedings under section 3 of the Obscene Publications Act. A separate count of these has been kept since April 1991, and is shown as "other proceedings" for the years 1991–1992 onwards.

The tables show the number completed in the magistrates courts, comprising all those defendants whose case was finalised by way of trial or guilty plea.

Cases discontinued comprise all those defendants whose case was dropped by the CPS, whether in advance of the hearing or at court.

Cases committed comprise all those committed for trial in the Crown Court during the period.

Other disposals comprise the remaining cases: committal hearings in which the defendant was discharged, cases where the defendant was bound over to keep the peace without a trial having taken place, instances where the defendant could not be found, and other cases where the prosecution could not proceed, for example because the defendant had died.

Other disposals comprise committal hearings in which the defendant was discharged, cases where the defendant was bound over to keep the peace, instances where the defendant cannot be found, and other cases where the prosecution cannot proceed (e.g. through the death of the defendant). The minus value for Other Disposals in the Nottinghamshire Area is produced because the sum of advice only, completed, discontinued and committed to the Crown Court cases is greater than the total number of cases recorded as finalised. This result is produced because of limitations in administrative arrangements for obtaining the basic data in the Area at that time. The occurrence of such circumstances is now avoided by validity checks and controls which have since been introduced.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Consumers' Rights

20. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will introduce legislation to enhance the rights and interests of consumers of services and products. [21961]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The rights and interests of consumers of goods and services are best served by ensuring that there is an open competitive market. But we consider legislation where it is necessary and appropriate.

Exports

21. Mr. Booth: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to improve the participation of small firms in exporting. [21962]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The DTI and FCO overseas trade service already provides a comprehensive and high quality range of export assistance and advice, which is primarily of benefit to small and medium sized companies. In addition, support for small businesses is being greatly improved through business links partnerships. One of the objectives of business links is to encourage and help small and medium sized companies to develop effective export strategies.

23. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the trends in exports in 1995. [21964]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The outlook for exports in 1995 is excellent. The Confederation of British Industry reports that export orders are growing faster than ever before and that optimism amongst exporters is at its highest for a generation. The volume of exports has risen by 12½ per cent. over the last year.

British Gas

22. Mr. Chisholm: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he is making to British Gas about the level of consumer dissatisfaction with the service provided. [21963]

Mr. Page: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the oral answer that I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones).

Output

24. Mr. Spring: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the change in output per head in the past 12 months in (a) the manufacturing sector and (b) the economy as a whole. [21965]

Mr. Eggar: Output per head rose by 6 per cent. in manufacturing and 3½ per cent. in the economy as a whole during 1994.

Late Payment of Invoices

25. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action he proposes to take to discourage the late payment of invoices to small and medium-sized companies. [21966]

Mr. Page: In the 1994 White Paper, "Competitiveness—Helping Business to Win", the Government announced a number of practical measures to tackle the late payment of commercial debt. These measures included additional prompt payment requirements for Government Departments and their agencies, the development of proposals for a British standard for prompt payment, the implementation of proposals to require public companies to state their payment policies in their directors' reports, further changes to streamline and simplify court procedures and a review of the scope of the small claims procedure.

Work on the implementation of these measures is continuing.

Counterfeit Goods

26. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the financial and other effects on United Kingdom manufacturing industry of the trade in counterfeit goods allegedly made in Britain. [21967]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Government have not made their own assessment of the effects of the trade in counterfeit goods. They are, however, aware of industry estimates that, in 1993, over £300 million worth of counterfeit goods were in circulation in the United Kingdom. They are also aware of evidence of an increase in the amount of counterfeits which originate in the United Kingdom and trading standards officers and the police are being encouraged to pursue counterfeiters.

Small Businesses

27. Mr. Khabra: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations his Department has received from chanbers of commerce about his policies in respect of and the demand for the products and services of small businesses. [21968]

Mr. Page: My Department has regular contact with the Association of British Chambers of Commerce and individual chambers, and discussions with them frequently concern the valuable contribution made to our local economies by small businesses.

Dr. John Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the success rate of small businesses between 1985 and the present in (a) Cumbria, (b) the United Kingdom and (c) the European Union as a whole. [22734]

Mr. Heseltine: A measure of the success of the small business sector is shown by the growth in the number of VAT registered businesses. Allowing for the change in the VAT threshold in 1991, the number of VAT registered businesses in Cumbria rose by 7 per cent. between 1985 and 1993, the latest year for which figures are available. In the UK as a whole it rose by 14 per cent.

There are no equivalent figures for the European Union as a whole.

BT Directory Inquiries

28. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many complaints the Office of Telecommunications has received in the past year concerning British Telecom's 192 number inquiry service; and if he will make a statement. [21969]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Oftel received 40 letters about BT's directory inquiries service in the year to 30 April.

Traditional Industries, Leicester

29. Mr. Janner: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will take steps to assist the traditional industries of the city of Leicester. [21970]

Mr. Page: The Government are doing much to assist all industry, particularly small and medium-sized enterprises, in Leicester. Business link Leicestershire is now providing a valuable service to the local business community. My Department is providing funding of £725,000 to the business link which handled over 60,000 enquiries in the year from 1 March 1994. In addition, my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, Central (Sir P. Beresford), has recently confirmed that funding of £10.5 million will be available in the hon. and learned Member's own constituency through the city challenge programme.

Inward Investment

30. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on inward investment policy. [21971]

Mr. Eggar: The Government's economic policies and warm welcome for foreign investors has made the UK the preferred location in Europe for inward investment and I am determined that we should remain so. That is why we have strengthened the resources of the Invest in Britain Bureau.

Nuclear Industry

31. Mr. Alan W. William: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the future of Nuclear Electric and Scottish Nuclear. [21972]

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to the statement that my right hon. Friend made to the House yesterday, Official Report, columns 563–65.

Manufacturing Profits

32. Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proportion of manufacturing industry's profits were reinvested in United Kingdom industry in 1994. [21973]

Mr. Eggar: In 1993, the latest year for which figures are available, investment in manufacturing industry accounted for almost half of the gross operating surplus of companies in this sector.

Manufactured Goods

33. Mr. David Marshall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the United Kingdom's balance of trade in manufactured goods in 1979 and in 1994. [21974]

Mr. Needham: In 1979, the United Kingdom had a surplus of £2.7 billion or 1.4 per cent. of GDP in manufactured trade. In 1994, there was a deficit of £7.5 billion or 1.1 per cent. of GDP.

Insolvency Procedures

34. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions he has had regarding the creation of a legal framework whereby companies experiencing cash flow and insolvency problems are allowed time to trade out of their difficulties before being put into the hands of receivers; and if he will make a statement. [21976]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: There are already procedures in the insolvency legislation which can assist companies with such problems and there has been extensive discussion since my Department commenced a review of these in 1993. In April 1995 the Insolvency Service issued a further consultative document on proposals for a new company voluntary arrangement procedure. These proposals include a 28-day moratorium, binding on all creditors, which gives companies a breathing space during which to put together a rescue plan. It is also proposed that floating chargeholders give five working days notice before they can appoint an administrative receiver, to allow companies an opportunity to seek advice.

International Competitiveness

36. Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent assessment he has made of the United Kingdom's international competitiveness. [21979]

Mr. Heseltine: Last year, the Government set out the UK's competitive position in the White Paper, "Helping Business to Win". The Government plan to publish soon a second White Paper on competitiveness. This will report on progress over the last year, extend the analysis of the UK's competitiveness and bring forward new initiatives to help business to win.

Newspapers

37. Mr. Spellar: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received regarding carriage charges by news wholesalers to newsagents; and what action he has taken. [21980]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I have recently received a number of representations from Members of Parliament on behalf of newsagents, regarding increased carriage charges. I have also received representations from the National Federation of Retail Newsagents.

In the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's 1993 report on newspapers the commission reached no adverse findings in relation to carriage charges. Accordingly, I have no power to act.

Crown Post Offices

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the future of Crown post offices. [21977]

Mr. Page: The Post Office has a policy of converting Crown offices to agency status as and when suitable opportunities arise. The policy has advantages for customers—who have access to the full range of services but usually during longer hours and from more accessible premises—and for the network—which can offer clients a competitive service. For these reasons the Government support this policy. Its implementation is a matter for the Post Office.

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Barron: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many, and what proportion of, vacancies advertised by his Department, and by each of his Department's agencies, in the last three years have listed the attainment of NVQs as an acceptable entry requirement; and, of those, how many have required (i) level 1 NVQs, (ii) level 2 NVQs, (iii) level 3 NVQs and (iv) other level NVQs. [22975]

Mr. Ian Taylor: None of the vacancies advertised by my Department has listed NVQs as an entry qualification.

Of the Department's agencies, only the Radiocommunication Agency has advertised vacancies with NVQs listed as an acceptable entry requirement. It has advertised 20 posts—32 per cent. of total advertised vacancies—all requiring only level 1 NVQs.

Military Training Assistance Scheme

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the annual cost to his Department of the United Kingdom military training assistance scheme in each of the last five financial years. [23241]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The United Kingdom military training assistance scheme is funded and controlled by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and my Department bears no cost associated with the scheme.

Business Links

Mr. Fisher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, how many staff are employed in business link (a) at his Department in London and (b) in business link centres around the United Kingdom. [22294]

Mr. Page: Forty-eight staff in my Department in London are employed directly in business link development. In addition a large number are involved indirectly in respect of the activities of business link partner organisations and the integration of DTI funded services into business links.

My Department does not keep information on the numbers of staff employed by business links or those employed by, or located by partner organisations and co-located within business links.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many inquiries for information were received by (a) business link and (b) the marketing information centre in the past 12 months. [22292]

Mr. Page: Information is not held centrally on the figures relating individual enquiries made to business link. However, my Department collects figures on the numbers of firms assisted in each quarter. Companies are recorded only once even though several enquiries may be made in the monitoring period.

During April and December 1994–the latest period for which figures are available—51,710 companies were assisted on at least one occasion.

In the 12 months April 1994 to March 1995 the Export Market Information Centre received 20,233 visitors, approximately 37,000 telephone calls and 1,343 written inquiries.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the cost, in the last year for which figures are available, of (a) business link and (b) the marketing information centre. [22295]

Mr. Page: In the financial year 1994–95 DTI contributed £13.1 million to the establishment of business link. This was in addition to contributions from partner organisations.

In the financial year 1994–95 the net cost of the export market information centre was £1.7 million.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish a list of the business link centres in the United Kingdom. [22291]

Mr. Page: One hundred business link outlets are open in England:

1. Alnwick
2. Aykley Heads
3. Aylesbury

International Atomic Energy Agency

Mr. Flynn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the total budget of the International Atomic Energy Agency; what proportion of that budget is spent on safeguards; what is the United Kingdom's annual contribution to the budget of the agency; and what proportion of that contribution is spent on safeguards. [23071]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The regular budget of the International Atomic Energy Agency for 1995, as agreed by the general conference in September 1994, is $211,557,000 of which the safeguards programme accounts for 34.38 per cent. or $72,745,000.

The United Kingdom paid its share of £8,048,512 or 5.277 per cent. in full in February this year. The contributions from the member states are pooled by the IAEA and allocated amongst the wide range of programmes it supports.

East London

Mr. Gapes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to visit east London to discuss industrial investment and economic development. [21978]

Mr. Eggar: Neither my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade nor I have plans to visit east London again at present. The Government and our key partners in economic development, local authorities and training and enterprise councils, are working to bring investment to that part of London and to ensure that it is used effectively. Partnerships have been formed to maximise European Union funding, to support inward investment, to develop regeneration strategies and to work within the Thames gateway framework. These and other joint efforts will substantially increase the competitive position of that key area of London.

Cinema Ownership

Mr. MacShane: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will hold discussions with directors of the Rank Organisation on its plans to acquire MGM cinemas. [23607]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: No. Any plans which the Rank Organisation or any other company might have to acquire MGM cinemas would be a matter for discussion with the Director General of Fair Trading, who has a duty under the Fair Trading Act 1973 to advise my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade on whether any qualifying mergers should be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. MacShane: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, what communication his Department has received from the Rank Organisation about its plans to acquire MGM cinemas. [23606]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I am aware that the MGM cinemas business is for sale. Until such time as I am called on to announce my decision about whether any qualifying mergers arising from the sale should be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, it would not be right for me to make any comment.

Mr. MacShane: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the ownership of cinemas in the United Kingdom. [23608]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Any proposals for changes in the ownership of cinemas in the UK which would result in qualifying mergers under the Fair Trading Act 1973 would be matters on which the Director General of Fair Trading would advise my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade as to whether they should be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

National Grid

Mr. Orme: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make it his policy that customers share in the profits made by the regional electricity companies on their sale of the National Grid. [21941]

Mr. Eggar: The National Grid Company is owned by the regional electricity companies. The Government will consider any firm proposal by the RECs for the flotation of NGC on its merits.

Nuclear Safety

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment has been made of the relevance of the current operational difficulties being suffered by the Daya bay pressurised water reactors in China for the safe operation of the Sizewell B reactor. [22013]

Mr. Page: The problems that have been encountered with control rods at the Daya bay nuclear power station in China have no implications for the Sizewell B pressurised water reactor, which uses a different design and manufacture of fuel and control rods.

Nigeria (Military Equipment)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many requests for export licences for the export of military equipment to Nigeria have been (a) granted and (b) refused in each year from 1990; and from which firms and for what weaponry. [21939]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 2 May 1995]: Statistics of export licence applications granted and refused for goods classified under the military list of the Export of Goods (Control) Order for Nigeria for the years in question are detailed in the table. ML classifications covered by the applications are given for years 1992–1994. Similar information is not readily available for 1990 and 1991 and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. It has been the policy of successive Administrations not to disclose the details of export licences or applications for export licences. Since the introduction of the European Union measures against Nigeria, in December 1993, no export licences have been granted for the supply of lethal defence equipment to the Nigerian armed forces.

Export licence applications for military list goods

| Year | Issued | Refused | ML classifications covered |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1990 | 30 | 0 | — |
| 1991 | 64 | 0 | — |
| 1992 | 21 | 0 | 1, 3, 4, 6, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15 |
| 1993 | 16 | 0 | 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 11, 13, 15 |
| 1994 | 20 | 1 | 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 14 (Refusal in respect of ML 1 goods) |

Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what representations his Department has received in relating to the issue of mobile telephone cloning; [23505]

(2) what assessment his Department has made of the need for legislation to prevent the cloning of mobile telephones; [23514]

(3) what discussions his Department has had with regulators of the telecommunications industry concerning the need for legislation to prevent telephone cloning; [23510]

(4) what action the Office of Telecommunications has taken to investigate the problem of cloning of mobile telephones; and what representations this agency has made to his Department on this matter; [23509]

(5) what assessment his Department has made of the costs incurred by mobile telephone users as a result of unauthorised calls being made on mobile telephones which have been cloned; [23511]

(6) what current legislation governs the operation of the mobile telephone industry. [23515]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answers 9 May 1995]: My Department has received a number of representations from the industry and private individuals concerning mobile phone fraud which includes the illegitimate cloning of mobile telephones. Together with the Home Office, Oftel and the Association of Chief Police Officers, we have been discussing with the mobile phone industry what steps can be taken to tackle the problem of mobile phone fraud.

The industry is in the best position to assess the costs arising from cloning and other cellular fraud offences and it is the industry which, in particular, has been taking action to improve the detection of cloned phones and prevent their use. The industry is also considering a number of other ways of combating cellular fraud, including improved control of electronic serial numbers and equipment marking schemes.

Legislation specifically governing the operation of the industry is included in the Telecommunications Act 1984 and the Wireless Telegraphy Act 1949. Offences concerning cellular fraud already exist under those Acts. In addition, the Theft Acts 1968 and 1978 cover the theft and handling of mobile phones, which often leads to their being cloned. Discussions are continuing with the industry about whether any new offences to combat cellular fraud, including cloning, would be effective in reducing the problem.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what steps his Department has taken to prevent the cloning of telephones being utilised by his Department; and if his Department has discussed this matter with any official agencies; [23454]

(2) what costs his Department has incurred during the last 12 months as a result of cloning of mobile telephones being utilised by his Department, with particular reference to the making of unauthorised calls; [23488]

(3) what use his Department makes of hand-held and car-based mobile telephones; what were the costs for each financial year of these services since mobile telephones were first introduced to his Department; and how many mobile telephones are currently in use; [23448]

(4) how many mobile telephones being used by his Department have been cloned during the last 12 months. [23428]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 9 May 1995]: Records are no longer kept centrally of all uses of mobile telephones. However, it is estimated that, excluding next steps agencies, there are currently in the region of 800 mobile telephones in use in my Department at a cost of around £320,000 per annum.

For the same reason, I do not have a figure for the actual number of mobile telephones cloned in the past 12 months, but the information that we have suggests that it is probably fewer than 10. The Department has incurred minimal costs as the service providers have identified the cloning and credited the Department for the costs of unauthorised calls.

It is currently very difficult to prevent cloning of analogue mobile telephones. However, my Department is discussing this issue with the mobile phone industry. Close liaison with service providers helps to identify cloning at any early stage, and increasingly the Department is using digital mobile telephones which, although more expensive, are not easily cloned.

Anglo-Japanese Trade

Ms Armstrong: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much income was raised by United Kingdom firms in the last year through the export of (a) computers, (b) cars and (c) cameras to Japan; and what was the value of (i) computers, (ii) cars and (iii) cameras imported into the United Kingdom from Japan. [23029]

Mr. Needham [holding answer 9 May 1995]: The information is as follows:

£ million

| | UK exports to Japan, 1994 | UK imports from Japan, 1994 |
|---|---|---|
| Computers | 309 | 843 |
| Cars | 219 | 964 |
| Cameras | 12 | 197 |

Source:
Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom.
Commodity definitions: Computers—Standard International Trade Classification (SITC) 752 and 759.97; Cars—SITC 781; Cameras—SITC 764.82, 881.1 and 881.2.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Recruitment

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many, and what proportion of vacancies advertised by his Department, and by each of his Department's agencies, in the last three years have listed the attainment of national vocational qualifications as an acceptable entry requirement; and, of those, how many have required (i) Level 1 NVQs, (ii) Level 2 NVQs, (iii) Level 3 NVQs and (iv) other level NVQs. [22980]

Sir John Wheeler : The Northern Ireland Civil Service Commission recruits centrally all permanent non-industrial staff for the northern Ireland departments and agencies.

During the last three years, the Northern Ireland Civil Service Commission advertised one vacancy for which specifically a level 3 NVQ was an entry requirement. This represented less than 0.5 per cent. of all vacancies advertised. Where appropriate, advertisements make clear that applications will be considered from candidates with relevant formal qualifications considered by the commissioners to be of an equivalent or higher standard than those stated.

In addition Northern Ireland Departments run competitions for industrial and casual staff. The Department of Economic Development advertised one vacancy, listing as advantageous, the possession of NVQ assessor award D32/33. This represented 2 per cent. of competitions run by DED.

The remaining Northern Ireland departments have not used NVQs as an entry requirement for industrial and casual staff.

Private Finance Initiatives

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of his Department's budget is allocated to initiatives which have been undertaken to secure private finance for his Department's projects. [22794]

Sir John Wheeler: Almost 1 per cent. of the total budget of Northern Ireland departments and the Northern Ireland Office is directly allocated to initiatives which have been undertaken to secure private finance for projects. Other expenditure will be incurred in the consideration of private financial potential, but is an integral part of project appraisals and is not recorded separately. In addition, some expenditure will be incurred by agent bodies in the Health and Personal Social Services and Education and Library boards, but this information is not collected centrally and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Temporary Class Rooms

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many temporary classrooms are at present located on (a) nursery school sites, (b) primary school sites, (c) post-primary school sites and (d) further education college campuses in Northern Ireland. [23312]

Mr. Ancram: Information in the form requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, the estimated number of schools with temporary classrooms on site is as follows:

| Number of schools | Number of temporary classroom units |
|---|---|
| 600 | 1–5 |
| 100 | 6–10 |
| 35 | 11–15 |
| 30 | over 15 |

Special Protection Areas

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list those sites which (a) have been designated or (b) meet the criteria for designation as (i) special protection areas under the European Community directive on the conservation of wild birds or (ii) Ramsar sites under the convention on wetlands of international importance. [22367]

Mr. Moss: In Northern Ireland two sites at Swan island and Sheep island have so far been designated as special protection areas under EC directive 79/409/EEC on the conservation of wild birds. A further 11 sites have been identified as possible meeting the criteria for designation. These are:

Belfast Lough
Carlingford Lough
Dundrum Bay
Larne Lough
Lough Foyle
Lough Neagh and Lough Beg
Outer Ards Peninsula
Rathlin Island Cliffs
Strangford Lough
Upper Lough Erne
Pettigoe Plateau

One site has already been designated under the Ramsar convention, Lough Neagh and Lough Beg. All the sites on the above lists also qualify for designation as Ramsar sites, with the exception of the Rathlin island cliffs.

The Banks Residential Home

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what consideration he took of the independent advocate's report when coming to his decision to close the Banks residential home; what account he took of the commitment of the North Down trust to existing residents that they would be allowed to remain there; and if he will protect the rights of existing residents to remain in the Banks if it should be sold. [23330]

Mr. Moss: I have taken fully into account the independent advocate's report along with all the other views and representations which have been made to me.

I respect the North Down and Ards community trust's desire to accommodate the wishes of the residents and to provide a further option in terms of future accommodation. I have asked the trust to proceed with inquiries with the independent nursing homes sector about how the site can be redeveloped while allowing the residents to remain.

However, the disposal of the site will have to be handled in light of Government rules about disposal of assets and value for money and demonstration of fair and open competition. As a result there can be no guarantee that the desired outcome will materialise.

Old People's Homes

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information was available to him about alternative provision when he decided to close six old people's residential homes as announced on 21 April; if he will list the deficiencies in each of the homes and the estimated capital cost of rectifying these deficiencies; and what is the potential capacity in these homes and the per capita cost of maintaining residents. [23327]

Mr. Moss: When I announced my decision to endorse the proposal of trusts to close six residential homes for the elderly, I was aware that the following alternative provision existed in the areas:

700 statutory residential home places
3,799 independent residential and nursing home places

At the time of my decision there were approximately 345 vacancies in the statutory independent homes sector. The deficiencies in each of the homes, the estimated capital cost of rectifying these deficiencies, the potential capacity and the per capita cost of maintaining residents are as follows.

SOUTH AND EAST BELFAST HSS TRUST

James Dixon House

Potential capacity = 41

Per capita cost 94–95 = £232.70 per week

Deficiencies:

The building is institutional in character. It has long corridors, the toilets are inappropriately positioned given the increasing frailty of residents, bedroom sizes are small and increasingly the registration and inspection unit has been seeking a commitment from the trust that double rooms be made into singles. The home requires substantial expenditure to modernise it and to bring it up to an acceptable minimum standard as set out in the Health and Safety at Work (NI) Order.

Capital expenditure cost = £345,000

Enler House

Potential capacity = 49

Per capita cost 94–95 = £301.89 per week

Deficiencies:

The facility was built upon traditional lines with many institutional features including long corridors, double rooms and poorly located toilets. The home requires substantial expenditure to modernise it and to bring it up to an acceptable minimum standard as set out in the Health and Safety at Work (NI) Order.

Capital Expenditure Cost = £409,000

Marlborough House

Potential Capacity = 27

Per Capita Cost 94–95 = £681.34 per week

Deficiencies:

It is a large old building which was converted six years ago to a home for elderly mentally infirm people. The building is functionally unsuitable for its task. It does not meet fire code standards. The home requires substantial expenditure to modernise it and to bring it up to an acceptable minimum standard as set out in the Health and Safety at Work (NI) Order.

Capital Expenditure Cost = £325,000

NORTH AND WEST BELFAST HSS TRUST

Old See House

Potential Capacity = 40

Per Capita Cost 94–95 = £285.87 per week

Deficiencies:

It was opened in 1977 and although some upgrading work has been carried out further extensive work is required. The home requires substantial expenditure to modernise it and to bring it up to an acceptable minimum standard as set out in the Health and Safety at Work (NI) Order.

Capital Expenditure Cost = £280,000

Cairns House

Potential Capacity = 40

Per Capita Cost 94–95 = £370.56 per week

Deficiencies:

Its location has limited accessibility. The home requires substantial expenditure to modernise it and to bring it up to an acceptable minimum standard as set out in the Health and Safety at Work (NI) Order.

Capital Expenditure Cost = £205,000

NORTH DOWN AND ARDS HSS TRUST

The Banks

Potential Capacity = 40

Per Capita Cost 94–95 = £621.86 per week

Deficiencies:

It requires upgrading work to be carried out to bring it up to fire and safety standards. The building provides double room facilities which would need to be converted to singles. The rooms are small and the corridors are long. The home requires substantial expenditure to modernise it and to bring it up to an acceptable minimum standard as set out in the Health and Safety at Work (NI) Order.

Capital Expenditure Cost = £600,000

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will indicate what criteria are used by health and social services trusts to admit elderly people to independent homes with financial support from the trusts. [23328]

Mr. Moss: People who are assessed as in need of care in a residential or nursing home with public financial support can, within certain reasonable criteria, choose which home they enter.

The criteria which trusts apply on behalf of Health and Social Services boards are as follows:

the accommodation must be suitable for the assessed needs of the individual;

the cost to the board should not be more than it would usually expect to pay for someone with the individual's assessed needs;

the accommodation must be available;

the person in charge of the home must be willing to provide accommodation subject to the board's usual terms and conditions for such accommodation.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the average full per capita cost to unit trusts in supporting elderly residents in independent homes. [23329]

Mr. Moss: The information required is not held centrally in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

DEFENCE

Expenditure

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the defence expenditure in each year since 1985; and if he will specify the deflator to be applied to plans up to 1997–98. [23516]

Mr. Soames: The information requested is set out in the statistical supplement to the "Financial Statement and Budget Report", 1995–96, Cm 2821, tables 3.2 and 1.1.

Equipment Orders

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what military purpose 20 truck mounted 12 tonne cranes are to be purchased as set out in future purchase No. LV1A/260; what consideration he has given to leasing or contract hire of cranes; and if he will make a statement. [22523]

Mr. Freeman: The 12 tonne cranes will be procured as replacements for existing RAF equipments that have reached the end of their economic lives. They will be used in aircraft maintenance and workshop areas within operational RAF stations. The provision, management and support of service transport is at present being reviewed to determine whether, and to what extent, there is scope for greater private sector involvement. The primary aim of this review is to secure greater value for money. We intend to establish some pilot leasing schemes this calendar year. Tender LV1A/260 therefore reflects the present procurement arrangements, but any resultant contract will be placed for the minimum quantity required in the financial year 1995–96, with options only for future years.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what military purpose approximately 100 all-wheel drive pick-ups, vans and 11 seat station wagons are required, as set out in tender No. LV2A/265; what consideration he has given to leasing or contract hire; what consideration he has given to extending the number of companies invited to tender; and if he will make a statement. [22524]

Mr. Freeman: The all-wheel drive vehicles will be procured as replacements for exiting Navy, Army and RAF equipments that have reached the end of their economic lives. They will mainly be used to transport stores and personnel, both on and off road. The provision, management and support of service transport is at present under review to determine whether, and to what extent, there is scope for greater private sector involvement. The primary aim of the review is to secure greater value for money. We do not intend to establish a number of pilot leasing schemes this calendar year. Future purchase tender LV2A/265 therefore reflects the present procurement arrangements, but any resultant contract will be placed for the minimum quantity required in the financial year 1995–96, with options only for future years. The final distribution of tenders will depend solely on companies registering an interest against this advertisement. The future purchase tender identifies two companies. They were the only companies known to meet the Department's required quality standard.

RAF Valley

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the outcome of the recent market testing survey at Royal Air Force Valley. [22409]

Mr. Soames: Further to a feasibility study which recommended market-testing a broad range of activities, my Department has proposed contractorising support services at RAF Valley. This proposal is subject to consultation with the trades unions and other interested parties.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the annual cost of renting additional airspace for Royal Air Force Valley weapons training's air-to-air gunnery after Aberporth range is given agency status. [22414]

Mr. Soames: There will be no cost for the use of the airspace.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a comparison between the weapon task achievement over the last two weeks of Royal Air Force Chivenor being in operation and the average at Royal Air Force Valley. [22415]

Mr. Soames: In the last two weeks of weapon task training from RAF Chivenor, 148 sorties were flown by RAF Valley aircraft using RAF Chivenor as a forward operating base. This represented an increase in the normal level of tasking and was in anticipation of a brief interruption prior to RAF St. Athan becoming available. The average number of weapon task training sorties planned by RAF Valley for any two-week period is 120.

RAF Commands

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the total cost of the rationalisation of the Royal Air Force structure by the creation of an additional command. [22413]

Mr. Soames: There has been no increase in the number of RAF commands. RAF Germany ceased to be a separate command in April 1993 and now has group status within RAF Strike Command. RAF Logistics Command and RAF Personnel and Training Command were established on 1 April 1994 replacing RAF Support Command and the former Departments of AMSO and AMP. These changes result in significant overall cost savings.

RAF Relocation

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration has been given to relocating the Fleet Requirements and Air Direction Unit or any other flying unit to Royal Air Force Chivenor; and what building work would be necessary. [22411]

Mr. Soames: Consideration was given to relocating the Fleet Requirements and Air Direction Unit to RAF Chivenor, but an alternative location was preferred on operational and cost grounds. No other suitable options for relocating flying activity to the station have been identified.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements have been made to bridge the gap between the cessation of the Hawk support flight at Royal Air Force Chivenor and the tactical armament facility—Hawk—detachment being ready at Royal Air Force St. Athan; what will be the cost of such interim arrangements; and why this work is not being continued at Royal Air Force Chivenor. [22416]

Mr. Soames: As part of the plans for the longer-term enhancement of RAF St. Athan to accept Hawk detachments, some early work was identified as essential to provide sufficient initial capability for the weaponry requirements. The cost of this work was £290,000. The task is not being continued at RAF Chivenor because it is not compatible with the stations's future.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what impact the closure of Royal Air Force Finningley and transfer of navigation training to Royal Air Force Valley will have on the calculations about Royal Air Force Valley's capacity which were made when the decision was taken to close Royal Air Force Chivenor. [22417]

Mr. Soames: The impact is minimal. The rationalisation of Hawk instructor training at RAF Valley has created spare capacity at the station, and this offsets the extra navigator training task transferring from RAF Finningley.

RAF St. Athan

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what impact the proximity of Cardiff airport to Royal Air Force St. Athan has on its flying capacity; and what are the comparative figures for available capacity at Royal Air Force Chivenor. [22418]

Mr. Soames: On current and future planned usage, the proximity of Cardiff airport has no impact on RAF St. Athan operations. A simple comparison of criteria which define capacity shows that RAF Chivenor has greater capacity than RAF St. Athan, but detailed comparative capacity figures could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

RAF Chivenor

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the cost of maintaining the runway and airfield operation at Royal Air Force Chivenor. [22410]

Mr. Soames: There is no requirement to retain the runway and airfield operation at RAF Chivenor beyond 1 October this year, although the search and rescue flight will remain within an enclave at the station.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment has been made of the advantages of joint usage and funding of the airfield operation at Royal Air Force Chivenor by the Royal Air Force, Royal Navy and Royal Marines. [22412]

Mr. Soames: No viable options have been identified for joint usage and funding of the airfield operation.

Mr. Gordon Foxley

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now place in the Library a copy of the MOD report into the activities of Mr. Gordon Foxley. [22628]

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Lady to my reply to her of 27 April, Official Report, column 696. In the current circumstances of my Department's civil proceedings against Gordon Foxley and others, there is nothing I would wish to add to the account given in the Comptroller and Auditor General's report referred to.

Fox Hunts

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the military drivers and grooms who act as support staff for armed forces personnel who attend fox hunts have a choice in undertaking these duties. [22397]

Mr. Soames: Members of the armed forces who are permitted to hunt as part of their duties rely on volunteers to act as grooms and drivers.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total income from hunts that have licences to hunt on his Department's land in 1994 to 1995; what was the increase made for inflation; and if these licences were open to public tender. [22398]

Mr. Soames: The total income from licensing fox hunts to hunt over my Department's land during the 1994–95 fox hunting season was £779.45, including administration charges. Fees charged are not linked to inflationary increases but are based on the commercial judgment of the Defence Land Agent. These licences were not open to public tender due to insufficient demand to justify normal tender procedures.

Plutonium

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 26 April, Official Report, column 588, if he will make a statement on the future location, ownership and use of fuel grade plutonium to be separated from spent fuel at the Chapelcross and Calder Hall reactors, with particular reference to the military stockpile. [22399]

Mr. Soames: The material in question will continue to be stored at Sellafield and there are no plans to transfer it to the civilian stockpile.

Low Flying

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many low-level training sorties were carried out by (a) the Royal Air force and i(b) other air forces in the United Kingdom during April; and how many of these were in (i) the Lake district and (ii) the Yorkshire dales national parks. [22435]

Mr. Soames: Statistics on the use of the United Kingdom low flying system during April will not be available until towards the end of May. My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence will then write to the hon. Member with details of the numbers of sorties carried out in the United Kingdom by British military aircraft and by those of other air forces. Statistics are not available on the number of sorties flown over particular locations, nor is it possible for these to be estimated.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many incidents have been recorded in each year since 1990 involving low-flying military aircraft and microlights and hang gliders. [22937]

Mr. Soames: The information requested is as follows:

| Year | Microlights | Hang gliders |
|---|---|---|
| 1990 | 5 | 4 |
| 1991 | 8 | 1 |
| 1992 | 2 | 2 |
| 1993 | 2 | 3 |
| 1994 | 1 | 1 |

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of his Department's budget is allocated to initiatives which have been undertaken to secure private finance for his Department's projects. [22783]

Mr. Freeman: It is expected that about £730,000, which represents 0.0034 per cent. of the defence budget, for 1995–96 will be spent by the Department's private finance unit in direct support for the private finance initiative. This does not include costs incurred in support of projects where the possibility of private finance is being explored, or the costs of the projects themselves.

Air Misses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many category A air misses between military and civilian aircraft over the United Kingdom have been reported in each year since 1989. [22806]

Mr. Soames: The information requested is as follows:

1989: 12
1990: 12
1991: 8
1992: 9
1993: 4
1994: 2

Training

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what special training is given to persons who have responsibility for assessing the historical significance of documents held by his Department. [23291]

Mr. Soames: Training in assessing the significance of departmental records is carried out under the guidance of the Keeper of Public Records. It is provided in a number of different ways, including courses on the appraisal of records and through conferences and seminars arranged by the Public Record Office. Additionally, Ministry of Defence reviewers, who are former senior officials recruited for their breadth of experience of the Department and its business, liaise closely with our historical branches. They work to a comprehensive instructions manual.

Empty Properties, Berkshire

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received from hon. Members in constituencies in Berkshire regarding empty dwellings owned by his Department. [22833]

Mr. Soames: My right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) has corresponded with my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence about married quarters at Clayhill near Burghfield in Berkshire.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many empty dwellings his Department owns in each constituency in Berkshire. [22834]

Mr. Soames: As at 31 March, my Department owned the following empty properties in the constituencies of Berkshire:

| | Number |
|---|---|
| East Berkshire | 14 |
| Windsor and Maidenhead | 6 |
| Reading East | 110 |
| Reading West | 0 |
| Newbury | 171 |
| Slough | 2 |
| Wokingham | 0 |

A large number of the vacant properties are either undergoing or awaiting major maintenance work, already allotted to service families due to move in shortly or form part of the management margin needed to ensure that accommodation is available for entitled service families.

Of the 171 vacant properties in Newbury, 72 are in the process of being sold.

Land Mines

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) of 27 January, Official Report, column 445, for what reasons Her Majesty's Government do not include land mines possessing a self-destruct mechanism in their moratorium on the export of land mines. [23094]

Mr. Freeman: As announced by the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, on 15 March 1995, Official Report, column 862, the Government have extended the moratorium on the export of anti-personnel land mines, so that it is now prohibited to export non-self-destruct and non-detectable anti-personnel land mines to any destination, and to export any type of anti-personnel land mine to countries which have not ratified the United Nations weaponry convention.

Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what costs his Department have incurred during the last 12 months as a result of cloning of mobile telephones being utilised by his Department, with particular reference to the making of unauthorised calls; [23496]

(2) how many mobile telephones being utilised by his Department have been cloned during the last 12 months; [23501]

(3) what steps his Department has taken to prevent the cloning of telephones being utilised by his Department; and if his Department has discussed this matter with any official agencies; [23464]

(4) what representations his Department has made to the Department of Trade and Industry concerning the need for legislation to prevent the cloning of mobile telephones. [23471]

Mr. Soames [holding answer 9 March 1995]: The cloning of mobile telephones used by my Department has so far affected only telephones fitted in official cars. The Department's records show that 27 official car telephones have been cloned during the last 12 months. To prevent further cloning all official car phones are being upgraded to a global system for mobile communications models operating on digital networks. There is no evidence that GSM digital telephones can be cloned in the same manner as analogue mobile telephones.

The cost of unauthorised calls, as a result of a mobile telephone being cloned, is borne by the service provider and not charged to my Department. The cost of the car conversion to a digital GSM telephone is approximately £340 excluding VAT.

We have worked very closely with telephone service providers and cellular network operators to prevent the cloning of mobile telephones. My Department has made no official representation to the Department of Trade and Industry about the need for legislation to prevent the cloning of mobile telephones.

Allowances

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 25 April, Official Report, columns 491–94, what was the total amount paid in allowances in 1993–94 and 1994–95; and if he will set out the occasions during the last 10 years when the allowances have been revised. [22189]

Mr. Soames [holding answer 2 May 1995]: The total amount paid in allowances to attaches and advisers in 1993–94 and 1994–95 was £3,946,000 and £3,491,000 respectively. These totals include cost of living and related allowances—which are paid to all personnel serving overseas—as well as those allowances which are related to the particular post. Allowances are reviewed at regular monthly intervals, except for representational attachment allowance which is assessed annually.

HEALTH

Primary Care and Deprivation

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the relationship between primary care spending and deprivation. [21928]

Mr. Malone: Extra funds are made available to general practitioners working in under-privileged areas through the deprivation payment scheme.

Agency Staff

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, what is her Department's estimate of the use of agency staff in the NHS over the last five years. [21994]

Mr. Malone: The tables show the whole-time equivalent numbers of agency nurses, midwives, medical and dental staff working in the national health service over the last five years.

NHS hospital and community health service agency nursing and midwifery staff, England 1989–93 As at 30 September for each year

| | Qualified and Unqualified whole-time equivalents |
|---|---|
| 1989 | 7,230 |
| 1990 | 6,710 |
| 1991 | 3,930 |
| 1992 | 3,230 |
| 1993 | 4,780 |

Medical Negligence

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations she has received on the length of time taken to resolve medical negligence claims involving the national health service. [22201]

Mr. Malone: Hon. Members have asked two questions on this subject this year and, in addition, we have received representations about two individual cases.

Ministerial Visits

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which hospitals in inner and greater London (a) she and (b) the Minister of State have visited in the last 12 months; and on what dates. [22652]

Mr. Malone: There have been numerous visits to hospitals in inner and greater London during the past year. The information is shown in the table.

| Minister | Hospital | Date |
|---|---|---|
| Minister for Health (Dr. Mawhinney) | Queen Mary's University hospital | 16 May 1994 |
| Minister for Health (Dr. Mawhinney) | Harefield hospital | 13 June 1994 |
| Minister for Health (Dr. Mawhinney) | Royal London Homeopathic hospital | 16 June 1994 |
| Secretary of State | St. George's hospital | 20 June 1994 |
| Minister for Health (Dr. Mawhinney) | Charing Cross hospital | 4 July 1994 |
| Minister for Health (Mr. Malone) | St. Charles hospital | 27 July 1994 |
| Minister for Health (Mr. Malone) | King's College hospital school of medicine and dentistry | 27 July 1994 |
| Secretary of State | Royal National Throat Nose and Ear hospital | 15 September 1994 |
| Minister for Health (Mr. Malone) | St Giles' hospital, Camberwell (Optimum Health Services NHS Trust) | 4 October 1994 |
| Secretary of State | Lewisham and Guy's Mental Health NHS Trust | 17 October 1994 |
| Minister for Health (Mr. Malone) | Royal London hospital | 20 October 1994 |
| Secretary of State | Chelsea and Westminster hospital | 13 November 1994 |
| Minister for Health (Mr. Malone) | St. Bartholomew's hospital | 1 December 1994 |
| Minister for Health (Mr. Malone) | Guy's hospital | 7 December 1994 |
| Minister for Health (Mr. Malone) | Homerton hospital, London Chest hospital | 16 January 1995 |
| Minister for Health (Mr. Malone) | St. Thomas' hospital | 18 January 1995 |
| Minister for Health (Mr. Malone) | Royal Homeopathic hospital | 8 February 1995 |
| Minister for Health (Mr. Malone) | University College London hospital | 8 March 1995 |
| Secretary of State | King's College hospital | 22 March 1995 |
| Minister for Health (Mr. Malone) | The London Hospital for Sick Children | 27 March 1995 |
| Minister for Health (Mr. Malone) | King's College hospital | 27 March 1995 |
| Minister for Health (Mr. Malone) | St. Ann's hospital (Haringey Community Services NHS Trust) | 21 April 1995 |
| Minister for Health (Mr. Malone) | Western Eye hospital (St. Mary's NHS Hospital Trust) | 1 May 1995 |

HIV and AIDS

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the research sponsored by her Department and the amount spent on each project for (a) AIDS/HIV prevention and (b) AIDS/HIV treatment, for the last five years for which figures are available; and if she will make a statement. [22669]

Mr. Malone: The main agency through which the Government support research into HIV and AIDS is the Medical Research Council which receives its grant-in-aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Over the last five financial years the Department of Health has contributed to the MRC's work to a value of £1,233,161 in 1990–91, £2,000,700 in 1991–92, £1,708,967 in 1992–93, £1,794,722 in 1993–94 with a £1,210,000 estimated expenditure in 1994–95.

In addition, the Department is funding its own programme of research covering the health and social care for people with HIV/AIDS. Over the last five financial years funding of the programme has been £593,000 in 1990–91, £786,000 in 1991–92, £789,000 in 1992–93, £834,000 in 1993–94 with an estimated expenditure of £955,000 in 1994–95.

The nature of the work undertaken means that it is not possible to split the research projects between prevention and treatment; many will cover both aspects.

The work undertaken by the Department is listed in two recent publications, "The Health and Social Care for People with HIV Infection and AIDS" and "Centrally Commissioned Research Programme." Copies of both publications are available in the Library.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the research work that her Department sponsors on HIV/AIDS which incorporates international co-operation. [22667]

Mr. Malone: The Department's programme of policy research covers the delivery of health and social care to people with HIV infection and AIDS in England. Researchers carrying out the work have strong international links but given the nature of the studies sponsored by the Department it is appropriate that they are based in this country.

Whooping Cough Vaccine

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evaluation her departmental advisers have made of the research by Dr. Michel Odent suggesting a link between whooping cough vaccine and childhood asthma and ear infections. [22895]

Mr. Sackville: The Department of Health is aware of Dr. Odent's suggestion that there is an association between the rise in acceptance of whooping cough vaccine, and asthma and other conditions. However, Dr. Odent has failed to consider that until the mid-1970s acceptance of whooping cough vaccine was very high and did not appear then to be linked with asthma. The Public Health Laboratory Service is in close contact with other international agencies investigating this suggestion.

Complaints Procedure

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make it her policy that family health service authorities are informed of, and directed to make maximum use of, the voluntary services of groups of conciliators when dealing with complaints. [22733]

Mr. Malone: Since 1990 family health services authorities have been required to make available a process of conciliation to resolve complaints against family health services practitioners. It is for each authority to make appropriate local arrangements for provision of this service.

Patients

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action she is taking to prevent patients being left on trolleys for excessive periods by hospital trusts. [22893]

Mr. Sackville: Under the new patients charter for England, any patient who needs to be admitted to hospital through an accident and emergency department can expect to be given a bed as soon as possible, and certainly within three to four hours. From April 1996 this standard will be improved to two hours.

Local Health Needs

Mr. Khabra: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps her Department is taking to improve the identification of primary health care issues in local areas. [22894]

Mr. Malone: Family health services authorities work closely with primary care professionals in their areas to identify and respond to local needs. Subject to Parliament's approval, this function will be strengthened by the establishment of unitary health authorities, from April 1996, to replace district health authorities and family health services authorities. The new health authorities will have overall responsibility for assessing the health care needs of the local population.

Committee on Safety of Medicines

Ms Hodge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arrangements are made for an independent body to oversee the working of the Committee on Safety of Medicines. [22925]

Mr. Sackville: The Medicines Commission, established under section 2 of the Medicines Act 1968, has a general function to advise Ministers on matters relating to the Medicines Act or the exercise of any power conferred by it. The commission has a specific duty to review the functions of committees, including the Committee on Safety of Medicines, established under section 4 of the Act. In addition, the commission considers representations made by an applicant or licence holder where the licensing authority has been advised by the CSM to refuse, suspend, revoke or vary a licence.

Training

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what special training is given to persons who have responsibility for assessing the historical significance of documents held by her Department. [23286]

Mr. Sackville: Training in assessing the historical significance of Department of Health records is carried out under the guidance of the Keeper of Public Records. It is provided in a number of different ways, including courses on the appraisal of records and through conferences and seminars arranged by the Public Record Office.

Drugs and Alcohol Grants

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much each local authority has bid for the drug and alcohol specific grant for 1995–96; and how much was awarded. [23631]

Mr. Bowis: A list of bids, made and awarded will be placed in the Library. Local social services authorities submit bids in respect of local voluntary sector projects that they wish to support. Each successful project may be supported for up to three years.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21385]

Mr. Goodlad [holding answer 1 May 1995]: Any conflict of interest involving civil servants and special advisers would have been dealt with in accordance with the established guidance. Records of the number of cases are not held centrally.

Indonesia

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what date he sought assurances from the Government of Indonesia that the AR325 three-dimensional radar sensors with data display and handling systems supplied by Plessey Radar would not be deployed in East Timor. [23250]

Mr. Goodlad: We received general assurances from the Indonesian Government on 8 June 1994 that British defence equipment would not be used for internal repression in East Timor.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what dates he sought assurances from the Government of Indonesia that British-supplied defence equipment would not be used against (a) the GAM (Aceh), (b) the OPM—West Papua, Irian Jaya—and (c) FRETELIN—East Timor. [23238]

Mr. Goodlad: We received assurances from the Indonesian Government on 8 June 1994 that British-supplied defence equipment would not be used against civilians in East Timor or in Indonesia.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Indonesian military personnel have been funded by his Department to attend courses in the United Kingdom through the United Kingdom military training assistance scheme in each year since 1 January 1990. [23246]

Mr. Goodlad: Details of military training between ourselves and individual countries are confidential between Governments.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what date he sought an assurance from the Indonesian Government that Hawk aircraft would not be used for internal security purposes. [23254]

Mr. Goodlad: On 24 June 1993.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on which date he sought an assurance from the Indonesian Government that British-supplied defence equipment would not be used for internal security purposes. [23236]

Mr. Goodlad: We have on several occasions, most recently on 2 February 1995, sought the assurance of the Indonesian Government that British-supplied defence equipment would not be used for internal repression in Indonesia and East Timor.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many official visitors to the United Kingdom from Indonesia were funded by his Department in 1994; and if he will list the dates of their stay in the United Kingdom. [23252]

Mr. Goodlad: Two; on 8 to 11 July.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on which date he last sought assurance from the Government of Indonesia that British-supplied defence equipment would not be deployed in East Timor. [23240]

Mr. Goodlad: On 2 February 1995.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on which date he was made aware that British-supplied Hawk aircraft were in service with one of the Indonesian air force's two counter-insurgency squadrons. [23248]

Mr. Goodlad: The British-supplied Hawk aircraft is in use with the Indonesian air force as a jet trainer.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on which date he asked for assurances from the Government of Indonesia that the former Royal Navy supply ship, the Green Rover, would not be deployed in the territorial waters of East Timor. [23239]

Mr. Goodlad: Specific assurances on the use of this equipment were not sought.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the phrase "internal security purposes", used in his answer of 9 February 1994 to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), Official Report, column 283, includes activities by the Indonesian armed forces in East Timor. [23255]

Mr. Goodlad: As I explained in my reply to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on 9 February 1994, column 283, the Indonesian Government have given us assurances that Hawk aircraft will not be used for internal security purposes. By their own definition, this includes activities by the Indonesian armed forces in the territory of East Timor.

We have never recognised Indonesia's annexation of East Timor.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the phrase "civilian population", as used in his answer of 9 February 1994 to the hon. Member for Monklands, West, (Mr. Clarke), Official Report, column 283, in terms of its application to the populations in Indonesia and East Timor. [23253]

Mr. Goodlad: The use of the term "civilian population" was intended to demonstrate our policy of not licensing for export to Indonesia any equipment which we consider likely to be used for internal repression in East Timor or Indonesia.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what dates he sought assurances from the Government of Indonesia that British-supplied defence equipment would not be deployed in East Timor (a) on land, (b) in its territorial waters and (c) in its airspace. [23237]

Mr. Goodlad: We have received assurances from the Indonesian Government, on a number of occasions, that British-supplied defence equipment would not be used for internal repression in East Timor. In the case of the Scorpion armoured vehicles, announced by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade on 2 March 1995, column 716, the Indonesian Government assured us on 2 February 1995 that these vehicles would not be deployed in East Timor.

Overseas Missions (Staff)

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many staff, and at what grades, who were not employed in entry clearance work were in post in (a) New York, (b) Moscow, (c) St. Petersburg, (d) Accra, (e) Lagos, (f) Abuja, (g) New Delhi, (h) Bombay, (j) Calcutta, (k) Madras, (l) Dhaka, (m) Islamabad, (n) Karachi and (o) Colombo in the financial years (i) 1992–93, (ii) 1993–94 and (iii) 1994–95 to the latest convenient date. [22647]

Mr. Goodlad [holding answer of 9 May 1995]: Details of the staff at the 14 overseas missions listed who are not employed in entry clearance work are given in the table. These figures include some service attachés and staff from other Government Departments and agencies for whom the FCO is not financially responsible. Separate tables are provided for the financial years 1992–93, 1993–94 and 1994–95.

Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what use his Department makes of hand-held and car-based mobile telephones; what were the costs for each financial year of these services since mobile telephones were first introduced to his Department; and how many mobile telephones are currently in use. [23451]

Mr. Goodlad [holding answer of 9 May 1995]: We supply mobile phones to individuals and departments where this enhances the effectiveness of their work. We cannot provide a breakdown of costs prior to 1993 without incurring disproportionate cost. Costs for the financial years since are:

| [1]1993–94 £ | [1]1994–95 £ |
|---|---|
| 80,415 | 116,302.36 |

[1] Aid wing figures not available.

There are 195 hand-portable sets and 11 car phones in use within the diplomatic and aid wings of the FCO.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations his Department has made to the Department of Trade and Industry concerning the need for legislation to prevent the cloning of mobile telephones. [23470]

Mr. Goodlad [holding answer of 9 May 1995]: Neither the FCO nor the ODA has made representations to the DTI regarding the need for legislation to prevent the cloning of mobile telephones.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps his Department has taken to prevent the cloning of telephones being utilised by his Department; and if his Department has discussed this matter with any official agencies. [23456]

Mr. Goodlad [holding answer 9 may 1995]: The FCO understands there are no commercially available means to prevent cloning. For its part, the Department has initiated thorough checks of itemised billing to ensure unusual call patterns and excessive costs are highlighted and investigated. Additionally, international calls are barred wherever possible.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many mobile telephones being utilised by his Department have been cloned during the last 12 months. [23425]

Mr. Goodlad [holding answer 9 May 1995]: This Department has had 10 mobile telephones cloned between November 1994 and April 1995. The ODA has had none.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what costs his Department has incurred during the last 12 months as a result of cloning of mobile telephones being utilised by his Department, with particular reference to the making of unauthorised calls. [23491]

Mr. Goodlad [holding answer 9 May 1995]: This Department has not incurred any costs for the unauthorised use or reprogramming of cloned telephones. All identified costs—approximately £4,000—have been absorbed by the cellular telephone companies.

Rwanda

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to China in respect of arms sales to Rwanda in breach of the United Nations Security Council resolutions. [23616]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: None.

The UN sanctions committee has received no evidence of any arms sales by China to Rwanda in breach of the UN arms embargo.

Central Africa

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the proposed conference on regional problems in central Africa, as proposed by the UK at the United Nations Council, will take place. [23614]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We recognise the important role of the countries of the region in the search for solutions to this problem in central Africa. The UN Secretary-General is pursuing proposals for a regional conference on peace and security in the Great Lakes region, but no date has yet been set.

GCHQ Wartime Archive

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to authorise the transfer of all GCHQ's remaining wartime archive to Bletchley park. [23414]

Mr. Hurd: None. Bletchley park is not an authorised repository for public records. GCHQ will continue to review its holdings of the wartime archives of the Government code and cypher school, for possible release through the Public Record Office.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Historical Documents

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Lord President of the Council what special training is given to persons who have responsibility for assessing the historical significance of documents held by his Department.

Mr. Newton: Training in assessing the historical significance of departmental records is carried out under the guidance of the Keeper of Public Records. It is provided in a number of different ways, including courses on the appraisal of records and through conferences and seminars arranged by the Public Record Office.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

AIDS-HIV Research

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the research sponsored by his Department through the Medical Research Council, and the amount spent on each project for (a) AIDS-HIV prevention and (b) AIDS-HIV treatment for the last five years for which figures are available and if he will make a statement. [22668]

Mr. Horam: The overall expenditure figures on AIDS research over the last five years are:

| F/Y | £k |
|---|---|
| 1989–90 | 6,200 |
| 1990–91 | 13,300 |
| 1991–92 | 15,900 |
| 1992–93 | 15,300 |
| 1993–94 | 16,200 |

The nature of the research is such that a split between prevention and treatment is artificial, as many of the research projects cover both aspects. The overall figures do not therefore draw a distinction between the two.

I have today placed copies of lists of the HIV and AIDS research projects supported by the MRC in the Libraries of both Houses. These lists show the titles of the projects, by whom they were carried out and the resources allocated. The list indicates both current projects and projects already completed, indicated by +.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Discretionary Social Fund

Mr. Stephen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what changes he intends to make to the discretionary social fund, in the light of the changes to the funeral payments regulations announced on 9 May, and if he will make a statement. [24173]

Mr. Roger Evans: We are introducing minor improvements to the Secretary of State's directions and guidance to clarify the help available for funeral expenses from the discretionary fund. The revised directions clarify those circumstances where applicants will have access to loans for funeral expenses.

Details of the amendments and a revised copy of the Secretary of State's directions and guidance to take effect from 5 June will be placed in the Library.

Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps his Department has taken to prevent the cloning of telephones being utilised by his Department; and if his Department has discussed this matter with any official agencies. [23463]

Mr. Hague [holding answer 9 May 1995]: Cloning is a general problem associated with the use of analogue cellphones. Minimising the risk of cloning would be achieved by moving from analogue to digital cellphones, using the global system for mobile communications, which has wide coverage within the UK and Europe.

The Department at this stage has not taken any positive steps to prevent cloning and before we do, the cost of the conversion from analogue to digital cellphones must be weighed against an assessment of the cloning exposure.

The Department has not at this stage discussed this matter with any official agencies.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

EU Standards, Testing and Certification

Mr. Amess: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he intends to publish the results of his Department's study on standards, testing and certification barriers in the non-harmonised areas of the single market. [24172]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The generic study on standards, testing and certification barriers in non-harmonised areas of the single market is one of a number of studies which arose from my Department's single market compliance unit business plan. Two hundred and fifty businesses and around 100 trade associations were asked whether they had experienced problems in this area and the results of the survey were analysed to discover the nature of the problems and how they would best be tackled.

Our investigations show that many companies are successfully exporting to other member states, but they confirm that problems are faced by some companies and suggest that these problems may be more significant in certain sectors. Specific problems in exporting to six member states were identified and as might be expected from the size of their markets Germany, in particular, and France specified much more often than other member states, although the numbers of problems identified were still low in absolute terms. Analysis of the problems identified supports the twin approach to resolving conflicts—bilaterally and through direct approaches to the European Commission—as indeed is my Department's usual practice. There is also a need to encourage industry to utilise the benefits of possible agreements under the auspices of the European Organisation for Testing and Certification and to stimulate the work of the European Co-operation for Accreditation of Laboratories and European Accreditation of Certification.

Our investigations have confirmed that there are gaps in mutual recognition which are detracting from the benefits of the single market. I have, therefore, written to the European Commission with the results of the study and I will be raising the study with fellow European Ministers in the Internal Market Council.

My Department's single market compliance unit will try to resolve, with firms, specific problems identified by the study and my Department's standards policy unit will help to publicise the ways in which mutual recognition may be achieved.

I have placed in the Library of the House a copy of the report of the study which has been issued.

Telecommunications

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he supports the European Commission's proposals to allow cable television companies within the European Community to offer telecommunications services; and if he will support action to allow other telecommunications operators to provide entertainment services. [24171]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Government welcome the Commission proposals to allow cable TV companies to offer telecommunication services, which would bring other member states into line with existing UK practice. The Commission proposals, which are currently subject to public consultation, would not affect member states' existing rules on the provision of entertainment services, nor is there any sign that the Commission would be willing to extend its proposals in this way. The Government would strongly oppose any such action. UK Government policy remains as set out in Command Paper 2734, published in November 1994.

Insurance Companies

Mr. French: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to ensure that insurance company orphan funds accrue to policy holders. [23265]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: One of the Department's priorities is to ensure that the balance between policyholders' and shareholders' interests is not affected, as I explained in my answer to the hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen) on 24 February 1995, Official Report, column 362.

Fireworks

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if children aged under 16 years will still be prohibited from purchasing fireworks which do not contain gunpowder after the coming into force of the Firework (Safety) Revocation Regulations 1995. [23030]

Mr. Jonathan Evans [holding answer 9 May 1995]: The supply of fireworks to children apparently under the age of 16 will continue to be prohibited with the coming into force of the Fireworks (Safety) (Revocation) Regulations 1995, by virtue of section 31 of the Explosives Act 1875 as amended, irrespective of whether fireworks contain gunpowder or other explosive substances.

Inward Investment

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals he has to encourage inward investment to the United Kingdom. [22252]

Mr. Eggar: My Department's Invest in Britain Bureau runs a comprehensive programme for promoting the UK overseas, including company visits, advertising, mail shots, seminars and missions. Within the UK, the IBB will be working with Govnerment offices, regional agencies and others to encourage more systematic cultivation of opportunities for securing new investment by existing companies. The resources of the IBB have also been strengthened with the appointment of a new chief executive from the private sector and a regional director for the far east.

PRIME MINISTER

Committee on Standards in Public Life

Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister when he expects to receive the first report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life; and if he will make a statement. [24306]

The Prime Minister: The first report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life, under the chairmanship of Lord Nolan, is being published today as Command Paper 2850. I should like to express my thanks to Lord Nolan and his colleagues for the way in which they have discharged the initial part of the remit which I announced to the House in October. It is welcome that they have reached unanimous recommendations based on open proceedings, and having taken oral and written evidence from a wide cross-section of opinion. The oral evidence they have taken is included in volume II of the report, and written submissions are to be made available at the Public Record Office.

Lord Nolan has arranged to send a copy of his Committee's report to every Member of the House.

I believe it is important to maintain the highest possible standards and confidence in public life. I therefore welcome the work the committee has done.

I accept the broad thrust of the committee's recommendations in so far as they are addressed to the Government. We shall give the report the close study it deserves and then make a detailed response.

The recommendations which are addressed to this House are, of course, a matter for the House itself to consider, and my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will arrange an early opportunity for debate.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 11 May. [22391]

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 11 May. [22393]

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Pay Review Bodies

Mr. Coe: To ask the Prime Minister what is the current membership of the public sector pay review bodies. [24307]

The Prime Minister: The current membership, with effect from 1 April 1995, is listed:

Senior Salaries Review Body
Sir Michael Perry CBE (Chairman)
Professor George Bain
Mr. Gordon Hourston
Sir Anthony Wilson
Sir Sydney Lipworth QC
Mrs. Rosemary Day
Miss Patricia Mann
Mrs. Yve Newbold
Mr. Mark Sheldon
Mrs. Beverley Bernard

Armed Forces Pay Review Body
Mr. Gordon Hourston (Chairman)
Mr. Michael Bolton
Mrs. Dorothy Venables
Mr. John Cox CBE
Mr. John Crosby
Air Chief Marshal Sir Roger Palin KCB OBE
Mr. Guy Neely
Sir Gavin Laird CBE (from 1 July 1995)

Review Body on Nursing Staff, Midwives, Health Visitors and Professions Allied to Medicine
Mr. Michael Bett CBE (Chairman)[1]
Miss Annie Mackie OBE
Professor Gillian Raab
Ms Ruth Lea
Mrs. Sheila Gleig
Mrs. Anne Dean
Mr. Lyndon Hadden
Mr. Gareth Griffiths

[1] Following his appointment as First Civil Service Commissioner, Mr. Bett has indicated that he will be stepping down as chairman of the review body once a successor has been appointed.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Epilepsy

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many deaths were attributed to epilepsy in Northern Ireland in each year since 1990 in each health board area for which information is available. [22841]

Sir John Wheeler: The number of deaths registered from, or related to, epilepsy in Northern Ireland for each year from 1990 in each health board area are as follows. Deaths are recorded by date of registration and not by date of occurrence.

| | 1990 | 1991 | 1992 | 1993 |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Epilepsy as underlying cause of death | | | | |
| Eastern health and social services board | 4 | 3 | 6 | 9 |
| Northern health and social services board | 7 | 6 | 2 | 4 |
| Southern health and social services board | 4 | 3 | 6 | 3 |
| Western health and social services board | 4 | 2 | 1 | 3 |
| Northern Ireland | 19 | 14 | 15 | 19 |
| Epilepsy as an associated cause of death | | | | |
| Eastern health and social services board | 16 | 13 | 13 | 17 |
| Northern health and social services board | 17 | 6 | 13 | 11 |
| Southern health and social services board | 3 | 8 | 10 | 7 |
| Western health and social services board | 5 | 3 | 12 | 7 |
| Northern Ireland | 41 | 30 | 48 | 42 |

Note.
1994 figures will not be available until June.

Belfast

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the aims and objectives of the Belfast urban area plan 2001; and how these objectives fit into the aims of the strategy for making Belfast work published in March. [23105]

Mr. Moss: The aims and objectives of the Belfast urban area plan 2001 are set out on pages 7 and 16 of the plan, a copy of which is available in the Library. The main focus of the making Belfast work strategy is to increase opportunities for residents of MBW areas to secure employment and to improve their quality of life. These aims complement those set out in the Belfast urban area plan 2001.

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how relevant the Belfast urban area plan 2001 now is; if the Department of the Environment proposes to undertake a review of the plan; and if the public will be invited to put forward their views. [23106]

Mr. Moss: The Belfast urban area plan 2001 remains the statutory plan for Belfast. The Department is currently carrying out a reassessment of development land to ascertain the anticipated requirement for a further release of land reserved for housing in the second phase of the plan. When the draft proposals are published, this will afford the public the opportunity to make representations and a public local inquiry may be held for the purposes of hearing those representations which cannot be resolved.

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how the Department of the Environment is co-ordinating the overall improvement process in Belfast and the different elements of that process; and how elected representatives are involved in these matters. [23107]

Mr. Moss: The Department of the Environment co-ordinates the overall improvement process in Belfast through the Belfast development office and the making Belfast work initiative. The Belfast development office has responsibility for physical development in close consultation with the Department's planning service. The making Belfast work initiative acts as a catalyst in providing funding to the public, private and voluntary sectors for social and economic programmes in disadvantaged areas.

Elected representatives are involved in these matters through direct contact and correspondence with officials and Ministers and through the Department's statutory obligations to consult Belfast city council on planning matters.

Driver and Vehicle Licensing

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what performance targets have been set for Driver and Vehicle Licensing (Northern Ireland) in 1995–96. [24048]

Mr. Moss: For 1995–96 the following key performance targets have been set for the agency:

To meet an overall efficiency gain of 2 per cent.

To reduce the unit cost per vehicle excise enforcement case by 0.5 per cent. in real terms compared to 1994–95.

To dispatch 94 per cent. of registration books for new vehicles in 16 working days from receipt.

To dispatch 91 per cent. of refunds of vehicle excise duty in 11 working days from receipt.

To dispatch 93 per cent. of vehicle excise licences in five working days from receipt of postal applications.

To dispatch 93 per cent. of duplicate vehicle registration books in six working days from receipt of applications.

To dispatch 93 per cent. of ordinary driving licences in 11 working days of receipt of applications.

To dispatch 96 per cent. of vocational driving licences in 10 working days from receipt of applications.

To dispatch 94 per cent. of provisional driving licences in nine working days from receipt of applications.

To dispatch substantive replies to 95 per cent. of written enquiries for information from the drivers and vehicles registers in four working days from receipt.

To limit maximum waiting time at local vehicle licensing offices to 25 minutes during peak periods—the first eight and last two working days of each month—and 10 minutes at other periods.

To limit the error rate—errors on any item sent out by the agency—to a maximum of 0.5 per cent. of total agency output.

Agricultural Occupancy Conditions

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he has taken to review the position regarding agricultural occupancy conditions. [24049]

Mr. Moss: Following a review of procedures it has been agreed that the "four-year rule", which requires that enforcement proceedings can be initiated only within four years of a breach, should apply to agricultural occupancy conditions. I have also decided to appoint a consultant to advise on alternatives to the use of occupancy conditions. It is expected that the consultants' report will lead to a further review of policy.

DEFENCE

Queen's Birthday Parade

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimated total cost of this year's Queen's birthday parade. [22938]

Mr. Soames: No additional costs are incurred for the men and horses taking part in the parade as they are already funded. Costs will be incurred for hired road transport, and these are estimated at £12,000. There are other additional costs such as drycleaning of ceremonial uniforms and accommodation services, including facilities, rations and communications. Full details are not recorded separately, however, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Army Deployment

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the strength of the British Army in Northern Ireland at the time of the IRA ceasefire; what reductions in manpower strength have taken place since then; and what is the current strength of the British Army in Northern Ireland. [23042]

Mr. Soames: In August 1994, there were some 17,000 soldiers deployed in support of the Royal Ulster Constabulary. This figure included 12 major units deployed to the Province in the infantry role and six battalions of the Royal Irish Regiment. Since the IRA ceasefire, a sub-unit of some 140 personnel has been withdrawn and its task reassigned to other units already in the Province, and two major units have been relocated to their home bases outside Northern Ireland but remain available to the General Officer Commanding and can return at short notice if required. These adjustments have brought the number of soldiers deployed to the Province to some 16,000.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) pursuant to his answer of 28 April, Official Report, column 772, what is the basis upon which the figure of a 14 per cent. reduction in the total stockpile of United Kingdom nuclear weapons is determined; if the stockpile of United Kingdom nuclear weapons is equivalent to the number of warheads actually deployed; and if he will make a statement; [23108]

(2) pursuant to his oral answer of 28 March to the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) Official Report, column 817, if the figure referred to of a 21 per cent. reduction in nuclear warheads is based on a comparison of the total number of nuclear warheads in the United Kingdom's stockpile. [23109]

Mr. Soames: The basis of the figures for reductions in our nuclear deterrent is explained in the footnotes to figure 6 on page 39 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1995".

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the four Trident submarines will be deployed with nuclear weapons at any one time. [23110]

Mr. Soames: It is our policy to maintain at least one submarine at sea on deterrent patrol at any time.

Arms Sales Teams (Indonesia)

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the dates when Army sales teams have been deployed in Indonesia since 1 January 1990. [23244]

Mr. Freeman: Army sales teams were deployed in Indonesia in July and August 1990 and again in February and March 1992.

Arms Sales (Indonesia)

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Provan (Mr. Wray), of 24 April, Official Report, column 394, what defence equipment whose sale to Nigeria was agreed before June 1993 was delivered after that time. [23256]

Mr. Freeman: It is our general policy not to reveal details of individual exports of defence equipment. However, the 1994 UK return to the UN register of conventional arms, now in the House of Commons Library, provides information on transfers of defence equipment within seven broad categories.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on which date he approved exports of Hawk 200 series aircraft to Indonesia. [23249]

Mr. Freeman: The approval of export licences is a matter for my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. It is not the practice to give details of approvals or denials of specific export licence applications, but I can assure the hon. Member that such export licence applications would be considered against the background of an assurance from the Indonesian authorities that Hawk aircraft will not be used against the civilian population or for repressive purposes.

UK Military Training and Assistance Scheme

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the annual cost to his Department of the UK military training and assistance scheme in each of the last five financial years. [23243]

Mr. Soames: The UK military training and assistance scheme is controlled by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, which has primary responsibility for funding military assistance. The MOD does not bear any of the costs of UKMTAS. On occasion, however, and where the aims serve defence interests, the MOD agrees to waive the costs of training provided to foreign Governments. The total of these waivers in the last five years is as follows:

| Year | £ million |
|---|---|
| 1990–91 | 4.6 |
| 1991–92 | 4.6 |
| 1992–93 | 5.9 |
| 1993–94 | 5.1 |
| 1994–95 | [1]5.6 |

[1] Forecast outturn.

In addition, some £70,000 was spent in 1993–94 and a further £173,000 in 1994–95 in support of the United Kingdom's programme of bilateral defence contact with central and eastern Europe.

Details of the assistance provided are confidential between Governments.

British Defence Advisory Team

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the dates when elements of the British defence advisory team have been deployed in Indonesia since 1 January 1990. [23245]

Mr. Freeman: The British defence advisory team visited Indonesia in October 1992.

Defence Export Services Organisation

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence who was the Head of Defence Export Services Organisation in 1991; what was the duration of their contract and their annual salary including bonuses; and from which organisation they were seconded. [23233]

Mr. Freeman: Sir Alan Thomas was the Head of Defence Export Services Organisation in 1991. The duration of his contract on secondment from Raytheon Europe Ltd. was five years and his annual salary in 1994, the year he left the Department, was £131,674 plus a performance bonus of up to an annual maximum of £30,000.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the net and gross cost of the Defence Export Services Organisation in 1991–92. [23257]

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) on 20 April 1995, Official Report, column 228.

Land Mines

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a revised list of the criteria he uses for classifying land mines by type. [23067]

Mr. Freeman: The NATO standard definition of a mine is "an explosive or material, normally encased, designed to destroy or damage ground vehicles, boats or aircraft, or designed to wound, kill or otherwise incapacitate personnel. It may be detonated by the action of its victim, by the passage of time, or by controlled means".

There is no NATO standard definition of an anti-tank or anti-personnel land mine: my Department considers an anti-tank land mine to be one which is designed specifically to target tanks or other vehicles; and an anti-personnel land mine to be one designed specifically to target people.

Defence Equipment Exports

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many staff in his Department and companies owned by his Department work on assisting with the export of defence equipment; and how many of these staff have served in the armed forces. [23359]

Mr. Freeman: The Defence Export Services Organisation, which includes the Disposal Sales Agency, exists to help British manufacturers market and sell their products abroad, complementing the wider range of services offered by the DTI. There are 691 staff in the DESO, of whom 233 are serving military personnel, and a further five are retired officers. Records of previous military service, including national service, are not held centrally. IMS Ltd. is wholly owned by the Secretary of State for Defence, but has ceased trading.

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many, and what proportion of vacancies advertised by his Department, and by each of his Department's agencies, in the last three years have listed the attainment of NVQs as an acceptable entry requirement; and, of those, how many have required (i) level 1 NVQs, (ii) level 2 NVQs, (iii) level 3 NVQs and (iv) other level NVQs. [22976]

Mr. Freeman: Since 1991, levels 1 and 2 NVQs in business administration have been recognised qualifications for entry to some junior non-managerial grades in my Department. Recruitment of more junior grades is undertaken by a large number of personnel management authorities throughout the country. Their individual recruitment activities are not co-ordinated centrally, and no central records are maintained of vacancies advertised. Information on the number and percentage of vacancies listing the NVQs as an acceptable criterion of these grades could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Level 3 and 4 NVQs in information technology have been accepted as an entry criterion for recruitment to recently advertised specialist IT executive officer posts. The scope for recognising a wider range of NVQs for recruitment to industrial and non-industrial posts is under review.

Recruitment of executive officers is undertaken centrally. The current executive officer (IT) recruitment campaign aims to fill 90 posts which equate to 100 per cent. of the total EO(IT) posts advertised by the Department this year.

VE Day and VJ Day

Mr. Sykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements have been made for the funding within the defence budget for the national commemorations of the 50th anniversary of both VE day and VJ day. [24051]

Mr. Soames: Parliamentary approval for this new service is being sought in the 1995–96 supply estimates for defence: operational and support costs—class I, vote 1. Pending that approval, urgent expenditure of £5,800,000 will be met by a repayable advance from the Contingencies Fund.

Defence Analytical Services Agency

Mr. Sykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what performance targets have been set for the Defence Analytical Services Agency for 1995–96. [24052]

Mr. Soames: Key targets have been set for the chief executive of the Defence Analytical Services Agency for this financial year and beyond. The targets build on the progress already made by the agency since it formed in July 1992 and are as follows:

Delivery of customer services

About three quarters of the agency's business is now covered by service level agreements with customers, which set out the targets and standards for the level of service, timeliness and quality of work. For the remaining parts of the business, for which service level agreements are not appropriate, project agreements are in place. Key targets are:

(a) To meet at least 95 per cent. of the timeliness and quality targets in the service level agreements and project agreements.

(b) For all parts of the business, to achieve in the annual customer satisfaction survey at least 90 per cent. of customers expressing themselves satisfied or better with the timeliness, quality of work and helpfulness of staff.

(c) To improve the quality of published output and to devise a methodology to demonstrate the improvement.

Efficiency and use of resources

The agency will be expected to find efficiency savings of 2.5 per cent. to meet the targets laid down in the departmental efficiency plan. The agency will also be required to develop a robust system for the Department to produce location statistics for service and civilian personnel.

Sunken Ship Montgomerie (Explosives)

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what contracts or tenders have been considered in relation to clearing, removing or otherwise dealing with explosives on the ship Montgomerie sunk off Canvey island; with what results; and if he will make a statement; [22619]

(2) when the explosives on the ship Montgomerie sunk off Canvey island were last inspected; what were the results of that inspection; and how often inspections are undertaken; [22618]

(3) what assessment he has made of the risk posed to nearby residents, shipping or fishermen, by the explosives on the ship Montgomerie, sunk off Canvey island; and if he will make a statement. [22620]

Mr. Norris: I have been asked to reply.

These are operational matters for the Coastguard agency. I have asked the chief executive to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from C. J. Harris to Dr. Robert Spink, dated 11 May 1995:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions as these deal with operational matters, for which I have responsibility as Chief Executive.

PQ 1660/94/95. The last survey was completed in September 1993. The Viscount Goschen, Minister for Aviation and Shipping, sent you and other interested MPs copies of the survey report on 26 October 1994 and copies were also placed in the Library of the House of Commons. I am arranging for a further copy to be sent to you.

The survey found no evidence of any major change to the condition of the wreck and concluded that there was no reason to change the policy of not disturbing it.

The wreck is surveyed biennially. Another contracted survey will take place this summer supervised by the Ministry of Defence, with the agreement of the Port of Sheerness. When the details are finalised I will write to you, to other local MPs and local authorities in the area to explain what is happening.

PQ 1661/94/95. Expert opinion, based on the information available about the types of explosives on board, is that the risk of an explosion is remote, and that the best way to keep the risk to an absolute minimum is to leave the wreck undisturbed. The site of the wreck is designated a prohibited area under the Protection of Wrecks Act 1973.

PQ 1673/94/94. No contracts have been considered in relation to disturbing the munitions. Expert opinion is that the risk of an explosion would significantly increase if the wreck were to be disturbed by moving its contents or otherwise dealing with the explosives.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Witness Support Schemes

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects there to be witness support schemes in every magistrates court. [22838]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 10 May 1995]: There are no plans to set up witness support schemes in magistrates courts. Our priority is to implement the royal commission recommendation to establish witness support schemes at all Crown courts. Some 40 schemes are already in operation, and additional Home Office funding last year and this will enable victim support to complete the witness service at all 78 Crown court centres by the end of 1995.

Police Patrol Vehicles (Accidents)

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 4 April, Official Report, column 1019, about road traffic accidents involving police vehicles, how many of the accidents which resulted in civilian injuries in each year involved basic drivers. [23331]

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 4 April, Official Report, column 1019.

I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the number of accidents involving basic drivers which resulted in civilian injuries is as follows:

| Year | Accidents involving civilian injuries (total) | Advanced drivers | Basic drivers | Others |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1991 | 303 | 123 | 44 | 136 |
| 1992 | 294 | 121 | 52 | 121 |
| 1993 | 327 | 136 | 51 | 140 |
| 1994 | 289 | 113 | 29 | 147 |

These figures do not include accidents in which a police vehicle was in the vicinity but not directly involved.

Passport Applications

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the time it takes to process applications for a British passport; and if he will make a statement. [23658]

Mr. Nicholas Baker [holding answer 10 May 1995]: On Wednesday 26 April the turnround times for processing properly completed, straightforward applications were:

Belfast 6 days
Glasgow 7 days
Liverpool 7 days
London 2 days
Newport 6 days
Peterborough 5 days

All the Passport Agency's key targets for 1994–95 were met. This resulted in a reduction in the overall average turnround time from just under eight days to just under seven days.

Secure Mental Hospitals (Manslaughter Detainees)

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many defendants who pleaded guilty to manslaughter were sentenced to detention in a secure mental hospital in each of the last 10 years: and for how long each of them was detained. [23525]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 10 May 1995]: Information on the plea entered by defendants is not available centrally for those sentenced to detention in a secure mental hospital. The following information is based on those restricted patients with a hospital order who were sentenced for manslaughter.

Patients with hospital order for manslaughter, by years to release

England and Wales Number of patients

| Sentence year | Less than one year | 1 up to 2 years | 2 up to 3 years | 3 up to 4 years | 4 up to 5 years | 5 up to 6 years | 6 up to 7 years | 7 up to 8 years | 8 up to 9 years | Remains on population | Total |

Note:
In 1988 the total includes one person for whom details are not available.

Civil Defence

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list (a) existing civil defence facilities currently in operation, (b) the final cost of construction in each case, (c) the numbers employed at each facility and (d) the numbers entitled to use each facility in the event of war. [23170]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: There are no existing civil defence facilities currently in operation. The remaining former regional government headquarters, United Kingdom Warning and Monitoring Organisation monitoring posts, and United Kingdom Warning and Monitoring Organisation group controls, are awaiting disposal, most by sale on the open market. Prior to commencement of the disposal programme there were 17 RGHQs, 26 UKWMO group controls and 874 UKWMO monitoring posts.

The cost of construction of Chilmark and Ashdown Forest RGHQs, the only two purpose-built establishments, was approximately £2.1 million, in 1986, and £3 million, in 1989, respectively. Information relating to the cost of construction of all the other facilities either is not available or could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The numbers designated to operate these facilities in the event of war would have ranged from two to three at the United Kingdom Warning and Monitoring Organisation posts to the 60 at the United Kingdom Warning and Monitoring Organisation group controls and 150 at the larger RGHQs.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further assessment he has made of the implications on civil defence in the United Kingdom arising from the peace dividend; and if he will make a statement. [23169]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Civil defence arrangements are made in the light of assessments of the risks faced by the United Kingdom. There has been no significant change in that assessment of risk since November 1992, when the present arrangements were set in place.

Animal Procedures Committee

Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what appointments he has made recently to the Animal Procedures Committee. [24310]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: I have appointed the following persons to be members of the Animal Procedures Committee for four years with effect from 1 May:

(i) Miss Cindy Millburn, special projects director, World Society for the Protection of Animals.

(ii) Dr. Jacqueline Southee, manager, In-vitro Toxicology, Microbiological Associates Ltd.

(iii) Mr. Les Ward, director, Advocates for Animals.

Cycling (Footpaths)

Mr. Timms: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions there have been for cycling on footpaths in (a) the London borough of Newham, and (b) London, in each of the past five years for which records are available. [23154]

Mr. Maclean: The information is given in the table. 1994 data will not be available until autumn 1995.

Number of defendants prosecuted for cycling on footpaths[1] within the Metropolitan police, City of Londonand Newham areas and England and Wales 1989–1993

| Area | 1989 | 1990 | 1991 | 1992 | 1993 |

[1] An offence under the Highway Act 1985, section 72, and the Metropolitan Police Act 1939, section 54(7) and byelaws.

Police Training

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are his estimates for the cost of training needed to enable the police in England and Wales to be fully aware of the provisions of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994; and what funding has been made available to police authorities for such training. [23050]

Mr. Maclean: The extent to which police officers need to be trained in relation to the provisions of this Act is a matter for individual chief officers to determine. Centrally produced training material has been made available, free of charge, to all forces; the costs of delivering any training considered necessary will be met from existing police budgets.

Driving without Insurance

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many of those convicted of driving without insurance were immediately disqualified in each of the last three years; [23268]

(2) how many of those convicted of driving without insurance received an endorsement of six or more penalty points in each of the last three years. [23267]

Mr. Maclean: The following table gives the available information which relates to the number of convictions for "using a motor vehicle uninsured against third-party risks" in England and Wales for the years 1991 to 1993. Figures for 1994 are not available.

Convictions for using a motor vehicle uninsured against third-party risks

| | Total disqualifications imposed | Endorsements–without disqualification—with six or more penalty points |
|---|---|---|
| 1991 | 19,387 | 108,638 |
| 1992 | 20,762 | 125,771 |
| 1993 | 25,570 | 143,818 |

Immigration

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the application made to the United Kingdom post in Islamabad by Mr. Mohammad Rashid and Mrs. Anwar Jahn Rashid—ref: V95/000618—to visit the United Kingdom was referred to him; when it was received; if a recommendation has now been made; and if he will make a statement. [23052]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: This application was not referred to the Home Office for decision or recommendation, but for information to assist the entry clearance officer to reach a decision. The request was received by telex on 24 January, and information was dispatched on 6 March.

Identity Cards

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of how frequently identity cards with photographs would need to be replaced. [23068]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: We shall be publishing a consultation document about identity cards soon which, among other things, will address this issue.

Liquor Licensing

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of (a) public houses and (b) other licensed properties in (i) 1980, (ii) 1985, (iii) 1990 and (iv) 1994. [23269]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The available information on licensed premises is published in table 1 of the Home Office "Statistical Bulletin", issue 4/93, "Liquor Licensing Statistics, England and Wales, July 1991–June 1992", a copy of which is in the Library. Information on liquor licensing is collected only once every three years on the licences in force in the year of collection and in the previous year.

Police Deaths

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list names of persons convicted of killing police officers since 1960 (a) who are still serving imprisonment together with the date when they are next considered for release on licence and (b) who have been released, with the date of that release; and if he will state for each offender the identity of the officer killed and the dates of the crime and of the sentence. [22896]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I will write to the hon. Member.

Community Service Orders

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offenders have served more than two community service orders; and what plans he has to set a maximum on the number of such orders that can be served before a custodial sentence must be imposed. [22520]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: A sample of offenders convicted in 1993 suggests that about 3,700 who receive a community service order had been sentenced to community service on at least two previous occasions. It is for the sentencing court to decide whether or not a custodial sentence is justified in the light of all the circumstances before it, having regard to the provisions of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 as amended. Those provisions enable the court to take account of the offender's failure to respond to previous sentences.

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department is taking to improve community service orders and to ensure that breaches of such orders are properly punished. [22521]

Mr. Nicholas Baker: On 9 March, my right hon. and learned Friend published revised national standards for the supervision of offenders in the community, which tighten up the way in which community service orders must be run and enforced. A copy of the 1995 standards is in the Library.

Criminal Injuries Compensation

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce legislation dealing with criminal injuries compensation. [24309]

Mr. Howard: I have today introduced the Criminal Injuries Compensation Bill.

The Bill provides a power to establish a new criminal injuries compensation scheme. It also repeals the provisions in the Criminal Justice Act 1988, which, if implemented, would have put the old, common law damages scheme on to a statutory footing.

Following the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the House of Lords, which was delivered on 5 April, I have been giving very careful thought to the arrangements which should be made for compensating those who have the misfortune to be injured as a result of a crime of violence.

The judgment related to the method of introduction of the tariff scheme, not its merits. The effect of the judgment was to require the 1990 common law damages scheme to be reinstated in place of the tariff based approach introduced on 1 April 1994. The costs of the common law damages scheme have risen very substantially since the scheme was first introduced in 1964 and more than doubled in real terms between 1987–88 and 1993–94. Although improvements have been made in administration of the scheme, we believe that a tariff-based approach offers greater scope for further improvement and the speedier settlement of cases. I remain of the view, therefore, that steps need to be taken to constrain future expenditure and to ensure that a quicker service is provided. This cannot be achieved within the framework of a system based entirely upon common law principles. I remain therefore of the view that the 1990 common law damages scheme should be replaced by a new tariff-based approach.

I have, however, considered very carefully the concerns which have been expressed about the effect which such an approach may have on those who are most seriously injured. We all have immense sympathy for such victims and the Government are anxious to do all that they can to safeguard the position of victims. I have therefore come to the view that the tariff-based approach should be enhanced to provide payment for loss of earnings and special care for those who are incapacitated for more than 28 weeks—the period during which statutory sick pay is payable. I also propose that there should be provision for loss of dependency/support in fatal cases. In addition, I propose that structured settlements should be available: these will greatly help those receiving the higher awards by providing a guaranteed, index-linked, tax-free income for life, thus considerably increasing the net benefit of the award for many victims.

I believe that a scheme of this sort will be fair while at the same time providing a mechanism for controlling future expenditure. Further details of the proposed scheme are set out in a paper entitled "Criminal Injuries Compensation: proposals for a Tariff Based Scheme" which has been placed in the Library and the Vote Office.

Ours is the most generous compensation scheme in the world. We pay out more compensation than all other European countries added together. That will remain the case under our new proposals.

TRANSPORT

Aircraft (Electronic Interference)

Sir Peter Fry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will ask the Civil Aviation Authority to undertake an urgent investigation into the interference in aircraft navigation and other systems in flight caused by (a) laptop computer and (b) other electrical devices. [23143]

Mr. Norris: The Civil Aviation Authority participates, with the Defence Research Agency and representatives of the airline and aerospace manufacturing industry, in the Electro Magnetic Compatibility Club. The assistance and advice of the club has been sought on the subject of passengers' portable electronic equipment. The CAA's research programme currently includes a project to extend this work to include passengers' mobile telephones.

Illegal Operations Working Group

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what initiatives the illegal operations working group has taken forward over the last 12 months; and what recommendations it has published. [24050]

Mr. Norris: Initiatives which the group has been taking forward are detailed in an annual report which has today been circulated to those organisations with an interest in goods vehicle enforcement. A copy of the group's 1994 report has been placed in the Library of the House.

ENVIRONMENT

Conservation Sites

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the consequences of farm land being designated as a special area of conservation under the EU habitats directive. [22139]

Mr. Atkins: The regulations implementing the habitats directive are based in the existing provisions applying to sites of special scientific interest. In the vast majority of cases, the nature conservation interests for which sites on land will be selected as special areas of conservation will be very similar to those for which these sites will already be protected as SSSIs. In most cases, management measures which have conserved these sites in the past as SSSIs will continue to be appropriate when they become SACs.

The Conservation (Natural Habitats, &c.) Regulations 1994 introduce the following measures for European sites, including SACs:

a duty on the statutory nature conservation agencies not to give consent to potentially damaging operations which will adversely affect the integrity of the site, and to offer a management agreement; powers to review existing consents for potentially damaging operations; powers for the statutory nature conservation agencies to make byelaws to control the activities of third parties;

powers for the Secretary of State to make special nature conservation orders, to prevent damage, which are not time limited; changes to planning law to give effect to the directive's requirements in terms of the consideration and approval of plans and projects likely to affect sites.

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the requirements and benefits of designation as (a) a site of special scientific interest; (b) a special protection area; (c) a Ramsar site; (d) a national nature reserve and (e) a special area of conservation. [22138]

Mr. Atkins: The various designations indicate a site's national or international importance for nature conservation and the level of protection to be given to its wildlife and natural features under both wildlife and planning legislation. Each of the designations referred to by my hon. Friend plays its part in meeting th Government's commitment to sustainable development, and in particular to conserving the natural heritage for the benefit of this and future generations:

(a) sites of special scientific interest are notified by English Nature under section 28 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 for their special interest by reason of their flora, fauna, or geological or physiographical features. SSSIs are protected from damaging operations and the notification is a material factor in the consideration of any development proposal that might affect the site;

(b) special protection areas are classified by my right hon. Friend under the EC wild birds directive to safeguard the habitats of bird species listed in annexe 1 to the directive and of regularly occurring migratory species;

(c) Ramsar sites are wetlands of international importance, which are designated by my right hon. Friend in fulfilment of the United Kingdom's obligations under the convention on wetlands of international importance, the Ramsar convention, to conserve wetlands and foster their wise use;

(d) national nature reserves are declared by English Nature under section 35 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. Their essential characteristic is that their primary use is for nature conservation;

(e) no special areas of conservation have yet been designated. A list of possible SACs is currently the subject of public consultation. SACs are to be sites hosting the natural habitat types and habitats of the species listed in the EC habitats and species directive. Member states are required to establish the necessary conservation measures which correspond to the ecological requirements of the site.

These designations are not mutually exclusive. Indeed, it is the Government's policy that SPAs, Ramsar sites, NNRs and SACs shall first be notified as SSSIs. Further details on these designations are given in planning policy guidance note 9, issued in October 1994, a copy of which is in the Library.

Housing Associations

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion, by local authority in the west midlands, of the Housing Corporation's approved development programme for 1995–96 will be used by housing associations for rehabilitating existing properties (a) for rent and (b) for shared ownership; how many units of accommodation this will cover; and how this compares with his Department's original ADP funding intentions for 1995–96, as set out in the 1992 "Autumn Statement". [22720]

Mr. Robert B. Jones [holding answer 9 May 1995]: The table shows the proportion, by local authority in the west midlands, of the Housing Corporation's approved development programme for 1995–96 which will be used by housing associations for rehabilitating existing properties (a) for rent and (b) for shared ownership; and the related units of accommodation. No regional allocation was made of the 1995–96 ADP as set out in the 1992 "Autumn Statement".

Deyntes Cottage, Northolt

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will call in the current planning application to Ealing council concerning Deyntes cottage, Northolt; and if he will make a statement. [23137]

Sir Paul Beresford: I am considering the case and will write to my hon. Friend shortly.

Surcharged Councillors

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many councillors in England have been surcharged or prosecuted as a consequence of taking decisions in relation to the Local Government (Planning and Land) Act 1980; [23341]

(2) how many councillors in England have been surcharged or prosecuted as a consequence of taking decisions in relation to the Local Government Act 1988. [23342]

Mr. Curry: My Department does not keep records of such actions.

Local Authority Contracts

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list by authority and service area the number of full-time equivalent job losses experienced by local authority direct labour/service organisations in England operating contracts under the terms of the Local Government Act 1988 for the financial years 1990–91, 1991–92, 1992–93 and 1993–94; [23333]

(2) if he will list by authority and service area the number of full-time equivalent job losses experienced by local authority direct labour/service organisations in England operating contracts under the terms of the Local Government (Planning and Land) Act 1980 for the financial years 1990–91, 1991–92, 1992–93 and 1993–94. [23334]

Mr. Curry: My Department does not keep this information.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by service area the local authorities in England that have been challenged by his Department under regulations issued under section 9 of the Local Government Act 1992 in relation to their internal arrangements for establishing client/contractor splits. [23335]

Mr. Curry: Although we have received allegations of anti-competitive behaviour by local authorities about the arrangements for establishing a client/contractor split, none has proceeded to statutory action. Records are not available by service area of the allegations which have been received.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many local authority direct labour/service organisations in England, operating contracts under the terms of the Local Government (Planning and Land) Act 1980 have achieved the required rate of return for the financial years 1992–93 and 1993–94;

(2) how many local authority direct labour/service organisations in England, operating contracts under the terms of the Local Government Act 1988, have achieved the required rate of return for the financial years 1992–93 and 1993–94. [23338]

Mr. Curry: For the financial year 1992–93, my Department recorded 2,409 accounts for direct service/labour organisations under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 and Local Government Act 1988. Some 2,060 of these accounts—85.5 per cent.—recorded that the DLO or DSO had met the statutory financial objective.

For 1993–94, 2,381 accounts were received of which 2,057—86.4 per cent.—recorded that the financial objectives had been met.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by authority and service area the recorded deficits made by local authority direct labour/service organisations in England that have failed to meet the rate of return requirements operating contracts under the terms of the Local Government (Planning and Land) Act 1980 and the Local Government Act 1988, for the financial years 1990–91, 1991–92, 1992–93 and 1993–94 expressed in both absolute and percentage terms. [23336]

Mr. Curry: Three hundred and twenty-four—13.6 per cent.—of the 2,381 local authority direct labour/service organisation accounts for 1993–94 received by my Department recorded a failure to meet the rate of return requirements.

For 1992–93, 2,409 accounts were received of which 349—14.5 per cent.—recorded a failure to meet the rate of return requirements.

For 1991–92, 2,260 accounts were received of which 320—14.2 per cent.—recorded a failure to meet the rate of return requirements.

For 1990–91, just over 2,000 accounts were received of which 330—14.8 per cent.—recorded a failure to meet the rate of return requirements.

Detailed lists for the years 1991–92 to 1993–94 have been placed in the Library of the House. A list for 1990–91 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list, by authority, the surplus achieved on trading accounts for the financial years 1992–93 and 1993–94 for (a) general highways work, (b) construction and maintenance of sewers, (c) works of new construction and (d) maintenance work, delivered by local authorities' direct labour/service organisations in England under the terms of the Local Government (Planning and Land) Act 1980; [23320]

(2) if he will list, by authority, the surplus achieved on trading accounts for the financial years 1992–93 and 1993–94 for (a) refuse collection, (b) street cleaning, (c) building cleaning, (d) school and welfare catering, (e) other catering, (f) vehicle maintenance, (g) ground maintenance and (h) sports and leisure maintenance, delivered by local authorities' direct labour/service organisations in England under the terms of the Local Government Act 1988; [23321]

(3) if he will list, by authority and service area, as defined by the Local Government (Planning and Land) Act 1980, surpluses achieved by local authority direct labour/service organisations in England for the financial years 1992–93 and 1993–94;

(4) if he will list, by authority and service area, as defined by the Local Government Act 1988, surpluses achieved by local authority direct labour/service organisations in England for the financial years 1992–93 and 1993–94. [23323]

Mr. Curry: Some 2,074—87.1 per cent.—of the 2,381 local authority direct service/labour organisation accounts for 1993–94 received by my Department recorded surpluses. A detailed list has been placed in the Library of the House. Lists for 1992–93 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Sulphur Emissions

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is in a position to issue new sulphur emissions allocations under the national plan to large combustion plant in the other industry sector. [24262]

Mr. Atkins: The EC large combustion plant directive requires member states to draw up programmes for the progressive reduction of total annual emissions from existing plants of sulphur dioxide and oxides of nitrogen with the aim of complying with the ceilings and percentage reductions laid down in the directive. The UK national plan for meeting these commitments was made in 1990. Existing large combustion plant are, under the plan, grouped into three sectors: electricity supply, refineries, and the remaining plant grouped together as "other industry".

In the other industry sector it was expected that the replacement of existing plant with new plant would over time lead to a reduction in the sector allocations for permitted levels of $SO_2$ emissions. This reduction has taken place more slowly than anticipated. As a result, forward allocations for 1996 exceeded the sector total in the national plan. Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, which has responsibility for allocating the sector total between sites, therefore consulted last year on a revised method of allocation. Following that consultation, Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution has today issued revised allocations to sites in England and Wales for 1996, 1997 and 1998.

The existing national plan is likely to be superseded in due course by a wider national strategy aimed at delivering the UK's commitment under the second United Nations Economic Commission for Europe sulphur protocol. The targets under the protocol for an 80 per cent. reduction over 1980 levels in $SO_2$ emissions from all sources by 2010 are likely to require some reduction in the existing national plan targets for total emissions in 1999 and subsequent years. We hope to consult later in the year on proposals for the new national strategy.

Climate Change Programme

Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he will take to enhance the climate change programme following the recent announcement concerning the fossil fuel levy. [24305]

Mr. Gummer: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has announced that he proposes to privatise parts of Nuclear Electric during 1996, and at the same time to end payments from the fossil fuel levy to the company, ahead of the original schedule. Our climate change programme and recently published forecasts assumed the original schedule for the termination of these payments.

Early termination will mean that electricity prices will fall sooner than anticipated, which may result in some corresponding increase in the output of carbon dioxide in the short term. I am determined to ensure that we sustain momentum for increased energy efficiency, and continue to give the strong lead we have established internationally on climate change, most recently at the first conference of parties to the climate change convention in Berlin. I am therefore pleased to announce that I shall make available to the Energy Saving Trust an additional £25 million a year to promote energy efficiency measures, from 1996 until the gas and electricity markets are fully liberalised.

Following my earlier announcement of support for its running costs, the Energy Saving Trust is currently drawing up new plans. I intend to invite the trust to use the coming year to prepare a number of cost-effective proposals for my consideration. I will make money available for the best ones within the £25 million ceiling.

I shall be looking for innovative pump-priming schemes involving all fuels, which require funding to get started and which are designed to take advantage of and enhance the effectiveness of the developing competitive markets for energy and energy services. I shall be looking for a positive emphasis on demand-side management measures and on the development of energy services companies.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Historical Documents

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what advice he gives to Departments concerning the training of persons with responsibility for assessing the historical significance of documents held in those Departments. [23180]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Guidance is issued by the Keeper of Public Records. Section 3(2) of the Public Records Act 1958 prescribes that every person responsible for public records shall perform his duties under such guidance, which is detailed in the Public Record Office's "Manual of Records Administration".

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what special training is given to persons who have responsibility for assessing the historical significance of documents held by his Department. [23283]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Training in assessing the historical significance of departmental records is carried out under the guidance of the Keeper of Public Records. It is provided in a number of different ways, including courses on the appraisal of records and through conferences and seminars arranged by the Public Record Office.

Female Poll Tax and Fine Defaulters

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many cases of women being gaoled for poll tax and fine default have had those convictions ruled unlawful in the High Court since 1989. [23151]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The question concerns a specific operational matter on which the chief executive of the Court Service is best placed to provide an answer and I have accordingly asked the chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from M. Huebner to Ms Janet Anderson, dated 10 May 1995:

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, has asked me to reply to your question about the number of convictions which have been ruled unlawful by the High Court involving women gaoled for poll tax and fine default.

I am sorry to have to tell you that this information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

State Papers

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the official definition of a state paper. [22935]

Mr. John M. Taylor: I understand the expression "State Papers" to signify those papers which are created or acquired by Ministers, officials or other Crown servants by virtue of the office they hold under, or their service to, the Crown. Whether or not the Crown can claim ownership of any wider class of papers will depend on the circumstances of the case.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department in what circumstances state papers are permitted to be held in private hands. [22936]

Mr. John M. Taylor: State papers are normally held by the Crown. In very rare circumstances, they may be held in private hands, normally when permission has exceptionally been given to a former Minister or public servant to retain possession of them. Examples of such circumstances are given in part 1 of the report of the Committee of Privy Counsellors on Ministerial Memoirs, Cmnd 6386, also known as the Radcliffe committee.

Solicitors

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what action he plans to take in respect of solicitors who persuade criminals to take civil cases against the police. [22732]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Solicitors are duty bound to act in the best interests of and on the instructions of their clients and, subject to means and eligibility tests, will apply for legal aid to take or defend actions where appropriate on behalf of their clients.

Legal Aid

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will take urgent action to limit legal aid in fraud cases to a maximum of £10,000. [22742]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lord Chancellor has recently announced the proposals he intends to take forward following the consultation paper on legal aid for the apparently wealthy. The Lord Chancellor will issue a Green Paper on the future of legal aid very soon. That will address the provision of legal aid in both civil and criminal cases.

Leasehold

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what effect the recent leasehold valuation tribunal decision on the Westminster Grosvenor estate will have on recent legislation providing for leasehold enfranchisement; and if he will make a statement. [23345]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: I have been asked to reply.

The Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993 enables leasehold valuation tribunals to approve estate management schemes, if the tribunal is satisfied that this is in the general interest having regard to the matters specified in the Act. The Grosvenor estate, Mayfair, applied for a scheme, and following a hearing the tribunal approved it. I understand that this decision is being appealed to the Lands Tribunal.

HEALTH

Mental Health Care

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the amount spent per head of the population on NHS mental health care in London, Manchester, Birmingham, Liverpool and Newcastle in each year since 1991. [21916]

Mr. Bowis: Figures are shown in the table. Comparable figures are not available prior to 1991–92.

| | 1991–92 £ | 1992—93 £ | 1993–94 £ |
|---|---|---|---|
| London | 60.05 | 65.00 | 63.46 |
| Newcastle | 88.64 | 70.00 | 71.74 |
| Birmingham | 47.11 | 51.95 | 52.10 |
| Manchester | 61.84 | 72.92 | 51.93 |
| Liverpool | 33.51 | 41.03 | 47.37 |

Sources:
1. Annual financial returns of health authorities.
2. Mid-year population estimates.

Notes:
1. Figures for 1993–94 are provisional.
2. Figures are for services purchased by district health authorities and do not include expenditure by general practitioner fundholders.
3. Figures do not include expenditure on services for people with learning disabilities.

In addition, of course, local authorities in these cities would also incur expenditure as a result of their responsibilities for the care of mentally ill people.

Serious Bowel Disease

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) on what date Ministers were first informed of the research project recently reported in The Lancet, into possible links between immunisation for measles and serious bowel disease; [22624]

(2) on what date Ministers were first informed of the findings of the research project recently reported in The Lancet, into possible links between immunisation for measles and serious bowel disease. [22625]

Mr. Sackville: The chief medical officer was first informed of the scope of the Royal Free hospital school of medicine work which was reported in The Lancet recently in September 1994. At that point, he sought advice from national and international experts. In January 1995, the Department of Health convened a meeting at which the preliminary results of the Royal Free work were discussed. At that meeting, attended by independent experts, work was also presented on other possible factors in the causation of serious bowel disease including other infectious agents.

Tobacco

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will provide tables showing for each 5p between 5p and £1, her estimate of the effect on consumption of an increase in the purchase price of an average (a) packet of 20 cigarettes, (b) 250 g of hand-rolling tobacco, (c) packet of five cigars and (d) 250 g of pipe tobacco. [22991]

Mr. Sackville: The Department does not hold figures on the effect of price on the consumption of specific tobacco products holding a minor share of the market, such as hand-rolling tobacco, cigars or pipe tobacco. However, studies have shown that a 10 per cent. increase in the price of tobacco products can be expected to lead to a drop of between 3 per cent. and 6 per cent. in consumption. Working on the basis of this relationship the effect of price increases on a packet of cigarettes costing £2.70 would be as follows:

| Increase in price | Percentage decrease in consumption Per cent. |
|---|---|
| 5p | 0.6—1.1 |
| 10p | 1.2—2.2 |
| 15p | 1.6—3.2 |
| 20p | 2.1—4.2 |
| 25p | 2.6—5.2 |
| 30p | 3.1—6.1 |
| 35p | 3.6—7.1 |
| 40p | 4.1—8.0 |
| 45p | 4.5—8.8 |
| 50p | 5.0—9.7 |
| 55p | 5.4—10.6 |
| 60p | 5.8—11.3 |
| 65p | 6.3—12.1 |
| 70p | 6.7—12.9 |
| 75p | 7.1—13.7 |
| 80p | 7.5—14.4 |
| 85p | 7.9—15.1 |
| 90p | 8.3—15.9 |
| 95p | 8.7—16.6 |
| 100p | 9.0—17.2 |

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on her most recent assessment of the relationship between cigarette advertising and the level of smoking-related illness. [22672]

Mr. Sackville: In 1992, the Department of Health reviewed all the available evidence on the effect of tobacco advertising on tobacco consumption. The findings were published as a discussion document, "Effect of Tobacco Advertising on Tobacco Consumption", copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is her Department's assessment of the relationship of the price of tobacco products to health. [23002]

Mr. Sackville: Studies show that a 10 per cent. increase in the price of tobacco products would be expected to lead to a reduction in consumption of between 3 per cent. and 6 per cent. Since tobacco consumption is harmful to health, increases in price can therefore be expected to have a beneficial effect on health.

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she last discussed, and when she next plans to discuss, tobacco pricing with a (a) European Union health ministers and (b) Group of Seven member country Health Ministers; and if she will make a statement. [22954]

Mr. Sackville: The European Community Health Council last discussed smoking at its meeting on 22 December 1994, including the importance of price in reducing tobacco consumption. There is no specific date for the next discussion, although this issue is regularly raised at meetings between Ministers and other European Health Ministers. Indirect taxation issues are of course a matter for Finance Ministers.

There have been no meeting of the Group of Seven member country Health Ministers, nor are any planned.

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the percentage of the population by (a) age, (b) sex and (c) socio-economic grouping consuming each different type of tobacco product for each year since 1965; and if she will give her estimate of levels of consumption for the current year among each of these groups. [22992]

Mr. Sackville: The available data will be placed in the Library.

The tables give the percentage of adults estimated to smoke cigarettes, cigars and pipes and of under-16s estimated to smoke cigarettes. Data on other types of tobacco products are not available.

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many representations she has received in the last year concerning the effect of the price of tobacco products on levels of consumption; how many have been in favour of (a) an increase and (b) a decrease in price; and if she will list the representations received. [22953]

Mr. Sackville: Tobacco taxation policy is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The available records show that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health received 12 letters on this subject in the last year. Six of the correspondents were in favour of price increases, four wished to see no further rise, while the remaining two suggested that price rises would not achieve any reduction in consumption.

NHS Staff Retirement

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total of NHS staff (a) retiring on pension and (b) taking early retirements on pension for each of the last 10 years; and what was the annual cost of early retirements in each of the last 10 years. [22739]

Mr. Sackville: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the NHS Pensions Agency under its chief executive, Mr. A. F. Cowan. I have asked him to reply to the hon. Member.

Letter from A. F. Cowan to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 11 May 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question as it falls within my area of responsibility.

A breakdown of the figures in the format requested is not available. We are however able to provide the following information:

Age retirements over the last 4 years:

Age Retirements

| Year | Number |
|---|---|
| 1991–92 | 11,734 |
| 1992–93 | 12,774 |
| 1993–94 | 9,635 |
| 1994–95 | 11,364 |

Ill-health retirements over the last 4 years:

Ill-health Retirements

| Year | Number |
|---|---|
| 1991–92 | 7,387 |
| 1992–93 | 8,381 |
| 1993–94 | 8,613 |
| 1994–95 | 8,484 |

Early retirements over the last 4 years:

Early retirements

| Year | Number |
|---|---|
| 1991–92 | 3,108 |
| 1992–93 | 4,033 |
| 1993–94 | 6,318 |
| 1994–95 | 5,564 |

The value of early retirements including ill-health retirements to the scheme over the last 3 years is:

| Year | £ million |
|---|---|
| 1992–93 | 137.291 |
| 1993–94 | 158.827 |
| 1994–95 | 211.383 |

GP Fundholding

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what guidelines she has issued to general practitioner fundholders regarding the assessment of a patient's needs as medical or social; [22693]

(2) what guidelines she has issued to general practitioner fundholding practices regarding the maintenance of respite care provided by general practitioners. [22695]

Mr. Malone: The explanatory booklet "General Practitioners and Caring for People", issued in October 1992, provided guidance for general practitioners on the implications of the community care reforms. In addition, HSG(95)8 sets out NHS responsibilities, including those of fundholding GPs for meeting continuing health care needs. Fundholding GPs do not purchase respite care other than through the total purchasing pilot projects, where fundholding GPs work in partnership with health authorities to purchase the full range of health care for their patients.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many general practitioner fundholders employed community psychiatric nurses in each of the last five years; [22845]

(2) how many general practitioner fundholders employed health visitors in each of the last five years; [22846]

(3) how many health visitors were employed by general practitioner fundholding practices in each of the last five years. [22847]

Mr. Malone: None. Fundholding general practitioners do not directly employ nurses providing these services. Fundholding general practitioners may contract for these services with an established national health service provider of community nursing services or with a provider of community mental health services.

Liver Complaints

Mr. Critchley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to increase the number of specialist intensive care units for liver complaints. [23077]

Mr. Sackville: None. Specialist units for treating liver failure are provided under the supra-regional arrangements. They are funded centrally to meet the level and quality of service required.

Newham General Hospital

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will request the East London and City health authority, or other appropriate body, to conduct an inquiry related to the relevant parts of the Medical Act 1983, into the participation by a theatre assistant in an operation at Newham general hospital conducted earlier this year. [23119]

Mr. Malone: This is a matter for Newham Healthcare national health service trust. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mrs. Rosemary Walters, chairman of the trust, for details.

Children in Care

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in how many cases the children of women serving custodial sentences for fine defaulting have been taken into care since 1989. [23152]

Mr. Bowis: This information is not available centrally.

Junior Doctors' Hours

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many junior doctors and dentists, by region, remain outside the current new deal limits for contracted hours in on-call posts; and if she will make a statement. [24261]

Mr. Malone: The new deal on junior doctors' hours, a copy of which is in the Library, currently requires that no junior doctor or dentist should be contracted for an average of more than 72 hours a week in a hard-pressed post. At 8 February 1995, the returns from the eight regions in England were as follows:

Hard-pressed on-call posts contracted for more than 72 hours a week

| Region | March 1994 | September 1994 | February 1995 |
|---|---|---|---|
| Northern and Yorkshire | 1,433 | 878 | 162 |
| Trent | 342 | 175 | 60 |
| Anglia and Oxford | 517 | 306 | 189 |
| North Thames | 1,094 | 773 | 178 |
| South Thames | 879 | 411 | 95 |
| South and West | 452 | 148 | 20 |
| West Midlands | 529 | 293 | 67 |
| North West | 1,291 | 801 | 0 |
| Total | 6,537 | 3,785 | 771 |

Since March 1994 there has been a fall of over 88 per cent., from 6,537 to 771, in the number of hard-pressed on-call posts contracted for more than 72 hours a week. Over 96 per cent. of the present total of 27,669 junior doctors and dentists now comply with the current new deal contracted hours targets.

This is excellent progress, showing that the rate at which we are eliminating these posts more than doubled in the four months to February this year. Hospitals, supported by our task forces, have made enormous strides in confronting the problem of long hours and I am very grateful to them.

While we must remain firmly focused on tackling the hard-core of problem posts remaining, I believe we have now succeeded in establishing a ceiling on contracted hours which will help us to press on with further improvements.

The progress we are making is most encouraging, but there is no room for complacency. We know that more work is still needed to crack the problem and there are still too many juniors who are under pressure to work too long. The Government are absolutely committed to ensuring that juniors get real and lasting benefits from the new deal.

Epilepsy

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what representations she has had regarding National Epilepsy Week; what financial support her Department has given and will be giving to National Epilepsy Week; and if she will make a statement; [22844]

(2) pursuant to her answer to the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) of 17 January, Official Report, column 576, what progress her Department is making with any new initiatives for people with epilepsy; and if she will make a statement. [22920]

Mr. Bowis: Since January of this year, the Department of Health has been working with the voluntary sector on an epilepsy initiative which includes National Epilepsy Week. We will officially launch the week on 15 May and we have commissioned a series of posters to publicise the Week and to raise awareness of epilepsy generally. During the week we are sponsoring a large multidisciplinary conference, on epilepsy in London.

These events are only part of the Government's current initiative. We have so far provided £144,000 for voluntary organisation projects over the next three years and £95,000 for two innovative epilepsy service development projects. The Joint Epilepsy Council is producing a booklet for young people with epilepsy and the Royal College of General Practitioners is working on new guidelines, on epilepsy, for general practitioners.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 9 March, Official Report, column 320, how many of the 96 products licensed for the treatment of epilepsy between 1991 and 1995 were (a) new chemical entity products, (b) variations on existing products and (c) products that received a product licence, parallel import; and if she will place the names of the 96 products in the Library. [22921]

Mr. Sackville: Records from the Medicines Control Agency show that of the 96 products licensed for the treatment of epilepsy between 1991 and 1995, eight were new chemical entities, 69 were variations, through abridged licences, on existing products and 19 were products that received a product licence, parallel import.

A list of the information requested will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 9 March, Official Report, column 320, how many of the 90 products licensed for the treatment of epilepsy between 1985 and 1990 were (a) new chemical entity products, (b) variations on existing products and (c) products that received a product licence, parallel import; and if she will place the names of the 90 products in the Library. [22922]

Mr. Sackville: Records from the Medicines Control Agency show that, of the 90 products licensed for the treatment of epilepsy between 1985 and 1990, one was a new chemical entity product, 30 were variations, through abridged licences, on existing products and 59 were products that received a product licence, parallel import.

A list of the information requested will be placed in the Library.

Child Protection

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was spent on child protection training for general practitioners in each of the last five years (a) by health authority and (b) as a percentage of the overall training budget. [22848]

Mr. Malone: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health who represents general practitioner fundholders on area child protection committees. [22849]

Mr. Bowis: The exact composition of an area child protection committee is a matter to be agreed locally. Government guidance, contained in "Working Together Under the Children Act 1989: A Guide to Arrangements for Inter-Agency Co-operation for the Protection of Children from Abuse", is that general practitioners should be represented by the general practitioner representative(s) of the local medical committee(s). Copies of the guidance are available in the Library.

National Blood Authority

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she now expects the NBA to submit to her its proposals for reorganisation of the national blood transfusion service; and if she will place in the Library a copy of the NBA proposals. [23423]

Mr. Sackville: The National Blood Authority will make its final recommendations shortly. A copy of the authority's published proposals will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what contingency planning on the part of the NBA to implement amalgamation of blood centres and changes to present arrangements for the production and testing of blood products she has authorised. [23424]

Mr. Sackville: The National Blood Authority was set up in April 1993 to be responsible for the strategic management of the national blood service with a view to enhancing its quality and cost efficiency. Specific changes are a matter for consideration by the National Blood Authority.

Privatisation

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she will make a statement on the inclusion of privatisation as one of her priorities and key challenges for 1995–96 to 1997–98; [22763]

(2) what factors led to the addition of privatisation as a priority in the 1995 departmental report; [22765]

(3) what services she has prioritised for privatisation in 1995–96 to 1997–98. [22764]

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 9 may 1995]: The Department is committed to securing the best value for money available for its internal running costs. Its "Priorities and Key Challenges 1995–96—1997–98"—repeated in the "1995 Departmental Report"—includes privatisation as well as market testing and purchasing among the range of techniques available to secure this. This is in line with the White Paper "Continuity and Change", Cm 2627.

A prior options review recommended the privatisation of the non-core business of the National Health Service Estates agency. Ministers have accepted this recommendation and a scoping study is now under way to consider the extent of the business that might be included. There are no other privatisations planned.

Waiting Lists

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the percentage change in the average length of time waiting list patients stay in hospital in 1982–83 and 1992–93. [22777]

Mr. Malone [holding answer 9 May 1995]: Estimates show that the average length of stay in hospital for patients admitted from waiting lists reduced by 41 per cent. between 1982–83 and 1992–93, from 8.7 days to 5.1 days.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Cinemas

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what information he has on the structure of ownership of cinemas in the United Kingdom. [23604]

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the recent report of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on the supply of films for exhibition in cinemas in the United Kingdom, which provides detailed information about the pattern of such ownership. Copies are available in the Library of the House.

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations he has received about the future pattern of ownership of cinemas in the United Kingdom. [23605]

Mr. Dorrell: None.

Equal Opportunities

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what progress has been made within his Department on equal opportunities matters. [21486]

Mr. Sproat: After initial consultation with staff through formal working parties, my Department published in November 1994 an equal opportunities policy statement and an equal opportunities action plan for 1994–95. The policy statement and action plan are consistent with government policy and have recently been updated to reflect the considerable progress made in this area. The documents underline the Department's commitment to be an equal opportunities employer.

Tourism

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) what programmes analysis review has been carried out as the value of the expenditure of public money on promoting tourism; [22529]

(2) what contribution is made from public funds to the promotion of tourism in the United Kingdom; for what public purpose or purposes; and if he will publish the available evidence on the return produced. [22522]

Mr. Dorrell: This financial year the combined grant in aid allocation to the British Tourist Authority and the national tourist boards for England, Northern Ireland, Wales and Scotland is close to £90 million. In addition, local authorities in England spend some £62.7 million annually on direct tourism promotion.

The British Tourist Authority and the English tourist board have evaluation studies attached to all their major programmes. Although it is extremely difficult to establish the link between tourist board activity and tourist spend, research undertaken on behalf of the BTA indicates that its activities may stimulate as much as £10 in incremental revenue per £1 spent.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is his assessment of proposals made by the British Tourist Authority's VAT working group's report for a reduction in the level of value added tax levied on the accommodation sector. [22947]

Mr. Dorrell: The report does not take account of all the different costs to business in other member states and therefore I believe does not demonstrate that UK tourism operators are placed at an overall competitive disadvantage because of the level of VAT alone. The Government are working with the industry on a range of measures to improve the competitiveness of British tourism.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations he has made to other Departments with regard to the report prepared by the British Tourist Authority's VAT working party. [22948]

Mr. Dorrell: My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has received a copy of the final report and is aware of the industry's views.

Churchill Papers

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage in what circumstances historians and others wanting to use the Churchill papers, following their purchase for the state, will have to pay a copyright fee; to whom such copyright proceeds would go; what is the estimated amount of such proceeds per annum; and if he will make a statement. [22447]

Mr. Dorrell: Anyone wishing to use the Churchill papers for commercial purposes will need to seek permission from the copyright owners. Copyright in the non-state papers is vested in the Churchill family; copyright in the state papers is vested in the Crown. The proceeds go to the copyright owners; it is not possible to estimate the amount per annum of such proceeds as this is entirely dependent upon the use made of the papers.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make a statement on his consultations with the national heritage memorial fund in respect of the decision to purchase the Churchill papers. [22448]

Mr. Dorrell: Under the National Lottery etc. Act 1993, the national heritage memorial fund is responsible for distributing 20 per cent. of the net proceeds from the national lottery for expenditure on or connected with the national heritage. Individual funding decisions on applications are made entirely independently of Government. However, once the NHMF had reached its decision to fund the purchase of the non-state papers in the archive, the Government chose to transfer the state papers in the archive to Churchill college in order that it be retained intact for the nation.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many items in the Churchill papers recently purchased (a) are state papers, (b) are private papers and (c) have been the subject of dispute as to whether they are state or private. [22934]

Mr. Dorrell: The Government are of the view that none of the papers recently purchased by the national heritage memorial fund was a state paper.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will list the state papers or classes of state papers which Her Majesty's Government have given to Churchill college and the Churchill archive. [22946]

Mr. Dorrell: The classes of state papers transferred to the Churchill college by the Crown were those listed as "official" in the catalogue of the Chartwell papers which is available at Churchill college, Cambridge and in the national register of archives, Chancery lane. They include papers relating to Sir Winston Churchill's appointments as Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, President of the Board of Trade, Home Secretary, First Lord of the Admiralty, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Minister of Munitions, Secretary of State for War and Air, Colonial Secretary, Chancellor of the Exchequer and Prime Minister, and to the Cabinet, War Council, War Cabinet and Committee of Imperial Defence.

The remaining classes in the catalogue also contain a number of state papers; ownership of these was transferred at the same time.

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many, and what proportion of, vacancies advertised by his Department, and by each of his Department's agencies, in the last three years have listed the attainment of NVQs as an acceptable entry requirement; and, of those, how many have required (i) level 1 NVQs, (ii) level 2 NVQs, (iii) level 3 NVQs and (iv) other level NVQs. [22981]

Mr. Dorrell: The Department of National Heritage does little direct recruitment which necessitates advertising vacancies. However, the Department has conducted two recruitment schemes for administrative assistants in the last three years. In both cases, the entry requirement was stated as two GCSEs or equivalent qualification. The NVQ business administration level 1 was accepted as an equivalent qualification.

The Historic Royal Palaces agency and the Royal Parks agency have not so far specified that candidates must possess NVQs for any job vacancies advertised. However, where a NVQ was held which was clearly linked to levels of skills, competencies or experience required for a particular post, it would be taken into account and accepted in place of other equivalent qualifications.

National Lottery

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is his policy on the extent to which funds from the national lottery should be evenly distributed over the United Kingdom (a) on an annual basis and (b) over a longer period. [23261]

Mr. Dorrell: The net proceeds from the national lottery will be distributed by independent bodies according to the merits of each individual application. The Government have made it clear that they expect to see a fair distribution of lottery proceeds across the United Kingdom taking into account the relative merits of the projects submitted for approval.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage to what extent the organisations to which he gives directions under section 26 of the National Lottery etc. Act 1993 have regard to previous successful applications when considering subsequent applications from the same area. [23264]

Mr. Dorrell: The 11 bodies responsible for the distribution of the net proceeds of the national lottery will consider all projects on their individual merits.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will require the organisations to which he gives directions under section 26 of the National Lottery etc. Act to publish the criteria they apply in distributing national lottery funds. [23262]

Mr. Dorrell: Under directions issued under section 26(3) of the National Lottery etc. Act 1993, the distributing bodies are obliged to publish and regularly update guidance for potential applicants for grants. Copies of the guidance documents published to date—all of which include the criteria against which they will assess applications—have been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will review the rules governing the release of information concerning bids for lottery money in so far at this may happen in election periods. [22805]

Mr. Dorrell: There are no special rules to the release of information concerning bids for lottery money during election periods. As is the case throughout the public service, the lottery distributing bodies are expected to take particular care during election periods to ensure that their actions are politically impartial.

Digital Terrestrial Television

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when he expects digital terrestrial television to become available in the United Kingdom. [23179]

Mr. Dorrell: Digital terrestrial television could become available in the United Kingdom by 1997.

Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what costs his Department has incurred during the last 12 months as a result of cloning of mobile telephones being utilised by his Department, with particular reference to the making of unauthorised calls. [23485]

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 9 May 1995]: My Department has incurred no charges due to the cloning of mobile telephones.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what steps his Department has taken to prevent the cloning of telephones being utilised by his Department; and if his Department has discussed this matter with any official agencies. [23459]

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 9 May 1995]: My Department has converted all mobile telephones from analogue to digital. This is in line with advice received from official sources.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations his Department has made to the Department of Trade and Industry concerning the need for legislation to prevent the cloning of mobile telephones. [23472]

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 9 May 1995]: My Department has made no representations to the DTI on this matter.

SCOTLAND

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many, and what proportion of, vacancies advertised by his Department, and by each of his Department's agencies, in the last three years have listed the attainment of NVQs as an acceptable entry requirement; and, of those, how many have required (i) level 1 NVQs, (ii) level 2 NVQs, (iii) level 3 NVQs and (iv) other level NVQs. [22972]

Mr. Lang: My Department and agencies do not specifically list Scottish vocational qualifications—the Scottish equivalent to NVQs—in their recruitment advertisements, but they make it clear that candidates with qualifications equivalent to any listed are eligible to apply.

A78

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his document "Local Government Reform, Shaping the Trunk Road Network: The Government's Response", if he will make a statement on the trunking of three-mile non-trunk section of the A78 south of Greenock town centre. [23293]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 9 May 1995]: One of the criteria for establishing the new trunk road network was to provide the road user with a coherent and continuous system of routes which serve destinations of importance to industry, commerce, agriculture and tourism. Taking into account responses to the published draft proposals and the commercial role performed by the A78, the Government concluded that the A78 should remain part of the new trunk road network and to ensure continuity of this route decided the section of the A78 south of Greenock town centre, which is presently a local road, should be trunked.

A statutory instrument for negative resolution will be prepared and laid before Parliament to give effect to trunking and detrunking proposals across the existing Scottish road network and will include provision to trunk this section of the A78.

Primary Schools

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the expenditure per (a) primary school and (b) primary school pupil in real and constant price terms in every year since 1979; and what are the corresponding figures excluding staffing costs. [23394]

Lord James Douglas Hamilton: Information on annual budgeted expenditure for each primary school in Scotland, and per pupil for each such school, is contained in reports published annually since 1993 by the audit unit of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools. A copy of the most recent report—"Scottish Schools: Cost 1993–94 and 1994–95"—has been placed in the Library.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on how many occasions during the last five years (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers in his Department or its agencies have declared conflicts of interest; and how many instructions have been issued about their retention, disposal or management. [21382]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 1 May 1995]: All staff are required to comply with the civil service management code and the Department's staff manual. Comprehensive records are not collected centrally, but where potential conflicts are identified involving staff, including special advisers, arrangements are made to ensure that no actual conflict arises.

Meat Inspections

Mr. Dalyell: To as the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what considerations underlie the requirements (a) for a vet to pass deer as fit for slaughter and (b) a meat inspector to pass venison as fit for consumption before sale; what aspects of inspection prior to slaughter which are undertaken by a vet could not appropriately be undertaken by a meat inspector; and if he will seek to amend EC regulations in this area. [21442]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 9 May 1995]: The EC legislation and our national implementing regulations require all fresh meat, including farmed venison, to be produced under the supervision of an official veterinary surgeon. The Government support the principle of veterinary responsibility for meat hygiene and inspection and have consistently argued for flexibility in the EC legislation to make maximum use of qualified meat inspectors working under the responsibility of the official veterinary surgeon in all aspects of meat inspection and hygiene control.

Where young deer are slaughtered at an abattoir, ante-mortem inspection may be carried out by a meat inspector answerable to the official veterinary surgeon. We will discuss with the Meat Hygiene Service and with interested organisations whether it would be appropriate to review the arrangements for ante-mortem inspection of deer slaughtered on farm, which is normally carried out by the farmer's own veterinary surgeon.

Birds of Prey

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the number and species of birds of prey poisoned in each year since 1987. [22365]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 9 May 1995]: The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food co-ordinates the wildlife incident investigation scheme which monitors the effect of pesticides on wildlife and domestic animals. The following figures have been compiled from reports of deaths of birds of prey where pesticides have been confirmed as the likely cause. The figures relate to incidents reported in Great Britain. In order to reduce the risks to wildlife, the Ministry has mounted a campaign against illegal poisoning in collaboration with a number of interested organisations.

| Year | Total (number of incidents) | Species |
|---|---|---|
| 1987 | 20 | Species include Kestrels, Sparrow Hawks, Barn Owls and Buzzards |
| 1988 | 26 | 12 Buzzards1 Peregrine Falcon1 Hen Harrier2 Sparrow Hawks5 Tawny Owls4 Golden Eagles1 Harris Hawk |
| 1989 | 43 | 22 Buzzards1 Golden Eagle3 Peregrine Falcons12 Red Kites4 Sparrow Hawks1 Kestrel |
| 1990 | 36 | 24 Buzzards3 Golden Eagles2 Red Kites2 Hen Harriers4 Sparrow Hawks1 Kestrel |

| Year | Total (number of incidents) | Species |
|---|---|---|
| 1991 | 28 | 4 Owls16 Buzzards2 Red Kites1 Golden Eagle1 Hen Harrier2 Kestrels2 Peregrine Falcons |
| 1992 | 34 | 19 Buzzards1 Goshawk1 Hen Harrier2 Kestrels2 Sparrow Hawks6 Red Kites1 Golden Eagle2 Peregrine Falcons |
| 1993 | 32 | 22 Buzzards1 Golden Eagle5 Red Kites1 Hen Harrier1 Sparrow Hawk1 Merlin1 Owl |

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Olner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was his Department's official response to the legal opinions obtained by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals on the live export of veal calves; and if he will make a statement. [22892]

Mrs. Browning: My right hon. Friend informed the House in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Streeter) on 22 February Official Report, columns 276–86, that consideration of the RSPCA's latest legal advice was under way; that process is still on-going.

Historical Documents

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what special training is given to persons who have responsibility for assessing the historical significance of documents held by his Department. [23274]

Mr. Jack: Training in assessing the historical significance of departmental records is carried out under the guidance of the Keeper of Public Records. It is provided in a number of different ways, including courses on the appraisal of records and through conferences and seminars arranged by the Public Record Office. Additionally, reviewers receive desk training from visiting Public Record Office staff who constantly monitor appraisal criteria and decisions.

Brewing Industry

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the meetings he has had in the last three months with representatives of the brewing industry with the topics which were discussed at each meeting. [23271]

Mr. Jack: My right hon. Friend has met representatives of the brewing industry on four separate occasions over the last three months. A number of issues were discussed including issues relating to the single market.

Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what costs his Department has incurred during the last 12 months as a result of cloning of mobile telephones being utilised by his Department, with particular reference to the making of unauthorised calls. [23486]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 9 May 1995]: The Department has incurred no costs during the last 12 months as a result of cloning of mobile telephones. The service providers—Mercury and Vodac—met the cost in all known instances.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many mobile telephones being utilised by his Department have been cloned during the last 12 months. [23430]

Mr. Jack: There were seven known instances of mobile phone cloning during the last 12 months.

Religious Slaughter

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met representatives of the Jewish community, what was discussed, and if he will make a statement. [24308]

Mr. Waldegrave: I met the President of the Board of Deputies of British Jews and other representatives of the Jewish community on 30 March when Shechita—religious slaughter—was discussed in relation to the Welfare of Animals (Slaughter or Killing) Regulations 1995, SI 1995/731. I assured the president that the 1995 regulations maintain the legal protection for Shechita contained in the previous legislation.

Council directive 93/119/EC, on which the 1995 regulations are based, recognises the need to take account of the requirements of religious requirements such as Shechita. The Government accept that Shechita is a fundamental matter of religious belief to Jewish communities who are an important part of our national life and would oppose any moves to remove the right of the Jewish community to practise Shechita.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Indonesia

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 6 December 1994, Official Report, columns 118–20, if he will list the projects on which British aid to Indonesia was spent in the financial year 1991–92; and what was the value in each case. [23232]

Mr. Baldry: The information is as follows:

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on which date his Department first began funding Indonesian police officers (a) in Indonesia and (b) in the United Kingdom. [23235]

Mr. Baldry: We have been providing UK training awards for Indonesian national police officers since 1979 and meeting some of the costs of training courses in Indonesia since 1983.

Mrs Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 6 December 1994, Official Report, columns 118-120, if he will give the exact date of formal appraisal documents submitted by the Overseas Development Administration and the Department of Trade and Industry in respect of the aid and trade provision support for each project listed. [23251]

Mr. Baldry: I provided responses on two of the projects on the list previously in my answers on 10 January to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), Official Report, column 14, and on 1 March to the hon. Member for Cynon Valley, Official Report, column 574. Because the other projects on the list were generally approved some years ago, the information requested is not immediately available. I shall write to the hon. Lady when we have obtained it.

Land Mines

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much Her Majesty's Government contribute to United Nations programmes to clear mines in (a) Cambodia and (b) other countries; and if he will make a statement. [23100]

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 10 May 1995]: Since April 1992 we have contributed a total of £4.96 million to UN de-mining programmes. Of this, £2.133 million was for Cambodia, £2.5 million for Afghanistan, £226,000 for Angola and £100,000 for the Yemen. In addition, in March 1995 we paid £500,000 into the UN voluntary fund for mine clearance. We shall continue to consider UN requests as helpfully as possible.

Afghanistan

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 27 April, Official Report, column 638, when Her Majesty's Government will decide how much funding is to be made available to British non-governmental organisations for emergency aid to Afghan refugees and displaced persons for (a) rehabilitation and (b) other purposes. [23133]

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 10 May 1995]: I have nothing to add to my previous answer.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Exhibitions

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee if he has considered an application for an exhibition relating to women in science, engineering and technology to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Administration Committee, arrangements have been made for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from Monday 3 July to Friday 7 July 1995.

WALES

European Structural Funds

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy with regard to the provision of matching funds to help applications for assistance from the EU in Wales under objective 5b schemes. [23074]

Mr. Redwood: The objective 5b single programming document for rural Wales 1994–99 makes available European structural funds grants averaging some £23 million a year to support national public expenditure on projects averaging some £34 million and private sector contributions of around £5 million a year. These figures clearly demonstrates that, without substantial domestic expenditure to support projects, it would not be possible to utilise the structural funds grant resources being made available.

Funding for projects can come from a variety of sources including local authorities, Government agencies, training and enterprise councils and voluntary bodies as well as from my Department. It is for applicants to determine whom they should approach to seek funding for any project. Those approached for matching funding, including my Department, will need to satisfy themselves that there is no legal or other constraint to them providing such funding and consider, inter alia, the quality of the project, whether it represents good value for money and what other funding approaches they have received before deciding whether they wish to invest in the project.

Historical Documents

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what special training is given to persons who have responsibility for assessing the historical significance of documents held by his Department. [23275]

Mr. Redwood: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him today by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, Official Report, column 565.

Voluntary Organisations

Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to review the way in which his Department assists local support services for voluntary organisations. [24170]

Mr. Richards: I have today issued a consultation paper seeking comments on the effectiveness of current arrangements for delivering support services to voluntary organisations at local level. The paper also seeks views on the best way of channelling support from the Welsh Office to the organisations providing such services. I shall welcome comments from voluntary organisations throughout Wales, from those who have links with the voluntary sector and from the organisations which the Department currently funds. A copy of the consultation paper has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

EDUCATION

Inspection Training

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the cost of sending (a) a primary school teacher and (b) a secondary school teacher on additional inspector training; what is the cost of the place on the course and the additional cost of any supply teaching which has to be provided; and which body meets this cost; [23649]

(2) how many (a) primary and (b) secondary school teachers have attended additional inspector training this year. [23650]

Mr. Forth: These are matters for Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools, who heads the Office for Standards in Education. I have asked Mr. Chris Woodhead to write to the hon. Member.

Pupils

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will list for each local education authority (a) the proportion and (b) the number of pupils in grant-maintained (i) primary and (ii) secondary schools. [23651]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested is set out in the tables.

Note:

1. Pupil numbers are derived for the 1994 DFE schools census and include all secondary schools which are currently grant-maintained.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the number and percentage of pupils in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools in (i) January 1980, (ii) January 1991, (iii) January 1992, (iv) January 1993, (v) January 1994 and (vi) January 1995 being taught in classes of 30-plus in maintained schools (1) in each local education authority and (2) in total. [23653]

Mr. Robin Squire: Information on pupils in classes of size 31 and over in maintained primary and secondary schools for January 1980, 1991, 1992, 1993 and 1994 has been placed in the Library. Information for January 1995 will not be available until the autumn.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will list those schools which have been required to modify the admissions policy submitted as part of their proposals for grant-maintained status before having their application approved. [23652]

Mr. Robin Squire: This information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will list by local education authority the schools holding ballots on grant-maintained status since 1 January 1994, giving in each case (a) whether the outcome favoured or opposed grant-maintained status, (b) whether the governing body applied for a grant under section 36 of the Education Act 1993, (c) the maximum grant available and (d) the amount of grant (i) claimed and (ii) paid. [23654]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many (a) primary and (b) secondary schools held ballots on grant-maintained status; how many of each voted in favour of and against becoming grant-maintained; and if she will list the amount of eligible parents in each sector who (i) voted in favour, (ii) voted against and (iii) did not take part in the ballots for the years (1) 1 April 1993 to 31 March 1994 and (2) 1 April 1994 to 31 March 1995.

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested is set out in the table.

GM ballots

|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1 April 1993 to 31 March 1994 171 | 218,518 | 135,779 | 76,612 | 59,167 | 82,739 | 107 | 64 |
| 1 April 1994 to 31 March 1995 43 | 54,830 | 33,965 | 14,867 | 19,098 | 20,865 | 13 | 30 |

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the cost of funding (a) the GM information team and (b) the GM information line in (i) 1993–94 and (ii) 1994–95; and what are the budgets for 1995–96; [22790]

(2) how many staff are employed in staffing (a) the grant-maintained information team and (b) the grant-maintained information line. [22781]

Mr. Robin Squire: Currently there are 10 staff employed in the Department's grant-maintained schools information team, dealing with GM publications and organising Going GM conferences. The grant-maintained information line is staffed by members of the team.

The team's costs—including pay, superannuation, employers' national insurance contributions, accommodation, travel and administrative costs—were approximately £330,000 in 1993–94 and £410,000 in 1994–95; and it is estimated they will be some £420,000 in 1995–96. However, these figures are not wholly comparable because of changes in accounting arrangements between 1993–94 and 1994–95. Expenditure on the GM information line cannot be disaggregated from the Department's general telephone costs.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the cost to her Department of materials and staff involved in the campaign to persuade schools to opt for grant-maintained status. [22897]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department's information activities concerning grant-maintained schools are designed to provide factual, unbiased information, not to persuade schools to "opt-out". The total expenditure on GM publications, including videos, since 1988 is some £1,200,000. This represents spending of about 16p per pupil in England.

The grant-maintained schools information team was established during 1991-92. The team's costs—including pay, superannuation, employers' national insurance contributions, accommodation, travel and administrative costs—are estimated at approximately £330,000 in 1993–94 and £410,000 in 1994–95. These figures are not wholly comparable because of changes in internal accounting arrangements between the two years.

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will list by local education authority the grant-maintained secondary schools, indicating for each (a) the percentage of pupils entitled to receive free schools meals and (b) the percentage for the secondary sector in each local authority.

Mr. Robin Squire: A table showing the information requested has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the cost to her Department of the free video tapes outlining the advantages of opting for grant-maintained status which are provided to parents with children in schools balloting on opt-out proposals. [22898]

Mr. Robin Squire: The video "Our Children, Our Choice" provides factual information to those interested in grant-maintained status. It cost some £48,000 to produce and some £30,000 for the 20,000 copies made to date, giving a total cost of £78,000—£3.90 per tape.

Technology Colleges

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will list by local education authority the schools which have become technology colleges, together with details of the sponsorship agreed in each case. [23656]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested is set out in the table, with local education authorities listed alphabetically. Each technology college is supported by sponsorship totalling some £100,000. For most schools, this comprises support from several organisations or individuals. The table then indicates the largest sponsor by value pledged, or largest sponsors where two or more have each pledged the same value, as indicated in the school's application.

Teacher Training

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will estimate the number of hours which staff in her Department spend on issues relating to teacher training in (a) whole-time equivalents and (b) cost terms. [23637]

Mr. Robin Squire: The number of full-time equivalents working on issues relating to teacher training including teacher supply in the Department is 14.8. Each member of staff works a contractual 41-hour week. The cost of employing these staff during the financial year 1995–96 is estimated at £656,279.

Indonesian Students

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many Indonesian nationals studied in the United Kingdom in each year since 1980. [23234]

Mr. Boswell: The available information is shown in the following table.

Numbers of full-time students from Indonesia studying in further and higher education in the United Kingdom

| Academic year | Numbers |
|---|---|
| 1979–80 | 600 |

Administrative Staff

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education (1) if he will make a statement about the success of (a) North Yorkshire county council education department and (b) other county councils in England over the last five years in reducing the levels of managerial and administrative staff as a result of improved technology and the advent of local management of schools; [23174]

(2) what was the estimated percentage reduction in administrative staff in the education departments of county councils in England resulting from the introduction of local management of schools; and what was the actual percentage achieved; [23176]

(3) what assessment he has made of the effect of high-technology computer systems in the last five years on the establishment of managerial and administrative staff within the education departments of county councils; [23175]

(4) what reductions have been made in the last five years in the managerial and administrative staff of the education departments of county councils as a result of local management of schools; [23177]

(5) what changes of staff numbers in each of the education departments of county councils in England have occurred since the introduction of local management of schools. [22788]

Mr. Robin Squire: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) on 28 March 1995, Official Report, column 570.

Historical Documents

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what special training is given to persons who have responsibility for assessing the historical significance of documents held by her Department. [23289]

Mr. Robin Squire: Training in assessing the historical significance of departmental records is carried out under the guidance of the Keeper of Public Records. It is provided in a number of different ways, including courses on the appraisal of records and through conferences and seminars arranged by the Public Record Office.

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many, and what proportion of, vacancies advertised by her Department, and by each of her Department's agencies, in the last three years have listed the attainment of NVQs as an acceptable entry requirement; and, of those, how many have required (i) level 1 NVQs, (ii) level 2 NVQs, (iii) level 3 NVQs and (iv) other level NVQs. [22984]

Mr. Forth: The Department and its agency have held 19 recruitment competitions in the last three years of which three have listed the attainment of NVQs as an acceptable entry qualification. Of those, all have required NVQ level 1.

Further Education Funding Council

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education when she was consulted by the Further Education Funding Council on its decision to have the right not to disclose its deliberations; and what plans she has to review the council's provisions on the disclosure of information. [22680]

Mr. Boswell: Since its establishment, the Further Education Funding Council has published a bulletin after each council meeting, each committee with delegated authority and each regional committee meeting. The council has proposed to make the minutes and agendas of those meetings available in future. My right hon. Friend has no plans to review these procedures.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what discussions she has had with the Further Education Funding Council on the setting up of an independent panel to oversee the council; and if she will make a statement. [22684]

Mr. Boswell: My right hon. Friend is aware that the Further Education Funding Council is consulting on the possibility of establishing an independent panel to consider allegations of maladministration. This is a matter for the council.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will make a statement on the decision of the Further Education Funding Council not to disclose general advice given to her Department with particular reference to its implications for open govnerment. [22678]

Mr. Boswell: The Further Education Funding Council's policy is to make publicly available the substance of advice to my right hon. Friend except where my right hon. Friend has asked that advice should remain confidential.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will make a statement on the policy of the Further Education Funding Council not to publish individual items of expenditure below £20,000 in its annual report; and which other educational bodies observe this limit. [22686]

Mr. Boswell: Neither the FEFC, nor any of the non-departmental public bodies which the Department sponsors, is required by statute to publish details of individual items of expenditure. The FEFC's decision to publish details of contracts with values of over £20,000 demonstrates the council's openness and willingness to make information available to the public.

Each of the other educational non-departmental public bodies decides its own policy in this area. Practice varies, but none has adopted the FEFC's approach.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what criteria apply in terms of registrable financial interests in respect of the work of the Further Education Funding Council. [22587]

Mr. Boswell: The Further Education Funding Council is consulting on a code of individual conduct of council members, including a register of financial interests. The council intends to make the register publicly available. This is a matter for the council.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what plans she has to introduce legislation for the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration to act as the ombudsman for the Further Education Funding Council. [22685]

Mr. Boswell: None.

Publications

Mr. Pope: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what are the production and distribution costs of her Department's recent leaflet "National School Tests in 1995—a Parent's Guide"; and what is the circulation of the leaflet other than for schools. [22704]

Mr. Forth: The cost of producing 9 million copies of the leaflet "National School Tests in 1995—a Parent's Guide" is £140,000. In addition to schools, distribution routes included post offices and inserts in television listings magazines. Copies were also sent to a database of parents who have asked to receive our material, and will shortly be distributed through a number of retail outlets. In all, over 6 million copies will be in circulation, in addition to the 2.3 million copies requested by schools. The total distribution cost is estimated at some £273,000.

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what has been the total cost of (a) establishing and (b) administering the GM publications centre. [22791]

Mr. Robin Squire: The GM publications centre was established in January 1994. The costs to date are as follows:

| | Establishment £ | Administration £ |
|---|---|---|
| 1993–94 | 6,000 | 28,000 |
| 1994–95 | — | 124,000 |

The administration costs include handling the freephone requests and publications dispatch costs but do not include call charges.

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what has been the cost for 1994–95 for the publication and distribution of (a) "How to Become a Grant Maintained School", 1995 edition, (b) "Going Grant Maintained: A Brief Guide", (c) "Questions Parents Ask", (d) "Questions Staff Ask", (e) "Questions Governors Ask", (f) "Funding Worksheet 1995–96", (g) "Nursery Factsheet", (h) "Experiences of Primary Schools", (i) "Experiences of Secondary Schools", (j) "Experiences of Former Voluntary Schools", (k) "Our Children, Our Choice" and (l) "Going Grant Maintained with other schools: Grant Maintained clusters; and how many responses has she had to each of these publications (i) in total and (ii) from Nottinghamshire schools. [22782]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested is as follows:

| | Approximate publication cost 1994–95 £ | Responses September 1994–March 1995 |
|---|---|---|
| (a) "How to Become a GM School, 1995 edition | 24,000 | — |
| (b) "Going Grant-Maintained: A Brief Guide" | 6,000 | — |
| (c) "Questions Parents Ask" | 0 | 568 |
| (d) "Questions Staff Ask" | 7,600 | 483 |
| (e) "Questions Governors Ask" | 16,200 | 477 |
| (f) "Funding Worksheet 1995–96" | 11,500 | — |
| (g) "Nursery Factsheet" | 0 | 234 |
| (h) "Experiences of Primary Schools" | 55,000 | 496 |
| (i) "Experiences of Secondary Schools" | 55,000 | 357 |
| (j) "Experiences of Former Voluntary Schools" | 55,000 | 248 |
| (k) "Our Children, Our Choice" | 46,000 | 328 |
| (l) "Going Grant-Maintained with Other Schools: GM Clusters" | 12,500 | 285 |

Notes: 1. The above costs do not necessarily represent the full production and printing costs for these publications, but only those which were incurred during the 1994–95 financial year.

2. The total distribution cost for publications by the DFE GM publications centre in 1994–95 was some £124,000.

3. The Department does not keep records of how many people it is contacted by as a result of seeing these publications. The table shows how many orders for one or more copies of each publication were placed with the GM publications centre between September 1994 and March 1995 inclusive. Data on such inquiries were not collated before that time and are therefore not readily available.

4. It is not possible to specify how many orders were destined for Nottinghamshire schools.

5. Although costs were incurred in 1994–95 on the production of items (a), (b) and (f), these were not available for distribution to schools until the current financial year.

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the total cost of the publication and distribution of the letters and information concerning the annual consideration of grant-maintained status; and what was the specific cost of the packaging in which the information was sent. [22789]

Mr. Robin Squire: Final figures are not yet available, but the estimated total cost of producing and distributing these letters concerning the annual consideration of grant-maintained status, including the enclosed publications, is some £50,000. The cost of packaging was £3,000—some 12p per item. The letter and enclosures were sent to all chairmen of governors and chief education officers in England. Copies of the letter without the publications were sent to head teachers.

Further and Higher Education, Cumbria

Dr. John Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what percentage of west Cumbrian secondary school pupils gain (a) qualifications in further education and (b) qualifications in higher education; and what are the national averages. [22736]

Mr. Robin Squire: This information is not available.

Funding Appeals

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what plans she has to replace the present complaints procedure for an appeals process for funding. [22681]

Mr. Boswell: It is for the Further Education Funding Council to make arrangements for handling complaints about its decisions.

Research

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the share of her departmental budget set aside for research purposes. [22688]

Mr. Boswell: For 1994–95 over 6 per cent. of the Department's total expenditure was allocated for research and development. This included the Higher Education Funding Council's allocation to higher education institutions for research.

Public Bodies

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will list the supervisory educational bodies funded by her Department which do not disclose their deliberations. [22682]

Mr. Boswell: None of the Department's executive non-departmental public bodies currently publishes minutes of meetings.

Further Education Colleges

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if she will list the available information by which hon. Members are able to examine the financial viability of colleges in their constituencies. [22679]

Mr. Boswell: Under the financial memorandum between colleges and the Further Education Funding Council, colleges are required to keep proper accounts and accounting records, and to prepare a statement of accounts in respect of each financial year. Colleges are required to make reasonable arrangements to make copies of the accounts publicly available.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education to what extent colleges are penalised in their funding via the Further Education Funding Council if the institution fails to meet her growth targets. [22683]

Mr. Boswell: Details of the allocation of funding to colleges are matters for the Further Education Funding Council. I am therefore asking the council's chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Teachers' Pay

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many individual letters objecting to the Government's decision not to fund fully the pay rise for teachers from (a) hon. Members and (b) others her Department has received. [22603]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department has received around 1,500 letters from hon. Members and 15,000 from others on funding issues. Most of these refer either directly or indirectly to the funding of the teachers' pay award.

Class Sizes

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what assessment the Government have made of the effect of class size in state secondary schools on the education of children in those classes; what representations she has received on the subject from private schools; and what are the current average class sizes in the fifth form for (a) grant-maintained schools, (b) public schools, and (c) other independent schools and (d) other state schools. [22437]

Mr. Robin Squire: The accumulated research evidence has not demonstrated any simple or conclusive link between marginal changes in class size and pupil performance. What matters most is the quality of the teaching. I am unaware of any representation to my right hon. Friend from independent schools on the issue of class size.

The schools census provides limited information on class size by age. In January 1994 the average size of one-teacher classes for pupils mainly aged 14 and 15 was 21.2 for both maintained and grant-maintained secondary schools. Information on class size in independent schools is not collected by the Department.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Sir Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many males aged between 50 and 65 years are not in full-time employment, as defined by working over 16 hours per week. [22395]

Miss Widdecombe: The latest estimates from the labour force survey for autumn 1994 show that 1.8 million males agreed between 50 and 65 were not in full-time employment. Of these, 0.1 million worked 16 hours or less per week, 0.3 million were ILO unemployed and 1.4 million were economically inactive, a category which includes long-term sick and disabled and retirees.

Over three quarters of the economically inactive males—about 1.1 million people—included in this figure stated, in reply to the LFS, that they did not want a job.

Earnings

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the average weekly wage in each year since 1965. [22987]

Mr. Oppenheim: Information on the average weekly earnings of all full-time employees on adult rates of pay has been available only since 1983. The most convenient source is table 17 of recent reports of the new earnings survey. The 1994 report contains the information for 1984 to 1994 and the 1993 report that for 1983 to 1993. Table 16 contains information for males and females separately.

Between 1971 and 1983, the available information is for full-time men aged 21 and over and full-time women aged 18 and over. The information for 1974 to 1983 is in table 30 of the 1984 new earnings survey report and that for 1971 to 1973 is in table 15 of the 1980 report.

The available information for the years between 1955 and 1968 is in tables 54 and 55 of "British Labour Statistics Historical Abstract 1986–1968".

Copies of the publications are available in the Library.

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what has been the average weekly wage for (a) part-time male employees and (b) part-time female employees in each socio-economic group in each year since 1865; [22989]

(2) what has been the average weekly wage for (a) full-time male employees and (b) full-time female employees in each socio-economic group in each year since 1965. [23001]

Mr. Oppenheim: No information on average earnings in each socio-economic group is available before an earnings question was introduced into the labour force survey at the end of 1992. For the years since 1971, information on average weekly earnings in each major occupation group can be found in the reports of the new earnings survey, copies of which are available in the Library.

Employment Medical Advisory Service

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received (a) in favour of and (b) against the proposals for the employment medical advisory service; and if he will make a statement. [22803]

Mr. Oppenheim: None.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to change the employment medical advisory service; and if he will make a statement. [22800]

Mr. Oppenheim: In 1994 the Health and Safety Executive began a prior options study to consider whether any of the functions currently carried out by the employment medical advisory service could be undertaken by other means. the report of the study has not yet been completed.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many doctors were employed by the employment medical advisory service in each of the last five years for which figures are available. [22801]

Mr. Oppenheim: The number of doctors employed in the employment medical advisory service of the Health and Safety Executive at 1 April in each of the last five years was as follows:

1991:47
1992:52
1993:55
1994:47
1995:35

The 1995 figures are not completely comparable with those of earlier years due to the effect of changes in the management structure of the service. Numbers are planned to rise to 39.5 by 1 April 1996.

Historical Documents

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what special training is given to persons who have responsibility for assessing the historical significance of documents held by his Department. [23288]

Miss Widdecombe: Training in assessing the historical significance of departmental records is carried out under the guidance of the keeper of public records. It is provided in a number of different ways, including courses on the appraisal of records and through conferences and seminars arranged by the Public Record Office.

Licensed Premises

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were employed in licensed premises in (a) 1980, (b) 1985, (c) 1990 and (d) 1994. [23273]

Mr. Oppenheim: The information requested is provided in the following table:

Employees in licensed premises in Great Britain at December of each year

Thousands

| | 1980 | 1985 | 1990 | 1994 |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Restaurants, snack bars, cafes etc.[1] | 185 | 221 | 306 | 307 |
| Public houses and bars | 236 | 259 | 338 | 329 |
| Nightclubs and licensed clubs | 136 | 141 | 148 | 136 |
| Hotel trade and tourist accommodation[1,2] | 204 | 221 | 274 | 298 |
| Total[3] | 761 | 841 | 1,066 | 1,070 |

Telephones

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what use his Department makes of hand-held and car-based mobile telephones; what were the costs for each financial year of these services since mobile telephones were first introduced to his Department; and how many mobile telephones are currently in use. [23440]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 9 May 1995]: Within the Department, mobile telephone are used by staff whose duties involve travel away from the office or where personal safety may be compromised by the need to work in isolated areas. The costs for each financial year for these services and the number of mobile telephones in use could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps his Department has taken to prevent the cloning of telephones being utilised by his Department; and if his Department has discussed this matter with any official agencies. [23498]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 9 May 1995]: The Department has not identified any effective efforts it could make as a service consumer to prevent cloning of mobile telephones. The Department will be raising this matter with CCTA—the Government Centre for Information Systems—to establish what practical steps can be taken.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what costs his Department has incurred during the last 12 months as a result of cloning of mobile telephones being utilised by his Department, with particular reference to the making of unauthorised calls. [23480]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 9 May 1995]: There is no evidence to suggest that any charges have been incurred as a result of cloning.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many mobile telephones being utilised by his Department have been cloned during the last 12 months. [23504]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 9 May 1995]: There is no evidence to suggest that any of the Department's mobile telephones have been cloned.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations his Department has made to the Department of Trade and Industry concerning the need for legislation to prevent the cloning of mobile telephones. [23477]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 9 May 1995]: The Employment Department has made no representations to the Department of Trade and Industry concerning the need for legislation to prevent the cloning of mobile phones.

Stapro Insecticide

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) for what reasons staff were not evacuated during the spraying of Stapro insecticide at Grays benefit office on 5 October 1991; [22598]

(2) which firm was commissioned to spray Stapro insecticide at Grays benefit office on 5 October 1991; [22599]

(3) pursuant to his answer of 28 April, Official Report, column 717, what are the conditions of approval to which he refers and where they are to be found; and what are the requirements of the consent of use to which he refers and where they are to be found; [22662]

(4) pursuant to his answer of 28 April, Official Report, column 717, if the manner and method of the spraying of the Stapro insecticide at Grays benefit office on 5 October 1991 complied with regulation 4(5) of the Control of Pesticides Regulations 1986. [22663]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 10 May 1995]: Responsibility for the subject of the questions has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given and to keep me informed on progress on this issue.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Andrew Mackinley, dated 11 May 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your questions relating to the spraying of an insecticide at Grays Unemployment Benefit Office on 8 October 1991.

My letter to you of 2 May advised that the contractor employed to undertake the spraying was CDR Services of Tiptree, Essex. We were assured that the chemical used could be sprayed whilst the office was occupied and, in accordance with this, the office was not evacuated. The contractor also assured us that he had complied with the manufacturers instructions, which encompass the conditions for use.

I am not in a position, at this time, to provide you with further information on the conditions for use as we have now been informed by the contractor that the chemical sprayed was not Stapro Insecticide. A letter has been sent to the contractor's solicitors seeking details of the chemical used, which will enable me to provide the information you seek.

I will write to you again as soon as I have received the solicitor's reply.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to the answer of 2 May, Official Report, column 145, what was the chemical sprayed at the Grays benefit office on 5 October 1991. [22912]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 9 May 1995]: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given and to keep me informed of progress on this issue.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Andrew Mackinlay, dated 11 May 1995:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about to the spraying of an insecticide at Grays Unemployment Benefit Office on 8 October 1991.

My letter to you of 2 May advised that the contractor employed to undertake the spraying (CDR Services of Tiptree, Essex) has now informed us orally that the chemical used was not Stapro Insecticide. A letter has been sent to the contractor's solicitors seeking details of the chemical used.

Given these circumstances, I am unable, for the time being, to provide you with the information you seek. However, I will write to you again as soon as I have received the solicitor's reply.

Sikhs (Headwear Exemptions)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make it his policy to seek to arrange for an exemption (a) throughout the United Kingdom and (b) throughout the European Union of the personal protective equipment at work regulations to enable resident Sikhs to wear holy turbans; and if he will make a statement. [23097]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 10 May 1995]: The European directive on the use of personal protective equipment at work does not permit such an exemption. During the negotiations on this directive, the UK pressed for a derogation which would have allowed an exemption to be granted, but was unsuccessful.

Disability Employment Advisers

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what training and information disability employment advisers and special needs careers advisers receive to enable them to advise people with epilepsy accurately about employment and training. [22843]

Miss Widdecombe: The training provided by the Employment Service for disability employment advisers covers a wide range of disabilities, including epilepsy. From July this year, the training will be enhanced. Training will continue to include information about specific disabilities such as epilepsy, and DEAs will be actively encouraged to develop expertise in dealing with specific disability groups.

The additional skills, knowledge and attitudes required of careers officers dealing with young people with special needs are included in the post graduate diploma in careers guidance. Careers officers must hold this or an equivalent qualification.

TREASURY

Exchange Rate

12. Mr. Spellar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his Department's policy regarding the exchange rate with the deutschmark. [22237]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government do not have a policy of targeting the exchange rate against the deutschmark or any other currency. The exchange rate is one of the factors that are considered in determining the appropriate stance of monetary policy.

Structural Adjustment Programmes

13. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has made to the International Monetary Fund to alleviate the effects of structural adjustment programmes on poor and indebted countries. [22239]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government support the International Monetary Fund's policy on structural adjustment programmes. Adhering to a structural adjustment programme will often require difficult decisions by the country concerned. But we believe it is important that requests for lending by international financial institutions be accompanied by sensible conditions. This is in the interests of the countries concerned. Sound economic policies are needed if countries are to achieve sustainable economic growth. The alternative to structural adjustment is slower growth and worse poverty.

Domestic Economy

14. Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the state of the domestic economy. [22240]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Britain is enjoying sustained economic growth with low inflation, which will lead to higher living standards for all.

Economic and Monetary Union

16. Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what submissions he plans to make to the IGC 96 on economic and monetary union. [22242]

25. Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what submissions he proposes to make to the IGC 96 on economic and monetary union. [22251]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Government do not intend to provide any submission to the 1996 intergovernmental conference on any of the articles or associated protocols relating to economic and monetary union, which are contained in the treaty on European Union, as agreed at Maastricht.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which countries currently fulfil the Maastricht conditions for economic and monetary union. [19074]

Mr. Nelson: The question of which countries meet the Maastricht criteria will be decided by the Council on recommendations from the Commission.

Value added Tax (Tourism)

17. Mr. Tyler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made in examining proposals for the harmonisation of value added tax on tourist services throughout the European Union. [22243]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: There are no proposals for the harmonisation of VAT on tourist services throughout the European Union.

Mortgage Interest Relief at Source

18. Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on MIRAS. [22244]

Sir George Young: Mortgage interest relief helps some 10 million borrowers to buy their own homes at an estimated cost to the Exchequer of £2.8 billion in 1995–96.

Teachers' Pay

19. Ms Lynne: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the cost of funding the current teachers' pay award; and what increase in the standard rate of income tax is required to raise this sum. [22245]

Mr. Aitken: The cost in England and Wales of the pay award recommended by the school teachers' pay review body is about £294 million. The estimated full year effect, at 1995–96 income levels, of a 1p change in the basic rate of income tax is £1.9 billion.

Tax Changes

20. Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about recent tax changes. [22246]

Sir George Young: I have received a wide range of representations from hon. Members, organisations and individuals about recent tax changes.

Economic Performance

21. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the performance of the United Kingdom economy in the last two quarters of the 1994–95 12-month period. [22247]

Mr. Aitken: Growth is slowing to a more sustainable rate. Public borrowing and unemployment are falling, and inflation remains low. Living standards continue to rise.

Living Standards

23. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on recent changes in living standards. [22249]

Sir George Young: Real personal disposable income is expected to rise by 1½ per cent. this year. This should mean that households will on average be about £5 per week better off after tax and inflation.

Capital Gains Tax

24. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the loss of revenue to Her Majesty's Treasury of the abolition of capital gains tax. [22250]

Sir George Young: Receipts from tax on the capital gains of individuals, including trustees, and companies are forecast to be £1,650 million in 1995–96, projected to rise to some £3 billion by the turn of the century. This revenue would be lost if tax on capital gains was abolished. A very significant amount of income tax would also be lost due to behavioural effects as returns were taken as gains rather than as income.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the revenue yield in a full year of restricting the annual exempt amount for capital gains tax to relief at (a) 25p and (b) 20p in the pound; and what would be the yield from abolition of the annual exempt amount for CGT, for both individuals and trusts. [23350]

Sir George Young [holding answer 9 May 1995]: Under current rules, net chargeable gains below the capital gains tax annual exempt amount are totally exempt from tax. The effects of restricting this relief at the 25 per cent. and 20 per cent. rates are given in the table, based on forecast 1995–96 liabilities. The estimates assume the restriction would only affect individuals with gains above the annual exempt amount and do not allow for any consequential change in their behaviour.

| | Capital gains tax yield (£ million) |
|---|---|
| Restricting the relief to: | |
| (a) 25 per cent. rate | 40 |
| (b) 20 per cent. rate | 65 |

It is estimated that the cost of the annual exempt amount in 1995–96 amounts to £300 million. However, consequential behavioural effects could alter the yield from abolition.

All figures exclude tax on gains made by companies, which is included under corporation tax.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish estimates for the revenue cost/yield in a full year of altering the top rate of capital gains tax from 40 per cent. to (a) 30 per cent., (b) 35 per cent., (c) 45 per cent., (d) 50 per cent. and (e) 55 per cent., and levying the new rate on those with incomes over (i) £27,825, (ii) £30,000, (iii) £40,000, (iv) £50,000, (v) £60,000, (vi) £70,000, (vii) £80,000, (viii) £90,000, (ix) £100,000, (x) £110,000, (xi) £120,000, (xii) £130,000, (xiii) £140,000 and, (xiv) £150,000, and assuming that where the new top rate is lower than 40 per cent., the 40 per cent. band is abolished, and where it is higher, the 40 per cent. band remains in place. [23353]

Sir George Young [holding answer 9 May 1995]: Estimates for all the requested combinations of top rates and income limits could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Estimated revenue effects for the various top rates and four limits are given below. It has been assumed that capital gains are taxed as if they were the top slice of an individual's income and therefore the limits apply to the total of taxable income and gains. The estimates are based on forecast 1995–96 liabilities and take account of the likely effect of the changes on the volume of disposals in a full year.

Estimated revenue effects (£ million)

| | Top rate of capital gains tax (per cent.) | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | 30 | 35 | 45 | 50 | 55 |
| Taxable income and gains over: | | | | | |
| £27,825 | –120 | –55 | +45 | +75 | +100 |
| £50,000 | –130 | –70 | +40 | +70 | +90 |
| £100,000 | –140 | –90 | +30 | +60 | +80 |
| £150,000 | –150 | –110 | +25 | +50 | +70 |

These figures exclude gains made by companies which are included under corporation tax.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of individuals with capital gains (a) below and (b) in excess of the capital gains tax threshold who pay income tax at 40p in the pound. [23355]

Sir George Young [holding answer 9 May 1995]: It is estimated that 32,500 of the forecast 90,000 capital gains taxpayers with liabilities in 1995–96 will pay income tax at 40p in the pound. However, I regret that reliable estimates are not possible for the number of individuals with net gains below the annual exempt amount.

All figures exclude companies making gains which are charged under corporation tax.

Inflation

26. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about the latest annual rate of inflation. [22253]

Mr. Aitken: The Chancellor receives a variety of representations which reinforce his determination to achieve the Government's objective of permanently low inflation.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the average rate of inflation (a) over the past five years and (b) between 1974 and 1979; and if he will make a statement. [22392]

Mr. Nelson: The average rate of underlying inflation—retail prices index excluding mortgage interest payments—over the past five years was 5 per cent.; between 1974 and 1979 it averaged 14 per cent.

The Government are committed to permanently low inflation. The benefits of low inflation are coming through in healthy growth, based on good export performance, and falling unemployment.

European Bank Notes

27. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had about whose head shall appear on common European currency bank notes. [22254]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Under article 109f(3) of the treaty of European Union the European Monetary Institute is responsible for supervising the technical preparation of ecu banknotes. The EMI has set up a group of national central bank experts to undertake a detailed study. The Chancellor has made it clear to other member states that if the United Kingdom were to participate in a single currency it would attach great importance to the retention of national features on the notes and coins.

Under the UK protocol to the treaty, any decision to seek to join a single currency would be a matter for the UK Government and Parliament.

Executive Remuneration

Ms Hodge: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what new proposals he has with regard to executive remuneration in the privatised utilities. [22241]

Sir George Young: Remuneration is a matter for the companies and their shareholders. The Greenbury committee is reviewing best practice for companies and we will consider the need for any Government measures, if appropriate, in the light of their conclusions.

Summit for Social Development

Ms Corston: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he has taken to ensure that the United Kingdom Government complies with the agreement reached at the world summit for social development to institute regular national reviews of economic policies and budgets in respect of the eradication of poverty and the reduction of inequality. [22238]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The best way to tackle poverty and inequality is by giving people opportunities, promoting wealth creation and helping people back into work. As a result of our policies the average income of all economic groups and family types has risen since we came to office.

Paymaster General (Targets)

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the key targets for 1995–96 for the office of HM Paymaster General. [24047]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Paymaster Agency's key targets for 1995–96 are as follows:

Pensions

meet targets agreed with customers for responding to correspondence and processing associated amendments meet quality targets agreed with customers for processing amendments

Banking

meet agreed transaction timetables for handling banking transactions meet agreed quality targets for processing banking service transactions meet the agreed timetable for sending financial information to the Treasury 95 per cent. of the time and never exceed the timetable by more than one day

APEX

Recovering the full cost of running the agency

obtain sufficient revenue to cover the full costs of running the agency

Reducing unit costs

achieve at least a 10 per cent. reduction in real terms in the average unit cost of paying a pension compared to the previous year achieve a 5 per cent. improvement in the average unit cost index for banking transactions compared to the previous year.

Uniforms

Mr. Dicks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has had from organisations faced with a retrospective demand from the Inland Revenue for taxes to be paid by employees who have to wear a uniform at their place of work as part of their contract of employment. [23314]

Sir George Young [holding answer 9 May 1995]: I am not aware of any such representations, other than my hon. Friend's representations, on behalf of employees who have received clothing from their employer.

Tobacco

Mr. Barron: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last discussed, and when he next plans to discuss, tobacco taxation with (i) European Union Finance Ministers and (ii) Group of Seven member country Finance Ministers; and if he will make a statement. [22970]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Chancellor has not personally discussed tobacco taxation with European Union Finance Ministers. The previous Chancellor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston-upon-Thames (Mr. Lamont), last did so during the discussions leading up to the completion of the single market on 1 January 1993. The subject will be discussed again at the next appropriate meeting of Finance Ministers following publication of the Commission proposals arising from their review of minimum rates of excise duties. We would not normally expect to discuss tobacco taxation in a G7 context.

Mr. Barron: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy in the taxation of tobacco products. [22958]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Government policy is to set duty rates which are consistent with revenue needs and health of the nation objectives but which also take account of industry and retail business concerns.

Mr. Barron: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list, for each year since 1965, the yield, in current and in real terms, from tobacco tax; and what is the estimated yield for the current year. [22956]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The information requested is given in the table.

| | Total tax £ million | Tax in real terms (at 1994–95 prices) £ million |

| 1993–94 | 8,133 | 8,355 |
| 1994–95 | 8,980 | 8,977 |

The forecast for tobacco duty receipts in 1995–96 is £7.2 billion.

Mr. Barron: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current proportion of the purchase price paid in taxation for an average (a) packet of 20 cigarettes, (b) 250 g of hand-rolling tobacco, (c) packet of five cigars, and (d) 250 g of pipe tobacco in each country in (i) the European Union and (ii) the Group of Seven. [22967] n/a = information not readily available.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The information for the European Union member states is given in the table. The information requested is not readily available for the Group of Seven countries in the form required.

Mr. Barron: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list, for each 5p between 5p and £1, his estimate of the revenue raised by an increase in excise duty on an average (a) packet of cigarettes, (b) 250 g of hand-rolling tobacco, (c) packet of five cigars and (d) 250 g of pipe tobacco, if such increases were to be fully reflected in price. [22959]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The information is as follows:

| | Revenue £ million | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Pence | Cigarettes 20 king size | Cigars five small cigars | Hand rolling 250g | Pipe 250g |
| 5 | 235 | 8 | 1 | 0 |

| 100 | 4701 | 156 | 11 | 6 |

Mr. Barron: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the amount in sterling equivalent and/or percentage rate of levied on an average packet of 20 cigarettes in (a) specific excise duty, (b) at valorem excise duty and (c) VAT or other sales tax in each country in (i) the European Union and (ii) the Group of seven including the United Kingdom. [22965]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The information is as follows:

| | | Specific duty £ per 20 | Ad valorem (per cent.) | VAT rate (per cent.) |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Austria | | 0.30 | 41.00 | 20.00 |
| Belgium | | 0.16 | 50.00 | 20.50 |
| Denmark | | 1.39 | 21.22 | 25.00 |

| Canada | high | 1.85 | — | — |
| | low | 0.60 | — | — |
| Japan | | 0.93 | — | 3.00 |

For the United States and Canada, tax rates vary considerably between states. For these countries, the specific duty column shows the total tax burden.

Mr. Barron: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the loss to the Treasury in uncollectable revenue from (a) tobacco, (b) beer, (c) wine and (d) spirits in (i) duty and (ii) VAT from overseas mail order arrangements for selling through a personal agent; and if he will make a statement. [22963]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The duty receipts for the financial year 1994–95 are as follows:

| | £ billion |
|---|---|
| Tobacco | 7.4 |
| Beer | 2.5 |
| Wine | 1.1 |
| Spirits | 1.8 |

The quantities that might be purchased through a personal agent are unknown. Any figure would therefore be wholly speculative.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 259

SESSION 1994–95

1st May—11th May 1995

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes and cannot therefore, be used in connection with the daily part or weekly Hansard. For these versions use the Fortnightly Index.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instruments etc, under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Speaker and deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speaker's rulings and statements'.

Other contributions by Speaker and deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates and Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates, etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R = first reading, 2R = second reading, Money res = money resolution, Comm = Committee stage, Rep = Report stage, 3R = third reading, amendt/amendts = amendment/amendments, * = matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
